House of STUART

THE ERRORS of LATE HISTORIES ARE Discovered and Corrected

Particular Particulars of the History of the House of Stuart, from the first Accession of James VI. to the Death of Charles I. are here presented to the Reader, in a new and more accurate Edition, than has hitherto appeared. The Author has been assisted by the most judicious Critics, and has corrected all the Errors, which were crept into the former Editions. He has also added many new Facts, and has corrected the Dates, which were formerly misstated. The whole is now printed in a new and more elegant Type, and is bound in a new and more durable Binding. The Price is 1s. 6d. per Volume.

TO ALL TRUE ENGLISHMEN, LOVERS of our Present Happy Constitution.

IT is about twenty Years since I was desir'd by some Persons of Eminence, who were very much in your Favour, to undertake the Defence of your Happy Constitution against the furious Attacks of a Powerful Faction, who, in the latter part of Queen Anne's Reign, by false Doctrine, false Argument, by wicked Arts, and delusive Pretences, subverted the best Administration you ever liv'd under; and would have subverted your Religion, Liberty and Laws, had not the good Providence of God interpos'd for your Deliverance, as it had done wonderfully at the Revolution.

In the Prosecution of this Work, I was obliged to look back into the Practices of the Enemies to the Constitution of ENGLAND, ever since the Death of Queen Elizabeth; for till then Englishmen had no Enemies but Foreigners and Papists, and I found all those Practices to be so many Warnings to us to guard against them for the future.

Scarce was that glorious Princess cold in her Grave before there broke out a flaming Zeal for what those Men were then pleas'd to call the Church; by which they, in truth, meant no other than the Tyranny of the High-Commission Court, and the inferior Spiritual Courts under their Protection.

To make this pass with the Prince, their Doctors every where preach'd up the boundless Prerogative of the Crown, the slavish Obedience of the Subject, and the Blessings of Arbitrary Power and Servitude; which in a limited Protestant Government, could not but create ill Blood, as ill Blood always creates Distempers, which become obstinate by Continuance, and are not to be cur'd, but by Remedies equally violent and dangerous.

What then? Must the Patient die for fear the Physick should gripe him? Your Fathers, when the Disease was likely to become mortal, never fail'd of applying a Cure, and never fail'd of Success; tho' the Editors of Lord Clarendon's History, and Archdeacon Echard, represent them as so many Empiricks, who knew neither the Disease nor the Cure, but administer'd the Poison, instead of the Antidote.

The Acceptance which some of my former Endeavours for your Service found with you, in the MEDLEY, THE SECRET HISTORY OF EUROPE, and other Treatises, too numerous to be inserted, inspir'd me with Ambition to produce something more worthy that Honour.

I could think of nothing so necessary, as to discover the Errors in the History of the Rebellion, and Mr. Echard's History; and having so done, to set the Facts in the four Stuarts Reigns in a true light, that the glorious Principles and Practices of your Ancestors, might no longer lie under the Reproach of REBELLION;

—nec dicier Arma Senatus

but be Examples of a brave and necessary Defence of their Religion and Liberty to all Generations.

It is true, we are so happy as to live under a Government, which has the same Foundation with our Liberty, and the joint Security of both is inseparable. But we see every day, especially of late, many wild and insolent Attempts made to blanch the Characters of all the Princes, who in the

D E D I C A T I O N.

the last Century attempted to destroy our Religion, Rights, and Privileges, to set them off as so many Patres Patriæ, and to blacken Your Patriots and Champions, as so many Villains and Scoundrels; the Terms that are made use of, with a traitorous Intent to promote the Interest of a pretended Heir to those Princes, who doubtless inherits their Love to your Religion and Liberty, with the Advantage of having never liv'd in any Country, but where Tyranny and Popery were triumphant; and who consequently can have no Conception, that Heaven has any other Happiness in store for either Prince or People.

You have given me reason to believe, that the Critical Histories of England, and the Comparison of Clarendon with Whitlock, discover'd the Errors of the above-mention'd Historians to your Satisfaction; and to encrease it, I have farther examin'd them en passant in this Work: after which, I hope neither the present Age nor Posterity will be in danger of being impos'd upon and corrupted by them, as it is very plain they would have been, had the Counsels and Actions of your Ancestors been handed down to them with so much Misrepresentation, Partiality and Malice, without Remark and Animadversion. If the Mischief intended by these Writers is prevented, I leave to you to judge of the Importance of the Service, and I can no more doubt of your doing it Justice, than of your Affection and Attachment to the Welfare of your Country.

Some ill Men have maliciously aspers'd the Author, as if he had been hired by a Party to write, what otherwise he had no Concern about: But the Baseness of this Aspersion will appear in almost every Page of his Writings, where the Reader will soon see the Heart speaks with a Sincerity and Ardor, that are not to be bought and sold; and as to the Hire, were it decent for him to explain himself, he could prove the Falshood of that Charge to a degree not easily to be imagin'd or believ'd.

When you have gone thro' the following Reigns, and are come to their Dissolution, in the Accession of King William and Queen Mary to the Throne, will you not look back upon them, as Voyagers do on the boisterous Ocean, after having escap'd Shipwreck, when they stand safe on the solid Shore? Will you not dread the like Tempest, and promise yourselves never again to tempt the Dangers of the Deep? Will you not be deaf to all Persuasion and Flattery, and resolve, as far as in you lies, to enjoy the Calm and Safety you live in, with contented and grateful Minds? Will you not then abhor those restless mutinous Spirits, who endeavour to disturb that Calm, and endanger that Safety? Will you not perceive their pernicious Views, however they disguise them? Will you not distinguish Names from Things, Truth from Falshood, and adhere firmly firmly to the Lessons left you by your Fathers, for the Preservation of the Protestant Religion and Liberty, which so many of them seal'd with their Blood? If I could flatter myself that the remembring these things here, would have so good an Effect, how should I rejoice in the Success of my Labours?

But be that as it will, I shall never cease to pray that your Happiness in the present Constitution, Ecclesiastical and Civil, may be transmitted to your Sons, and their Sons Sons, to the End of Time.

I am,

Your most Humble,

Most Faithful,

And most Devoted Servant.

P R E F A C E.

I were to be wish'd that the Divisions among us in England, and the Mischiefs they have occasion'd since the Death of Queen Elizabeth, were bury'd in everlasting Oblivion; that all Names and Notions of Distinction among Englishmen might be no more heard of, and that a Spirit of Peace and Union might spread over the whole Nation.

It is the Duty and Interest of all Men to contribute to this Blessing to the utmost of their power, and why this is not done, is very easy to be observ'd.

Particular Parties support themselves by particular Views, and no Persuasion or Argument can reconcile them to the General Good, if those Views are lost by it, and the Happiness it would procure is to be in common. A mean and ruinous Way of Thinking, unworthy a wise and generous People! But it has prevail'd so long, and taken so deep root, that it is not to be eradicated by Precept; and if Example has any Prevalency, some benefit may accrue by turning over the following History, where the fatal Effects of Division and Discord will appear in almost every Page, as well before and after the Civil Wars, as during those miserable Times of Devastation and Slaughter.

Yet what Hope is there of succeeding in any Attempt to unite Men's Minds, their divided Opinions and Interests, and reduce them to one sound Principle, that of Liberty Spiritual and Temporal, as long as there is so little Disposition in them to look on things with an impartial Eye, and to judge without Prejudice and Passion?

Perhaps I may myself be thought guilty of that Passion and Prejudice, and to be misled by the same Weakness I condemn in others. It is therefore necessary to consider what is, or ought to be understood by the Word Party; and I wish what I have to say on that Subject were worth the Reader's Attention: for if my Conceptions are right, as I must think they are, till I am better inform'd, I cannot justly be deem'd a Party-man, or pass under that Censure with Men of Reason and Candour, however Appearances may at first sight make against me.

If we have any such thing as a Constitution, and that Constitution is the Bulwark of our Ecclesiastical and Civil Liberties, Rights and Properties, whatever is said or done in defence of it, is for the Advantage of the Commonwealth, of every one in particular, and of all in general; which sure is not a Party, no one Man, nor no Set of Men, having any more Concern in it than another, but in proportion to the Interest he or they have in the Whole.

If this Constitution is founded in the Protestant Religion, a due and impartial Execution of the Laws, a just and equal Administration of Affairs; then all contrary Courses are contrary to the Constitution, and he who adheres to it, cannot be said to be of a Party, because the Constitution is the Whole; and those only are Party-Men, who divide from it, by setting up an arbitrary, partial, unequal, illegal Government, and an Interest separate from that of the Publick. It follows then, that those who stand up in defence of this happy Constitution, when any Breaches are attempted to be made in it, are no more Party-Men, than those who shou'd, in case of Invasion, stand up in defence of their Country; especially since domestick Enemies are more dangerous than foreign, and Treason more to be fear'd than Power.

It will appear plain enough by the History of the Stuartine Kings, that they were continually making Breaches in this Constitution, and endeavouring utterly to subvert it: Those therefore that adher'd to them in such unlawful Endeavours, of course separated from the general Interest, and supported a particular mistaken one, in opposition to it, which render'd them the worst sort of Party-Men; while their Opponents were the only true Sons of the Common-wealth, good Protestants, and good Englishmen, adhering to their Birthright, their Religion, Liberties and Properties, which those Princes, and their Adherents, in so many Instances invaded and violated.

The Facts in the following History being the Proofs of this Assertion, the Question is brought into a narrow Compass; for if the Facts are true, the Argument deduced from them must be so too; upon which Issue I leave it.

I expect that some Persons of too much Indifference in matters of so very great Importance, will be apt to censure this Undertaking, as if it was a reviving antient Animosities, and giving a new Ferment to that ill Blood, which occasion'd the Distempers in the last Century: But these Persons do not consider what great pains have lately been, and are now every day taken to vilify the Principles and Practices of those brave and wise Men, the Hampdens, the Hollis's, the Pym, the Seldens, the Onslow, the Whitlocks, &c. who distinguish'd themselves in Counsel and in Arms, by their Zeal for the Reform'd Religion, the Rights and Privileges of the People.

When the Nation was pretty well reconcil'd to the Principles of the Revolution in Queen Anne's Reign, and the Doctrine of Passive-Obedience and Non-Resistance was become so much a Jest, that it was hardly nam'd, but in Ridicule; when the Cause it was to support, was sinking so fast, that in a little time we were like to hear no more of Hereditary, Unalienable, Indefeasible, Unalterable Right to the Crown, which are all only so many Names for the Pretender: Then did the Party, Enemies to the Revolution, and the Governments founded upon it, bring forth the History of the Rebellion, under the great Name of the Earl of Clarendon; and the Prefacer told her Majesty, That the industrious Propagation of the REBELLIOUS Principles of the last Age, (Pray observe he very decently calls the House of Lords and House of Commons REBELS), Render'd it necessary that she should have an eye towards them. The Tenour of the History is to justify all the arbitrary illegal Acts of Government, which produc'd the Civil War, and to represent the Parliament that oppos'd them, as a Company of hot-headed factious Enthusiasts. But I desire it may be remember'd, the Editors of it were not charg'd with reviving Animosities: And coming out under the Protection of what they were pleas'd to call the Church, no body durst question the Truth of it, till it had done so much Mischief, that the Malady became almost incurable. At last the Critical Histories made way for this, as the best Cure that could be thought of; and as such it is offer'd to the Publick, for whose Service it was written, and in whose favourable Acceptance the Author hopes to find a Reward for all the Labour, Trouble and Expence he has been at, under many Discouragements and Hindrances. The latter indeed seem'd affected, and that by Persons, who, the world would think, should rather have forward'd than hinder'd so useful and laudable an Undertaking.

But these Matters are too particular and personal, to concern the Reader any farther in them.

I have, in more than one Place of this History, mention'd the great reason there is to suspect that the History of the Rebellion, as it was publish'd at Oxford, was not entirely the Work of the Lord Clarendon, who did indeed write a History of those Times, and I doubt not a very good one; wherein as I have been, I believe, well inform'd, the Characters of the Kings, whose Reigns are here written, were very different from what they appear in the Oxford History, and its Copy, Mr. Echard's. I speak this by Hearsay; but Hearsay from a Person superior to all Suspicion, and too illustrious to be nam'd without leave.

I also humbly refer it to the Decision of another very honourable Person, whether there is not, to his Knowledge, such a History in Manuscript still extant; and to a Reverend Doctor now living, whether he did not see the Oxford Copy, by which the Book was printed, alter'd, and interpolated; and the Proofs of the printed Copy, and even the Revises of those Proofs alter'd and interpolated, while it was at the Press.

To which I must add, that there is now in custody of a Gentleman of Distinction, both for Merit and Quality, a History of the Rebellion of the first Folio Edition, scor'd in many Places by Mr. Edmund Smith of Christ-Church, Oxon, Author of that excellent Tragedy, Phædra and Hippolitus, who himself alter'd the Manuscript History; and added, what he has there mark'd, as he confess'd with some of his last Words before his Death. These Alterations, written with his own Hand, and to be seen by any one that knows it, may be publish'd on another occasion, with a farther Account of this Discovery. In the mean time, for the Satisfaction of the Publick, I insert a Letter entire, which I receiv'd since the last Paragraph was written.

To Mr. * * * * *

SIR,

Accidentally looking on some of the Sheets of your History of England, during the Reigns of the Royal House of Stuart, at the Booksellers, I find that you mention the History of Lord Clarendon; wherein you justly question the Genuineness of that Book: In order to put that matter out of Doubt, I here send you the following Account.

Mr. Edmund Smith, a Man very well known in the Learned World, came down to make me a Visit at * * * * * about June, 1710, where he continu'd till he died, about six Weeks after.

As our Conversation chiefly ran upon Learning and History, you may easily think that Clarendon's was not forgotten. Upon mentioning that Book, he frankly told me, "That there had been a fine History written by Lord Clarendon, but what was publish'd under his Name was only Patch-Work, and might as properly be call'd the History of Al. . . . Small . . . . and Atterbury, for to his knowledge 'twas alter'd; nay, that he himself was employ'd by them to interpolate and alter the Original."

He then ask'd me, Whether I had the Book by me? if I had, he would convince me of the Truth of his Assertion by the very printed Copy. I immediately brought him the Folio Edition; and the first thing he turn'd to, was the Character of Mr. Hampden, where is that Expression of, "He had a Head to contrive, a Heart to conceive, and a Hand to execute any Villany." He then declar'd it was foisted in by those Reverends.

SIR,

I have only to add this, That he not only underlin'd this Passage as a Forgery, but gave, during the short time he liv'd with me, the same Remark to some Hundreds more.

I am, Sir, &c.

Tho' this Information differs a little from my former, mention'd in the Body of the Book, yet it, in the main, confirms it, and comes from a Person of so much Honour and Worth, as leaves not the least room to doubt it. The Original of this Letter is and shall be forthcoming. It has been read by all my Booksellers, and the Gentleman who wrote it, is ready to attest the Truth of it.

And now what a Farce was play'd in the History of the Rebellion, its Dedication, and Prefaces; all which were publish'd, as was thought, seasonably, to prevent Queen Anne's putting her Affairs into the Hands of those Ministers, who rais'd the Reputation of England higher than ever it had been perhaps in any preceding Reign, Plantagenet or Tudor? And what was their Reward? What the fatal and shameful Effects of shifting those Hands, and putting in their Places——our Enemies will tell the rest with pleasure, as said the Right Reverend Father Bishop Fleetwood?

It was the History of the Rebellion, and the Preachments that were made upon it, which in a great measure rais'd that wicked Spirit which threw the Kingdom into Distraction and Confusion in Sacheverell's Time, robb'd it of all the Fruits of so many glorious Victories, and reduced it to a State of Dishonour and Contempt, like that of the Reigns we have been writing.

Was it not then necessary for Posterity, The present Age, 'tis to be hoped, are made wiser by such late dear-bought Experience; I say, for Posterity to have an Antidote for the Poison? An Antidote is in this History, which we trust will descend to them, and answer its End, notwithstanding the Impediments it has met with.—Of which no more at present.

I am far from thinking that no part of the History of the Rebellion was written by Lord Clarendon. The Fruitfulness of the Imagination, the Beauty and Variety of Colouring, and above all, the Redundancy of Expression, are Proofs to the contrary, tho' they are all well imitated in the Alterations: but it appears at first sight, that those who directed those Alterations were zealous for the Laudæan Hierarchy, the Honours and Emoluments thereunto belonging, which no Lay-Hand would have labour'd so much.

Besides, it is not possible for an Historian, who treats of a Contest in a Nation divided into two Parties, to range all the Heroes on one side, and all the Poltrons on the other, with any regard to Fact and Truth. Heat here prevail'd over

Judgment, and who are the Hot Men when their Interests and Prerogatives are in question, I leave to every one to judge.

The Wonder is very much magnify'd by the Editors ranging all those Heroes on the side of Tyranny, the worst Cause that can be, and all the Poltrons on that of Liberty, which is the best.

Lucan, in his Poetical History, written almost 1700 Tears ago, and 1200 Miles off, describes the Parties engag'd in our unhappy Civil Wars, more justly and naturally than is done in the History of the Rebellion. We find there the General of the Senate's or Parliament's Army thus haranguing his Soldiers the Roundheads of Old Rome:

O scelerum Ultores, melioraque signa secuti:
O vere Romana manus: quibus Arma Senatus
Non privata dedit, votis deposite pugnam.

*Ye brave Avengers of your Country's Wrong,
You who to Rome and Liberty belong;
Whose Breasts our Fathers Virtue truly warms, Whose Hands the Senate's sacred Order arms:
With chearful Ardor meet, &c.*

ROWE.

He then charges Cæsar and his Followers, the Roman Cavaliers, with beginning the Civil War, as King Charles I. and his Cavaliers, were always charg'd by the Parliament, and by all fair and impartial Historians.

Jam tetigit Sanguis pollutos CÆSARIS Enses:
Dij melius, Belli tulimus quod Damna priores, Coepit inde nefas. Nec dicier Arma Senatus
Bella superba decet, sed Patriæ Vindictis Iram.

*Now CÆSAR's Sword with Roman Blood is stain'd;
The Fates this Field for our Defence ordain'd:
His Lawless Rage the Senate long did bear, Patient of Ills, till he began the War.
Some other Term to their just Arms belongs,
A righteous Vengeance of their Country's Wrongs.*

We have a very lively Image of the Armies of Greenville and Goring in the West, as they are left us in the History of the Rebellion, and of the Sack and Slaughter at the taking of Bristol, Leicester, &c. by the Royalists.

—————Neque enim ista vocari Prælia justa decet—————
Nec magis hoc Bellum est, quam cum Catilina paravit
Arsum in tecta faces, sociusq; Furoris Lentulus, exertique manus vesana Cethegi.
O Rabies miseranda ducis!

*Yet call not it a War to which we go,
We seek a Malefactor, not a Foe.
Rome's awful injur'd Majesty demands
The Punishment of Traytors at our hands*.
If this be War, then War was wag'd of old,
By curst Cethegus, Catiline the Bold;
By every Villain's Hand who durst conspire,
In Murder, Robbery, or Midnight Fire.
Oh wretched Rage! Thee, Cæsar, &c.*

ROWE.

---

* The Punishment of Delinquents was declar'd by King Charles II's first Parliament to be a just Cause for that War, which the Editors of Lord Clarendon's History call the Grand Rebellion.

One thing more is observable in this Translation of Mr. Rowe's, and that is his Negligence of Decorums. He sticks not to call the Emperor Julius Cæsar MALEFACTOR, and his Adherents VILLAINS, a Term which is sufficiently warranted by the Example of the History of the Rebellion, and Archdeacon Echard's History, when they speak of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, and their Adherents. Whoever reads Lucan's Pharsalia, finds a thousand Parallels for our Civil Wars as to Things; but as to Persons, the Character even of Cæsar's Romans can by no means be lower'd to that of our Cavaliers; tho' I think the Hampdens and the Pym's were as truly Roman, in Principle and Practice, as the Cato's and Scipio's.

If I have any where spoken of the Earl of Clarendon as the Author of the Oxford History, I spoke it when I had not had so good Information, and was in some doubt concerning it, tho' very little, for the Reasons here suggested, and its unparallel'd and undisguis'd Partiality.

Mr. Echard's History is a poor Copy of the History of the Rebellion. He has copy'd the very Foibles of it, the Overflowings of Fancy and Expression, as well as the Errors in Fact; and I could not make room for my own History, without removing the Rubbish which those Historians had laid in my way: a Work which, while I was upon it, put me often in mind of the Augæan Stable.

However, what I have said of those Historians, has no more Malice nor Rancour in it, than the Pleadings of a Lawyer, who, to make good his Cause, bears hard on his Antagonist, and perhaps dines with him as soon as the Trial is over; nevertheless with this difference, that the Author has made a Conscience of saying any thing which he believ'd was not true. A Scruple that, 'tis to be fear'd, is not always observ'd in Pleadings.

I have heard some Gentlemen express their Fears, that there would be too much Warmth in this History. If by Warmth they mean Spirit, their Apprehension of it were enough to make one vain; but since I'm afraid by Warmth they mean Scurrility and Virulence, it will require some Explanation.

If I had affected any such Indecencies, I should not think the Examples of the Author of the History of the Rebellion, and Mr. Archdeacon Echard, nor even those of King Charles I. and his Son King Charles II. would justify me, tho' the Parliament are often call'd Devils, Dogs, Villains, Vipers, Rogues; and Mr. Archdeacon descends so low as Son of a Whore, when he is taking to task the Evidence against the Papists about the Plot. But the Facts I was oblig'd to relate were sometimes so foul, that it was impossible to preserve always the Purity of Expression, or to meet with so much Injustice, Cruelty, and Insolence, as will here be met with, and not kindle a little with Indignation; which is not inconsistent even with Stoicism, when the Cause of our Country is in question. All the favour I desire in this case is, that the Reader will not leap over Mountains in their Histories, and stumble at Mole-Hills in mine.

The Ancients had a very great Advantage over the Moderns in writing History; they had Liberty of Genius, and were under no Restraints but those of Truth and Decency: which, as to Decency was none at all, because with them what was true was decent. The Freedom of ancient Greece and Rome appear'd in all their Writings, and the Greatness of Soul in Greeks and Romans, a happy Effect of that Freedom, privileg'd every Citizen to speak and write what he thought would conduce most to the common Good, whether it reflect'd on Archons or Consuls, Senators or Priests. King Charles II. asking Vossius why it was, the Ancients wrote better than the Moderns, that Learned Critick reply'd, The Ancients wrote in Free Governments, where Learning only flourishes. When afterwards Rome had lost her Liberty, her new Masters, the Emperors, did not presently tie up the Tongues, and put Fetters on the Pens of the Romans; not only Augustus, but Tiberius bore even with the Invectives of those Historians, who could not bear the Slavery they impos'd upon them, nor forget the Happiness and Glory of the Republick. Tacitus, tho' Contemporary with the Tyranny of Domitian, blesses himself for the Privilege, which the Romans still enjoy'd, 100 Years after the Commonwealth had no more a Being, Rara Temporum Felicitate, ubi sentire quæ velis, & quæ sentias dicere licet. They think what they please, and speak what they think: And whenever that Privilege ceases, it is to be hop'd History will cease with it; for it must then degenerate into Flattery, and so misrepresent Persons and Things, that Posterity would know no more of past Times, than we could do of the Civil Wars, their Causes and Effects, by what we read in the History of the Rebellion, and Archdeacon Echard's; which disagreeing with Rushworth, Whitlock, and other fair Writers, so acknowledg'd by Mr. Echard, must be themselves unfair.

It is very probable I may be censur'd for speaking freely of the Kings in the following Reigns, but I assure myself that Censure will be pass'd by such only as are not sufficiently acquainted with the Rules and Manners of History; as Mr. Archdeacon shews he is not, when he values himself on his considering those Kings chiefly according to the Dignity of their Offices, which borders so near upon Nonsense, that it is ridiculous or unintelligible: For when Kings do not maintain the Dignity of their Offices, which is to govern according to Law and Justice, the Endeavours of an Historian to do it for them, will be vain and fruitless. He adds, He has been fearful of examining and exposing their private Vices and Extravagancies. Decency commands to throw them into Shades. To search into their Recesses, is presumptuous. Ought not an Historian to examine into the Waste of the immense Treasures squander'd by King Charles II. for fear of discovering they were consum'd by the Ladies? Does Decency command us to throw his Double-dealing with God and Man, in pretending Zeal for the Protestant Religion, when he was a Papist, into Shades? Should we not search into the Recesses of his Negotiations with France for a Pension, to enable him to live without Parliaments, lest we be guilty of Presumption?

The Noble Lord Hollis, that Patriot and Confessor for the Cause of Liberty in two of the following Reigns, did not think it presumptuous to search into this Recel, and to charge King Charles II. with conspiring the Subversion and Destruction of the Protestant Religion, as will be seen, p. 647. How idly then does the Archdeacon talk of treating that Prince, chiefly according to the Dignity of his Office? Had Lord Hollis so treated him, we should never have known that he had enter'd into a League to subvert and destroy the Church of England, which must always be understood in the first place, when the Protestant Religion is mention'd, as it is by my Lord Hollis: For the True Church of England, such as it was in the Days of King Edward VI. such as it was under Archbishop Grindal, Archbishop Abbot, and many other pious primitive Bishops even in the Stuartine Reigns, such as it has been ever since the Abdication of King James II. and such as it is now under her present Fathers, eminent for Learning and all Christian and Humane Virtues; I say, this True Church of England, is the True Protestant Religion, and so acknowledg'd, and as such reverenc'd by all the Reform'd in Christendom.

I desire the Reader to take particular notice, that Lord Hollis charges King Charles II. with a Design to subvert the Religion of his Country; and then to read what Dr. Welwood says of Cæsar. Lucan is not content, only to deliver him down to Posterity, as the Subverter of the Laws and Liberties of his Country, which he truly was, and than which no greater Infamy can possibly be cast upon any Name; but, &c. How afraid some Persons have been, lest I should be too warm, as if Infamy could be too warmly dealt with! Lord Hollis and Dr. Welwood are my Counsel in this Case.

I know some ignorant Persons among the Disaffected, who abound with them, have objected, that to say any thing of the Princes of the House of Stuart, is raking the Ashes of the Dead, of whom nothing should be said but what is good; which is very just as to private Characters, De Mortuis nil nisi Bonum. If they offended, they will offend no more. They stood on low Ground, were little seen or observ'd. They and their Actions pass off like a Dream. We should be silent with respect to those on whom Death has impos'd eternal Silence. To take advantage of their Mortality to insult and defame them, is barbarous and impious. However, it is not so as to Princes, otherwise than as Defamation and Insolence are always impious and barbarous. Their Vices are contagious, and infect whole Kingdoms. Their Actions live, and affect the Living, when they are mouldering in their superb Monuments. They stood on the most lofty Ground, and their Examples are like glorious Suns, to enlighten and enliven all those that come after them; or like Beacons, to shew when and where there is Danger, and warn People to be upon their Guard. If nothing but what is Good was to be said of Emperors and Kings, we had never heard of the Fate of Uriah, or the Fortune of his Wife; and of the Twelve Cæsars, we had never had the History but of three or four. Were there any thing in this Objection, it would damn all History at once; which, being universally allow'd to be the most useful, as well as pleasant Part of Literature, needs no Defence from us.

It is great pity Mr. Archdeacon had not inform'd himself better of the Duty of an Historian, before he took upon him that Character. He has not only consider'd the Stuartine Kings chiefly according to the Dignity of their Offices, he has done the same by their Ancestor Mary Queen of Scots, whom I have spoken of, according to the Truth of History, prov'd by Mr. Anderson in his Collection of Records; in defiance of which, Mr. Echard asserts, She was a Princess of singular Piety towards God:

But,

But, as he sometimes does, a Line or two after he contradicts himself, and says, It was believ'd her Misfortunes proceeded from the Vengeance of Heaven, for such secret Crimes of her's, as Anderson, who search'd into the Reccsies of her Conduct, has made publick.

I beg leave to copy from the Critical History a Paragraph or two on this Subject, since it very much behoves me to vindicate myself for not following Mr. Echard's Precept with respect to Decorums, tho' instead of a Vindication, I might have urg'd his not having follow'd it himself; but better Authority will be requir'd of me, and better I cannot have, than that of our late Protestant Queen Mary, whose adorable Virtues will make her Memory ever dear to all good Britons; who, tho' she had more reason to resent any hard Sayings against her Ancestor Mary Queen of Scots, than all Mankind besides, justify'd the speaking of her more freely than I have done: for asking Dr. Burnet, when she was Princess of Orange, why King James her Father was so sharpen'd against Monsieur Jurieu? and the Doctor telling her, It was for some Indecencies spoken of Mary Queen of Scots, which cast Reflections on them that descended from her: That divine Princess reply'd, Jurieu must support the Cause he defends, and expose those that persecuted it in the best way he can; if what he says of Mary Queen of Scots be true, he is not to be blam'd, who made that use of it. Which is a full Answer to all that can be said of my speaking freely of that Queen or her Descendants; and I shall have reason to despise it, till a better Authority, than that Religious and Belov'd Princess who said it, is produc'd against me. She was pleas'd to add, If Princes will do ill Things, they must expect the World will take Revenge of their Memory, since they cannot reach their Persons. That is but a small Suffering, far short of what others suffer at their hands. Sentiments so just and angelical, as shew how much superiour a true Christian Spirit is to all Humane Wisdom and Philosophy. Upon another Occasion, hearing some Historians blam'd for reflecting on the Memory of certain Princes, she said, If those Princes were really such as those Historians represented them, they well deserv'd that Treatment; and others, who tread their Steps, might look for the same; for Truth will be told at last. These Lessons having the Sanction of so Wise, so Virtuous, so Illustrious a Princess, need not be confirm'd by any other. Indeed all other would, after these, be poor and languishing. Those that demand more, will find enough to convince them, if they are capable of Conviction, in the Introduction to the second Volume of the Critical History, where I have also discuss'd this Matter, and where a greater Freedom of both Thought and Expression than will be found in this History, is warranted by both the Precepts and Examples of ancient and modern Criticks and Historians. A Reflection which will arm me against all arbitrary Decisions, that the Work is too warm; for till the Reasons and Authorities that are urg'd here and there for such Freedom are answer'd, I shall not reckon myself touch'd in any such Charge, nor be concern'd about it, but very reasonably assure myself that those who make it know nothing of the matter: especially considering, that some who have seen part of this History, have really thought it not warm enough; and how to steer safely between two such Rocks, not warm enough, and too warm, was equally difficult and dangerous. A Writer in this case is to follow the best Light that offers; and the Reader will but do him justice, if he allows, that probably he who seriously study'd both Thought and Expression, may as well be in the right, as he who runs them over cursorily for Amusement and Pleasure.

The next Hold the Enemies to this Design will endeavour to take of me, will be from those Passages that speak of, Episcopacy, Bishops and Clergy, which they will be sure to call the Church, in the sense Archbishop Laud and his Disciples understood it; Altars, Images, Consecrations, Tapers, Bowings, Forms, Mitres, Crosciers, Hoods, Titles, Territories, Courts and Revenues. In which sense Bishop Burnet says there's a Charm in the Word, which gives it all Shapes, and applies it to all Uses: But I desire to be permitted to understand Church in a Primitive Apostolical Sense, a Congregation of Christian Believers, met together to worship God in Sincerity and Truth; and if I have in any place given offence to that Church, I am inexcusable, and at mercy. As this Definition is far from excluding Bishops, who had Pastoral Care of the Churches so early as the Apostles Days: so neither does it unchurch foreign Protestants, nor those in England, Scotland, and Ireland, who are not under Episcopal Discipline; which being the Establishment, requires the Respect and Homage that are due to the Law, when it is exercis'd with Prudence and Moderation, as we have seen it ever since the Revolution; and had the like Episcopal Discipline prevail'd in the Church, and had the like Reverend, Pious and Learned Fathers, the Bishops, had the Exercise of it from the Beginning of the Reformation till now; the Church had never been in Danger, nor the State in any Trouble about it. But having consider'd what may be objected on this Article in the Preface to the Critical History before cited, I chuse to borrow what is there said, because I have been inform'd, it has given Satisfaction to some who were prepar'd to take Offence at the bare mentioning of the Bishops and Clergy.

"As it was necessary to name the ill Instruments made use of in carrying on the bad Work, during the Reigns after Queen Elizabeth, and those ill Instruments consisting of Ecclesiasticks, as well as Lay-Men, I could not avoid making frequent mention of the former; not out of any Disregard to the Sacred Function, but to answer the Truth of History, and lay the Mischiefs which have happen'd to these Kingdoms since that time, at the doors of those that did them.

"I know very well that the Clergy of the Church of England are the best Defence and Ornament of the Protestant Religion, and that both in City and Country there are many, for whom one cannot have too much Deference. I must needs own the Malignity has lain chiefly among the rural Priesthood; but among them have I also met with many Pious and Learned Ministers, Men of good Sense and Worth, whose Minds have been larger, and more ingenuous, than to give into the rigid Notions of such as have been misled by Pride, Passion, Interest, and Ignorance, as were the Laudæan Persecuting Clergy, who, and who only, are spoken of in the following History with any Disadvantage to their Character; and it is with great Pleasure that I have lately observ'd the Number of the latter to be much diminish'd."

I cannot think any of those good Men will apply to themselves what is said of such as have not their Virtues and Abilities; or that those who have given no Offence by their Conduct, will be offended at what is said of those who have. Let me have this Quarter from them, and I desire no more.

I shall doubtless be cavill'd at by the smaller Criticks, for mixing ludicrous Expressions with the Gravity of History. I know what they have been taught of its Dignity and Majesty, that comparing it with Musick, it must be all of the solemn Cathedral Kind: And as we are told by the Connoisseurs, that Musick cannot descend lower than the Gay, so also History cannot descend lower than the Pleasant; that neither of them admit of Mirth and Laughter, and consequently Jest should be turn'd out of History, as Jiggs out of Musick. And in the general this is true; but as there are no Generals without Exceptions, so the History of England, during the Period here treated, is an Exception to all Historical Rules, both Persons and Things being the most out of the way of any that were ever thought worth remembrance.

Now, as Wickedness and Folly are constant Companions, among a great many wicked Acts we must necessarily find a great many foolish ones; and 'tis as natural for Folly to excite Mirth, as for Wickedness to move Terror.

The Steps which Fools take to carry a Point, will always bear the Marks of their Folly; their Pretences will be vain and positive, their Disguises thin and apparent, their Assertions bold and absurd, their Principles false and inconsistent: In all which is the Ridiculum, as much as in Falstaffe or Foppington; and it is impossible to keep them company, and much less to shew them, without laughing. I need not say who are the Fools in this History, their Actions will sufficiently bewray them: and I must confess I could not help, amidst so much Provocation, being sometimes merry myself, and endeavouring to make the Reader so. To be always declaiming against cruel and illegal Acts of Government, exorbitant Taxes, Fines, Punishments, tyrannous Prelates and their Courts, ravenous Minions, Mistresses and Ministers, and whatever else is peculiar to these Reigns, would have been like beginning a Tragedy with the Catastrophe, and staining every Scene with Blood, without any Relief to the Spectator; for the ease of whose Mind, it has been found convenient to have a Run of Farce, for which the Heroes of the History of the Rebellion, have plentifully supply'd us with Materials. I have not avoided making frequent use of the Irony, tho' I was caution'd against it in an Apprehension that weak and wrong Heads wou'd not distinguish Jest from Earnest. But no Author, I believe, proposes to himself the Entertainment of wrong and weak Heads; if he does, he runs a great risk of entertaining no body else, and then I leave it to him to think how laudably he will spend his Time, and his Study. I could not be convinc'd that the Stile of Indictment would be always more agreeable and useful than that of Raillery, which is the surest way to keep the Reader awake, who will be apt to fall asleep under perpetual Declamation, and Remonstrance.

As to the Scotch and Irish Affairs, I have not enter'd far into that History: I should have gone much farther, especially as to the Affairs of Scotland, if I had been so happy as to have known some worthy Gentlemen, who could and would have assisted me, so well before I had finish'd this Work, as I have done since. And as to Ireland, I knew little of the Transactions there, but what are in the common Memoirs. Besides, in the forming of this Design, I had in view chiefly the History of England, as the Title shews, and intended only to touch the History of the other two Kingdoms as it came in my way; not out of Disrespect, for I ever regarded them as England's most dear Sisters, but for want of more Room and more Information.

The Helps I receiv'd towards carrying on this Work, by Manuscripts and Information, were, as will be easily perceiv'd, very considerable from Persons of Ability and Eminence, whose Names, tho' they wou'd do honour to my History, I dare not publish without their Approbation: It wou'd be neither decent nor discreet, and might hazard the Loss of their Good Will, and Good Offices on another occasion. I do not examine what Reason there may be for any Shyness in this case, because it ought to have affected me more than others, if it has really weight in it. Shou'd I be in an Error, 'tis so pleasing a one, that I am as loth to come out of it, as young People are to awake out of those Dreams, in which their Fancies took pleasure.

The Assistance I had by printed Histories, old Pamphlets, and State-Papers, was at least as good as any Historian cou'd hope for, and it will be allow'd when it is known, that I was assisted by Francis Bennet Esq; of Merefield in Dorsetshire, and Dr. Fraser of London, who had been fifty Years making Collections of Histories, Pamphlets and Papers proper for my Subject. I might add many other Names of Gentlemen, who furnish'd me with the like Materials; but many other Names wou'd come short of those two, and are therefore unnecessary.

I have mention'd one great Advantage the Ancients had over the Moderns in writing History, which was the Liberty of their Genius, and they had another, which was the Credit they were in with their Readers; we do not find the Margents of Thucydides and Livy crouded with Authorities. The Historian's own Word was taken, but now an Author must bring somebody to be bound for him; tho' if a Reader cannot trust a Writer, he had better have no Dealings with him. If a Man's Conscience will let him lye in History, his Discretion will hardly restrain him. Quotations are no infallible Security against the Fraud and Artifice of an Historian, if his own Honour is not engag'd. However, I have mention'd my Authorities in most Places out of Complacency to the Infidelity of the Age; and when I have not so done, it is generally when the Facts have not been of much consequence, or were so well known, that they attested themselves.

There happen in this difficult Period many Events, which may be suspected, and several Reflections, more proper for others to make than the Author; which has led him to the use of some Writers, of whose Merit he had no great Esteem, tho' never but in Places where he thought what they said was true, a Rule he set himself from the Beginning, and pursu'd it to the End of his Work, and where they corroborated other Evidence. Of this kind are Peyton, Welden, Walker, Lilly, Coke. He has here and there not told the whole Truth, it being too strong for weak Stomachs; tho' he shou'd have ventur'd to have reported, that Queen Anne of Denmark, Consort to King James the First, died a Papist, had he known it in time. It were to be wish'd Gentlemen had been earlier with their Communication, and wou'd be so for the future, if he writes the succeeding Reigns.

The Historian has, from the Freedom of his Thoughts and Expression, reason to expect various Attacks from various Sorts of Persons, every one of whom will mistake him and his Meaning, if they interpret him in any other Sense than that of the Protestant Religion, and Protestant Succession; the Rights, Liberties, Properties and Privileges of Britons. But if any of these mistaken People shall treat him as a Man who loves and endeavours to serve his Country deserves to be treated, with Moderation and Decency, he will do his utmost to undeceive them; and if he is deceiv'd himself, own it, and sincerely thank those that shall set him right, where he is wrong. He has no where err'd willingly, or knowingly, and in case it should so happen by Misinformation or Misunderstanding, he wou'd be so far from being asham'd of owning an Error, that he shou'd take a pride in it, as doing a Service to Truth.

Whatever Criticisms are made on his History, he hopes they will be according to the Rule of Horace and Longinus, those great Master Criticks. Horace says,

—non ego paucis
Offendar Maculis; quas aut Incuria fudit,
Aut humana parum cavit Natura—

I will not quarrel with a slight Mistake,
Such as our Nature's Frailty may excuse. Rosc.

No Author shou'd be condemn'd for Slips and Negligences, which may have escap'd him thro' Incaution, or the Imperfection of Human Nature. Longinus explains this farther in his thirtieth Chapter. Of this kind are two or three Repetitions in these four Reigns; so also are was for were, is for are, their Contraries, and the like. Of this

this kind are Errors in Figures, Dates, or Sums, which, as well as the others, are for the most part Print-Faults; and those who would quarrel with him on their account, must do it for quarrelling sake, and be a Sort of People, with whom he would avoid Contention, as much as with a litigious, vexatious Petty-fogger, or a snarling, cavilling Pedant. As these Oversights are easily perceiv'd, so they are easily corrected, and a small Portion of Candour will excuse them, considering so great a Number of Sheets past through the Press in little more than three Months. As for the Common Answerers, such as fell immediately on Bishop Burnet's Memoirs, and wait for the coming out of a Book, as Ravens and Crows hover over a Field of Battle for Prey; as for the Weekly Scriblers, &c. he will not trouble himself about them, and probably he'll never hear, as he never will care, what they say.

Some worthy Gentlemen have intimated, they shou'd have been better pleas'd, had the History been continu'd to the Death of his late Majesty King George, or at least to that of Queen Anne, as the last of the direct Line of Stuart; but that would have broken in upon my Design, which I set a sort of value upon for its Simplicity, it being only an historical Plan of the Design of the Stuartine Kings to subvert the Constitution, in which the Female Branches had no Concern, and consequently cou'd not regularly come into this History: Besides, the Reign of King Willam, who had the sole Exercise of the Sovereign Power, put an end to that of the Royal House of Stuart, which reviv'd again in Queen Anne, and again died with her.

I confess I have little hope that the Simplicity of Design, which I set such a value upon, will have the like Merit with the Readers; for all Histories which have hitherto been publish'd in English, have not the Appearance of any. They are for the most part a Confusion of Method and Events, Journals, Annals, Biography, without regard to Conduct or Stile. The Stile of the History of the Rebellion, as florid as it is, is as vicious in History, as Musick would be in a Sermon. 'Tis declamatory and verbose to a Prodigy, and almost all other historical Stiles, are either so poor or so affected, that it is very plain the Historians were not Masters of their Art.

There is a Difficulty in the first Thought of Undertaking the Reigns since the Revolution, which is hard to be got over; and that is, that the Events are recent, and the Persons who transacted them either living, or their Sons, Grandsons, or Great Grandsons, who will take the Alarm at the very Sound of their Names.

We are all of us so jealous of our Glory, that we cannot bear any Report, which touches ever so little those we are a-kin to, for fear it shou'd be any Diminution of it. A Report being true, is so far from justifying it, that it adds to the Offence, and if the Heroism does not descend with the Name thro' every Generation, the Historian is in peril of making the Race his Enemies. There is something very silly and ridiculous in this Vanity, but that does not hinder its prevailing. It is no more a shame to me that my Father or Grandfather was a weak or ill Man, than that he was Crooked, or a Cripple, I cou'd no more help the one than the other; and no Man is accountable for what he cannot help: Yet I am afraid the remembring even bodily Infirmities wou'd be constru'd to be Scandal and Malice, and put an Author at variance with a whole Clan. Nay, I shou'd not have wonder'd if Banks the Poet had been prosecuted for bringing Lord Burleigh's Humpback upon the Stage, in his Earl of Essex. True it is, this was not the way of thinking in the Classcal Ages; if it had, there had been no such thing as History: but there being two or three other things, in which we differ from the Greeks and Romans, we will dwell no longer upon this.

Will it be any Complement to the Age we live in, for their Understanding and Generosity, that the second Part of Bishop Burnet's History of his Times is not printed, because some Passages in it reflect on the Conduct of certain Persons, whose Sons and Grandsons might be offended! Is it possible to write the History of any Nation and Time without such Passages, unless one can suppose it was an Age of Gold, and all those who liv'd in it were Heroes and Demi-Gods? It is a very whimsical Business, when'tis a little thought of.

I have collected Materials for the Reigns of King William, Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King George; and if I meet with no other Discouragement than this vain Humour, I shall continue my History in another Volume to the Death of his late Majesty, and take my Fate with Truth, which is great, and will prevail. In those good Reigns there will be little need of Political Reflections, they are too full of Action and Glory to suffer any Interruption in the Narration, except a cloudy Interval or two in part of King William's Reign, and the latter End of Queen Anne's.

I begin the Year always with the first of January, as it has always been in use among Historians, a few Instances of English Writers excepted. The Computation from the 25th of March is peculiar to Law and Commerce, and that too chiefly in England; tho' I know not for what reason, it having already occasion'd great Confusion, especially in History.

INTRODUCTION.

NOTHING has more corrupted the Truth of History, than the false Representations of the several Reforms which have been attempted in the Christian Church since it fell under the Tyranny of the Bishop of Rome. The Reformers have always been charged with Heresy and Schism, Sedition and Fanaticism, with broaching new Doctrine and novel Discipline: It being asserted, with the greatest Assurance, by all Writers who usurp the Character of Orthodox, that the Government of the Primitive Church was by Archbishops, Bishops, Déans, and Chapters, Archdeacons, Chancellors, and the like, in the very same Form as at present in the Church of France as well as England; and that Presbytery was not so much as known till about the Year 1564.

It may seem strange to begin a History of England with Reflections on Ecclesiastical Government; but it will appear very natural, when the Reader observes, that all the Troubles and Misfortunes during the Reigns I am about writing, were owing solely to the Spirit that animated this Controversy; which is really much more temporal than spiritual, and concerns the State much more than the Church: For take away the Dignities, Revenues, Courts, Privileges, and Prerogatives, which are all civil Matters, and Protestants would soon agree in the Ecclesiastical, as exhibited in the Apostolical Constitution.

But the temporal Part, those Dignities, Revenues, Courts, Privileges, and Prerogatives, which were impossible to be establish'd till the Empire became Christian, are now asserted to be the very Essence of that Church, which had a Being several hundred Years before there cou'd be any such Establishment: The Powers of the World being then Enemies to the Kingdom of Christ; whose Subjects did not then understand, that Dominion and Lordships were the Inheritance he left them.

'Tis very easy to conceive, that worldly Things wou'd make a strong Impression on worldly Minds, and that those who were in Possession of them, wou'd not be willing to part with them, or to exchange Power for Purity, and Revenue for Reformation. And, on the other hand, that Men of Conscience and Principle, convinced of the abominable Corruptions of the Church of Rome, wou'd abhor all her superstitious Innovations, and be zealous for a Reformation agreeable to the Gospel and the Practice of the first Christians. On the Side of the former, were Pride, Avarice, Bigotry, and Ignorance. On the side of the latter, were only Knowledge, Piety, and Conscience. In such a Contest, the most enlighten'd must needs be the least prevalent, as long as Men are governed by their Senses and Passions, more than by their Understanding and Reason; which, as it was from the beginning, is likely to last till the End of all Things.

The Princes of the Earth, from whom the spiritual Hierarchy derive their temporal Honours and Riches, have always been flatter'd by the most corrupt of them, with divine and unlimited Authority; in which they have, in return, been admitted to a Share to the Ruin of Religion, and the Oppression of the People.

There have not in all Ages been wanting godly and zealous Men, who have born their Testimony against Superstition and Tyranny: And they have, in all Ages, found Encouragement from those noble and virtuous Persons, who wou'd sometimes protect as well as encourage them.

The Aggressors, therefore, from the beginning, are those, who, renouncing the sacred Liberty of the Gospel, submitted to the Papal; more grievous than Egyptian, Bondage; and when Freedom was offer'd at the Reformation, still retain'd those Marks and Blemishes of Slavery, which were rejected by the far greater Body of reformed Christians.

Is it not astonishing, that a Dignitary of our Church shou'd know so little of ecclesiastical Affairs, as to assert the Geneva Discipline to be novel, a Thing not heard of in England till many Years after the Reformation?

Not to insist on the Government of the Primitive Church, which is so fully explained in that admirable Treatise, entitled, An Enquiry into the Constitution, Discipline, Unity, and Worship of the Primitive Church, the ancient The reformed Church, the ancient Church.

Had this learned Divine and Historian never heard of the Waldenses, who attempted a Reform about 600 Years ago? And the first Article of their Religion was, according to Pope Pius II. or Aeneas Sylvius; Romanum Praesulem reliquis Episcopis parem esse; inter Sacerdotes nullum Discrimen; Presbyterum non Dignitatem sed Vitae meritum efficere potiorum. Bohemici Hist. Waldenses!

"The Bishop of Rome is equal with other Bishops; "there's no Difference of Degree among Priests, "and no Priest is to be esteemed for any Dignity "of his Order, but for the Worthiness of his Life."

What was the Opinion of the Albigenses, about the Year 1230, is not so well known; but Fox informs us, They protest chiefly against the wanton Wealth, Pride, and Tyranny of the Prelates. Yet, like the modern Reform'd, they were for Episcopacy, such as that of Timothy and Titus, and such as Archbishop Usher's Reduction. For the Sophistry of the pretended Orthodox, lies in charging the Reformed with renouncing Episcopacy itself; whereas they never renounced any Thing more than what the Albigenses had thrown off long before, tho' they retain'd Bishops: And there is not a Calvinist in Christendom, but wou'd have retain'd the Order on the same Terms; it being most certain, that there were Bishops and Presbyters in the three first Centuries, tho' it is not so certain what was the

the Difference between them; but it is most sure, they were not Dukes and Counts, as in France and other Places.

Wickliffs.

The next Reformer of Note, was our Countryman John Wickliff, about an hundred Years after the Attempt of the Albigenses. What his Sentiments in this Matter were, may be conjectur'd by the Charge against him: That plain Deacons and Priests may preach without Licence of Pope or Bishop; That in the Time of the Apostles, there were only two Orders, Priests and Deacons; and that a Bishop doth not differ from a Priest: And what is most shocking of all in Reformation, That Priests of bad Lives cease any longer to be Priests. Again; That the Church was not endow'd with any immoveable Possessions before Constantine; that it is no Sacrilege to take away Things consecrated to the Church; that all beautiful Buildings of Churches, is blame-worthy, and savours of Hypocrisy. These and many other Articles were prefer'd against him by Thomas Walden, a noted Doctor at Oxford; who, in a Letter to Pope Martin V. acknowledges, he was wonderfully astonish'd at Wickliff's most strong Arguments, with the Places of Authority which he gather'd, with the Vehemency and Force of his Arguments, &c.

Bohemians

What were the Opinions of the Bohemians, one may guess by their being converted by the Waldensian Refugees first, and confirm'd by Wickliff's Writings afterwards, which were transmitted to Prague in so great Numbers, that Subink the Archbishop burnt 200 of them at once, all excellently written, and finely adorn'd with Bosses of Gold and rich Coverings, as the abovementioned Pope Pius II. writes in his History; which gives ground to conjecture, that those Books were sent thither with the Privy of Queen Anne, a Bohemian, Wife to Richard II. then reigning in England. That Princess is commended even by the Archbishop of Canterbury in those Days, for having Wickliff's Testament by her. And it was not only the meaner Sort of People who favour'd Wickliff, but Persons of the highest Rank and Distinction; as the Duke of Lancaster, Humphry Duke of Gloucester, and his Dutches; the Earl of Salisbury, the Lord Piercy, the Lord Latimer, the Lord Clifford, the Lord Montacute, &c. As also many learned Divines, as Reginald Pocock Bishop of Chichester, Dr. Redman, Philip Repington, David Sautre, William James, Peter Payne, and others, Men eminent for Learning and Piety. Polydore Virgil informs us, that Wickliff went himself into Bohemia, where he was in high Esteem, in magno pretio apud Bohemos fuisse; which is no more true, than that he was the Author of Wat Tyler's Rebellion, which he is accused of by Cope, and other such Writers of Church History; and nothing is more common with them, than to blacken all Principles of Reformation, as rebellious or seditious; in which they have been imitated by the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Eckard.

Full. Cb. Hist. 141.

Lollards.

About the same Time flourished Lollardus a German Reformer; from him the Wickliffs were term'd Lollards, according to Tallent. Others think the Name was given them by the Papists from Lolium, Tares among the Wheat; or from their calling often upon God, saying, Lord, Lord; which, tho' it is the Opinion of the Martyrologist, is not so probable, as the Derivation from Walter Lollard, the German or Austrian, whose Followers were also every where stigmatiz'd as Sowers of Sedition and Rebellion. For the superstitious Ecclesiasticks being never able to prevail against Revelation and Reason by Argument, have always blended their private Interests with the Prince's, and born down all Opposition with Power, without which they could never have supported their Domination. John Hus and Jerom of Prague, maintain'd Wickliff's Opinions in Bohemia. The Sentence of the Council of Constance against Hus, stiling him, The wicked Son of John Wickliff of damnable Memory. His Doctrine propagated extremely in several Parts of Germany, as well as Bohemia; many of the great Lords embracing it, as did a Multitude of the Commons. Sir John Oldcastle, Sir Roger Aston, and the Wickliffs in England, deliver'd their Sense of the Papal Hierarchy in what Sir John said, somewhat coarsely, Martyr. to the Archbishop of Canterbury, touching the Authority of the Keys, the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates: The Pope is very Antichrist, that is, the Head; the Archbishops, Bishops, and other Prelates, be his Members, and the Friars his Tail, &c. The Bohemians publish'd an Exhortation to all Kings and Princes, to excite their Zeal in Defence of the Gospel; wherein is this Article; When your Bishops will ordain Priests, the Person to be ordained must have sufficient Living by Inheritance or Benefice. Christ wou'd that Priests shou'd be poor, in as much as it is enough for the Scholar to be as his Master is, and for the Servant to be as his Lord: But the Bishops will they shou'd be rich upon Earth, which is unjust before the Almighty. This Exhortation was national, and the Hussites, not a rude Rabble only, but of the most Noble, Wise, and Learned: They were not only the most godly, but the most brave and warlike among that People. The Pope fear'd them so much, that he issu'd out a Crusade against them; in which the Emperor, the Duke of Saxony, and other German Princes engag'd; as did also a Prince of the Blood Royal of England, Henry Cardinal of Winchester. However, the Bohemians defended themselves with equal Bravery and Success, under Zisca, Procopius, and Mainardus, till the latter betray'd them, and gave the Emperor an Opportunity to suppress them and their Religion in publick; for in private it subsisted till Luther incited the German Princes to protect that Reformation which spread over all Christendom seventy Years after. If it is pretended, that the Wickliffs and Lollards, are not look'd upon as orthodox by staunch Churchmen, as indeed they are very much villify'd by Collier, Heylin, and the like; I refer to the Writings of the famous Dr. James of Oxford, in his Apology for John Wickliff, shewing his Conformity with the now Church of England, in answer to Parsons the Jesuit, printed at Oxon in 1608.

Luther,

The Lollards continu'd in England from their first Appearance, to the Vicegerency of Cromwel, in the Reign of Henry VIII. And what their religious Principles were as to Church-Discipline, we have sufficiently made appear. 'Tis no wonder then, that before the Reformation was reviv'd, and after it was promoted by Authority, there were great Numbers of the Reform'd, who strenuously oppos'd the retaining any of the Semblances of the Papal Hierarchy, Forms and Ceremonies; that there were many who insist'd on a thorough Reformation, and a Conformity to the Protestant Churches abroad. Thus we have seen, and may see still further, in all impartial Church-Histories, of which there are not many, that for four or five hundred Years before King Edward VI. or Queen Elizabeth's Time, there were reformed Churches in Christendom, some more publick, some more private, who made Profession of the same Principles in Doctrine and Discipline, as were maintain'd by the Reformed in Switzerland, Geneva, France, the Palatinate, Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, Transylvania, Poland, the Netherlands, Scotland, and the most sincere and pious of English Protestants. Few have had the Boldness to deny this. Indeed that ingenious and learned Historian Sanderson, asserts, That the Majority of the Reform'd abroad, are for Episcopacy in its Altitudes; and to prove it, he names the Places where it is establish'd; which I shall repeat as a very great Novelty: The Marquisite of Badu, the Earldom of Heneberg, the Earldoms of Levings, Marisfelt, Stalburgh, Revertern, Swatenbourgh, Wertembergh, Hannaw, Oeting, Glick, Leonstine, the Baronies of Lenenbergh, Scheneburg, Wildenfield, &c. besides thirty Cities, whose Territories, Thorough Reformation stops.

stories, says he, are as ample as Geneva. What an Advantage must any Cause have, which has such a Champion? And truly the Cause he labours had never a better Historian than this Sanderson, till Archdeacon Echard enter'd the Lists; and has, I doubt not, as many more Names of the like Importance to be us'd on the like Occasion. We must not therefore think it too daring in him to assert, That the Romish Hierarchy was never oppos'd, till a few wretched Enthusiasts set up Presbytery in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is to be hop'd, that these Historiographers do really know no better; and that we must impute their Confidence to Ignorance, and not Design. It being most true, that there are hardly any Names of Eminence among the first Reformers abroad, who were not entirely for the Geneva Discipline. At least nine Parts in ten of the foreign Protestant Churches conform'd to it; and that there was the same Disposition in England in the Dawn of the Reformation, is what must next be observ'd. And well there might be, if even among the Papists there is a truer Notion of Episcopacy than among many, who under the Name of Protestants are some of the best Friends to Popery; such as Bancroft, Neile, Harpsnet, Wren, Sheldon, &c. For in an Oration of the Cardinal of Arles at the Council of Basil, his Eminence, a Title he truly deserv'd, spoke as follows: *The Chief and Principal of all Divines, St. Austin, on the Words of St. Matthew, where Peter says to Christ, I will give thee the Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven, notes, that by these Words the judicial Power was given not only to Peter, but also to the other Apostles, and to the whole Church, the Bishops and Priests. The famous Doctor St. Jerom also agrees with St. Austin. His Words are upon the Epistle of St. Paul to Titus: Before that Difference was made in Religion by the Instigation of the Devil, or that it was spoken among the People, I hold of Paul, I of Apollo, and I of Cephas, the Churches were governed by the common Consent and Counsel of Priests: For a Priest is the very same that a Bishop is. How would Archbishop Laud have exclaim'd, if any Puritan Priest had said as much as this Cardinal did? Again; Wherefore all Bishops ought to understand that they are of greater Power than the Priests, rather by Custom than the Dispensation of the Truth of God. Whence then came the Terms of Divine Right, Divine Permission, Divine Providence; and the like? Again; Bishops and Priests ought to rule the Church together; which we learn out of St. Paul to Titus, who makes so much Agreement between Priests and Bishops, that he often calls Bishops Priests, and Priests Bishops. Had such Doctrine as this of St. Jerom been preach'd in the Time of the High-Commission Court, the Preacher had doubtless lost his Ears for it, as well as Mr. Burton, who did not say more against the Usurpations of the then Hierarchy. Can any one think that Montague, Manwaring, Sibthorp in former Times; that Pelling, Hicks, Hill, Sacheverel, Trapp, and a whole Host of such Clergy in our own Times, had the least Conception of this Equality between Bishops and Presbyters, or knew what St. Paul, and his Commentators St. Jerom and St. Austin, had said of it? I do not intend to enter into this Debate farther than is necessary to prove, that those holy Men who were of St. Paul, St. Austin, and St. Jerom's Opinion in this Matter before and after the Reformation, deserv'd not to be treated as Hereticks, Schismatics, Fanatics, and Rebels; and that those who sacrific'd the Peace of both Church and State to the temporal Dominion of the Prelacy, were neither good Christians nor good Englishmen: As for Protestants, I do not suppose they valu'd themselves on the Name, and therefore I omit it.*

We will now see whether the Spirit of Reformation was so entirely dead when it was reviv'd in England, that none of the first Reformers were of the same Principles with the Reformed in other Parts of Christendom; and whether, as Echard affirms, Presbytery was never nam'd here till after Episcopacy was establish'd.

The next Man who seal'd the Truth of the Go-English spel with his Blood, was Richard Hun, Citizen of first Re-London, in the Beginning of Henry the VIIIth's former's no Reign. He was murder'd in Prison, and then Enemies to sentenc'd to be burnt for an Heretick. A Charge it. against him being, that he had taught and preach'd that Bishops and Priests be the Scribes and Pharisees, all things taking, and nothing ministering nor giving.

It must be always remember'd, that these good Men do not mean good Bishops, such as are now the Support and Ornament of our National Church; but such Prelates as Bancroft and his Brethren before-mention'd. Sir Thomas More thought Mr. Hun considerable enough to employ his Wit against him; but the Subject was too tragical to admit of the Farce into which he would have turn'd it.

An Article against Mr. Bilney, Fellow of Trinity-Hall, Cambridge, was, That he said the Pope Martyr has not Peter's Keys, unless he lives the Life of 226. Peter; which I am satisfy'd will be allow'd to be schismatical, and to savour much of the Presbytery, by most of the Rural Priesthood. This holy Martyr converted Bishop Latimer to the true Religion, who before was a bigotted Papist. There were Full. Cb. other learned Men in Cambridge, who thought Hist. 102. like Bilney; as Dr Foreman of Queen's College, Mr. Stafford Divinity Reader, Dr. Thiffel, &c. The Place of meeting was from them called Hereticks Wall; and this was several Years before there was any Reformation by Authority of the State.

Whoever will turn over Mr. Fisb's Supplication of the Beggars, presented to King Henry VIII. will see no Proof indeed of his approving any other Church Government than what was Episcopal; but they will see also how he approved of Abbots, Pre-Martyr, later, Priors, Deacons, Suffragans, Archdeacons, Ca- 280. non, Pardoners, &c. their Temporalities, Prerogatives and Powers. For as to their religious Function, every one will grant those who live like Peter, have the Keys as much as ever Peter had. This is given up to them entirely; but this they will not be contented with, confounding Christ's Kingdom, and the Kingdom of this World, which is all that good Men have to say against any of them; yet whoever has any thing at all to say, is immediately guilty of Sedition, Schism, Sauciness, and what not.

About the same time Richard Bayfield, a Friar, Ibid. 290. who had renounc'd Popery, was charged with Heresy for saying, Every Priest ought to preach the Word of God by the Authority of the Gospel, without running to the Pope or Bishops for a License; which surely is downright Presbyterian Doctrine; espoused also by James Baynham, Esq; Son of Sir Alexander Baynham of Gloucestershire, who declar'd, That whoever preach'd the Word of God, and liv'd accordingly, had the Key that binds and looses both in Heaven and Earth; which Key is the Scripture. Ask Mr. Archdeacon Echard, and he will tell you 'tis the Priest. Mr. Baynham was a Lawyer of the Middle Temple, noted for Piety, Learning and Humanity; but more noted still for his patient Martyrdom soon after the Death of Bayfield. I mention these things, to shew that the Persons who desir'd a thorough Reformation, were not obscure, illiterate Enthusiasts, as our Ecclesiastical Historians represent them.

The next Year another Martyr was sacrific'd to the Rage of the Romish Prelates, Mr. Frith of Cambridge, a young Man, but of eminent Abilities and Learning, who was not examin'd as to the Constitution of the Church. The Articles against him concern'd chiefly the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, which he believ'd after the manner of the Swiss Protestants. A. Wood of Oxford, who seldom speaks Truth when it makes against Popery or or Papists, says Frith was converted to Lutheranism by Tyndal. Which is the Reverse of the Fact; Frith being a profess'd Sacramentary, as the Term was then; and believ'd the Eucharist as did the Zuinglians and Calvinists, and not as the Lutherans: Adding, The Church has no Power and Authority to admit any thing as Matter of Faith, which is not agreeable to Reason. Than which nothing can be more schismatical, according to some modern Divines.

Thomas Bennet, A. M. of Cambridge, was martyr'd the same Year at Exeter. His Learning and Abilities were more than ordinary, as appears by his Defence in Latin; in which he declar'd, That Christ gave the Keys to all the Apostles, as well as to Peter; and Peter had no more antiently given him than they, or else the Churches planted in every Kingdom are no Churches. He added, The Church which is built upon a Man is the Devil's Church, and not God's: And every Church this Day is appointed to be rul'd by a Bishop or Pastor, ordain'd by the Word of God, under the Prince the supreme Governor. To talk at a Country Visitation of Ordination by the Word of God, would be truly speaking in an unknown Language; as is what follows of the same Bennet: Where they are that confess the true Name of Christ, and where only Christ is the Head, and under him the Prince of the Realm, that is God's Church. Can any thing be more loyal, more agreeable to our Constitution Sacred and Civil? Again; What Bishop soever he be, who preaches the Gospel and maintaineth the Truth, is a true Bishop. How would Laud, Sheldon, Mew, Ken, Atterbury, Bisse, Gastrell, and other such Prelates, have been struck with Amazement and Horror at such a Characteristick of a true Bishop! Some of them indeed did preach, and very well too upon Occasion; but they plac'd the Episcopal Character in the Title, Dignity, Power and Revenue; and would as soon have allow'd Richard Baxter to have been the Messiah, as a true Bishop; tho' he preach'd the Gospel, and maintain'd the Truth before its mighty and most avow'd Enemies. Bennet's asserting the Prince to be supreme Governor of the Church, was a Year or two before King Henry assum'd that Title by Proclamation; nay, Stephen Gardiner, the Popish and cruel Bishop of Winchester, in his Treatise De vera Obedientia, writes thus: The Prerogative was not given to the Flesh and Blood of Peter, but to the better Part, that is, to the Spirit of Peter. An Interpretation of the Text, which the Dispensers of Absolution do not generally subscribe to. The Pardoners, as Mr. Fish call'd them 200 Years ago, apply the Prerogative to their very Persons; their dear Flesh and Blood; for if the Application was made only to the Spirit of Peter in such as live like Peter, we cou'd certainly not be absolv'd by every Vicar and Curate in England, as some of them now assure us we may be. Let us see what another such Popish Prelate as Gardiner, his Contemporary Bishop Tunstal, said of it. The Church is built not upon the Person of Peter, but the Faith of Christ. All which sufficiently teaches us, that the Episcopal Function, and that of Presbyter, have the same Powers and Prerogatives by the Authority of the Scripture; and that the temporal Emoluments, Prerogatives and Powers are deriv'd solely from the Authority of the Laws of the Land, and consequently are not of the same Nature with the Laws of the Medes and the Persians.

I might, in the next place, mention Mr. Tyndal of Magdalen-Hall, Oxford, another of the first Reformers before the Reformation was establish'd; the same who translated the Bible; but his Opinions were the same with his Friend Frith's: and his unities, Lordships, and Riches of Ecclesiasticks: I have often said, and may again say here and elsewhere, that the spiritual Character and Function are not what these pious Divines objected against, nor do I find that any Objection was ever made to them by religious and reasonable Men.

But the most remarkable Declaration concerning the lordly Hierarchy, was that of the glorious Saint and Martyr Mr. John Lambert of Cambridge, whose Sense of the Matter was as much Presbyterian as Cartwright or Travers; tho' the Learned and Judicious Archdeacon Echard affirms, that no such Sense was ever utter'd in England, till one Hallingham and Coleman, with two or three other such obscure Fanatics, started it in Opposition to the Establishment about 40 Years after. As to the Power of the Keys, said Lambert, the Power by which Men are loos'd from Sin, is not the Priest's Power. Solus Deus remittit peccata, says Lambert; God only forgives Sins: Neither doth the Ministry of the Priest any whit avail to loose any Person, unless he that should be loos'd has his Belief in the Word of God. 'Twere to be wish'd, that the Archdeacon last mention'd, or any other such Orthodox Archdeacon, would own as much as this blessed Man Lambert did, the Ministry of the Priest availeth nothing. For it is commonly asserted, when the Matter is in Debate, that it availeth every thing. As if the Absolution in our Church-Service was like the binding in the Popish Sacrament of Matrimony, either Marriage or Fornication according to the Intention of the Priest. Of the Hierarchy the holy Lambert said, and what he said he seal'd with his Blood; Nothing so customable as those to be called Priests, Presbyteri, who are set to be Prelates in the Church. And Priests thus called Presbyteri in the Primitive Church, when there were but few Traditions and Ordinances to lead us from the strait Institution made by Christ, were the very same, and none other but Bishops, as I have shewn you by the Authority of St. Jerom. Paul also shews the same in the first to Titus, where you may see that a Priest called Presbyter, should be the same that we call a Bishop. Many of the Priests that do minister now are elect by Bishops, explain'd, otherwise than after the Manner of Christ's Institution, and the Form of the Primitive Church. Was it not preach'd by a certain Doctor of Divinity in London, That the Church is nothing else but the Congregation of faithful People? You all are of the Church, as well as I or any other, if you be of God. Let us now consider a little, what a vast Difference there is between a Minister speaking the Sentiments of his Soul before his Persecutors, environ'd with Racks and Fire, and another haranguing an Audience in Hopes of Benefit and Preferment. What surer Way can a young Divine take to be prefer'd, than to court and flatter those that can prefer him. And how hard is it for worldly Minds to give up their Pretensions to the Things of this World? This Difference consider'd, what Weight will there be found in every Word of our suffering Saint; how light will the Sophistry of interested and ambitious Men be in the Balance against it? And how natural then is this Reflection, That the latter in forcing scrupulous Consciences to subscribe to their Injunctions without Warrant from Scripture, are chargeable with all the Miseries which have been occasion'd by it? I hope the Reader will now perceive, that this Introductory History is not at all foreign to the Reigns of the House of Stuart. We shall therefore continue it a little farther.

Contrary to St. Paul, St. Jerom, Frith, Lambert, and all the holy Martyrs before-mention'd, the historical Archdeacon assures us, the Beginnings of Presbytery were after a schismatical Manner in Queen Elizabeth's Reign; and those who suffer'd for it, deserv'd the severe Persecution they met with: It arising only from the Offence taken by

Mr. Cart-

Mr. Cartwright of Cambridge, for that the Queen did not take so much Notice of him as he expected.

Wood the Oxonian, a Hater of Reformation.

To the above Authorities I might add that of Dr. Barnes of Cambridge, thirty Years before Cartwright was heard of there; Mr. Jerom Minister of Stepney, Mr. Garret Minister of Honey-Lane; all Three Martyrs in the Year 1541. A. Wood calls Garret a forward, busy Man. And indeed that Oxonian has hardly a good Word for any of those holy Sufferers, who dy'd for the Gospel in the bloody Reign of Queen Mary. Witness what he says of pious Bishop Farrar, who was burnt at Carmarthen: One may easily perceive, that having a Woman to his Wife, was the chief Motive that drew him to the Protestant Religion, to which one may easily perceive, the University he was a Member of must needs be good Friends, by their permitting such infamous Scandal to pass with Impunity.

We have shewn what was the Opinion of the most Learned and most Religious Men in King Henry the VIIIth's Time, with reference to the then Hierarchy; and there is no room to doubt of their Desire to carry the Reformation farther than Dr. Laud and his Brethren would have had it. Which Desire of theirs was as earnest among the Laity, among the Nobles, and among the People, encourag'd by the Countenance of two Queens, Queen Anne Bulleyn and Queen Katherine Parr; the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Hertford, the Earl of Bedford, the Earl of Huntington, the Lord Cromwel, the Lord Parr, the Lord Lisle, Sir Thomas Cardine, Sir Ralph Sadler, Sir Philip Hobby, Sir Anthony Denny, Sir George Blague, and many Lords and Gentlemen of the Court; as also many Court Ladies, as the Dutchess of Suffolk, the Countess of Suffex, the Countess of Hertford, Lady Herbert, Lady Lane, Lady Tyrwhit, and others; whom I remember, to shew that the Friends to the Reformation at home, according to the Reformation abroad, were not of the Dregs of the People only, as they are misrepresented by some Ecclesiastical Writers; not a factious fanatical Rout only, but of the most honourable, as well as the most knowing. And what Deference was due to the Sentiments of such a Party, founded on Scripture and the Practice of the Primitive Church, will be conceiv'd by all conscientious and sober Men.

The Origin of the Troubles in England.

Instead of this, the rigid Priesthood stickled always for preserving the old Mumpsimus, as King Henry VIII. called it, and furiously persecuted all that would not comply with them; which, in truth, occasion'd that ill Blood, and those Distempers, that have been so troublesome and dangerous to both Church and State.

Full. Ch. Hist. 403.

In the Reign of King Edward VI. those that oppos'd the then Hierarchy and Ceremonies appear'd more openly, and spoke more directly. Hooper, nam'd to the Bishoprick of Gloucester, refus'd to wear the Episcopal Vestments at his Consecration; and the Earl of Warwick wrote a Letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury to dispenſe with him in it; but it cou'd not be obtain'd, till the King himself commanded that certain Rites and Ceremonies, offensive to his Conscience, might be dispens'd with. The Reasons given by this godly Bishop and Martyr, and those other Divines of his Opinion, are in Fuller's Church History, and prove that they did not think the Work of the Reformation compleat. Latimer, another holy Martyr, who had been depriv'd of his Bishoprick of Worcester for Non-Compliance with the Six Articles in the former Reign, would not be restor'd to his See, nor accept of any other Character than that of a Preacher. Fuller informs us, that the Disslikers of the Liturgy in this Reign became a potent Party, bearing themselves high on the Judgment of Calvin in a Letter to the Duke of Somerset, then Lord Protector; which is all I am contending for. There was a great Number of sincere, P. 426. pious Protestants, who thought, as the last mention'd Historian observes, there was too much of the Serpent, and nothing of the Dove, to offend those within to invite those without to the Church, driving Protestants thence to draw Papists thither. Which was the Advice of Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Ridley, and other good Bishops, who however were very far from establishing their Religion by High Commission Courts, and a Laudan Persecution.

Among the many Errors, some of Malice, some of Weakness, which contributed to the Loss of the little Reputation Archdeacon Echard's Histories once had, there is none more obvious and ill-grounded than where he boldly affirms, that the Rise of Presbytery in England was owing to a Pique of Mr. Cartwright of Cambridge, because Queen Elizabeth did not give him so much Money, nor look so smilingly upon him, as she did on Mr. Preston, six or seven Years after Episcopacy was establish'd. Thence he, the Lord Clarendon, and other Historians of the same Stamp, take all Occasions to charge those who press'd for a thorough Reformation, with Love of Novelties. Whereas it is plain from the Writings of good Churchmen, that such a Reformation was insisted upon before any Establishment was made in Edward the VIth's Reign.

Dr. Fuller, speaking of the Times 26 Years before Echard's Era of the Rise of Presbytery, writes Cb. Hist. 401. thus: Come we now to the saddest Difference that ever happen'd in the Church of England; if we consider either the Time, how long it continu'd, the eminent Persons therein engag'd, or the doleful Effects thereby produc'd about Matters of Conformity. The Struggle between Purity and Ceremony began with the Reformation, according to Dr. Fuller; and not after its Establishment, according to Archdeacon Echard. It was carry'd on, not according to him, by Mr. Cartwright, and such obscure Persons as Button and Benson, but by Persons of Eminence, according to Dr. Fuller, who represents both Parties openly driving on different Interests under their respective Patrons: Not of the Vulgar, as Mr. Echard affirms; for they were not able to patronize any thing. He could not but know so much of History as this; and therefore his Endeavours to asperse the Memory of those eminent Persons, some of whom we shall particularly name in this Introduction, are equally vain, malicious, and unwarrantable.

If it is true, that those of the Reformed, who were for carrying the Work farther, were encourag'd and confirm'd in their Sentiments and Zeal by the Principles and Practices of foreign Protestants, and desir'd only of their Opponents, if they would not hear them, to hear the Apostles; Who then ought to be charged with the Opposition and the Mischiefs of it? Those Reformers, who were for leaving nothing in the Church, which Scripture had not left there; or those who were for leaving in it so many things, not left by Scripture, to tempt the Papists to conform to it; which was the best Reason at that time given for it? Fuller mentions some of those things, as Sutplices, Ornaments, &c. 'Twas said they were indifferent; that they were necessary to Church Unity; that some decent Correspondence with the Papists shou'd be continu'd; that removing them wou'd cast a Slur on the Bishops who had us'd them; and that stubborn Wills ought not to be indulg'd. Dr. Fuller gives us to understand, that this was all that was, or cou'd be said for them; and what this all is, when put in the Scale against what was said by the Reformers, will, we fear, be found to be very light in the Balance. The latter urg'd, The best thing that can be said of them is, they are useless; otherwise they wou'd be ridiculous and superstitious. That grant them indifferent, left so by Divine Wisdom, it was Presumption in Man to stamp Necessity sity upon them. That as to bringing over the Papist, it had too much of the SERPENT in it, nothing of the DOVE, to offend those within, to invite those without, driving Protestants out to draw Papists in; that the Credit of the Bishops was not to be preserv'd by destroying the Consciences of others. As to the last, about indulging stubborn Wills, 'tis the Beginning of the Sophistry of the persecuting Spirit. They first suppose the Consciences of those religious Persons are not scrupulous; in a word, that they are Hypocrites and Idiots; and having arbitrarily determin'd their Wills to be stubborn, they give Judgment against a Toleration. Good Bishop Hooper, who probably drew up the Answer to the notable Reasons for Ornaments and Ceremonies, closes with this: I put myself on the Trial of the Searcher of Hearts, that no Obstinacy, but true Conscience made me refuse the Ornaments. It is pretended, that foreign Protestants disapprov'd of the Opposition their Brethren in England gave to the Establishment. This Pretence has not prevail'd much; the contrary being as well known, as that there are two such Places as Rome and Geneva. However, since the Lord Digby said in Parliament, That to his Knowledge the Government of the Church of England was admir'd by the most Learned of the Reformed Churches abroad, I will repeat Part of a Letter written by the Church of Geneva to their Brethren in England, in Answer to some Questions sent thither by the latter. 'Twas dated the 24th of October 1559, and sign'd by Beza, Coladon, Calvet, Dupleix, Simler, and others; wherein they say among other things, They do in God's most holy Name, and with Tears, beseech those who have succeeded in the Place of the Popish Bishops, utterly to destroy that Tyranny, which hath cast headlong the very Church. And tho' they were cautious of naming the Establishment, they speak broadly enough about it. But some will say, How shall we do in this Point? "Verily, if the Case was ours, we wou'd not receive the Ministry upon these Conditions if it were proffer'd; a great deal less would we sue for it". As to Copes and Ornaments, they say, We therefore flatly reply, That those Men who are Authors thereof, do deserve most Evil of the Church, and shall answer at the dreadful Bar of Christ's Judgment. The same being polluted and defil'd with infinite Superstition. Of the Cross in Baptism, they declare, We judge those Men to have done assuredly well, that have driven this Rite out of the Congregation. Of Kneeling at the Sacrament, they say, It hath a Shew of godly and Christian Reverence; yet because out of this Fountain the detestable Use of Bread-Worship follow'd, it seems to us that it was justly abolish'd. These Geneva Divines give their Reasons and Authorities for what they write; but it is sufficient for me that they gave their Opinion, since I am not entering into the Controversy. Father Orleans, the French Jesuit, assures us, Calvin complain'd to Bucer, that all the Mass was left in the English Liturgy, and advis'd Bucer not to conform to it. He adds: So great was the Deference paid to Calvin, that most of those things he found fault with were put out of the Liturgy; and the Parliament approv'd of it. We see by this, that some things which Calvin complain'd of, were left still in the Common-Prayer Book; and the Reformation was so far from going forward afterwards, that Queen Elizabeth, says the Jesuit, who lov'd Ceremonies, restor'd what had been struck out. The Calvinists then made a great Stir, but being as yet weak in England, there was little Regard had to their Complaints: Which is true enough. But it is as true, that a great Stir was made, at the first opening of the Reformation, for perfecting that Work, as Mr. Cartwright propos'd; and that Mr. Echard's asserting that Presbytery ow'd its Rise to him, is equally partial, false, and absurd; as is the Charge against him and his Brethren, that they were for Novelties in Discipline and Worship; which I cou'd easily prove, was this a Place for Debate; and was it not so well done already in the before-mention'd excellent Treatise, entitul'd, An Enquiry, &c.

In the cruel Reign of Queen Mary, most of the Martyrs were of the same Judgment with the Proto-Martyr Rogers, with Bradford, Samuel, Careless, Philpot, &c. The latter acknowledg'd before the Prelates, That the Church of Geneva was a true Catholick Church; and it was ever deem'd so, till Laud and his Brethren deserted the Reformation, and endeavour'd to erect a Papal Tyranny. What do the Laudeans think of the Protestant Exiles in Germany, Geneva, Swisserland, and other Parts of Europe, during that terrible Persecution, worse than those of Nero and Dioclesian? The Heathen then destroying the Christians; who were now destroy'd by the Professors of Christianity; such as Bonner, Gardiner, Brooks, Christopherson, Capon, Baines, Cotes, Morgan, all Brethren of the Popish Hierarchy; who did not strain its Prerogatives more than Whitgift, Bancroft, and such Sort of Prelates, before the Civil War, and after the Restoration.

Tho' many Worthy Fathers of our Church had at times accepted, as well as refus'd the Episcopal Dignity; they were well known to be Favourers of the Presbytery, and desirous of a Conformity with the Reformed Churches in those Parts where they had taken shelter: Of which Fuller writes thus; Those that fled hence beyond the Seas, living in Cities of popular Reformation, suck'd in both the Air and Discipline of the Place they liv'd in, and renown'd all Ceremonies, &c. No body, as has been often hinted, renounc'd them, according to Echard, till Cartwright came from Geneva many Years after. P. 404.

The most Pious and most Esteem'd of the first Protestant Bishops were Men of so much Moderation, that had the Sees of England been always fill'd with such Prelates, there wou'd have been no more Controversy about Ecclesiastical Government. Had Queen Elizabeth, otherwise a most Wise and Generous Princess, been less devoted to the Pomp and Grandeur of Religion, and more moderate in the Administration of her Supremacy; had not Bishop Parker so soon forgot the Miseries of her Sister's Reign, and Bishop Whitgift not rais'd a Persecution of another Kind in her own, there wou'd have been no Separatists, no Dissenters, no Division, no Disturbance, and none of those Troubles, which prov'd so fatal to the Royal House of Stuart. That Great Queen liv'd long enough to have establish'd Purity and Peace in the Church, if the Counsels of rigid and bigotted Prelates had not driven the most conscientious Men out of it. Protestant Bishops in England before Laud's Time.

As renown'd a Writer of History as Mr. Echard is, he surely never heard of such Men as Mr. Leaver, Mr. David Whitehead, Mr. Gilpin, Mr. Gilby, Mr. Crowley, Mr. Kingsmil, Mr. Withers, Mr. Huntington, Mr. Eaton, Mr. Sutton, Mr. Kelke, Mr. Fox, Mr. Kent, Mr. Kethe, Mr. Wood, Mr. Stanton, Mr. Cole, Mr. Chambers, Mr. Walton, Mr. Williams, Mr. Spencer, Mr. Whetnal, Mr. Mullings, Mr. Karvile, and a great Number of Divines more, most of whom were Fugitives at Zurich, Frankfort, and other foreign Cities. Were none of these Brethren of the Presbytery before Queen Elizabeth's Conformity Act? Let us see only what was the Form of Discipline and Worship establish'd by the English Church at Frankfort, in the Year 1555, long before Mr. Echard allows there were any Objections to the Establishment in England.

They chose a Minister and Deacons for a Time only; they concluded, that the answering aloud after the Minister should not be used.

To omit the Litany, Surplice, and other Ceremonies in Service and Sacraments, as superfluous and superstitious. A new

Dr. Fuller says, they were a true Communion of Saints, who invited, by Letters, their fellow Sufferers to partake of it. The Doctor must certainly be out, when he tells us, the Exiles at Zurich excused themselves on account of the English Common-Prayer, from which they were resolv'd not to recede. Were Humphry, Chambers, Leaver, &c. so zealous for the Liturgy, as to break off Christian Communion with their Protestant Brethren, rather than conform to the Service of the Church at Frankfort?

I need not here repeat the great Names of Bucer, Fagius, Oecolampadius, Martyr, Zwinglius, Calvin, Bullenger, Pellican, Bibliander, Simler, Zanchy, Golpius, Gualter, Lavater, Junius, Tremellius, and the Heads of the Reformation on the Continent. They are all well known to have erected their Churches on the Geneva Foundation; and if some Lutheran Dioceses retained their Bishops, they were but few in Number, and not of the like Esteem in the Protestant World.

I do not repeat what Calvin wrote to the English Divines at Frankfort, concerning the Common-Prayer, out of Disregard to it, or in Approbation of his Judgment; but to shew how vain those Writers are, who pretend that no Men of Learning or Note ever objected against it, till it was pass'd into a Law. I see, said Calvin, there are many tolerable foolish Things. By these Words I mean, there is not that Purity which were to be desir'd, &c. Then allowing that it might have been at first tolerated for a Season, he adds, It behoves the Learned, Grave, and Godly Ministers of Christ, to enterprize further, and to set forth something more filed from Rust, and purer. This further enterprizing, is what Archdeacon Echard, and many other Archdeacons, have treated as a seditious whimsical Business, which never enter'd into the Heads of sober, orthodox Men; and when it did, was the Effect of Distemper and Sedition, which deserved to be suppress'd by Power and Punishment.

Had the Historian dealt with us as ingenuously, as might be expected from his Function and Character, instead of telling us, that a few nameless Fanatics set up Presbytery six Years after Queen Elizabeth's Accession to the Throne, he wou'd have told us, that as soon as there was a Talk of re-establishing the Reformation, there were great Endeavours us'd to establish the Presbyterian Discipline, and correct the Liturgy. Miles Coverdale, who had been Bishop of Exeter, refus'd to accept again of the Episcopal Charge. Bernard Gilpin, the northern Apostle, did the same by the Bishoprick of Carlisle, as the above-mentioned David Whitehead did by the Archbishoprick of Canterbury. But the Disposition of the Queen, who was mightily taken with the Show and Shine of the Romish Church, with their Forms and Ceremonies, encourag'd some of the Prelates, who, no doubt also had the Dignities and Revenues in especial Consideration, to stickle for as much of all of them as cou'd be procur'd. However, while every one enjoy'd the Liberty of his own Thoughts, without subscribing to the Thoughts of other Men, there was no Separation from the national Church, as has been already observ'd: And happy had it been, if the Jealousy of those Prelates, left the first Reformers shou'd press further, had not put them upon procuring Articles, Canons, and Statutes, to compel the Consciences of scrupulous Protestants, who were then oblig'd to declare their Nonconformity, and worship God in their own Way.

No sooner were the Thirty-nine Articles past in Convocation, but, says Fuller, the Bishops, conceiving themselves empower'd by their Canons, began to show their Authority, in urging the Clergy of their Dioceses to subscribe to the Liturgy, Ceremonies, and Discipline of the Church: and such as refused, the same were branded with the odious Name of Puritans, as a Company of Hypocrites, who pretended to more Purity than others. But Fuller does them the Justice to add, Some of them were so far from opposing the Liturgy, that they endeavour'd, according to the Instructions thereof in the Preparative to the Confession, to accompany the Minister with a pure Heart. But prophane Men quickly improv'd this Nick-name, therewith to abuse pious People.

One of the first that was called to an Account by Authority of the Canons, was that eminent Confessor, and learned and laborious Antiquary, Mr. John Fox, Author of the Martyrology, who was summon'd by Archbishop Parker to subscribe, that the general Reputation of his Piety, might give the greater Countenance to Conformity. Father Fox, as Queen Elizabeth us'd to call him, produc'd a New Testament in Greek, and said, to this I will subscribe; and the Canons being offer'd him, he refus'd Subscription, saying, I have nothing in the Church, save a Prebend at Salisbury, and much good may it do you, if you will take it from me. However, there was not then Courage enough among the Persecutors, to exercise their Severity on a Divine of so much Piety and Merit. But the summoning him to do a Thing against his Conscience, when Smithfield was still warm with the Ashes of those Fires that had so lately burnt their Brethren, and when they cou'd not but know, that Mr. Fox understood the Matter much better than themselves, is a deplorable Instance of the bitter Spirit of Persecution; the Fury of which, if accompanied with Power, may be likened to a Sword in the Hands of a Man who is both mad and blind: An Image which is always present to me, when I read such Histories as that of Bancroft, Laud, &c.

We must not think that these Canons, and this Conformity, met with no Opposition but from a few scrupulous Divines; the most leading Members of both Houses of Parliament, fell in with those who were for indulging their Scruples, and, as Calvin said, enterprizing further in reforming Church-Discipline and Worship. To name some of them:

Queen Elizabeth against further Reformation.

And a great Number of other such illustrious Names, who, tho' they conform'd to the national Church, abhor'd Persecution for Conscience sake, and were always willing to hearken to any Propositions for promoting Reformation, Purity, Charity, and Peace. We read something particular of Dr. Nowel Dean of St. Paul's, in the Sermon preach'd by Dr. Abbot, afterwards Bishop of Sarum, at Oxford; of which, Mention will hereafter be again made; and there being some Reflections in it on that stupid and wicked Saying, so common in the Mouths of Country Curates and Foxhunters, I had rather be a Papist than a Presbyterian, I will repeat it entire. Now for this Speech, that the Presbyterians are as bad as the Papists; There is a Sting in it which I wish had been left out; for there are many Churches beyond the Seas, which contend for the Religion established among us, which yet have approved and admitted the Presbytery; and this is to make them as bad as the Papists. Besides, there have lived among us, long before Echar'd's Æra, many reverend and worthy Men, who have not rejected the Presbytery, taking it even for Lay-Elders. Dr. Nowel, late Dean of Paul's, in his larger Catechism, p. 29 and 71. affirms, That in every well govern'd Church, there was a Presbytery; and yet this Catechism, by the late reverend Archbishop of Canterbury, was commanded to be had in every Grammar School; which surely he wou'd not have done, if the Presbyterians were as bad as the Papists.

Mr. Morrice, one of the above-mentioned Gentlemen, Attorney of the Duchy of Lancaster, mov'd in Parliament for a Bill against the hard Courses of Bishops; 'tis Heylin who says it, against Ordinaries, and other ecclesiastical Courts, and prosecuting of learned and godly Ministers and Preachers; against Oaths and Subscriptions. The Act was ready drawn, as was also another Act against Imprisonment for Refusal of Oaths. But Mr. Coke, afterwards Sir Edward Coke the Speaker, was sent for, and admonished not to admit of any such Bills; which wou'd certainly have pass'd the House of Commons, and was at that Time the Sense of the Nation. Other Parliaments made several Attempts to accomplish so pious a Work; but the Protection of the Queen gave the more rigid Prelates a Majority, tho' her Ministers were very ready to take off the Edge of their Rigor, which was so destructive to the publick Tranquility, as appears by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh's, and the Lords of the Privy Council's Letters to Dr. Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, who first distinguish'd himself by Persecution in a Protestant Church: Bishop Parker, tho' rigid enough, setting Bounds to his Rigor; whereas Whitgift's was only restrained by the Laws.

The pious Lectures, and holy Lives of the Puritan Ministers, made them very popular, and the Bent of the People was visibly on their Side: To destroy which, the Prelates of Whitgift's Spirit tyranniz'd in the High-Commission Court; and by means of that Archbishop's long Possession of the Metropolitan Chair, there was so much Oppression in ecclesiastical Government, that it created a general Disatisfaction among all sober Men in the Nation. Such another Prelate as Archbishop Grindal might probably have restored Peace to the Church, and quieted the Minds of the Discontented. And such another might have been expected from the Education and Wisdom of King James I. if his Wisdom had really been so consummate as his Flatterers, especially among the Clergy, represented it.

We must now look back into the Affairs of Scotland, from whence we had our Kings of the Royal House of Stuart. The first of them, King James, was of the very same Religion with that of the Puritans in England; excepting that it was still more pure in the worst Sense of the Word. A Scotch Author will set this Matter in its true Light:

Mem. Ch. Scot. p. 12. "When King Henry the VIIIth abolish'd the Pope's Supremacy, his Principle at that Time being ra"ther politick than religious, he set his own Authority up in the stead of it, calling himself Supreme Head of the Church in all Things, whether Ecclesiastical or Civil; a Thing since made very ill use of, and improv'd to a Tyranny, which neither in the Divine Original of it, cou'd find any legal Foundation. When King Edward VI. rejected the Pontificate of Rome, he erected a Protestant Pontificate in its stead; which being oppos'd by some of the most eminent for Piety and Wisdom in the Reformation, quickly begot a Division in the Church."

This is too true, and too well known, to need more Words, how industriously soever some artful Persons, whose Function should teach them Simplicity and Sincerity, endeavour to disguise it, and make us believe, that not the Noble and the Wise, the Sober and the Learned, but if any, which they hardly grant, the Ignorant and Obscure, the Distemper'd and Illiterate, made the Opposition.

Duke Hamilton was at the Head of the Reformation in Scotland, where the Reformers went thorough with their Work at once; and it is well they did, for one may perceive by the Difficulties they met with in accomplishing and preserving it, that had they stop'd where the English did, they wou'd never have been able to go further afterwards: For even in Scotland, where Presbyterian Government was at first establish'd, some Superintendents retain'd the Title of Bishops, and the Title prevail'd generally in the several Dioceses, after King James was advanced to the Throne in the Life-time of his Mother, the hereditary Possessor of it; yet they had no more Ecclesiastical Authority than Ministers, being equally subjected to the Presbytery, Synod, and Assembly; and the Superintendency was under all the essential Articles of a Parity. This Subjection of Superintendents and Bishops to the Presbytery, was, with other Church Polity, regulated in their general Assemblies, and sign'd by the greatest Part of the Nobility and Gentry, before it had a Civil Sanction. Fourteen Years after, under the Regency of the Earl of Mar, there was an Attempt to restore the Government of Bishops; which, says my Author, was brought in by the Head and Shoulders; but so fetter'd and shackled with Limitation of Power and Castration of Stipends, that there was little in it more than there was before in the Ministers, who were called Superintendents, the Name and Dignities excepted; as appears by the Resolution of the Assembly of the Kirk, A. D. 1575. Bishops shall not appoint Ministers of the Province, nor Elders and Deacons, without the Peoples Consent. The Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishops of Dunkeld, Galloway, Brechin, Dunblaine, and the Isles, were Members of this Assembly; and Archbishop Spotiswood, tho' a partial Writer on the Side of Prelacy, owns, Those Bishops did not so much as open their Mouths against this Resolution. Two Years after it was ordain'd, That all Bishops, and all other Ecclesiasticks, be call'd by their own Names or Brethren only: Which Act was to continue, says Calderwood, till the Corruption of the State of Bishops be utterly remov'd out of the Church. The next Year, in an Assembly at Sterling, the same Law was made perpetual, and all Bishops then elected, were required to submit. Thus, says the Memoir Writer, That Infant Mongrel Episcopacy, so it was then called, was voted out of the Church as a Nuisance. Yet in almost all our orthodox Writers, we are assur'd, that Presbytery, even in Scotland, is a novel Discipline, and that at the Reformation Bishops were originally establish'd in that Church: Nay, this Opinion is so universally receiv'd, that I question whether there is one in an hundred of our Establishment, but who thinks Presbytery an Innovation in the Kirk: I do not say of the bigotted Priesthood only, I mean it of the Laity also, such as the before-mentioned Sanderfon, a Writer much much admir'd and follow'd by Archdeacon Echard: Let any Historian tell me, says he, when, and how they started into such a sincere Reformation, as to have no Bishops, as many wou'd pretend. You see how boldly he defies Calderwood, and every one of the Kirk Writers. Indeed he, and his Brother Authors, are the stoutest Champions that ever enter'd a List, when there is no Body to oppose them: But with all his Stoutness, his Parts and Credit are so small, that he is not worth taking notice of. The Temper of this worthy Gentleman, and his Fellow-Labourers, is seen in the next Page or two, where he tells us, that Reverend Divine Mr. Gilby, before spoken of, of Christ's-College Cambridge, a Confessor for the Protestant Religion, and an Exile at Geneva, was gone to the Devil. This is the same learned Gilby, who is so highly commended by Bishop Bale, his Companion in Banishment for the Truth of the Gospel.

In the Year 1580, the Assembly of the Kirk pass'd an Act, entirely abrogating the Office of a Bishop, as unscriptural, and having no Warrant or Foundation in the Word of God; but, in the Words of the Act, as brought in by the Folly and Corruption of Mens Invention.

I am not myself at all concerned in this Debate. My Intention is only to relate the plain Matter of Fact, and leave the Reflections to the Reader. I might add, that I do not think there is so great Stress to be laid upon Church-Government, either as to Bishops or Presbyters, as to justify a Division about it among Protestants; and that the Law is the ius & norma, the Right and the Rule in this Case as well as others. But since every one cannot think in this manner, the Blame lies on those who wou'd force other Men to do what they wou'd have them, tho' against their Conscience; and rather than not impose their Non-Essentials on those who agree with them in the Essentials of Religion, wou'd set the two Nations in a Flame; which they have done more than once since the Reformation.

'Tis evident, that King James I. of England, and VI. of Scotland, was bred up in that Kirk, tho' he had been baptiz'd by the Popish Archbishop of St. Andrews, who was hang'd for murdering his Father the Lord Darnly. 'Tis true, the Example of his Mother, and many of his Courtiers, gave him too favourable an Opinion of Popery; yet it is suppos'd he took the main of his Disgust to Presbytery, which was approv'd and often confirm'd by his Authority, purely on Account of some Reproof the Ministers solemnly gave him with regard to his Morals. There was a Deputation sent from the Assembly to the King, to admonish him, in the Name of the Eternal God, to have Respect, in time, to the Estate of true Religion, to the many Murders and Oppressions daily multiplied thro' Impunity and lack of Justice, and to discharge the kingly Office in both, as he will eschew the fearful Challenge of God, and avert his Wrath off himself and the whole Land, &c. The King never forgave them this Freedom, yet so well dissembled he his Zeal for the Presbyterian Discipline, that he made this formal Speech to the Assembly, taking off his Bonnet, and lifting up his Hands and Eyes to Heaven, I praise and thank God that I was born into the World at a Time when the Light of God's Word shone clearly forth, eclips'd neither with the Mists of Ignorance, or the false Lights of Superstition. I bless God that has honoured me to be a King over such a Kirk, the sincerest Kirk in the World; which he repeated three times; and to strengthen it, fell out into very warm Expressions against other Protestants: The Church of Geneva, What are they? They keep Pache and Yule. What Authority have they in God's Word? and Where is their Institution? As for our Neighbour Church in England, their Service is an evil-disposed Mass in English; they want nothing of the Mass but the Liftings. I charge you, my

gude People, turning himself to every Side of the Kirk, Ministers, Doctors, Elders, Nobles, Barons, and Gentlemen, to stand to your Purity, and to exhort my People to do the same. And I, forsooth, as long as Life and Crown be left to me, shall maintain the same against all deadly. Upon which, the Historian tells us, there was nothing heard for a Quarter of an Hour in the Assembly, but praising God, and praying for the King, who was at this Time so zealous a Presbyterian, that when Mr. Udal and Mr. Cartwright, two eminent Non-conforming Ministers, were furiously persecuted by Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, the former being condemn'd to die, and the latter in Danger, King James wrote this Letter to Queen Elizabeth in their Behalf, before it came to Extremity. How does the Speech to the Assembly, agree with the Dialogue at the Hampton-Court Conference, where the King spoke against the Kirk, it you will believe Archbishop Whitgift, by the Spirit of God? And how does this Letter agree with his suffering Archbishop Bancroft to tread in the Steps of Whitgift, and silence and ruin many hundred Protestant Ministers and others on Account of Conscience only?

I do not delight so much in the History of this Monarch, as to enter further into it than is necessary for the History of England during his Reign; therefore, with reference to the Scottish Affairs, I shall only add, that upon the Kirk's excommunicating some Popish Lords, and others of the Spanish Faction, he took them into his Protection, to give a solid Instance of his Wisdom and Piety. Those Lords being charged with Idolatry, Heresy, Blasphemy, Apostacy, and Perjury; and the Assembly directing a new Admonition to the King, with Complaints of his Conduct, his personal Sins, and the Sins of his Family, it was as ill-relish'd as the former; and the King, to be reveng'd of them, never gave over till he procur'd the Title of Bishops to be restor'd and given to such Ministers as were empower'd to give their Vote in Parliament. This Point being gain'd, and the King in Possession of the Crown of England soon after, those Bishops daily encroach'd on the Privileges of the Presbytery, in which they were encourag'd by the King, to the great Dissatisfaction of the Majority of the People, who, for about forty Years, had known no other Church Government but that of their Pastors, in their Congregations and Assemblies.

We have seen what was the Constitution of the Kirk, that it was on the Geneva Bottom; that King James I. was not only a zealous Member of it, but a Favourer of their Brethren the Puritans in England. We had seen before, that those Puritans, being a numerous Body of English Protestants, earnestly desir'd a greater Conformity with the Church of Scotland. And we shall now see, that when the same King James became Monarch of Great-Britain, instead of strengthening the Protestant Interest in both Nations, by an Ecclesiastical as well as political Union, he not only destroy'd the Constitution of the Kirk in his antient Kingdom, but protected the Prelates in persecuting and ruining their Brethren of the Reformation in his new one; which fine Stroke of Politicks acquir'd him the glorious Tide of a second Solomon, from many of our most orthodox Writers: For that it cou'd not be with respect to his Conduct in State Matters Civil or Military. will appear in the History.

A Scotchman tells us, that on the Sunday before he left Scotland to go for England, he made this Speech to the People in the great Church, As God hath promoted me to a greater Power, so I must endeavour to establish Religion, and to take away Corruption in both the Countries. He promis'd to visit them every three Years, that every one from the greatest to the meanest, might have Access to his Person; but, says my Author, he scarce ever perform'd one Word of it all.

Before I close this Introduction, I must observe, that it was King James's Misfortune not to have been very well belov'd in his own Country, while he liv'd there. His Double-dealing with the Kirk, gave them a Disfellowship of his Government, inasmuch, that they refus'd to give God Thanks for his Deliverance from Gowry's Conspiracy, which wou'd have been a most unchristian, as well as uncharitable Act, if they had believ'd it to be true. Their Answer was, Nothing ought to be deliver'd in the Pulpit, where the Truth was not well known. The Murder of the Earl of Murray by Huntley, was said to be with his Consent. Not only Bishop Burnet, but almost all Authors, intimate as much; and the Death of that popular Lord remaining unpunish'd, made very ill Blood in Scotland.

M. S. J.
M. F.

I have it from the best Authority, that this King, who tho' born of the handsomest Couple in Europe, was far from being handsome, conceiv'd a mortal Hatred against the Earl of Murray, for an Expression of his Wife Queen Anne, who, looking out at a Window, and seeing that Lord entering the Court, said, He was the handsomest Man she ever saw. What, said the King, handsomer than I? And then swore he wou'd have his Life. Accordingly, to use Bishop Burnet's Terms, he set on the Marquis of Huntley, who was Murray's mortal Enemy, to murder him: and by a Writing all in his own Hand, he promis'd to save him harmless. Huntley set the House, in which the Earl was, on Fire, and Murray, flying, was follow'd and murder'd. Soon after, all who were concern'd in that Fact, were pardon'd, which laid the King open to much Censure. And this made the Matter of Gowry to be the less believed. Huntley, the Murderer, thought to be as well with King Charles I. as he had been with his Father, and came to Whitehall in the first Year of his Reign; but that King wou'd not see him, having been inform'd what a base, barbarous Murder he had committed to please King James; upon which Huntley produc'd a Warrant under the King's own Hand for that Murder, and the Matter was hush'd up. The Gordons have that Warrant still in their Archives, tho' probably they are too good Catholics to give one a sight of it. Sir Edward Peyton mistakes the Earl of Murray for one Mr. Stuart a Relation of that Earl's, and tells us, he haunted the Queen's Chamber too sedulously, which bred such a Jealousy in King James, as to get the Marquis of Huntley to dispatch Stuart out of the way, who burning his House, &c. After whose Death the Queen found others. Such was the Prince of whom Archbishop Whitgift, a few Years after, said, he was inspir'd by the Spirit of God. If Mr. Echard had had the Eloquence and Persuasion of a Tully or a Sallust, cou'd he have impos'd such a King upon us as a Blessing to a Christian Church, or have made any Church the more happy for having such a Head? We have elsewhere prov'd his History to be stuff with bold Assertions, Hearsays, Reports, and trifling Tales. He says all at once: We are not to give Credit to Buchanan's Account, who, to ingratiate himself with the Earl of Murray, wrote most scandalously against the Queen; of all which he earnestly repented, and acknowledged before his Death. Every Word of which is as false as the falsest Tale in his History; and we cannot say any thing worse of it. Let the Reader observe his Tone here; We are not to give Credit; whereas, in truth, we are to give Credit to what Buchanan says. And tho' I was well satisfy'd before of the Arrogance and Falshood of this Assertion, yet now there are a hundred Records publish'd, proving that Queen to have been concern'd in the Murder of her Husband, more plainly than any one Fact ever was prov'd, which was endeavour'd to be kept secret; and it is given up even by Papists, and such sort of Clergy as T-p, Bisse, Swift, &c. who were the more loth to part with it on account of her Son's great Favour to such a sort of Priesthood; and they wou'd be ashamed of it, if they had Shame in them. There are extant three Letters of hers to the Duke of Norfolk, wherein she herself owns that she was accessory to the Death of her Husband: How then is it possible that Buchanan shou'd, at his Death, repent of having told the Truth, and die with a Lie in his Mouth, as he must do, if he said she was not? Buchanan, Lib. 18. Fol. 395. says, Cum ad secundum aciem pervenisset concurs ab omnibus clamor sublatu est, ut meretricem ut Parricidam cremarent, erat in Militare quodam vexillo depictus Henricus Rex Mortuus, & juxta Filium Infans vindictam Parricidii adeo exposcens. Id Signum duo Milites inter duas bastas distantum quoque se verteret, ob oculos ei objiciebant. The Queen having "surrender'd herself to the Lords; the second Line "of the Army us'd her very barbarously when "she came among them, and cry'd out, a Harlot, a Parricide, let us slay her; bearing in their "Standard the Picture of the murder'd King, and "his little Son lying by him, and displaying it before her wherever she turn'd her Eyes." This Fact, which Buchanan repented of telling, was, it seems, so well known, that the Soldiers carry'd about the Picture of it in their Colours. Buchanan, in another Place, assures us, She had before that given him Poison, which working, before its Time, broke out all over his Body, and so Nature expell'd it. Whoever will give himself the Trouble to cast an Eye on Anderson's Collection of Records, where those that are for her are printed, as well as those that are against her, he will presently be convinc'd she was so wicked as to encourage Bothwell in his unlawful Love to her during her Husband's Life-time, and to encourage Norfolk in the like unlawful Love during the Life-time of Bothwell: And that what is said of her lewd Commerce with Rizio the Italian Fidler, is too well grounded to be thrown by as a Fable. Father Orleans the Jesuit, who does not a little flatter this King for suffering the Laws to be broken in favour of the Papists, owns, that the Concern Mary Queen of Scots was in at the sight of Rizio's Murder, affected her Son then unborn so much, that 'twas the Cause of his Cowardice. Yet Echard, very piously, makes a Panegyrick on her singular Piety, out of Complement to her pious Son, for renouncing and persecuting the Protestant Church he was bred in. If such Things as these are thought partial, I shall give Reason enough to the Reader to think me so: But as in this, and all other the like Cases, I am ready to prove them to be true when call'd upon; so I shall not alter my Method out of Complacency to those who cannot, or do not distinguish Partiality from Truth. It is very happy for the Lovers of Truth, that Mr. Anderson liv'd long enough to collect and publish his Records, for he dy'd soon after; and all that Buchanan says of Mary Queen of Scots, is prov'd to Demonstration by those Records. Yet the French Jesuit above-mention'd, who had never seen any other Authorities than the Writings of Papists, and Ecclesiasticks popishly affected, positively asserts, That the Matter contain'd in the authentick Collection of Anderson, which is the same Authority that Buchanan had, is false; and that Posterity will never ver forgive King James the Lenity he shew'd to an insignificant Fellow, the great Buchanan his Preceptor. This Jesuit's notable Book is introduced into the English World, with a Recommendation by LAURENCE ECHARD M. A. Archdeacon of Stow; as if he had not had Falsities enough to answer for in his own Histories, but must needs adopt that Popish Priest's History, which contains hardly any thing else but Falshood from the Beginning to the End, as I have prov'd, and can prove beyond Exception.

Before King James I. left Scotland, the Ministers had so great Influence, that the Nation had generally no great Affection for his Person; yet what he did for the Protestants, made the Papists jealous of his Favour to them: And having no Dependence on his Sincerity, their Loyalty and Love were as little to be depended upon. True it is, his Friendship to them was much less affected, than his Kindness to the Kirk. But he was naturally so timorous, that he never ventured upon Extremities towards either Party. Whatever Prince gives his Subjects Reason to believe he wants Courage, he will certainly find they want Fear; and that Monarch who is not esteem'd, will surely never be belov'd: The necessary Consequence of which, is Oppression on one side, and Opposition on the other.

The Writers of this Reign keep no Measures in their Panegyricks. I hardly know one of them who seems to have had the Facts before him when he was forming K. James's Character. I will avoid Flattery and Prejudice alike, and foresee, that with all my Care in exposing the naked Truth from the most authentick Historians; who shall every where be named, I shall be condemn'd as partial, for not putting it in the same Light as our Ecclesiastical Writers have done: Some of whom, and some Lay Authors too, have not stuck, among other Encomiums, to extol the Piety of this Prince, so agreeable to the several Admonitions he receiv'd from the Clergy of the Church in which he was educated, and to those Execrations and Prophecies of the Sabbath, which are the Complaint and Lamentation of the Times we are about to write of.

The Subject of the following History, is not that of the Stuarts; but the History of England during their Reign here; so I shall not enter into the Genealogy of that House, nor trace them from Banco down to Elizabeth Mure, and from that Lady to King James I. King of Great-Britain. There are too many Tragedies in that Story, and the Facts are of too little Importance, and are not free enough from Barbarism to render it entertaining.

Before the Stuart Line was heard of in that Kingdom, there had been a long Succession of Kings, some of them brave and great, and others of them no better than the Posterity of Elizabeth Mure. Of the bad Kings, Dardanus the 20th from Fergus, Romachus the 36th King, and Alpinus the 68th, were all beheaded; and of the Posterity of Elizabeth Mure, her Son John Stuart, called Robert III. broke his Heart, and dy'd of voluntary Abstinence and Sorrow; and his Son James was kill'd in his Wife's Arms, A. D. 1436. James II. was shot dead by his own Soldiers, A. D. 1460. James III. was kill'd in a Battle against the Confederate Lords, A. D. 1488. James IV. was slain by the English at the Battle of Flodden Field; James V. died of Grief after a Rout. His Daughter Mary Queen of Scots was beheaded; and her Son James I. of England, brought along with him the ill Conduct and ill Fate of his Family.

My Design is to shew how much the Condition of this Kingdom was alter'd by that Prince's Accession to the Throne; and how he and his Posterity, by hearkening to the Counsels of Minions and Bigots, made this once flourishing and famous Kingdom, a Scene of Misery and Disgrace. In order to do this, let us take a short View of the glorious Reign of Queen Elizabeth, and consider her as she was the supream Head both of Church and State.

As she was Head of the Church, tho' there were some Things in her Government which were exceptionable, yet her Zeal for the Protestant Religion was most exemplary. She not only banish'd Popery out of England, but earnestly endeavoured to promote the Reformation in foreign Parts, by powerfully assisting the French and Belgick Protestants, and expostulating with Henry IV. upon his Apostacy, after she had done him so many good Offices, and so successfully supported him in his Succession to the Throne of France.

Then as to her Management of the State, she acquir'd more Glory than any of the Kings that had worn this Crown since the Reign of Henry V.

Her Sister Queen Mary had lost what was left of the English Conquests on the Continent. Calais was recover'd by the French, and by the first Treaty Queen Elizabeth made with them, she oblig'd them to pay 500000 Pounds for it, which was as much as two Millions now.

She took upon her the Protection of the United Provinces, and enabled the Dutch to throw off the Spanish Yoke. The Cities of Brill, Flushing, and Ramekins, were yielded up to her as a Caution for the vast Sums she lent them. Havre de Grace, in Normandy, was also surrender'd to her for the like Reason by the French, and the Terror of her Arms was so great upon the Ocean, that she was stil'd the Queen of the North-Sea.

Nor did our own Seas confine her Dominion, she made very successful Enterprizes by her Admirals in America, overthrew the Spanish invincible Armada, and destroy'd the vain Hopes of Philip II. of Spain, who aspir'd to the Universal Monarchy: She attack'd him not only in the Indies, but even in Spain itself, and reduc'd the strong City of Cadix.

She drove the French out of Scotland, and settled the Affairs of that neighbour Kingdom; as she thought best for the Protestant Interest, to strengthen which, she enter'd into Alliances with the Princes of Germany.

She procur'd Peace for the Poles, distress'd by the Turks. She suppress'd the Rebellions of the Papists in England and Ireland, and brought the Scots Queen to Justice, in Defiance of the Menaces of all the Papal Powers.

As she provided thus for the Security of Religion and Liberty, so she extended her Royal Care to the promoting of Trade and Manufactures. She invited the Belgick Say and Serge Men into England. She establish'd the Russia Trade, the Portugal Trade, the Turkey Trade, and the Trade in both Indies, which commene'd all in her Reign. She destroy'd Monopolies; and tho' she was at an immense Charge in carrying on so many necessary and glorious Designs, she was never in Debt.

The contrary to all which, are the Reigns we are entering upon; which, as inglorious as they be of themselves, appear still to be more so, by a Comparison with that of this incomparable Princess.

But before we enter farther upon this History, Many it is convenient to remember, that there were many illustrious Persons in England, who were so jealous of the Glory of the Nation, that they would have prevented the Succession of the Scots King, and had it secur'd to the Protestant Line in the House of Suffolk; the Founder of which, Charles Brandon, had marry'd Mary the French Queen's younger Sister to Margaret, Wife of James the IVth, King of Scotland; in whose Heirs remain'd the Hereditary Right, which has been so much for the Glory and Happiness of England since they succeeded to this Crown.

The Tragicall History of K. James's Family.

Queen Elizabeth's glorious Reign.

The

The Lord Keeper Bacon, the Lord Treasurer Cecil, and the wisest Heads in the Administration, made the same Judgment of King James the Sixth of Scotland and First of England, as did Henry the Fourth of France, who put a very great Affront on his Capacity, as will be mention'd in his History. The Distractions in the Government of Scotland during his Reign in that Kingdom, his Inconstancy and Dissimulation, were ill Prefages of his governing this. The Misfortunes of the Royal House of Stuart, of which, as has been observ'd, but two Kings dy'd a natural Death, seem'd to be attach'd to the Crown they wore; and it is no wonder, if wise Men were willing to prevent the Disgrace and Danger with which they were threaten'd.

John Hales, Esq; of Coventry, a very learned and polite Gentleman for his Time, wrote a Treatise in Favour of the House of Suffolk, especially of the Children of Edward Seymour Earl of Hertford, eldest Son of Edward Seymour Duke of Somerset, according to A. Wood; whereas he had an elder Son, another Edward Seymour, from whom those of that Name in Devonshire are descended. The Earl of Hertford marry'd the Lady Katherine Grey, Daughter of Henry Duke of Suffolk, nearly ally'd to Queen Elizabeth, who discountenancing all Mention of a Successor, Mr. Hales was sent to the Tower for writing that Treatise. The Lord Keeper Bacon was near losing the Seal for being privy to it, as was also the Lord Treasurer Cecil; tho', says Wood, the Matter was so wisely laid upon Hales and Bacon, that Sir William Cecil was kept free, and procur'd Pardons for the others. The Sense of these great Ministers was, one wou'd think, sufficient to alarm the Nation; but the People so heartily wish'd the Life of the Queen, that they seem'd to believe she was immortal, and troubled themselves very little about a Successor. Thus had our First King James a very easy Possession of the Throne; and had not fate there many Months before the People felt, as well as saw, the Effects of the Alteration.

'Tis no Miracle, that the nearer Queen Elizabeth drew to the End of her Reign and Life, the Courtiers turn'd their View to the North, and endeavour'd to ingratiate themselves with the Scots King. Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State, and Son to the late Treasurer, was one of the first who made his Addresses to him; informing him of the Discourse between the French Ambassador and himself; wherein the former attempted to intimidate the Secretary, by putting him in mind of the Death of the Queen of Scots, that King's Mother, which Sir Robert's Father had a great Hand in, and insinuating the Danger of admitting her Son to the Succession of England; which the Secretary not taking as the Ambassador wou'd have had him, the latter said his Master did not intend to impeach the King of Scotland's Interest. This Information procur'd a kind Answer from King James; I lov'd your Virtues long before I knew you wou'd deserve my Love of your Person: Which was some of the Cunning that was term'd King-Craft. Another Instance of his corresponding with the King of the Scots, was his concealing a Dispatch he receiv'd from him in Presence of the Queen; who taking the Air on Blackbeath near Greenwich heard a Post-Boy's Horn, and enquiring from whence he came, it was said from Scotland. Upon which she commanded to stop the Coach to receive the Pacquet. Cecil being in the Coach with her, and apprehensive of a Discovery of his Correspondence, calls suddenly for a Knife to cut open the Pacquet, lest Delay might beget Suspicion; and having open'd it, told the Queen 'twas in a filthy Pickle, smelt ill coming out of several nasty Budgets, and shou'd be air'd before it wou'd be fit for her Majesty to turn over. The Queen being very delicate as to Scents, enquir'd no farther about it; and the Secretary had time to shew what Part of the Dispatch he pleas'd.

The Earl of Northumberland, the King's Neighbour in the North, gave him early Advice of Queen Elizabeth's Sicknefs, that he might make sure of his Title, and be ready to take Possession when the Time came; which was the 24th of March 1602. that Excellent Princess passing then from an earthly to a heavenly Kingdom. The News of her Death was first brought to Scotland by Sir Robert Cary, a younger Son of the Lord Hunsdon, the late Queen's Cousin-German, Son of Mary Sister to Queen Anne Bullen. The Lords of the Council in England had commanded the Gates of the Palace to be shut, that they might be the first to give Advice of the Death of their late Sovereign by a Messenger of their own: But the Lord Hunsdon, Lord Chamberlain, found Means to let out his Son, who, says Sir A. W. most ungratefully caught her last Breath to carry it to the Scots King; and he was rewarded with a Barony for his Expedition, and afterwards made Governor to the Duke of Tork. The Privy Council hearing he was gone, complain'd to the King that he had done what in him lay to anticipate their Duty. They sent their Letter by Sir Charles Piercy, Brother to the Earl of Northumberland; and not Thomas Somerset, Son to the Earl of Worcester. As soon as the King had read it, and knew that he had been proclaim'd King of England in the Cities of London and Westminster, his Countenance chang'd, and the Lords who were with him fear'd he was taken sick; when on a sudden he left off reading, and lifted up his Hands and Eyes to Heaven, as if he pray'd; and giving the Letter to the Lord that was next him, said, Read it, Man; the Queen is dead. After these Gentlemen came Lewis Pickering, Esq; of Northamptonshire, one of the Heads of the Puritan Party, who arriv'd within a few Minutes of the former, in hopes of recommending his Friends to his Majesty's Favour. But Dr. Neville, Dean of Canterbury, who was sent by that Archbishop, succeeded better in his Errand, as will be seen hereafter.

On Sunday, April 3. the King made the Speech in the great Church at Edinburgh, which has been already mention'd. And in Answer to the Letter of the Lords of the Council, acknowledg'd their dutiful Affections, and confirm'd all Officers Civil and Military. The Letter was carry'd to the Council by Sir Roger Aston his Majesty's Barber, whom he advanced afterwards to be Gentleman of the Bedchamber, and Master of the Wardrobe, having employ'd him in the Queen's Time as a Letter-Carrier between the two Courts. The Lords enquiring of him how he had liv'd in Scotland, being of good Extraction in England, tho' mean in Fortune? he reply'd, Like a poor Man wandering above forty Tears in a Wilderness and barren Soil, now arrived at the Land of Promise.

On the fifth of April the King set out from Scotland, attended by those Scottish Noblemen and Gentlemen, whose Company was most grateful to him; as the Duke of Lenox, whose Conduct in Scotland had render'd him odious to the Protestants; the Earls of Hamilton, Argyle, Mar, Kinlofs; the Lord Hume, Sir George Hume, Sir John Ramsay, &c. Of the latter, more will be said in the following History, which begins with this King's Entrance into the Kingdom of England; where he was receiv'd with as much Acclamation and Joy, as if he had brought in his Train, Piety, Riches, and Glory.

Ill-Conduct at Berwick.

JAMES STUART, the first of that Royal House who reign'd in England, arriv'd at Berwick in his Way to London, to take Possession of the Throne, on the 7th of April, A.D. 1603; where, among other Lords and Gentlemen, there met him

Henry Howard, Son to the Duke of Norfolk, who was beheaded for his treasonable Correspondence with Mary Queen of Scots, King James's Mother. This Lord was immediately sworn one of his Majesty's Privy-Council; a very wise Act, considering he was a Papist, and the King just come out of a Presbyterian Country into a Land of Puritans. The Lord Thomas Howard, the Duke's Brother, another Papist, was also made a Privy-Counsellor.

To Berwick came the Lord Cobham, who three Months after was imprison'd for a Conspiracy against him. Here his Majesty did the only military Act he ever perform'd in his Life, for he gave Fire to, and shot off a Piece of Ordnance; which Stow, the Chronicler, records as an heroic Action in so peaceable a Monarch, who, as Pere Orleans says, could not see a naked Sword with swooning. Several other Persons of Quality paid their Complements to the new King at this Place, and many more waited on him at Durham and York; where he was receiv'd by the Lord Burghley President of the North, and a numerous Attendance of Noblemen and Gentlemen; the chief of whom was Sir Robert Cecil Secretary of State, that Lord's Brother; but his Train was so incommoded by the vast Concourse of People crowding every where to see him, that at York he issued out a Proclamation to prevent the Multitude's encumbering him in his Progress. The Inconstancy of the Great Vulgar, and the Small in so soon forgetting their belov'd Queen, was observ'd with Sorrow by Men of Ingenuity and Foresight, the Reason for their extravagant Joy having no Foundation in the King's Government of his antient Kingdom of Scotland; and it is very probable, that what a Scotsman said of the Adoration paid to his Master by the English, This People will spoil a good King, was as much Flattery as the other.

Fuller tells us he was amaz'd at the Equipage of the Northern Lords who repair'd to him at York, especially the Earl of Cumberland's, admiring there shou'd be so many Kings in England; for less he cou'd not take them to be by the Number and Gallantry of their Attendants. If his Revenue in Scotland was in the whole but 50000 Pounds a Year, as we are told, the two northern Earls of Northumberland and Cumberland, had together an Income not much short of it. But, according to my Author, he soon found a Way, by Advice of the English Secretary Cecil, to abate the formidable Greatness of the English Nobility, by conferring Honours on many Persons. Thus was Nobility so spread abroad, that it became very thin, and lost much of its ancient Esteem. Instead of such sober Reasoning, Archdeacon Echard thinks it was for the Glory of the Kingdom, It was

A.D. 1603. thought fit, thro' an Immenſity of Wiſdom, to give a free Courſe to the Paſſage of Honour, which during Queen Elizabeth's Reign had been ſo ſtopp'd.

His Maſteſty ſtaid three Days at Tork, and then proceeded to Sir Edward Stanhope's Seat at Grimſton; thence to Ponteſract, Doncaſter, and Newark, where he arriv'd the 21ſt of April, and exerciſ'd his kingly Office on a Cutpurſe, whom he commanded to be executed without Form of Trial; a very early Inſtance of that Wiſdom which acquir'd him the Character of a ſecond Solomon. However wiſe it was, the Juſtice of it was much queſtion'd, and it was hoped, when he had acquainted himſelf better with our Laws, he wou'd not have violated them ſo notoriously. Yet after he was ſettled at Whitehall, a Cutpurſe being taken in the Preſence, he commanded the Lord Garret, Knight Maſhal, to hang him up immediately, which was done; but the Knight fearing to be hang'd himſelf for ſo doing, eſcap'd by a Pardon under the Great Seal. The King was the longer on his Journey, for that he hunted all the Way, and banquetted at moſt of the Noblemen's and Gentlemen's Seats, every one ſtriving to gain his good Graces by Profuſion and Luxury.

On the 22d of April he arriv'd at Bolſloir Caſtle, a Seat of the preſent Duke of Rutland's, and the next Day at Burleigh near Stamford, a noble Seat of the preſent Earl of Exeter's. He tarry'd there two or three Days, and was royally entertain'd by the late Lord-Treaſurer's Son, the Lord Burghley. From thence he remov'd to Hinchinbrook near Huntington, a Seat of Sir Oliver Cromwel's, Uncle to the Protector, who has been often vilify'd for his baſe Exaction, by ſuch Hiſtorians as Heylin, Dugdale, Nalſon, &c. At Hinchinbrook his Reception was ſuch; as, ſays Fuller, in a manner made all former Entertainments forgotten, and all future to deſpair to do the like. All the Pipes about the Houſe ran with the choic'eſt Wines, and every thing answer'd the Greatneſs of Sir Oliver's Fortune, then one of the greateſt in England. Hither came the Heads of the Univerſity of Cambridge in their Scarlet Gowns and Corner Caps; and their Orator Mr. Robert Naunton, afterwards a Knight and Secretary of State, made an eloquent Latin Oration, requeſting a Confirmation of their Privileges, which his Maſteſty readily granted, and took particular Notice of Dr. Montagu Maſter of Sydney College, with whom he held much Diſcourſe.

At Godman-Cheſter, in the ſame County of Huntington, the Bayliſſ preſented him with ſeventy Teams of Horſes finely traced to as many new Ploughs, in Honour of Tillage; a Cuſtom of great Antiquity when the King paſſes through that Town, whoſe Inhabitants hold their Land by that Tenure. His Maſteſty told them he lik'd their Air ſo well, and took their Gift ſo kindly, that he wou'd often viſit them, were it not ſo expensive to them: And being told the Homage was only paid for the firſt Viſit, he perform'd his Promiſe to the Advantage of both Town and County.

Royſton was the firſt Place where he paid his own Expence. From thence he proceeded to Standon, the Seat of Sir Thomas Sadler; thence to Broxborn, the Houſe of Sir Henry Cook, Cofferer to Queen Elizabeth; where he was met by the Great Officers of the Crown, the Lord Chancellor Egerton, the Lord Treaſurer Buckhurſt, the Lord Admiral Howard, and moſt of the Lords of the Privy Council. At Ware the King came to Wiggen, ſo baſe a Cottage, that it begat a Saying, when a Thing was refus'd, You ſhall have it when the King comes to Wiggen.

On the 3d of May he arriv'd at Theobalds, Secretary Cecil's Seat, where he was moſt magnificently entertain'd for four Days, and added, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, the Lord Hume, the Lord Elphington, and the Lord Kinloſs, to his Privy-Council, another wiſe Act in the Infancy of his Government, to let the Engliſh ſee that his Favour, and the Nation's Riches, were to run in other Channels. Nor was it leſs an Act of Wiſdom, to dub twenty-eight Knights in Sir Robert Cecil's Houſe, to ſhew betimes how different his Conduct wou'd be from Queen Elizabeth's, who ſcarce ever made ſo many Knights in ſo many Months. A few Days after he dubb'd eighty more at the Charter-Houſe, and near two hundred before he reach'd Whitehall; by which he gain'd no more Love than the Knights got Honour, Knighthood being render'd too cheap to be in the Eſteem Queen Elizabeth left it. The Jeſt that was made of it, appears by this Queſtion, What need of ſo many Milites, when there's no War? But Mr. Echard, who is infect'd with the Wiſdom of this Reign, excuſes his Prodigality on account of the want of Knights to make Jury-Men at Aſſizes. Higher Dignities were diſpos'd of with answerable Profuſion. He created the following Scots Lords and Gentlemen, Peers of England and Scotland, as Sir John Ramſay, who murder'd Earl Gowry at the King's Inſtigation, Earl of Holderneſs; Sir James Hay Earl of Carlisle; Sir George Hume Earl of Dunbar; Sir Thomas Ereſkin Earl of Kelley; and Sir Richard Preſton Earl of Kildare: And to qualify them for theſe Honours, the publick Treasures were waſted in a moſt ſcandalous manner. Nothing, ſays Osborn, was made penal by Law in Church or Commonwealth, but was by the King granted to his Countrymen, and by them exacted to the uttermoſt Farthing. Many, in the mean time, venturing their Spleen in Songs; of one of which I remember two Lines.

*In Scotland he was born and bred,
And though a Beggar, muſt be fed.*

Which cauſ'd a By-word, That the Exchequer reach'd from London to Edinburgh. The Grievance was the more crying, for that this King choſe thoſe of his own Nation for his Favourites, who had not one good Quality to recommend them to him, and were in no more Eſteem in their own Country than in England. One of the beſt of them was Sir George Hume, the new Earl of Dunbar, who was the reigning Favourite when the King came to England; and it is ſaid, he procur'd that Favour by concealing what he knew of Gowry's Conſpiracy. Sir Anthony Welden ſays, the Scots gave little Credit to that Story, and the wiſeſt of that Nation ſpoke ſlightly and deſpitefully of it. Sir Edward Peyton writes thus: The Queen found others to ſatisfy her unruly Appetite, as namely, the Earl of Gowry, a Lord of a comely Viſage, good Stature, and of an attracting Allurement; who, upon King James's Suſpicion of often Society with the Queen, converted the Friendſhip and Love of the Earl to the Poiſon of Hatred, cauſing Ramſey and others to murder Gowry in his own Houſe, giving it out for a ſtale, that the Earl with others wou'd have kill'd him. And to make this Falſhood appear odious in Shape of Truth, the Fifth of Auguſt was appointed a ſolemn Day of Thankſgiving for his ſuppos'd Delivery, and in this he mock'd the God of Heaven. Sir J. H. has this Expreſſion upon it, he blaſphem'd God for his pretended Deliverance once a Year all his Life after. Mr. Osborn, who frequented his Court, tells it thus: "Among a Number of other Novelties, he brought a new Holyday in to the Church of England, wherein God had publick Thanks given him for his Maſteſty's Deliverance out of the Hands of Gowry; and this fell out upon the 5th of Auguſt, on which many Lies were told either at Home or Abroad, in the Quire of St. Paul's Church, or the Long-Walk; for no Scotsman you cou'd meet with beyond Sea, but did laugh at it, and it was ſaid, the printed Relation of it murder'd all Poſſibility of Credit." Wilson is a little more cautious; Whether the Gowries attempted on the King's Perſon, or the King upon theirs,

A.D. 1603. theirs, is variously reported. I will not say, the Celebration of this holy Day was Profaneness for Fame may be a Slanderer. Dr. Welwood, who was a Scotsman himself, a discreet Author, and well inform'd of the Fact, writes; Gowry's Conspiracy was in itself so improbable, and attended with so many inconsistent Circumstances, that 'twas believ'd at the time it was said to have been attempted. He then reflects on the Effects of the holy Day, which Bancroft and his Brethren celebrated so devoutly, and for which they had solemn Prayers: Posterity has swallow'd for Truth what their Ancestors took for a mere Fiction. Another Historian speaking of the printed Relation upon which the Holiday was founded, says, I will not descant upon the many Absurdities and incoherent Circumstances couch'd under this Relation; but only tell you, most Authors who have mention'd it seem to turn the Tables, and lay the Assassination at the King's Door. Notwithstanding all this, shall I be reckon'd partial by the inferior Clergy, and their Followers, for insinuating, that a Prince, said to have the Spirit of God in him, shou'd turn Religion into a Farce, and be capable of acting such a Part in it.

Hist. Stu.

On Saturday the 7th of May the King proceeded to London, being met on the Road by Sir Robert Lee Lord-Mayor, the Aldermen and Sheriffs. The Recorder, Sir Richard Martyn, made a florid Speech suitable to the Occasion. His Majesty stopp'd four Days at the Charter-house, a Palace of the Lord Thomas Howard's, where the Revellings and Rejoycings were continu'd; with which one would think both Court and City might in much less time have been surfeited.

From the Charter-house he went privately to Whitehall, and thence by Water to the Tower; where on the 17th of May he made fourteen Sergeants at Law, and three Days after created four English Peers, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Essington, Sir Robert Sidney Baron of Penshurst, Sir William Knolles Baron of Grays, Sir Edward Wootton Baron of Morley. The Lord Henry Howard was created Earl of Northampton, and Thomas Sackville Lord Buckhurst Earl of Dorset. Henry Wriothesley Earl of Southampton, who had been condemn'd for the Earl of Essex's Treason, and had been kept a Prisoner upon Reprieve in the Tower four Years, was discharg'd, and some time after made Knight of the Garter, Privy-Counsellor, and Governor of the Isle of Wight.

The King had left the Queen and Royal Family in Scotland; and as soon as he was settled in England, he dispatch'd John Spotswood, afterwards Archbishop of St. Andrews, to conduct her into England, with a Train of English Lords and Ladies, who valu'd themselves very much on the Honour of the Employment; as the Earl of Suffex, the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Compton, the Lord Norris, and Sir George Carew; the Countess of Worcester, the Countess of Kildare, the Lady Anne Herbert Daughter to the Earl of Pembroke, the Lord Scrope's Lady, the Lord Rick's Lady, and the Lady Walsingham, one of the late Queen's Bedchamber: These went by his Majesty's Appointment. The Countess of Bedford, the Lady Hastings, the Lady Cecil, the Lady Hatton, the Lady Harrington, and several other Persons of Quality, went voluntarily to fill up the new Queen's Court, that she might break forth from the North amidst a new Constellation of Beauties, herself indeed not the most beautiful. Spotswood had no Order to bring Prince Henry, but she would not stir without him. The Persons with whom the Earl of Mar, his Governor, had left him in Charge, refus'd to deliver him without positive Command from the King, which threw her into a Fit of Sickness; which his Majesty hearing of, dispatch'd the Lord Mar to present the Prince to the Queen; who had such an Aversion to that Lord, that when the King, to reconcile her to him, wrote her how much he was oblig'd to his Wisdom and Negotiations for his peaceable Reception in England, she said to her Ladies, I had rather never see England than be beholden to him.

Such are the Events of this triumphant Reign; such the Facts that are to instruct the Reader in the History of King James the First. The Queen, with Prince Henry then about 9 Years of Age, and the Lady Elizabeth, arriv'd at York the 11th of June. They rested there a few Days; and on the 27th arriv'd at Eaton in Northamptonshire, a Seat of Sir George Fermour's, where the King met them in Person, and having left the Princess Elizabeth to the Government of the Lord Harrington, they pass'd from thence to Sir J. Fortescue's in Buckinghamshire: A very worthy Gentleman, who was so jealous of the Liberty of his Country, that he mov'd to have King James oblig'd to Articles before he was admitted. So did Sir Walter Raleigh, and other generous Spirits; but the Earl of Northumberland swore he would bring him in by the Sword; and Cecil the Secretary, to have the Merit of his easy Admittance, frustrated all Motions of Articles.

The King's younger Son Charles Duke of Albany being not above three Years of Age, was thought too young to endure so long a Journey; but young as he was, and as much an Infant, he already discover'd a strange Perverseness and Obstinacy of Temper; so incorrigible and inflexible was his Nature, that his Nurses, and those Gentlemen who attended him, could very rarely devise how to please him, much less to reclaim that Intemperance of his natural Constitution; which, as the Gentlewomen themselves have both often related and protested, so are there yet enough alive who will justify it, says my Author, as a known Truth, and of which his Mother Queen Anne would often complain, usually calling him her perverse and obstinate Son. This is told us by a Servant of his Father's, who liv'd in his Court till he was weary of it; and is confirm'd by his Actions, as will be seen in the Sequel of our History. In the following Year, the young Prince was taken ill of a Fever; but recover'd by the Care and Skill of Dr. Atkins, one of the King's Physicians, who was sent on purpose to Scotland; and in October conducted him to Windsor, where the Court then resided.

As yet there is little Business done, but what consisted in Royal Progresses and Entertainments, Sports and Jollities in the midst of a severe Plague, which had till then rag'd in England, no less than 3000 a Week dying in London and Westminster. These Feastings were follow'd by the Ceremonies of Embassies. The first that came was a solemn one from the States of the United Provinces, who flatter'd themselves much with Hopes of his Friendship; and to do him Honour, sent Frederick Henry de Nassau, Brother to Prince Maurice, Counsellor of State, and General of the Horse; Walrave de Broderode, John Olden Barneveldt, and James Valk, with a magnificent Train and Equipage. They arriv'd at London the 14th of May, and had Audience of his Majesty the 27th, when they represented to him the Necessity of continuing the War with Spain and the Archdukes. They demand'd the same Succours which Queen Elizabeth had furnish'd them with, and Permission to raise Recruits for the English Troops in the Service of the States. They propos'd to the King of Great Britain, as he was then stil'd, to enter into a League against the Spaniards, with other Powers of Europe, to hinder their acquiring the Universal Monarchy, to which they had a long time aspir'd. They also inform'd him, that the late Queen having desir'd them to set out a Squadron of Ships to join her Fleet, and act against Spain; they had accordingly equipp'd nine Men of War and two Brigantines, which were ready in the Downs. King James return'd them an Answer in general Terms

16 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1603. Terms only, That he was but newly come to the Crown, and cou'd not yet resolve upon any thing; C. 11. to the Dutch. that he thought Peace was to be prefer'd to War: however, he was desirous to preserve Friendship with the States General. The Ambassadors easily enough guess'd his Meaning, and that no Succours were to be expected from him; whose Reign, says Monsieur Le Clerc, was a Series of Weaknesses; His Pays Bas. Le Clerc's Character of him. being a very timorous Prince, who minded nothing but his Pleasures, tho' he made a Shew of Knowledge and Learning. Instead of Wisdom, he is here charg'd with Weakness; instead of Learning and Knowledge, with a Shew of it; which, it seems, was as well known abroad as at home. Add to this his Inclination to Popery, which was very strong; not, I believe, out of the least Conviction that the Idolatry and Superstition of the Romish Church were more agreeable to Scripture, than the Piety and Purity of the Reform'd; but either out of Fear of the Papists, or thinking their Religion the easiest and best suited to a Life of Pleasure, which he intended to lead. Father Orleans tells us, P. 5. he had some Inclination to the Catholick Religion, and made some Steps towards being converted. A Prince in such a Disposition was not likely to be a hearty Friend to a Presbyterian Republick, as was that of the United Provinces. The foreign Negotiations in this Reign are so weak and inglorious, that they are not worth mentioning. Mr. Echard knew but little of them: Besides, to relate them was not for the Credit of a King, whom he makes not only the Head, but the Support and Ornament of our Church.

In June an Embassy arriv'd from the Elector Palatine, who probably had so early an Eye towards an Alliance with his Majesty, by marrying his Son to the Princess Elizabeth. From the Archduke, Governor of the Netherlands, came Count Aremberg, whose coming prov'd fatal to Sir Walter Raleigh. The King of Spain sent the Constable of Castile, a Grandee of the first Rank; and Careless of the Honour of England. his Errand was the most important, it being to make Peace with the Crown of England, which had been at War with the Spaniards almost thirty Years. Pere Orleans says, he immediately gave Order to conclude a Peace with Spain. And himself, and the Princes of his Race, from that time to the End of their Reigns, always took as little Care to maintain the Glory of England, as the Protestant Religion, which owes to it its best Protection. The Duke de Sully was Ambassador from Henry the IVth of France. The Duke of Tuscany, and the Senate of Venice, sent Embassies of Congratulation; and for their Reception with the more Pomp and Order, a new Officer was instituted by the Name of Master of the Ceremonies, who had more Business on his Hands than the Master of the Ordnance. Sir Lewis Lewkner was the first who held that Office.

Sir Robert Mansel, Vice-Admiral of England, was order'd to Graveline, to convoy the Spanish Ambassador; and Sir Jerom Turner to Calais, to bring over the French; who understanding Sir Robert Mansel, a superior Officer, was order'd to receive the Constable of Castile, refus'd to go aboard Sir Jerom Turner, but put himself into the Calais Pacquet-Boat with a Flag a-top. Sir Jerom sent to Sir Robert for Orders what to do; and he directed him to shoot, if he did not strike the Flag. Turner shot accordingly, and the Flag was taken down; but the Ambassador made great Complaints, which however were not much hearken'd to, the Action being generally approv'd of by the English Nation.

The King sent Ambassadors abroad to return the Compliments he receiv'd. The Earl of Rutland carry'd the Garter to the King of Denmark, and stood Godfather to his first Son. The Lord Spencer presented the Order to the Duke of Wirtemberg; and Sir Henry Wotton had the Embassy to Venice, where at that Juncture a Minister, who A.D. 1603. had more of his Master's boasted Wisdom, was wanted.

Pope Paul the Vth had so highly provok'd the Venice State of Venice, that at the Instigation of Padre inclin'd to Paulo, the learned Author of the History of the Council of Trent, they seem'd resolv'd to separate fall off from Popery. totally from the Court and Church of Rome. King James promis'd Justiniani the Venetian Ambassador, not only to assist them with all the Forces of his Kingdom, but to engage all his Allies in their Defense. At Sir Henry Wotton's Arrival, the Breach between the Pope and the Republick was brought very near a Crisis. The Ambassador at his Audience offer'd all possible Assistance in his Master's Name, and accus'd the Pope and Papacy of being the chief Authors of all the Mischiefs in Christendom. This was receiv'd with great Deference and Respect to King James. And when the Pope's Nuntio objected something as to that King's Orthodoxy, the Doge took him up briskly, and said, The King of England believes in Jesus Christ, but I do not know in whom some others believe. King James had sent with Wotton his Premonition to all Christian Princes and States, translated into Latin, to be presented to the Senate; which Padre Paulo, and the seven Divines of the State, more zealous for the Reformation than our English Ambassador, press'd might be done at his first Audience, telling him they were confident it wou'd have a very good Effect. But now for another bright Instance of this Monarch's immense Wisdom, and that of the Ministers he made use of: Sir Henry Wotton cou'd not be prevail'd with, alledging he had positive Orders to wait till St. James's Day, which was not far off. This Conceit of A Conceit of King James and his Envoy binders it, presenting the King's Book on St. James's Day spoil'd all; for before that Day the Difference was made up, and that happy Opportunity lost. When he had his Audience on St. James's Day, and presented the Book, all the Answer he got was, They thank'd the King of England for his Good-will; but they were now reconcil'd to the Pope, and were therefore resolv'd not to admit of any Change in their Religion, according to their Agreements with the Court of Rome. Because the King was St. James's Namefake, the Business must be deferr'd to be done on the Day of the two James's. Women and Children cou'd hardly have been guilty of any thing more whimsical. We shall find in a Year or two what Archbishop Whitgift said of him.

In July were solemnly perform'd the Rites of Knights of the Garter, and Lords made. St. George at Windsor, where Prince Henry, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Mar, the Earl of Southampton, and the Earl of Pembroke, were in- stall'd Knights of the Garter. Then also were created the Lord Thomas Howard Earl of Suffolk, the Lord Mountjoy Earl of Devonshire, Sir Robert Cecil Baron of Essendon, Viscount Cranbourn; Sir Thomas Egerton Lord Chancellor, Baron of Ellesmer; Sir William Russel Baron of Thornhaugh, Sir Henry Grey Baron of Grobie, Sir John Petre Baron of Writtle, Sir John Harrington Baron of Exton, Sir Henry D'Anvers Baron of Dantsey, Sir Thomas Gerard Baron of Gerard Bromley, Sir Robert Spencer Baron of Wormleighton. Those noble Dignities were bestow'd so plentifully, that a Pasquil was put up in St. Paul's, to direct weak Memories to a competent Knowledge of the Nobility. My Author adds, By a Multiplicity of them, Wilson, he made them cheap and invalid in the vulgar Opinion: For nothing is more destructive to Monarchy, than lessening the Peerage; upon their Decline the Commons arise, and Anarchy increases. The Merit of the Lord Mountjoy, the new Earl of Devonshire, was however distinguish'd from others. He brought over the old Irish Rebel Tyrone, who had ruin'd and massacred so many English Protestants; but having given his Word that he wou'd do so no more, he was not only pardon'd, but a Proclamation

The Irish Rebel Tyrone favour'd.

A.D. 1603. tion was publish'd, commanding all Persons to speak respectfully of him, and carry themselves civilly towards him; which is not to be imputed to his Majesty's Fear of a conquer'd Rebel, but to his Love of Peace and good Manners.

Lord Cobham and Sir W. Raleigh in Disgrace.

Raleigh's Plot.

No Foundation for it.

Soon after his Majesty's Arrival at London, the Lord Cobham and Sir Walter Raleigh were forbidden the Court; their Disgrace being owing, as some suppos'd, to the Malice and Suggestions of Secretary Cecil, who without any one of his Father's good Qualities had all his bad ones.

The Plague continuing to rage at London, the King retir'd to Wilton, a fine Seat of the Earl of Pembroke's in Wiltshire. While he was in this Retirement, a Discovery was made of that Conspiracy, which goes by the Name of Raleigh's Treason, Sir Walter Raleigh being one of the chief Conspirators. What the Treason was, no body could then give a very good Account of; and much less now that it has been almost 130 Years a brewing by those who hated Sir Walter's Memory for his making free with the Lands of the Church. There was no Foundation for it in Probability, whatever Fact was pretended to be prov'd on the Plotters. Was it likely that the Lord Cobham, Sir Walter Raleigh, and three or four Gentlemen more, should attempt to alter a Government with which the People were so transported, or that a Man of so great a Genius as Sir Walter Raleigh should give into so impracticable a Scheme? He was for binding King James to Articles, as has been observ'd; and that was a Crime not easily to be forgiven by a Prince, who lov'd Power as much as he hated War.

P. 472.

Sir Walter Raleigh was doubtless disgusted at the little Regard the King shew'd to his Merit; and being a Man of Spirit, might vent that Disgust in rash and dangerous Expressions, before Persons who made their Market of the Confidence he had in them. Sir Anthony Welden says, What the Treason was no Man could tell; and it is left with so dark a Comment, that Posterity will never understand the Text. It is true, some lost their Lives; yet the World was never satisfy'd of the Justice. Dr. Welwood compares this Conspiracy to that of Gowry's, saying, 'twas no less a Mystery. Mr. Osborn writes of it thus: A Treason so improbable to hurt others, or benefit themselves, that if ever Folly was capable of the Title or Pity due to Innocence, theirs might claim a large Share. Another Historian; It was such a Mixture, that nothing could be visible in it. Yet after the Lord Cobham's Brother Mr. Brook, and two Romish Priests, Watson and Clerk, had been put to Death for it, Mr. Echard cries out, how uncommonly tender and merciful was this King?

Such a Beginning of a Reign promis'd very little Good in the Course of it; but so much Care was taken to gild the Appearances that the Darknefs had not its full Effect on the Minds of the People. It was not probable that two Churchmen, the Lord Cobham and his Brother, and the Lord Grey of Wilton, a Puritan, should join with Sir Walter Raleigh a reputed Atheist, and two Romish Priests, to restore Popery, and set up a Spanish arbitrary Government; especially considering what an advantageous Treaty the Constable of Castile was upon concluding with the King's Ministers, of whom Cecil was the Chief. Welden observes, It was indeed those that made the Peace, not those that endeavour'd the breaking of it, that were the Traytors, and are to be curs'd by all Posterity. Sir Walter Raleigh oppos'd this Negotiation as detrimental and scandalous to the Interest and Honour of England. Cecil, amongst all his Politicks, could not penetrate so far as Raleigh, tho' the thing lay so near the Surface, or he was taken off by Spanish Money. As this Peace, says Osborn, was of infinite Consequence to the Spaniard, so he spar'd for no Cost to procure it. Howard Earl of Northampton built his Palace in the Strand with the Gold that came to his Share. And Cecil's Portion could not be less, considering he was Prime Minister; but it is all hush'd up; and one Reason of it may be his joining with the King against the Presbyterians at the Hampton-Conference, which was about this time. Fuller, 21.

For this Peace, and others of the same happy Effect, King James had the amiable Title of Rex Pacificus bestow'd upon him; and had the Peace he so inculcated been as much for his Honour as his Ease; had not his Fear of War been stronger than his Love of Peace, that Title would have been as illustrious as those of the Victorious and Invincible. Sir Walter Raleigh was a military Man, and therefore very unfit for a Favourite in this Reign; yet Cecil's Jealousy of his Parts and Worth sunk him deeper in the Conspiracy than was in Reason, as well as Truth. Was it not extremely likely that Count Aremberg should treat with Cobham for a Rebellion against the King, while the Constable of Castile was treating with Cecil for an Alliance between him and his Master the King of Spain; against which Raleigh wrote a Treatise, which he presented to the King? Be it as it will, Henry Lord Cobham, his Brother George Brook, Thomas Lord Grey of Wilton, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Griffith Markham, Sir Edward Parham, Bartholomew Brokesby, and Anthony Copley, Gent. were all seiz'd and imprison'd about the Beginning of July for conspiring the Death of the King, the Subversion of the State, and setting up the Lady Arabella Stuart on the Throne. The latter a very wild Imagination, to destroy King James's Hereditary Right for the sake of another female Reign. The Lord Grey was to raise 2000 Men under pretence of assisting the Hollanders, and with these to seize both the King and Prince. Sir Walter Raleigh was to procure Supplies of Money from Aremberg out of the Archduke's Treasury. Cobham was to go to Spain for the same Supplies; and when they had settled the Lady Arabella on the Throne, Watson the Popish Priest was to be made Lord Chancellor; George Brook, the Churchman, Lord Treasurer; the Lord Grey, a Puritan, Master of the Horse, and Earl Marshal of England; Sir Griffith Markham, a Papist, Secretary of State; and the others were to have the Places in the Kingdom upon the new Queen's Accession to the Crown. But tho' they were apprehended in July, they were not brought to Trial till November; the Pestilence raging so violently at London, that above 30000 dy'd of it this Year. The Term was deferr'd and kept at Winchester; as were the Exchequer Court, Court of Wards and Liveries, and that of the Duchy of Lancaster at Richmond.

But the Plague did not prevent the Royal Ceremony of the King and Queen's Coronation on St. James's Day: To prepare for which, besides the above-mention'd Lords, the King made sixty two Knights of the Bath; and dubb'd at once all the Judges, all the Serjeants at Law, all his Gentlemen Ushers, and many others.

On the 25th of July, the King and Queen were crown'd at Westminster by Archbishop Whitgift: The Lord-Mayor Sir Robert Lee, and twelve principal Citizens, were admitted to attend the Solemnity, but all other Citizens were stopp'd from passing either by Land or Water, for fear of Infection. Indeed some thought it an improper Season to celebrate so glorious a Festival, and that it would have been more decent, if not more religious, to have put off the Rejoicings for the Coronation, till there had not been so many Mourners in the Streets, and so many Doors shut up by the Desolation of the Pestilence. However, the Charge of the Ceremony amounted to thirty-seven thousand Pounds. The King at his Coronation did not take the usual Oath which all Kings were wont to do, Whitgift sinking some Parts of it, as favouring too much the

18 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1603. the Rights and Privileges of the People, as we are told by Dr. Cowel, Vicar General to Archbishop Bancroft, in his Treatise intitul'd the Interpreter; which was suppress'd by Proclamation for an Expression in it, That the King's Prerogative was in some Cases limited: tho' the Intent of the Book was to establish arbitrary Power.

This great Expence; that of his Majesty and Train in his Journey from Scotland, and on his Arrival at London, gave no Check to his Royal Bounty, much more boundless than his Treasury; which, while he was in Scotland, receiv'd its best Supply from a Pension the late Queen gave him of 15000 Pounds a Year. The Gentlemen he brought from Scotland with him, had a fair Harvest in the Beginning of his Reign, and it lasted with very little Intermision to the End, the King seeming not to distinguish between English and Scots Pounds.

What State-Affairs, other than ceremonial, were transacted in the Court of England, consisted chiefly in Proclamations, of which there were eleven issu'd in a few Months; the chief of them were that for quieting Mens Minds as to religious Matters, and that for suppressing Captain Thomas Tomkins the Pyrate, who robb'd near the Streights of Gibraltar.

The 5th of August was the first Holy Day in England to thank God for his Majesty's Deliverance from Earl Gowry, of which enough has been said already. There were two Earl Gowrys, Father and Son, who were put to Death by this King, rather out of Hatred to their Principles, being Presbyterians, than Fear of their Designs. Earl Gowry, the Father, join'd with the Earls of Mar, Lyndsay, and other Noblemen, in the Year 1582, to deliver the King from his Popish evil Counsellors; such as the Duke of Lenox, who, as the Bishop of Salisbury assures us, was a known Papist; which Echard tells us, is said out of Malice, and that he dy'd a good Protestant at Paris. Besides the Anniversary for the King's Deliverance from Gowry, there were Tuesday Sermons every Week for some Time; and can one, without Horror, think of the prophaning the tremendous Name of God in so solemn a Manner, to countenance a Cast of State Policy. It is true, the Puritans imitated their Brethren in Scotland, who before the King left that Kingdom refus'd to give God Thanks for a Deliverance which they did not believe. What I read in another Historian, gives one a shocking Idea of all Anniversaries set apart for Worship where the Foundation is not in Truth as sure as that of the Gospel. I pray God, says my Author, that the Effect of these Sermons in the Father's Time for that Service, produce no ill Effects, or be not one Cause of God's Anger with us in the Son's Reign.

We are now come to the Arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh and his Fellow Conspirators at Winchester, on the 4th of November. The Indictment was manag'd by the Attorney General Sir Edward Coke, Serjeant Hele, and Serjeant Philips. In the Management of it, Sir Edward Coke set a base Example to those Lawyers, who have since supply'd the Deficiency of Evidence with Railery and Inveective, and made the Fact foul by their foul Words and false Glosses. He may truly be said to bait Sir Walter to Death; for after a very long Trial, wherein he defended himself with great Strength of Argument and Spirit, he was tir'd with the Length of the Proceedings, or fearing the Court was tir'd, threw all the Merits of the Cause on this single Issue, Whether the Lord Cobham, as was urg'd against him, had given it under his Hand, that Sir Walter was guilty of Treason. Raleigh being conscious of his own Innocence, insisted upon it, that Cobham had not done, and cou'd not do such a Thing. This was what his Enemy Cecil wanted, for he had provided Proof to the contrary. Wade, the wicked Governor of the Tower, was Cecil's Creature, and he had employ'd him to tamper with his Prisoner Cobham to accuse Raleigh, which Cobham refus'd with great Constancy, beyond what cou'd be expected from a Person of his weak Intellect: But Wade, imposing on his Weakness, got him, by Surprize, to set his Name to a Blank, over which he himself wrote such an Accusation as Cecil wou'd have him. Being furnish'd with this Evidence, the Secretary often demanded of Raleigh, at his Trial, Whether he wou'd submit, if Cobham had really so accus'd him. Raleigh for some time stood out against this, saying, He knew not how far the Lord Cobham's Weakness might be wrought upon, therefore he wou'd not put his Life and Fortune on his Honour or Prudence. Yet, in the End, about nine a-Clock at Night, depending on the Impossibility of Cobham's knowing any such treasonable Matter of him, he consented to be determined by what he had subscrib'd concerning him, which was no sooner said, than Wade's counterfeit Paper was pull'd out, and the Contents of it proving the Treason, Sir Walter was convicted and condemn'd; but so little to the Satisfaction of the Jury, that many of them afterwards begg'd his Pardon on their Knees. Cecil and Raleigh had for many Years been in strict League against the Earl of Essex and his Party; and Cecil, like his Father, did not at first publicly appear over-zealous for the Scots King's Succession, to which Sir Walter never wish'd well, foreseeing that it must be attended with perpetual Disadvantages and Disgraces; and that nothing cou'd be more preposterous, than to set the Crown of England on the Head of a pusillanimous Prince: But Cecil having, by Treachery and Intrigue, secur'd an Interest in that King before he came to Whitehall, and being the greatest Favourite of the English Courtiers, began to neglect, and afterwards to abandon his old Friends, which created Enmity between Raleigh and him; and that naturally produc'd Cecil's Endeavours to get rid of a Man of a much greater Soul and Abilities than himself, Court Craft and an extensive Conscience excepted. In Sir Walter's Trial there was a Book urg'd against him, which concern'd Mary Queen of Scots; wherein something was said derogatory to her Son King James's Title. Cobham confess'd he had the Book from Raleigh, and Raleigh said he found it in Cecil's Father, the Lord Burgbley's, Study, which he had search'd for Cosmographical Manuscripts of the West-Indies, with leave of his Son. At his saying this, Cecil, who was upon the Bench, rose up, and said, I wou'd then have really trusted him as any Man, tho' since, for some Infirmities of Sir Walter, the Bonds of Affection were crack'd, and yet preserving my Duty to the King, which may not be dispensed withal, by God, I love him, and have a great Conflict in myself, that so compleat a Member has fallen from the State. We must not wonder to hear a Secretary of State in King James's Reign swear in a Court of Justice: The King's Example made Swearing so fashionable at Court, that hardly any one came thither who made a Conscience of it. Cecil's Malice ended not here: He confirm'd his Creature Wade's Forgery with a like Fraud of his own. The Sentence, pass'd on Sir Walter, was generally dislik'd, the Nature and Proof of the Treason very much suspected; and not long after, Queen Anne being cur'd of a desperate Distemper by a Prescription of Raleigh's, who was a learned and an experienc'd Chymist, he wou'd receive no other Reward than that his Majesty wou'd cause certain Lords to be sent to examine Cobham, Whether he had in Fact accus'd Raleigh of Treason, which the King commanded at the Queen's Desire. This alarm'd Cecil, who, to prevent the ill Consequence of such an Examination, took upon him to be one of the Lords that were to examine him; the Duke of Lenox, the Earls of Worcester and

Cobham, in answer to their Interrogatories, declar'd that he did never, and cou'd not accuse Sir Walter Raleigh of Treason, adding, That Villain, Wade, often solicited me, and not prevailing, got me, by a Trick, to write down my Name on a Piece of Blank Paper, which I, thinking nothing, did; so that if any Charge came under my Hand, it was forged by that Rascal, a great Confident of Cecil's, who must write something above it without my Consent and Knowledge. The Lords making their Report to the King, not only Sir Anthony Welden, but another Historian assures us, Cecil, their Spokesman, said elusively, Sir, My Lord Cobham has made good all that he ever said, which was nothing. Sir Anthony Welden proceeds: "By which you see the Baseness of these Lords, the Credulity of the King, and the Ruin of Sir Walter Raleigh. I appeal now to the Judgment of all the World, Whether these six Lords were not the immediate Murderers, and no question shall be called to a sad Account for the same, unless Cecil atton'd by his Merit at the Hampton-Court Conference. But what Account must theirs be, who thirteen Years after put that Gentleman to Death by virtue of that Sentence fraudulently and wickedly obtain'd? As to the rest of the Criminals in this formidable Conspiracy, the Lords Cobham and Grey, George Brook, Sir Griffith Markham, Watson and Clarke, were condemn'd; Parham and Brookesby were acquitted by the Jury. Watson own'd he had drawn in all the rest, holding the King to be no Sovereign till he were crown'd, and was himself drawn in by the Jesuits, against whom, as a secular Priest, he had written. Watson, Clarke, and Brook, were executed at Winchester. King James in his Warrant to Sir Benjamin Tibbourn, then High-Sheriff of Hampshire, telling him in the Scottish Brogue, They vaire the principal Plotteris and Intifaries of all the rest to the embracing the saidis treasonable Machinations. In the same Letter is a Warrant to respite Execution of the Sentence against the Lords Cobham and Grey, and Sir Walter Raleigh, to supersede the Execution of the saidis two Noblemen, and bringe them back to their Prison again quhile our further Pleasure be knowne; the like Course be also taken with Markham. However, Markham, Cobham, and Grey, were brought to the Scaffold, and past thro' all the Forms of Execution except the last dreadful one, the Blow; when, in the midst of their Terrors and Agonies, the Reprieve was produc'd, and the Criminals remanded to Prison, to the great Joy of the Spectators; but the Cruelty of keeping them in Suspence to the very last Minute of Life, took off much from the boasted Clemency and Tenderness in reprieving them; the Crime, make the worst of it, having more Folly than Treason, and more Talk than Action. Some Time after Sir Griffith Markham was released from Imprisonment, and going into voluntary Exile, dy'd beyond Sea in a mean Condition. The Lord Grey ended his miserable Life in the Tower; the Lord Cobham was indeed releas'd, but his Liberty was no great Blessing to him, having nothing to subsist on but the Charity of a Fellow who had been once a Servant to him, in whose sorry Cottage he dwelt, being forc'd to creep up a Ladder thro' a little Hole, to his Chamber; and not having Apparel and Linnen enough to keep him from Lice, tho' his Estate escheated to the King was 7000 Pounds a Year, and 30000 Pounds in Money. The Excuse for the Inhumanity in suffering so great and rich a Lord to starve, was, that his Majesty had been cheated of the Forfeiture by his Officers, and had nothing to spare, except 'twas out of the Revenue of the Crown, which was squander'd away on his Scotsmen, the most odious and worthless of his Nation. Sir Walter Raleigh was shut up in the Tower, and remain'd there twelve or thirteen Years, improving his Confinement to the Advantage of Learning, by writing his History of the World, the best of the Kind till the learned Dr. Howell's Universal History appear'd. We have been the more particular in the Account of this Conspiracy to shew the Justice, Prudence, and Piety of this Administration. If the Facts we relate are poor and disagreeable it is the Fault of the Reign to afford us not better.

We must now take a View of the State of Religion, which is not in so flourishing a Condition as our Ecclesiastical Writers represent. King James had forgotten the sincerest Kirk in the World before he came out of Scotland, and was grown much in Love with the Pope and his Hierarchy, tho' he cou'd not on a sudden renounce his Calvinistical Opinions. The Puritans flatter'd themselves with Hopes of his Friendship when he was King of England, for that he pretended to be their Friend when he was King of Scotland; but his Majesty soon undeceiv'd them; and being captivated with the Pomp and Lustre of the Laudian Hierarchy, he gave himself up entirely to the Counsels of the Bishops, who, unhappily for our Constitution Sacred and Civil, happen'd at that Time not to be the best that ever govern'd the Christian Church. The Bishops, in return, gave up the Liberty of the Subject to his arbitrary Will and sovereign Authority. Unlimited Power was the Compliment they and their corrupt Clergy paid him. The Puritans talk'd of Law and Conscience: Which of these Discourses must be most grateful to a Monarch who doated on Empire as much as those that cou'd acquire it by Conquest, is easy to imagine.

The first Occasion his Majesty took to humble the Presbyterians, and give the Prelates a Triumph over them, was at the Hampton-Court Conference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Clergy; wherein the latter were only sent for to be exposed to the Insults of the Bishops; for the Cause was plainly decided against them before by the King and his Prelates. This Conference is represented as the most despicable Colloquy that ever was among Men of Learning to turn the Presbytery into Ridicule; which however was attempted without either Argument or Wit. The Authority of the King, who talk'd more than all the Bishops, and as little to the Purpose, bore down whatever was said by the Presbyterian Ministers. 'Tis suppos'd we have no fair Representation of the Matter; but that written by Dr. Fuller, an orthodox Divine of the Church of England, seems to be the fairest and most impartial.

Before this Conference was set a foot, the reverend and eminent Mr. Cartwright had presented his Comment on the Ecclesiastes to the King, who had written to Queen Elizabeth in his Behalf; but his Reception at Court did not answer his and his Friends Expectation. He dy'd about a Fortnight before the Colloquy, or doubtless he wou'd have made another sort of Figure there than his Brethren did. He had had a long Controversy with Dr. Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, when the latter was Master of Queen's-College in Cambridge, and Cartwright was Lady Margaret Professor. Fuller tells us, that the Offence taken by Whitgift, was, because his own Lectures and Sermons were not frequented, while all flock'd after Cartwright, insomuch, that when he preach'd at St. Maries, the Clerk was forc'd to take down the Windows. However, Whitgift, when he was Vice-Chancellor, made use of his Authority, these Men cou'd never do any thing without it, and flatly depriv'd Cartwright of his Lecture. Indeed I have observ'd, that ever since the Reformation, and long before in the Days of Popery, such Prelates as Whitgift have always succeeded better by Power than by Argument, and better by Force than by Truth. Dr. Fuller confesses frankly, That the

A.D. 1603. the Bishops were confident of their Cause; and well they might be by the Inequality of the Conference; where, besides the Bishops and Deans, there appear'd against the Presbyterians the King, the Lord Cecil Secretary of State, the Lord Buckhurst Lord-Treasurer, the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, and most of the Privy-Counsellors; for one or two of them spoke in Favour of the Presbyterians.

There were summon'd,
For CONFORMITY,

Dr. Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Bancroft Bishop of London, Dr. Matthew Bishop of Durham, Dr. Bilson Bishop of Winchester, Dr. Babington Bishop of Worcester, Dr. Rudd Bishop of St. Davids, Dr. Watson Bishop of Chichester, Dr. Robinson Bishop of Carlisle, Dr. Dove Bishop of Peterborough, Dr. Andrews Dean of Westminster, Dr. Overal Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Barlow Dean of Chester, Dr. Bridges Dean of Salisbury, Dr. Field.

For NONCONFORMITY, only

Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Sparks, Mr. Knewstubs, Mr. Chadderton.

A.D. 1604. The King nominated the Presbyterian as well as the Episcopal Clergy, and tho' these four Divines were Men of Eminence, yet there were many others who were able and ready to have appear'd in this Cause, had his Majesty been more equal in his Nominations. The Place of Meeting was the Withdrawing-Room within the Privy-Chamber, and the first Time, the 14th of January 1604; present the King, Prince Henry, and all the Lords of the Council. His Majesty open'd the Conference with a Speech, too long to be repeated, but eloquent to Astonishment, as the Ecclesiasticks teach us to believe. The King began with exclaiming against that Church which, in Scotland, he thank'd God he was bred in. Now it is, Blessed be God's gracious Goodness, who hath brought me into the Promis'd Land, where Religion is purely profess'd, where I sit amongst grave, reverend, and learned Men; not as before, elsewhere, a King without State, without Honour, without Order, where beardless Boys would brave us to the Face. This is Ciceronian. And I assure you, we have not called this Assembly for any Innovation; for we acknowledge the Government Ecclesiastical, as now it is, to have been approv'd by manifold Blessings from God himself. If so, What need was there for his Majesty's exercising his Faculty of a good Physician to cure the Occasions of Complaints? He declares before there are no Occasions, and that he will cure nothing; curing and innovating being the same thing. Then comes more of Cicero's Eloquence: And if the Complaint be frivolous, he will cast a Sop into CERBERUS's Mouth, that he bark no more. This is the very Essence of Oratory; and Archbishop Whitgift cry'd out, His Majesty speaks by the Spirit of God. This Archbishop fell down upon his Knees, and as to the first Point, Confirmation, assur'd his Majesty, that St. Peter and St. Paul, and all the Apostles, were wont to confirm in the very same Manner himself and his Brethren practis'd Confirmation; which holy Bishop Bancroft prov'd from that Text in the Hebrews, where the Apostle speaks of Baptisms, Laying on of Hands, the Resurrection of the Dead, and Eternal Judgment. The Bishop of Carlisle urg'd the same very learnedly and gravely; and the Bishop of Durham said there was something in St. Matthew for Imposition of Hands upon Children. This Matter so admirably clear'd up, the Archbishop proceeded to Absolution, proving it to be free from all Superstition, by saying It was so: And the Confession and Absolution being read, his Majesty was inspir'd to say, I like and approve both.

Fuller's Cb Hist.
p. 89, &
seq.

Short and pithy. And next comes the Argument; A.D. 1604. What you say is true.

This Article being so unanswerably demonstrated to the great Satisfaction and Comfort of the Lords of the Council, the next concern'd Private Baptisms; and here the King did not appear so thoroughly convinc'd as the Bishops were, his Majesty saying, The Words cannot but intend a Permission for private Persons to baptize. And thus all the Baptisms of the Baptists wou'd be lawful, it had not been added, in Case of Necessity. Now there can be no Case of Necessity, where an orthodox Minister is at hand; which restores Matters to the State the Archbishop wou'd have them in.

As to Excommunication, all Sides agreed to have it alter'd, but it remains as it then was to this Day, in the Hands of vicious and greedy Laymen.

The next Day, the 15th of January, the Conference was renew'd, and the Nonconformists were allow'd to speak. Dr. Reynolds spoke first, but offer'd Things so unreasonably, that Dr. Bancroft Bishop of London cou'd not forbear calling him Schismatick even in the Presence. Dr. Reynold's humble Proposal was,

That the Doctrine of the Church might be preserv'd in Purity according to God's Word.

That good Pastors might be planted in all Churches to preach the same.

That the Church Government might be sincerely administer'd according to God's Word.

That the Book of Common-Prayer might be fitted to more Increase of Piety.

These monstrous Demands set pious Bishop Bancroft in a Flame; and he was not contented to call Dr. Reynolds Schismatick, he added, I wou'd fain know whether you do not think as Mr. Cartwright did, that we ought rather to conform to the Turks than the Papiſts? I doubt you do, by your Turkey Gown instead of Scholaſtick Habit. The King and his Nobles heard this Ribaldry without the least Censure. Bancroft's Pun coming so soon after his calling Names, shews his Wit as well as his Piety, either of which I do not find was ever laid to his Charge. But for Ratiocination Dr. Reynold's cou'd not come near him, as appears by his Answer to the Doctor's second Proposal about good Pastors. His Objection is vain, says Bishop Bancroft, it being the Doctrine and Practice of the Church, that none but a licens'd Minister may preach, and consequently every licens'd Minister is a good Minister. There was no standing against such forcible Reasoning, especially when it was seconded by the King, as thus: I dissent from the Judgment of St. Jerom, that Bishops are not of divine Ordination. Again; I approve the Calling and Use of Bishops, and it is my Aphorism, No Bishop, no King. It is because it is. Here's the Argumentation. The French King's Reason at the End of his Charters is exactly like it; Car Tel est notre Plaisir, For such is our Pleasure. This is a Conference with a witness. To what Purpose cou'd four grave Ministers argue against, I dissent, I approve, in the Mouth of a King.

Upon Dr. Reynold's Complaint of Popish Books, the Lord-Chancellor Egerton, the Lord-Treasurer Buckhurst, and Secretary Cecil, extenuated the Matter, and screen'd the Bishop of London for his Neglect in suppressing them. Mr. Knewstubs saying, If the Church has Power to add significant Signs, the Scruple is how far the Order of the Church bindeth; which was admirably well explain'd by his Majesty, I will have one Doctrine, one Discipline, one Religion in Substance and Ceremony, never speak more to that Point, How far you are bound to obey. Wou'd not a Proclamation with an I will have, &c. have done the Business better than a Colloquy?

Sir Philip Warwick, who understood Divinity as well as History, or any thing else, assures us, He shew'd P. 3.

A.D. 1604. showed his great Learning in over throwing the Arguments of learned Protestant Dissenters, and his great Wisdom in maintaining Bishops; which made him appear a great Divine. Now let us see how he overthrew those Arguments. The King again: If this be all your Party hath to say, I will make them conform themselves, or else I will harrie them out of the Land, or else do worse, only hang them, that's all: The very Language of the Holy Spirit, according to Bishop Whitgift.

Such was the End of this famous Conference; in which it was remark'd, that Dr. Reynolds lost much of his Character, and the other Ministers came off still worse. True it is, they were brow-beaten by both King and Bishops; and it was complain'd, that Dr. Barlow Dean of Chester, who publish'd this Conference, did it partially and to their Disadvantage. He is known to have been their Enemy; and, as Fuller observes, No wonder if he set a sharp Edge on his own, and a blunt one on his Adversaries Weapons. Tho' excepting the King's Laconicks and Menaces, and the Insults of some of the Bishops, I have not seen any thing that looks like sharp from one end of the Colloquy to the other. If this King was one of the wisest Princes that ever sat on a Throne, as our Church Historians characterize him, and this was one of the wisest Actions of this wise King; as they wou'd have us believe, how much is Osborn out in his Reflections upon it? "The Puritan Schism was not any way dangerous till King James, more it may be thought out of Ostentation, to shew such Parts as are nothing necessary, than Reason of State, only requisite in a Prince, made it considerable, by putting it in Competition with the Doctrine generally profess'd, in the Hampton-Court Colloquy. Till that dishonourable Dispute, in which, says Echard, he shew'd such Knowledge and Readiness, as rais'd no small Admiration, who shou'd command the Diocesan or the Priest; none did boggle at the Surplice, Cross, Ring, and so by consequence the Common-Prayer Book, but out of pure Conscience, and therefore unlikely to hurt any Body but themselves; till the Number increasing to such a Proportion, made a visible Profit appear to so many, as, wanting better Employment, cou'd but conform their Mode, Words, and Looks, to these Precisions. Nor did the notorious Debauchery of the Episcopal Clergy, add a little to the Breach." Wilson tells us, that the Puritans were for a more clear Reformation; which the Bishops oppos'd, as trenching too much upon them; and the King thought their dissenting from the establish'd Government of the Church, was but to get that Power into a great many Hands, which was now but in one, and that one had Dependence upon him. The Prelates distilling this Maxim into him, No Bishop, no Monarch; so strengthening the Mitre by the same Power that upholds the Crown. Sir Edward Peyton tells us, Dr. Reynolds and his Brethren had not Freedom of Speech, for all went on the Bishops Side; a Cause England in all Parts after were depriv'd of pious Men, which were silenced, imprison'd, and put out of their Lectures and Livings; so that want of teaching caus'd Profaneness to get the Pre-eminence.

What is most to be lamented in this Contest, is, that tho' the Subject of it be spiritual, and concerns entirely the Salvation of Souls, and Life or Death Eternal, yet it turns wholly on Temporal Powers, worldly Riches, and temporary Greatness, which are so many Nothings in Comparison with Peace of Conscience and Piety of Mind. 'Tis great Pity such simple and useful Sentiments shou'd escape those Men who are by their Function set apart to instruct and direct us. The King perform'd his Menaces very punctually, and by Bancroft and his Brethren, harried the best Men in the Kingdom out of the Land; in which he was the wiser, for that the People did generally love and respect them. This Disposition prevail'd so far over the whole Nation, that a Parliament being suddenly to assemble, Archbishop Whitgift pray'd that he might not live to see it, fearing to be called to an Account for his Severities against the Puritans; and it must needs be an Instance of the King's almost infinite Wisdom, to begin his Reign with giving Offence to the most sober, industrious, and valuable Part of his Kingdom; and even in his Proclamation against Jesuits, to express himself so much devoted to the Pope, that no good Protestant can read it without a secret Indignation. We acknowledge our self personally so much beholden to the now Bishop of Rome for his kind Offices, compliments and private temporal Carriage towards us in many Things, as we shall be ever ready to requite the same Pope towards him. Queen Elizabeth wou'd have kiss'd his Toe as soon as she wou'd have paid the Pope such a Compliment.

To balance the Proclamation against Jesuits, another was issu'd against Nonconformists, who were unblameable in their Conversation, and therefore the more likely to make Enemies in a Court, where the Conversation was in every thing blameable.

About three Weeks after the Hampton-Court Conference, dy'd Dr. John Whitgift Archbishop of Canterbury; and, as another Instance of consummate Policy, the King advanc'd the most obnoxious Prelate in England, Dr. John Bancroft, to that Metropolitan Chair. This Bishop imitated St. Peter's military Faculty, and us'd the temporal as well as spiritual Sword. He arm'd his Servants and others when he was Bishop of London, to oppose the Earl of Essex, and was never at Peace with the Puritans. We shall see how well he imitated St. Peter in his apostolick Capacity. Yet neither he, nor his Brethren cou'd be so wary, but some Courtier or other wou'd recommend a Preacher to the King, if they knew any one of excellent Parts: by which means some preach'd before him, who were only occasional Conformists, such as Mr. Burgess, who in his Sermon compar'd Ceremonies to the Roman Senator's Glasses, not worth a Man's Life or Livelihood: For, says he, this Senator invited Augustus Cæsar to a Dinner, who, as he was coming to the Feast, heard a horrid Outcry, and saw a Company drawing a Man after them who made the Noise. The Emperor demanded the Cause of that Violence, and was answer'd, their Master had condemn'd a Man to the Fishponds for breaking a Glass which he set a high Value and Esteem upon. Augustus commanded a Stay of the Execution, and when he came into the House, ask'd the Senator, Whether he had Glasses worth a Man's Life? Who reply'd, He had Glasses he valu'd at a Province. Let me see them, says the Emperor; "Accordingly he was brought into a Room well furnish'd: The Emperor allow'd them to be beautiful to the Eye; but considering they might be the Cause of much Mischief, broke them all, saying, Better all these perish than one Man." I leave, said Mr. Burgess, to your Majesty to apply. The Bishops for this, and some other the like heinous Crimes, got him silenc'd; but he was restor'd again to his Ministry, and dy'd in a good old Age at Sutton-Cosfield in Warwickshire.

The King had been almost ten Months in England, but had not been seen much abroad. He naturally did not love to be look'd at; for, as has been said, he was not very handsome, and had no Relish of the Formalities of State. Some attribute it not to the Disagreeableness of his Person, but to the Shyness of his Temper, and some to his Timorousness, there being more Danger in a Crowd than in a few Attendants.

Having summon'd a Parliament to meet the 19th of March, he went on the 15th with his Queen and the Prince to the Tower, riding through the arbitrary.

The Parliament.

It was taken notice of, that in the Proclamation for summoning this Parliament, his Majesty gave the Nation a Taste of his Inclination to Arbitrary Power. Before his coming to the Crown, the Election of Members for the House of Commons was so free, that Letters from the King, or any Nobleman, to chuse a Knight, Citizen, or Burgess, was judg'd Cause sufficient to render the Election void: But the King, by this Proclamation, gives order what sort of Men, and how qualify'd, shou'd be chosen, concluding thus; We notify by these Presents, that all Returns and Certificates of Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses, ought and are to be brought to the Court of Chancery, and there to be filed upon Record; and if any be found to be made contrary to this Proclamation, the same to be rejected as not lawful, and insufficient, and the City or Borough to be fin'd for the same: And if it be found that they have committed any gross or wilful Default or Contempt in the Election, Return, or Certificate, that then their Liberties, according to the Law, are to be seiz'd as forfeited. And if any Person take upon him the Place of Knight, Citizen, or Burgess, not being duly elected and sworn according to the Law and Statutes in that Behalf provided, and according to the Purport and true Meaning of this our Proclamation; then every Person so offending to be fin'd and imprison'd for the same. This was so bold a Stroke against the Rights of the People, and Privileges of Parliament, that it cou'd be little expected from a Prince of a pacifick Disposition. But we have been taught, by woful Experience, since the Death of Queen Elizabeth, that those Kings who are least qualify'd to make Conquests on their Enemies abroad, make the most terrible Invasions on the Laws and Liberties of their Subjects at home.

From the Tower the King rode triumphantly, for such were all the Triumphs of his Reign, to Westminster; and open'd the Parliament with a long Speech, longer than many Sermons by our most eminent Preachers. The most remarkable Passage in it, is another needless Compliment to Popery; as much out in Fact, as in Policy: I acknowledge the Roman Church to be our Mother Church, tho' defil'd with some Infirmities. The Church of Rome can no more be Mother of our Protestant Church of England, than Christ can be Father of Anti-christ, or the Spouse be the Whore of Babylon. This was a very wise Saying too, and produc'd in the Hearers, the sage Senators of England, an Admiration of his Majesty's Abilities, if we may believe Echard; and in Return for this gracious Declaration to them, they recogniz'd his Title to the Crown, and oblig'd themselves, their Heirs and Posterity to maintain it. In Compliance also with his Majesty's earnest Desire for a Union between the two Kingdoms of England and Scotland, they pass'd an Act for appointing Commissioners to treat with such Noblemen and Gentlemen of Scotland, as shou'd by their Parliament be appointed for that Purpose. This Project came to nothing; and one Reason of it is thought to be the Offence which many took at a Passage in the King's Speech, where he seem'd to set up a sort of Parity between the two Kingdoms. To promote this good Work as far as in him lay, the King caus'd himself to be proclaim'd King of Great-Britain. Scots Money was made current, and the English Ships had St. George's and St. Andrew's Crosses quarter'd together in their Flags.

A.D. 1604. The Reverence due to Parliaments wore off be- times in this Reign; several Members of the House of Commons coming to hear the King's Speech in the House of Lords, had the Door shut upon them, particularly Sir Herbert Crofts, who was repuls'd by a Yeoman of the Guard, with the uncivil and contemptible Terms of Goodman Burges, you come not here.

We have seen how the King stretch'd the Prerogative in the Proclamation for calling the Parliament; and in their Proceedings he let them know in the Case of the contested Election between Sir Francis Goodwin and Sir John Fortescue, to be Knight of the Shire for the County of Bucks, that he wou'd have Differences determin'd by his absolute Power; and tho' the Commons voted Sir Francis duly elected, yet the King commanded them to let the Matter be heard before the House of Lords and the Judges: But Sir Francis Goodwin, fearing it might cause a Rupture between the King and the House of Commons, petition'd that a new Writ might be issu'd to elect a Knight for that County in his Stead; and accordingly Christopher Pigott Esq; was chosen, and soon after expell'd the House. Mr. Brown Willis makes Goodwin to be unduly elected, which is contrary to the Vote of the House, and to Sir Francis Goodwin's Petition. This happen'd about a Week after the Opening of the Session, at the End of which, on the 16th of June, the Commons presented the King with an humble Apology, setting forth the Breaches that had been made in their Privileges, and wherein they conceiv'd themselves aggriev'd. This was a hopeful Beginning of the Royal House of Stuart; and the King took their Apology so ill, that he never heartily lov'd our Constitution afterwards. The plain Truth from the House of Commons little agreed with the Flatteries he was us'd to at Court; and he afterwards did his utmost to establish an unlimited Authority founded on Jure Divino, in which fatal Enterprize he was flatter'd by the Clergy, whose Sermons were Lectures to teach Obedience rather to the Will of the Prince than the Gospel of Christ.

P. 494.

Mr. Osborn, who heard some of those Sermons, writes of them thus: "The Court Sermons informing his Majesty he might, as Christ's Vicegerent, command all; and that the People, if they deny'd him Supplies, or enquir'd after the Disposition of them, were presumptuous Peepers into the sacred Ark of the State, not to be done but under the severest Curse, though it appear'd likely to fall through the Falshood or Folly of those at the Helm." Can any thing be more plain, more self-evident, than that it was such sort of Preaching which animated this mean-spirited Monarch in the bold Design to invade the Rights and Privileges of his Subjects: And his Son Charles I. imbibing this fatal Doctrine as it were with his Mother's Milk, the Lust of despotick Power became as natural to him, as the Love of Liberty is to all true Englishmen; which Opposition cou'd not end otherwise than it did, in a Rupture between King and People, to prove which is the Design of this History, that the Guilt and Folly of that Rupture may be laid at their Door who were the Occasion of it. The Historian Echard overlooks this first Rise of our Troubles in England since Queen Elizabeth's Death, and takes great Solace in the Act which pass'd now to secure Church Lands; and the excellent Canons that were made at the same Time, being in Force even at this Day, as Echard says; and as Dr. Welwood, These Canons did never receive the Royal Approbation, and therefore are in the same Case as if they had never been; which is a Dispute that relates not to me, who am not solicitous whether they were or were not royally approv'd, as not looking upon them to be what Echard will have them, for the Honour and Establishment of the Church, of which this King Court.

A vicious Court.

A.D. 1604. took a religious Care, by ordering the Profanation of the Sabbath, by a Habit of prophane Swearing, by Riot and Luxury, and other such Enormities, enough to corrupt History, as they corrupted the Age he liv'd in. Dr. Fuller, speaking of the same Honour and Establishment, writes, Wife and moderate Men suppos'd so many Laws too heavy a Burden to be long born; and that it had been enough for the Episcopal Party to have triumph'd, not insulted over their Adversaries in so numerous Impositions. These very Impositions, condemn'd thus by moderate and wise Men, drove the most conscientious Ministers out of the Church; and they were follow'd by the most conscientious of their Flocks; which increas'd the Separation to a Degree, that in the next Reign produc'd a new Establishment.

The Rise of the Troubles.

A Motion was made in this Convocation for an Oath against Simony, which was warmly oppos'd by Dr. Rudd Bishop of St. David's. His Reason was, he thought it unequal for the Incumbent to swear, and not the Patron; a most unreasonable Thing. But might not the good Bishop have consider'd, that the Incumbent had his Vocation from the Holy Ghost, and therefore must be safe in swearing, whereas the Patron had nothing spiritual in his Composition, and therefore might bargain and sell with a safer Conscience? 'Twas demand'd of him, Whether he wou'd have the King swear when he made a Bishop or Dean? To which Bishop Rudd had nothing to say.

Having made some mention of Bancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, who was the first and great Mover in Convocation-Business, let us repeat what Coke writes of him; "He was a Man of a rough Temper, a stout Foot-ball Player, a zealous Assertor of the Rights of the Church of England, or rather a Faction of Churchmen, who arrogated to themselves the Title, which is the Truth: And it was King James's encouraging this Faction, in Opposition to his Protestant Subjects, Puritans and Presbyterians, that put him upon ill Terms with his Parliament and People. Bancroft exhibited twenty-five Articles in the Name of the Clergy, call'd Auriculi Cleri, which were desir'd to be reform'd in granting Prohibitions. These Articles were presented to the King and Council, the Parliament, and even the Convocation then sitting: And as Bancroft in doing it, ascribed an absolute Power to the King, so it struck directly at the Constitution of Parliaments. The Judges gave so clear and distinct an Answer to them all, that the King did not think fit to meddle in them; yet did not Bancroft rest here." This Prelate's Zeal is the more extraordinary, for that his Morals were so very ordinary as to make him the common Subject of Satyr.

Here lies my Lord's Grace at six, and at seven,
And, if I don't lie, his Soul is in Heaven;
I wish, from my Heart, it may be to his seeking,
Since all the World knows it was never his seeking.

Bancroft was for Plays,
Lean Lent, and Holidays;
But now undergoes their Doom;

Yet kept open a Back-Door,
To let in the Strumpet of Rome.

These Rhimes are in Osborn; and it is not below the Dignity of History to insert them, since they let us into the Character of a Bishop who was at the Head of the Faction mention'd by Coke; and one may see very plainly, that whatever his Actions were, Religion and Piety cou'd not be the true Motive of them. We read in the Menagiana, that Satyrs and Lampoons are necessary to be read by an Historian who wou'd write sincerely. Un Recueil des Vaudevilles est un piece de plus ne-

cessaire a un Historien qui veut ecrire sincerement: A.D. 1604. Which will be some Information to those who have no Conception of any such Necessity.

King James's first Parliament having for the first Session sat about fifteen Weeks, it was on the 7th of July prorogu'd to the 7th of February following.

This pacifick Reign was not so full of Blessings, that no Mischiefs cou'd break in upon them. Our inbred Distempers, says Wilson, lay upon the Lee, intermix'd with other gross Dregs, which the Prince's Lenity, and the Peoples Luxury produc'd. The King minding his Sports, many riotous Demeanours crept into his Kingdom. The Sunshine of Peace being apt for such a Production upon the Slime of the late War. Divers Sects of vicious Persons appear'd under the Title of Roysters, Roaring Boys, Bravadoes, &c. who committed many Insolencies; and the Discontents in the Country between the Gentry and the Commonalty about Inclosures, grew in some Places to a petty Rebellion. These Felicities, with the Tyranny and Oppression exercis'd every where in Spiritual Courts, a perpetual Scandal to Religion and Law, the Waste of the publick Treasure on Scottish, and afterwards on English Favourites, cou'd not but expose this Nation to the Envy of all Nations, according to Archdeacon Echard, under the Government of so wise and so pious a Prince.

Something has been said of the Embassies from and to foreign Potentates, in the beginning of this Reign; and something still must be added concerning the Spanish Ambassadors, the Constable of Castile, the Conde de Villa Mediana, Mynheer Ravidius, and the Ministers sent by the Archduke Governor of the Neitherlands, the Count d'Arenberg, the President Richardot, and Secretary Warreskin, by whose joint Negotiations with the English Plenipotentiaries, the Earls of Dorset, Nottingham, Devonshire, Northampton, and Cecil, Lord Esmond, a Peace with Spain was concluded, or rather sold; for there was hardly a Courtier of Note who did not taste of the Catholick King's Bounty either in Gold or Jewels; of which Sir Anth. Welden writes thus: It was so advantageous for Spain, and so disadvantageous for England, that it and all Christendom have since both seen and felt the lamentable Effect thereof. Mr. Osborn says, The King cast himself as it were blindfold into a Peace with Spain, far more destructive to England than a War. The wonderful Wisdom of it! And then the Honesty. Hence all Princes may calculate the vast Difference that lies between a Counsel suborn'd and one free from Corruption. Sir Anthony Welden informs us further, that of all the Money taken for this bad Bargain, the Countess of Suffolk was the greatest Gainer, who shar'd not only in her Lord's Interest, but in Secretary Cecil's; and from what both of them gain'd by the Spanish Treaty, she rais'd the famous Palace of Audley-End, and other stately Structures. This Countess was Mother to the Lady Essex, and by her Gallantry set such an Example to her Daughter, as has stain'd their Names with indelible Infamy.

Dissonance to England.

In March following, the old Admiral the Earl of Nottingham was sent Ambassador to Spain, attended with the prime Noblemen and Gentlemen of England, and a Train of above 600 Servants and others, who made so fine an Appearance, that the Spaniards were struck with Astonishment, having receiv'd such ill Impressions from the Reports of the Jesuits, that they thought the English were all like the Picture they had made of Sir Francis Drake, half Man, half Dragon; and believing they were turn'd into Monsters, as a Punishment for casting off the Pope's Supremacy. They now saw them with Looks rather of Angels than Devils; and their Beauty was magnify'd so much the more, by how much they had had a false and vain Conception of their Deformity. Sir Robert Mansel, Vice-Admiral, who convoy'd the Earl of Nottingham,

A.D. 1605.

A.D. 1605. ham, had two or three Opportunities to distinguish himself by his Valour and Prudence: And his Behaviour did Honour to the Nation, whose Sovereign had sent him to Spain. The Spaniards, says Mr. Echard, manifested great Satisfaction in the English Amity; and truly they had very great Cause so to do, having turn'd it all to their own Advantage, and made a fast Friend of an Enemy, in whose Power only it was to destroy their ambitious and tyrannical Projects both in Europe and America, and secure the Liberty of Commerce in both the old World and the new. The Earl of Hertford was sent Envoy to the Archduke Albert; and Sir William Monson, who convoy'd him, meeting a Flemish Man of War in his Passage to Flanders, made a Signal to strike, which the Fleming refus'd; and being fir'd at, fir'd again: the first Affront of this Kind offer'd to the Royal Ships of England in Time of Peace. But England is to learn to accustom herself to Affronts during the Reigns we are writing of. Monson did not fight the Flemish Ship, giving for Excuse that the Earl of Hertford charg'd him on his Allegiance to land him first; and being appointed to attend him, he thought it his Duty so to do; but afterwards he so repented it, that he wish'd he had been hang'd, rather than have been recorded for the first English Sea-Officer, who suffer'd such an Indignity to pass with Impunity. Sir A. W. who heard him say this, assures us 'twas all Affectation; that he was a Creature of the House of Suffolk, of the Spanish Faction, and let the Flemish Ship go out of Respect to the King of Spain.

Honours
conferr'd.

We see by this how soon the English Nation began to sink in Reputation, after the Accession of the House of Stuart to the Throne; and how much they are indebted to the Caution and Indolence of a King, who, says Echard, was now truly stild Rex Pacificus, being now in Friendship with all the Princes of Christendom: A Happiness which few of his Ancestors ever enjoy'd. And few of his Ancestors would have accepted of on Terms so disadvantageous and so dishonourable. He proceeds: In these peaceable Times this munificent King open'd the Fountains of Honour, and made Duke Ulrick, the Queen's Brother, and the Earl of Northampton, a Confident of the Countess of Essex, Knights of the Garter; Secretary Cecil, Lord Effingham, Viscount Cranburn and Earl of Salisbury; Thomas Cecil, Lord Burghley, Earl of Exeter; Sir Philip Herbert, younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Montgomery; Sir Robert Sidney, Baron of Penshurst, Viscount Lisle; Sir John Stanhope, Lord Stanhope of Harrington; Sir George Carew, Lord Carew of Clopton; Mr. Thomas Arundel of Cornwal, Lord Arundel of Warder; Mr. William Cavendish, Lord Cavendish of Hardwick.

The Papists observing that the Prodigality of the Scots render'd them odious to the English, endeavour'd to increase the Animosities between them with Calumnies and Scandal, some true, some false. The Scots gave them too much Occasion; some of them being so daring, as to counterfeit the King's Privy-Seal, and make Addresses by it to foreign Princes; as to the Archbishops of Cologne, Triers, and Mentz; the Duke of Cleves, and Count Palatine of the Rhine; of which one Thomas Douglass was convicted, and being condemn'd as a Traytor, was hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd in Smithfield.

gain.

The King's Ministers, especially Salisbury, on whose crooked Shoulders the Burthen of the State lay, were well pleas'd with the King's frequent Diversion of Hunting, for that it kept him out of Town, and left the Court clear to themselves. Royston and Newmarket Houses were purchas'd for him, and Theobalds soon after. In which Salisbury made a fine Market, exchanging that Palace at 50 Years Purchase, for Lands and Houses of the King's; and to preserve his Station at Theobalds

A.D. 1605. still, he got himself and his Heirs to be appointed perpetual Keepers of the House and Parks adjacent, while he rais'd the magnificent Pile at Hatfield for the Reception of himself and his Posterity, when they were weary of Attendance at Court, and surfeited with Royal Favours.

At the latter End of the Summer, the King and Queen visited the University of Oxford, and were entertain'd with Festivals and rhetorical Speeches. Several of the Courtiers had Academical Degrees bestow'd upon them; particularly Sir George Calvert, afterwards Lord Baltimore, who was then created Master of Arts.

There is nothing more unaccountable in the Conduct of the Romish Faction, than their Plots against the Princes of the House of Stuart who have reign'd in England, there not having been one of them who did not love or favour them. King James, the first of them, let no Occasion slip to shew either his Fear of, or his Affection to them. But while he and his Successors found themselves under a Necessity to temporize with their Parliaments, and execute the Laws against them, tho' with visible Regret and Moderation, they were always resty and impatient, and hoping any Change of their own making would be for their Advantage, they frequently enter'd into Conspiracies to accomplish it, to which they were doubtless instigated by the Lessons and Promises they receiv'd from Rome, and the Hopes of Assistance from the Papish Princes.

Papists conspire against the Government.

Their first Conspiracy in this Reign, (for I do not take Raleigh's to be theirs, or worth the Name) was the infamous Gun-Powder Plot, which I shall endeavour to trace from its Original, according to the best Helps I am furnish'd with. It is said, the Papists petition'd for a Toleration; and having depended entirely on the Good-will of the King, were extremely exasperated at their being put off; and the most desperate of them resolv'd to be reveng'd on the whole Nation for their Disappointment in the Conduct of the King. I do not believe this devilish Machination was so old as Pope Clement's Brief in Queen Elizabeth's Time, to have the Scots King excluded in the Succession. There was no Prince in the English Succession, who was fitter for their Purpose than this King; and the Powder-Plot must be rather the hellish Device of the Desperado's of Popery, than the general Sense of those of that Religion.

Gun-Powder Plot.

The chief of the Conspirators was Robert Catesbie, a Gentleman of a fair Fortune in Northamptonshire, descended from that Catesbie, who was the wicked Instrument of Richard the Third's Tyranny and Cruelty. To him were join'd Thomas Piercy of the Northumberland Family, Sir Everard Digby, Francis Tresham, Robert Winter, Thomas Winter, John Wright, Christopher Wright, Ambrose Rookwood, Robert Keys, John Grant, and Guido Vaux. The Names of two of these Conspirators, Rookwood and Keys, are the more remarkable, for that we find them again in the Papish Assassination Plot against King William 90 Years after. Most of the Plotters were Gentlemen of good Estates, set on by Garnet and Tismond, two Jesuits; and the Plot was to blow up the Parliament House with Gunpowder. Upon a Scruple at one of their Consultations, that their Friends in both Houses of Parliament would be destroy'd with the rest, Garnet the Jesuit said, It is lawful in such a Case to kill Friend and Foe together. Other Difficulties lay in their way. Charles Duke of York would not be present by reason of his Minority, and the Princess Elizabeth was in keeping of the Lord Harrington, by which means two of the Blood Royal would escape, after the King and Prince Henry were blown up with the two Houses of Parliament. To remove these Rubs, Piercy promis'd to possess himself of the Person of the Duke of York; and Catesbie under pretence of a Hunting-
Match

*Ch. Hist.

A.D. 1605. Match at Dunsmore-Heath in Warwickshire, undertook to seize the Princess Elizabeth at the Lord Harrington's House, which was not far from Asby, where himself dwelt. Then they consider'd what shou'd be done when the Blow was struck. And to turn off the Guilt of it from themselves, it was resolv'd to lay it on the Puritans. "Thus," says Fuller, by transferring the Fact upon the "Innocent, they hop'd not only to decline the Oidium of so execrable a Design, but also to amuse all Men, that begetting a Distrust one of another, they might in that Perplexity work the Destruction of all their Opponents, Conformists or Nonconformists". This horrid Contrivance of the Papists was imitated to Perfection in the Reign of King Charles II. when the Lord Clarendon and his Fellow-Ministers laid so many sham Plots on the Dissenters, as will be shewn in the History of that King. The Conspirators drew up a formal Proclamation, charging the Puritans with the Plot. It was printed and ready to be publish'd, as we are inform'd by Du Moulin; but suppress'd on the Discovery of the Conspiracy. Dr. Parker Dean of Lincoln, Sir William Ellis Recorder of that City, and others, saw and read that Proclamation. Mr. Pickering of Tichmarsh in Northamptonshire, probably the same who rode Post to Scotland with the News of the Queen's Death, was to have been brought into this Plot, being a noted Puritan. One of the Plotters, perhaps Mr. Keys, his Brother-in-law, was to have borrow'd Mr. Pickering's Horse; and when the Blow was given to have kill'd it in his Flight, and left it by the way as a Proof of the Owner's Guilt and Fear. Father Weston, a Jesuit, who was active in this Plot, ingenuously confess'd 30 Years after to Mr. Wilson the Historian then in Flanders, that the Plotters design'd to father it on the Puritans. Fuller has an odd Story on this Occasion. A few Days before the intended Blow, Mr. Keys being at Tichmarsh suddenly whipp'd out his Sword, and as in Jest made several Passes at the Head, Neck and Breast of several Gentlemen and Ladies then in Company. It was at that time thought an apish Frolick; but when the Treason was discover'd, those who remember'd his Monkey-like Freak, imagin'd he meant to do what he mimick'd, to stab, wound, and kill the Hereticks of all Sexes, Ages, and Qualities.

The Design being form'd, they bound themselves to Secrecy by taking the holy Sacrament, Garnet the Jesuit being their Confessor. Every one of the Plotters had his Share in the Plot assign'd him. Some were to provide Money, some Materials. Piercy was to hire the Cellar under the Parliament House, to lay Wood and Coals in it for his Winter Store, which Guy Faux, who went for his Man by the Name of John Johnson, was to lodge there, and to give Fire to the Train. The Gunpowder was bought in Flanders, brought to Catesbie's House at Lambeth, and from thence by Night to the Cellars, where 'twas hid under the Wood. They design'd to perpetrate their Wickedness on the 7th of February, when the Parliament was to meet; but it being prorogu'd to the 5th of November, they were obliged to defer it, and dispers'd themselves with a Resolution to meet again when the Parliament met the next Winter.

They had in the Interval several private Cabals, in which it was resolv'd to kill the Duke of York, Piercy undertaking that bloody Work. When the King, Prince Henry, and the Duke were destroy'd, the Princess Elizabeth was to have been proclaim'd Queen under Tuition of the most rigid Papists; and in order to seize her, the Hunting Match at Dunsmore-Heath was fix'd to be the 5th of November. In this dangerous and dreadful Posture stood things, when on a Saturday, ten Days before Execution was to be, an unknown Fellow deliver'd a Letter seal'd to a Footman of the Lord

Monteagle's, Son and Heir to the Lord Morley. A.D. 1605. The Contents were:

My LORD,

OUT of the Love I bear to some of your Friends, I have a Care of your Preservation; therefore I wou'd advise you, as you tender your Life, to devise some Excuse to shift off your Attendance this Parliament; for God and Man have concurr'd to punish the Wickedness of this Time. And think not slightly of this Advertisment; but retire your self into the Country, where you may expect the Event in Safety. For tho' there be no Appearance of any Stir, yet, I say, they shall receive a terrible Blow this Parliament, and yet they shall not see who hurts them. This Counsel is not to be contemn'd, because it may do you good, and can do you no harm. For the Danger is past as soon as you have burnt the Letter; and I hope God will give you the Grace to make good use of it, to whose holy Protection I recommend you.

This Letter was deliver'd to the Lord Monteagle at his House at Bednal-Green. He cou'd not tell what to make of it, unless it was an Artifice made use of to hinder his going to Parliament; yet he cou'd not be easy till he had communicated it to the Earl of Salisbury, Secretary of State. Salisbury said, he was a Fool or Madman who wrote it: By this Expression, The Danger is past as soon as the Letter is burnt. If the Danger is past when the Letter is burnt, what needs any Warning? In which he misconstru'd the Writer's Meaning, whose Desire was to have the Letter burnt, and then the Danger wou'd be over both to him who wrote, and him who receiv'd it. The King at that time was hunting at Royston; as soon as he return'd to Whitehall, the Earl of Salisbury shew'd him the Letter.

It has been observ'd of Love, that it is ingenious in finding out Expedients to gain the desir'd Object; and Fear is not less ingenious to discover Danger, and avoid it. This Passion being natural in King James, he said immediately, It is no mean Man's Writing. There is a Blow to be given. They shall not see it that feel it. Some secret Mischief is meant by it; which on a second reading of the Letter his Majesty interpreted to be Gunpowder. Wilson says upon it, Many times Fear is a profitable and an active Servant, if it does not domineer and grow masterly. The King commanded the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Chamberlain, to make Search about the Parliament House; who under pretence of searching for some Hangings stolen out of the Wardrobe, enter'd the Cellar under the House accompany'd with the Lord Monteagle. They found the Cellar stuff'd with Billet, Faggot, and Coal. And asking Whinyard of the Wardrobe, who was House-keeper, to whom they belong'd? he reply'd, To Mr. Piercy, one of the Gentlemen Pensioners to the King, the Wood and Coal being for his Winter Fuel. The Earl of Suffolk casting his Eye aside, discover'd a tall, raw-bon'd, ill-looking Fellow in the Corner of the Vault; and asking who he was, understood 'twas Mr. Piercy's Man John Johnson, whose true Name was Guy Faux. The Lord Chamberlain thought fit to make this Report to the King before he proceeded farther in his Search; and his Majesty conceiving still greater Cause of Suspicion, order'd the Coal and Wood to be remov'd. Accordingly Sir Thomas Knevet, a Justice of the Peace at Westminster, with Constables and other Attendants, assisted Whinyard in a stricter Search after the pretended Hangings. They came to the Cellar about Midnight the fourth of November, and found Faux in Cloak and Boots at the Entrance into the Vault. Sir Thomas Knevet apprehended him immediately; and entering the Cellar, caus'd the Billers, Faggots and Coals to be thrown aside, under which they discover'd the

26 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1605. Magazine of Powder, 36 Barrels, prepar'd to blow up the King, Prince, and Two Houses of Parliament; and searching the Villain Faux, who waited to set fire to it, they found about him a Watch, very rare at that time, a Dark Lanthorn, three Matches, a Tinder-Box, and other Instruments; to have given fire to the Train at a certain Minute. He was so far from relenting, that he swore, if he had been in the House, he wou'd have blown himself and them up together; adding, he was sorry it was not done; and it was not God, but the Devil that discover'd the Plot. About four a-Clock in the Morning Knevet went with his Prisoner to some Lords of the Council, who waited his coming; and having given them an Account of his Success, the Earl of Suffolk and other Lords hasten'd to the King, and awak'd him with crying, The Treason is found out, and the Traytor taken. Faux was at first very obstinate, and wou'd confess nothing in particular; but own'd the Plot in general, justifying it by the Principles of his Religion, himself being a Catholick, and the King an Heretick. He was committed to the Tower, and threaten'd with the Rack; which brought him to a better Sense of his Condition, and by degrees to Repentance and Confession.

Before the Discovery of the Plot, the Plotters had Intimation of the Letter which was sent to the Lord Monteagle, who upon hearing Piercy nam'd imagin'd the Letter came from him, there having been some Intimacy between himself and Piercy; tho' in truth the Letter was written by Francis Tresham, Son of Sir Thomas Tresham, who was so active in this wicked Business, that he lent 2000 l. for the carrying it on. Sir Everard Digby lent 1500 l. and Piercy promis'd to seize the Earl of Northumberland's Rents, which wou'd bring them in 40000 l. They all forswore the Letter, but Tresham was suspected to be the Author. Himself, Catesbie, Piercy, Winter, and the younger Wright were lodg'd in the City; and when they heard of the Discovery, got out of Town as fast as they cou'd; only Tresham staid behind, and shifted his Lodging, in hopes of making his Escape beyond Sea. Piercy and Catesbie went first, Winter and others follow'd them to Dunchurch in Warwickshire, the Seat of Sir Everard Digby, where they had appointed to meet for the before-mention'd Hunting Match. John Grant of Northbrooke in Warwickshire, Esq; broke open the Stable of one Benock, a Manager of great Horses, and took away eight; on which he mounted so many resolute Papists; and not doubting of the Success of their diabolical Design, he was prepared to seize the Princess Elizabeth at the Hunting Match. The Conspirators broke open some Stables in London, and seiz'd several Noblemen and Gentlemen's Horses, in hopes of raising a good Body of Horse to head a general Insurrection of the Papists. Their Powder-Plot having miscarry'd, a Rebellion under Colour of Religion was to serve in its stead; but with all their Zeal and Activity they cou'd not draw 100 Men together. A Proclamation to apprehend them was issu'd at London; but it was not come into Warwickshire when Grant alarm'd the Country by breaking open Benock's Stable. Sir Rulk Grevile the Elder, a Deputy-Lieutenant of that County, caus'd Hue and Cry to be made, and a Party of Men was rais'd to pursue the Rebels; one of whom, Winter, was seiz'd by a Smith at Coventry, but rescu'd by his Fellows. Sixteen others of them were taken by the Citizens, and sent Prisoners to London by Sir Richard Verner, High-Sheriff of Warwickshire. Catesbie, Piercy, Grant, Rookwood, the two Winters and the two Wrights seiz'd Arms at the Lord Windsor's, and shut themselves up at Halbach, the House of Stephen Littleton in Staffordshire on the Borders of Worcestershire; of which Sir Richard Walsb, High-Sheriff of Worcestershire, having notice, he took what Help was at hand; and coming to Halbach, A.D. 1605; sent a Trumpet and Messenger to them. The Rebels being summon'd in his Majesty's Name to surrender, they answer'd with Disdain, If he cou'd not get more powerful Assistance, he wou'd not be able to defend himself. During the Parley, the chief Conspirators were busy in drying Powder far off from the Chimney; yet a Spark of Fire flew out, and falling amongst it blew up a Bag-full that was near it, and a good Part of the House. Catesbie, Rookwood and Grant were so wounded, that they cou'd make little Resistance. They were all in a terrible Consternation, and expecting no Pardon, resolv'd to open the Gate, and sell their Lives as dearly as they cou'd. Catesbie and Piercy fighting Back to Back were kill'd with one Shot. The two Wrights were also slain. Thomas Winter receiv'd several Wounds, and was taken Prisoner; as were Robert Winter, Littleton, Grant, Sir Everard Digby, Faux, Keys and Bates, who were all committed to the Tower; where Thomas Winter made a full Confession of this hellish Conspiracy, by which it appears to have been contriv'd soon after King James came into England. For Winter went to Flanders before the Constable of Castile landed in England, to desire him, in the Name of the Papists, to procure them Favour; and in Flanders he met with Faux, who so early as Easter 1603, communicated this cursed Design to him; which was contriving at the same time that Watson and Clarke, the two Popish Priests before-mention'd, were engag'd in Raleigh's Plot. Digby extenuated his Crime by the Despair to which they were driven, upon the King's deceiving them in their Hopes of a Toleration. Tresham nam'd Garnet the Jesuit as privy to the Plot; tho' afterwards he deny'd it, or that he had seen him in sixteen Years; which was prov'd to be false by Garnet's own Confession after he was apprehended, they having been together several times in the last half Year. Tresham's Wife, who had as much Zeal as her Husband, tempted him to clear Garnet, tho' against his Knowledge, even when Death look'd him in the Face. He dy'd of a Strangury in the Tower two Months before the Conspirators were try'd by a Commission directed to several Lords and Judges.

Thomas Winter, Robert Winter, Guy Faux, John Grant, Ambrose Rookwood, Sir Everard Digby, Robert Keys, and Thomas Bates, Winter's Man, were convicted and condemn'd. Digby, Robert Winter, Grant and Bates were hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd the 30th of January at the West End of St. Paul's Church in London; as were Thomas Winter, Keys, Rookwood and Faux the next Day in the Parliament-Yard at Westminster. I cannot imagine why Archdeacon Echard has so much Compassion for Sir Everard Digby, as to misrepresent his Case. He little imagin'd Treason, and was bound to Secrecy by Oath. What rare Authorities that Reverend Historian takes his Facts from, and what rare Reflections he makes upon them, when he has a mind to do Honour to the Papists and their Faction? Digby frankly lent 1500 l. to the Business, as Winter said in his Confession. If it is true that Sir Everard dy'd very penitently, in that case Humanity admits Compassion. But as to Digby's not knowing it to be Treason, 'tis equally false and absurd. Bishop Burnet tells us he wrote several Letters in Prison, wherein he expresses great Trouble, because he heard some of their Friends blam'd their Undertaking. He highly magnifies it, and says, if he had many Lives he wou'd willingly have sacrific'd them all in carrying it on; adding, They had taken care that there were not above two or three worth saving, to whom they had given notice to keep out of the way. As to his Penitence, the Bishop adds, he did not express any Sort of Remorse in his Letters. Winter and his Man Bates were very penitent; but Grant was more obstinate than any

tance appear'd to be most sincere; they all declared themselves Members of the Church of Rome; and considering how little in Life and Death they did Honour to that Church, she had no great Cause to boast of their Membership. Francis Tresham did not live long enough to be hang'd, his Head was cut off after his Death, and set upon London-Bridge, with the Heads of his Fellow-Conspirators.

As soon as the Parliament met, which was on the 9th of November, four Days after the Discovery of the Plot, the King made a Speech to them, wherein he did not only take Pains to clear the whole Body of the Catholics from the Guilt of it, but to sweeten them for the little Asperity which this Treason had put into the Speech, he did not forget to have a Fling at the Puritans, who deserv'd to be burnt for allowing no Salvation to Papists. The Parliament congratulated his Majesty on his Deliverance, and at the Motion of Sir Edward Montagu, Ancestor to his Grace the Duke of Montagu, pass'd an Act to have the Fifth Day of November for ever solemniz'd with Publick Thankgivings.

Notwithstanding the general Joy that appear'd every where on the Detection of this horrid Conspiracy, there were some who insinuated that the Plot was of the King's own making, or that he was privy to it from first to last: A Fancy inconsistent with his Majesty's Piety, says Dr. Fuller. I with the Doctor and his Brother Divines, had explain'd what they mean by Piety, when they speak of this King's, or wou'd teach us how to reconcile Piety with Swearing, Sabbath-breaking, Luxury, Wantonness, &c. Certain it is, 'twas inconsistent with what the Doctor calls his Fearfulness to dally so long with Destruction. Others tell us, King
James had Information of the Plot from Henry
IV. of France, before he saw the Lord Monteagle's Letter. If so, one need not hold up one's Hands with Astonishment at his Majesty's great Wisdom in discovering Gunpowder in the very Words of that Letter. Welwood is of this Opinion, "That " Letter was a Contrivance of his own, the Thing
" being discover'd to him before by Henry IV. of " France, through the Means of Monsieur de Rho-
" ny, after Duke of Sully. King Henry paid dear
" for his Friendship to King James; and there is " Reason to believe it was upon this Account, a" mong others, that a Party of the Church of " Rome, employ'd Ravillac to murder that great " Man." Osborn thinks the Information came first from France, on account of the small Notice that was afterwards taken of the Lord Monteagle; and that the French King did not give King James Advice of this Gunpowder-Plot, out of any Affection to his Person, but fearing a more heroick Prince shou'd come in his Place; and, to use my Author's Words, He shou'd exchange Herb John for Collo-quintida.

Among the many Compliments which were paid his Majesty on this Occasion, that of the Spanish Ambassador was most extraordinary, being accompanied with a Present of a fine Coat with Golden Tags, two Gold Chains, a Velvet Cap, a Gold Ba-son, &c. as you may read at large in Echard, who is wonderfully delighted with the Description of it.
This Farce was the more ridiculous, for that the very Plot was hatch'd in Spain, and the Flattery so gross, that the Pope cou'd not help laughing in the Face of Cardinal d'Osset, when he told him the Story, as the Cardinal informs his Master Henry IV. in one of his Letters; so easily was the British Solomon impos'd upon by the Address of the Spaniards, tho' so ill disguis'd, that there was no need of good Eyes to see thro' it.

The Execution of Father Garnet, Provincial of the Jesuit's Order in England, clos'd the Tragedy of the Gunpowder-Treason. This Jesuit was not only privy to it, but active in it by Exhortation and Counsel. Cecil Earl of Salisbury, Dr. Overal Dean of St. Paul's, and other Divines, examin'd him about it when he was in the Tower; but he insisted upon it, that having receiv'd Information of the Conspiracy in Confession, he cou'd not by the Laws of his Religion discover it. He was told that he had talk'd with Catesbie concerning it out of Confession; to which he reply'd, In via ad Con-fessionem, in order to Confession. Dr. Overal an-swer'd, Confession was of Things done, not to be done;

and that even the Romish Casuists allow'd Discovery, when a greater Good accru'd by revealing than concealing such Secrets. Garnet then own'd that he was minded to discover the Plot, but not the Plotters. The Earl of Salisbury demanded what hinder'd him? Yourself, says Garnet; for I know full well, shou'd I have reveal'd the Plot, and not the Plotters, you wou'd have rack'd me to Pieces to make me confess. He was arraign'd at Guildhall before the Lord-Mayor Sir Leonard Holiday, and the Lords of the Council, Sir Baptist Hicks, afterwards Viscount Cambden, being Foreman of the Jury, by whom he was soon convicted of High-Treason, for which he was hang'd, drawn, and quarter'd at the West-End of St. Paul's Church, being the last that suf-fer'd for this Treason, which Monsieur de Thou calls such a Monster of Conspiracies, as no Age or Country did every produce.

We have been the longer on the Gunpowder-Plot, that it might be made clear beyond question, being, as Welwood terms it, an uncontroverted Treason. But he is mistaken, notwithstanding all the undeniable Proofs of all the Circumstances, and all the Confessions of the Criminals, the French Jesuit Orleans controverts it in his History of Revolutions, of no other Value than as the Book was approv'd by our abdicated King James II. and is recommended by Archdeacon Echard. He begins with Doubts; All Men do not agree about the Circumstances of it. All Men, Protestants and Papists, do agree that there was a Plot to blow up King, Prince, and the two Houses of Parliament; that the Gunpowder was found under the House that was to be blown up, and the Villain who was to do it, taken with the Implements about him. What other Circumstances were wanting to prove the Treason, and hang the Traytors? Again; The Inventions of our Days shew what might have been invented then. Whether he refers to the Invention of the Ryehouse Plot, or the Invention of the Pre-tender, or what other Papist Invention I shall not enquire. But there has not been in our Days, nor in any Days, according to the illustrious Historian
De Thou, such a Monster as the Gunpowder-Plot.
Again; The Crime cou'd not be imputed to the Catholics alone, for a considerable Number of the Conspirators were Protestants: So impudently false, that not one of them was a Protestant. Fuller, they all crav'd Testimony that they died Roman Catholics. The Contrivers and Heads of the Conspiracy were to a Man Papi-sts, and I never heard of one Protestant nam'd in it. Again; Some of them were Priests, who had no other hand in it, than that they were accus'd without sufficient Proof of having been told it in Confession. The Priests are Garnet, for no other Priest was question'd for it. This good Man Garnet had no less than four Names, four Alias's, to cover him against Prosecutions for his Crimes. Besides what he had been told in Confession, Dr. Fuller assures us it was prov'd, that he frequently and publicly discours'd of it with Catesbie, Gerard, and Greenwood. Again;
the others were two or three Incendiaries; thole
two or three were in all two or threescore, tho' not above nine or ten were executed for it; set on by Cecil. What does the Reader think now of Mr.
Echard's Jesuit and his History?

The chief Conspirators having had their Reward, some who wish'd well to them were punish'd.

A.D. 1606. as Henry Lord Mordaunt, and Edward Lord Stourton, who had both neglected to come to Parliament, and were therefore suspected to be in the wicked Secret, and so far prov'd guilty of Misprison of Treason, that the Court of Star-Chamber fin'd the Lord Mordaunt 10000 Marks, and the Lord Stourton 6000, both of them to remain in Prison during his Majesty's Pleasure. The Earl of Northumberland was thought more guilty on account of his Kinsman Piercy, whom he had admitted to be one of the King's Gentlemen Pensioners, without administering to him the Oath of Supremacy, tho' he knew him to be a rank Papist; for which the same Court fin'd him 30000 Pounds, and condemn'd him to Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure.

The Punishment of the Traytors and their Accomplices, was scarce over, before the People were alarm'd with a Rumour of the King's being assassinated at Orkingham in Berkshire. But the Consternation lasted not long, his Majesty coming to London two or three Hours after. The Impression the late Plot had made on Mens Minds, render'd them very apt to be terrify'd with such Rumours; and when their Terrors were past, their Joy was equal to what their Fear had been. Sir Lewis Lewkner, Master of the Ceremonies, had a Gold Chain given him by the Spanish Ambassador, for bringing him News of his Majesty's Safety. 'Twas thought he was so generous to take off the Odium of the late Conspiracy from his Master the King of Spain, who was suspected to have fomented it.

Willson,
p. 32.

On the 27th of May the Parliament was prorogued to the 18th of November, having past several Acts besides that for the Fifth of November, particularly an Act granting the King three entire Subsidies, and six Fifteenths; and an Act enjoining a new Oath of Allegiance, in which 'twas asserted, That the Pope could not depose the King, nor dispose of his Kingdom, nor authorize any other Prince to invade him, nor discharge his Subjects from their Fidelity, &c. It also bound the Person who took it, to bear Faith and true Allegiance to his Majesty, to discover all Treasons and Conspiracies, and declar'd that the Pope had no Power to absolve this Oath; the Form of which was so order'd, that it might not offend the Conscience of those who, without renouncing their Religion, would pay that Duty to their Sovereign, which they rightfully ow'd him. The Thing appear'd so reasonable to the English Papists, that the Nobility, Gentry, Priests, and all others, swore in this Form. George Blackwell nominated Arch-Priest of England by Pope Paul V. not only took the Oath, but wrote in Defence of it, which the Pope understanding, sent a Brief immediately to forbid the taking it, as inconsistent with the Salvation of Souls. The Papists in England treated this Brief as spurious, and his Holiness was forc'd to send a second to confirm it. He also directed Cardinal Bellarmine to write to Blackwell about it; in which Letter were some Expressions which so anger'd his Majesty, as to put him upon answering it himself, in an Apology for the Oath: Wherein, says Dr. Fuller, he effectually confuted the Pope's Brief. And another Author writes, the King gave a very learned Answer to a Brief, which could not but have been answer'd without one word of Learning. However, such was the Language of certain Writers, whenever they spoke of his Majesty's Parts and Performances. Let us therefore see what Foreigners, who had no Bias of Hope or Fear, say of him and his Learning. Vassor writes thus, Had not a King better have forborn writing at all, and have left this Care to another? A little Jesuit, made a Cardinal by scribbling, was not an Adversary for a Monarch. The Pope behav'd himself like a King, and King James acted the Part of a Doctor. The Pope commanded, and King James disputed. Except a Prince wrote like Julius Caesar, or Marcus Aurelius, he is in the wrong to become an Author. The Jesuit Orleans, who speaks well of him in some Places for his Inclination to Poverty, cannot help saying of his boasted Learning, He was commended by learned Men as a Patron of Literature; for which, if we may judge by his Works, it will appear he had rather an Affection than any good Taste; and that he, who, during his Life, call'd him the learned King, rather did it because he was a King, than because he was really learned. What his Genius was, we have from Buchanan his Tutor; which Mexeray and Justel often told in their Assemblies at Paris. King James I. at his Levee in Scotland, would have the French Ambassador talk Latin; which he complying with, and happening to break Priscian's Head, the Laugh was against him; upon which he running out of Court, met Buchanan on the Stairs, and reproach'd him for having made a Pedant of his Pupil. Pedant, said Buchanan, lifting up his Hands and Eyes, I thank God I have made any Thing of him. And a noble Author, speaking of this very Incident, said, the Scotch Solomon had not one good Quality in him. This was confirm'd to me by a Person of that Dignity and Character, as leaves no room to doubt its Veracity, and I shall name him when I am put to it. The King was at first so sensible of the Indiscretion in his answering Bellarmine, that he did not own his Apology. Bellarmine wrote against it under the Name of Tortus: Dr. Andrews Bishop of Winchester reply'd to him. But a little Flattery on the Value of the Work, made his Majesty put his Name to it, and a very pompous Preface before it in the Nature of a Manifesto, address'd to all Kings, Princes, and States of Christendom, vindicating the Rights of Sovereigns against the Usurpations of the Pope. Vassor says, The Popish Princes durst not read, and the Protestant Princes did not need it. Henry IV. of France, who had been a zealous Protestant, forbid the translating it into French, which however was done soon after; and Coeffeteau, a French Historian and Refiner of that Language, answer'd it, tho' poorly enough, as allowing the Independence of the Kings of France. Cardinal Bellarmine reply'd to the King's Preface, addressing his Reply also to the Emperor, the Kings and States of Christendom. The Parliament of Paris condemn'd Bellarmine's Book; but some Years after, Mary de Medicis, King Charles the First's Mother-in-law, then Queen-Regent of France, order'd their Decree to be superseded; and all the Glory that redounded to King James by this Controversy, was, according to Mr. Coke, that he could wrangle and cavil as well as Bellarmine. 'Tis the Fault of the Reign, as has been observ'd, if the Matter is so trivial. Coke writes, The King gave himself wholly up to Hunting, Plays, Maïques, Balls, and writing against Bellarmine. Thus stood the Case for four Years after, wherein I scarce find any thing worth mentioning. Echard indeed mentions the Arrival of the King of Denmark, Brother to the Queen, but he does not mention what he read in Sir Edward Peyton, p. 63. If we examine the King of Denmark, Brother of Queen Anne, the first time he was entertain'd in England, what Debauchedness was exercis'd in his Welcome to King James, who both were so drunk at Theobalds, as our King was carried in the Arms of the Courtiers, &c. I can tell no more of it; the Delicacy of English Readers being such, that Truth itself gives Offence when it breaks in upon Decorums. No sooner was the King of Denmark gone, than another princely Visitor, the Count de Vaudemont, Prince of Son to the Duke of Lorain, arriv'd at Court with a numerous Train of Servants and Attendants, and was entertain'd with the like Magnificence, Profusion, and Luxury.

On the 18th of November the Parliament met, and Sir Francis Bacon, Solicitor-General, made a Motion for an Act to naturalize all Scotsmen; but it

A.D. 1607. it met with so much Opposition, that the King was forc'd to interpose, and in March following he sent for both Houses of Parliament, to whom he made that notable Speech which Echard is so fond of for its Jingles, Unus Rex, Unus Grex, Una Lex, one King, one People, one Law. But all that cou'd be gotten for the Scots was an Act to repeal all Laws of Hostility antiently made between England and Scotland. The Parliament neglected the Affair of the Union of the two Kingdoms, yet the King in some measure carry'd his Point, by a Determination of the Lord Chancellor Ellesmer, and most of the Judges in the famous Case of Calvin, by which the Postnati Scots, born after the King's coming to the Crown of England, were declar'd to be free, to bring real Actions, to purchase and inherit in this Kingdom.

Scots
Poil-nati.

Sir Francis Bacon made a very long Speech in the House of Commons for a general Naturalization, another for the Postnati before the Lord-Chancellor Ellesmer and the Judges in the Exchequer; and another in the House of Commons for a Union of Laws in England and Scotland: Three Speeches full of Learning and Eloquence. But that before the House of Commons for a Naturalization had no Effect on the major Vote; that before the Lord-Chancellor succeeded better, the King being Master of his and the Judges Opinions. The Motion for a closer Union with Scotland, was not then popular; his Majesty's profuse Bounty to the Scots Favourites, gave the English a Disgust to the Nation, to which the Insolence which generally accompanies Favour, did not a little contribute. Bishop Burnet informs us, That King James lost the Union of England and Scotland by an unreasonable Partiality in pretending that Scotland was the third Part of the Isle of Great-Britain, if not more. So very politic was his Majesty in an Affair which he had most at heart.

Before the Parliament broke up, there was a kind of Insurrection in Northamptonshire, Warwickshire, and Leicesterhire, the Rabble getting together under one John Reynolds, (whom they call'd Captain Pouch, from a large Leather-Pouch he wore by his Side,) to pull down Inclosures. A Proclamation was issu'd, commanding them to disperse, which they took no notice of; but the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Exeter, the Lord Zouch, and the Lord-Chief-Justice Coke, being sent against them with an arm'd Force, they were suppress'd. Their Leader Captain Pouch was hang'd, and the chief of them, who cou'd pay for the Rior, were fin'd.

Ireland.

The Earl of Tyrone, who had been so well receiv'd by his Majesty, the Lord Tyrconnel, the Lord Dungannon, and other Irish Peers, fled into foreign Parts to solicit Popish Princes against their own Sovereign. Tyrconnel dy'd in Spain, and his Son was made Page to Philip the III'd's Queen, so careful was the Spanish Court to cultivate a good Intelligence with the Irish Papists, who were continually caballing against the English Government, at the same time that the Spanish Ambassadors were more caref'd at the Court of England, than the Ministers of any other Princes or States. His Majesty had always shewn a particular Tenderness to Popish Offenders, and from his Accession to the Throne of England to his Death, punish'd none but those he was afraid of, such as the Gunpowder Plotters, whose Heirs were suffer'd to enjoy their Estates, particularly Digby's Son, Sir Kenelm Digby, a great Favourite of the Queen's, if not of the King's in the next Reign. He restor'd all the Forfeitures and Confiscations, to which he was most justly intitl'd by Tyrone's Rebellion in Ireland. This Lenity, instead of obliging them to grateful Obedience, embolden'd them to renew their traitorous Designs, and Tyrone drew the whole Province of Ulster into a Confederacy against the English; which being discover'd before 'twas brought to a

Head, and the other Provinces not joining with him, he and the chief of his Adherents fled to Spain, from whence he never return'd; so welcome were all these Rebels and Traytors to the Catholick King, at the same time that King James was so fond of his Friendship.

On the 4th of July the Parliament was prorogued to the 16th of November, and then to the 9th of February, in the Year 1609. In the Interval, the King spent his Time very jollily, always sporting or feasting: His Majesty din'd with the Lord-Mayor Sir John Watts, and was made free of the Clothworkers Company. Soon after he dined at Merchant Taylors Hall, and Prince Henry was made free of that Company; of which Archdeacon Echard tells us, a Queen and an Archbishop had been free before. Such Events as these must needs be very ornamental in History: But if I had had others to put in their Place, I shou'd have left these Ornaments to Mr. Echard's, which is capable of no better. About the same time Sir Thomas Knevet, of whom mention was made for his Service in the Gunpowder-Plot, was created Baron of Layton-Bromeswold; the Earl of Salisbury, and Thomas Howard Viscount Bindon, had been made Knights of the Garter the last Year; and George Earl of Dunbar, and Philip Earl of Montgomery, were now advanc'd to that Honour. Sir Julius Caesar, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was sworn of the Privy-Council, and bountiful was his Majesty in the Disposal both of his Honours and Treasures.

In the midst of this Time of Peace and Joy, this fair Outside of Government, there was growing within a Rottenness, which turn'd to a Mortification in the subsequent Reign. Coke coarsely expresses it: Whilst the King was wallowing in Pleasure, he wholly gave himself up to be govern'd by Favourites, to whom he was excessively prodigal, not only of Honours and Offices, but of the Revenues of the Crown, and Aids given in Parliament; and these being of both Nations, Scots as well as English, made them to be the more intolerable. All Things being in Peace abroad, publick Affairs were neglected, and scarce thought of: And in this Lethargy of State, the Prerogative Clergy swell'd the High-Commission to such a Weight, that it was complain'd of as a Grievance in Parliament; one Blackwood publish'd a Book, wherein he endeavour'd to prove, That the English were Slaves by Reason of a Conquest; and when the Parliament was about to proceed against him, his Majesty interpos'd and put a Stop to it, by issuing a Proclamation to call in the Book.

Another Instance of King James's Politicks, was his Proclamation prohibiting the Increase of Buildings in the City of London, which has been still increasing these 120 Years, and by collecting the Strength and Riches of the Kingdom into a Body, has render'd the Nation more safe at Home, and more formidable Abroad, than ever it was before. King James's strongest Reason referr'd to his own Person, for fear a Crowd of People shou'd bring in the Plague again, and infect Whitehall; whereas the Plague ceas'd at that Time, and the Danger was over. Many Men, says Wilson, that did not so well heed the Proclamation, laid out their whole Estates upon little Houels, and building fair Houses upon new Foundations, tho' but two Yards from the old, they became Trespassers, and must either purchase their Houses, or pull them down, both ways tending to their Ruin. However, Mr. Archdeacon assures us, it was done with mature Deliberation of the Council; and if we will not take such Counsels as this, to be the Effect of mature Deliberation, we must look for them in other Histories and other Reigns.

This Incident is misplac'd by the reverend Historian in the Year 1609, whereas it was publish'd in October 1607; and the Reason which was given for restraining the new Buildings to prevent Infection,

A.D. 1607. was found afterwards to be a Reason for enlarging the Buildings, that by having more Room, the Inhabitants might not be too much crowded, and consequently the Air in Time of Pestilence be less liable to be infected: So that what the Wisdom of our Time doth decry, says Wilson, the Experience of another may advance. Yet this is the Time when Counsels were maturely deliberated, and the wisest Monarch of the Age sat on the Throne of Great-Britain, to whose Wisdom is always join'd the Character of merciful, which did not however appear in this Instance.

A Judge at the Assize at Northampton, condemn'd a Felon, but repriev'd him on account of the Weakness of the Evidence: Judge Nicholls, who went that Circuit this Year, continu'd the Prisoner's Reprieve, for which he was complain'd of. The King, without enquiring into the Strength or Weakness of the Evidence, commanded the Judge, by Letter, to direct Execution of the Sentence, which that good Magistrate refus'd to do, saying, His Predecessor, who had heard the Witnesses, thought it Justice to reprieve the Felon, and his Conscience wou'd not let him direct Sentence to be executed, since he never had heard the Evidence: Besides, his Oath oblig'd him to do right, notwithstanding the King's Letter.

The Affair of the Union had better Success in Scotland, than it had had in England. The Parliament there allow'd all the Articles which were concluded by their Commissioners, provided the same were ratify'd by the Parliament of England, who took no Notice of what the Scots did in the Matter; so the Design fell, and came to nothing.

'Twas not likely that a King of King James's Disposition shou'd be much consider'd abroad, his whole Conduct, with respect to foreign Affairs, necessarily drew upon him the Neglect of all Europe. We shall see presently how he deserv'd it.

Le Clerc.

The President Jeannin, and Monsieur Roissy, the French Ambassadors at the Hague, offer'd a stricter Alliance between their Master and the States-General. The States notify'd this Offer to King James, who promis'd to dispatch Mr. Richard Spencer, and Mr. Ralph Winwood, who had been his Agent in Holland, to join in the Negotiation, but he found Means to evade it, and remain Spectator of the War. Richardot wrote from Brussels to Jeannin, that the King of Spain, his Master, was the more difficult in the Article of the Treaty of Truce, which related to the declaring the States-General to be a Free State, because King James had written to King Philip, That he believ'd the States might be brought to consent to the leaving out of the Treaty what related to the Acknowledgment of their being free; which shews how little he understood the Intentions and Resolutions of the States, and the true Interest of the Protestant Religion, and the Liberties of Europe; or at least how little he concern'd himself about them. The President Jeannin writing to his Master from Holland, told him King James was never sincere with the Dutch: Henry IV. reply'd, I know his Capacity, and the Inclinations of his People; the most contemptible Thing that ever was said of the Genius and Abilities of a Monarch.

A.D. 1608

In the beginning of the Year 1608, dy'd Thomas Sackville Earl of Dorset, in an apoplectick Fit, which seiz'd him and carry'd him off at the Council-Table. He was made Lord-Treasurer 10 Years before by Queen Elizabeth; he was Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and of Eminence in his Time for a poetical Genius, as his Tragedy of Ferrex witnesses, and for his rare Wisdom and careful Providence, to use the Words of an old Author. The Earl of Salisbury succeeded him as Lord-Treasurer; and tho' he had the Dexterity to raise one of the greatest Fortunes in England, it is said he gave a Check to the King's prodigal Bounty to others; which does not agree with what Osborn tells us,

He was a Seducer of the King, persuading him this A.D. 1608: Nation was so rich, it cou'd be neither exhausted nor provok'd. 'Tis certain he was very loose in his Morals, as by the Satyr on him.

p. 154.

Echard says, after Osborn, who is here mistaken, or the Archdeacon wou'd not have made use of him, He might have enrich'd his Family more, had he not look'd upon low Things with Contempt; which is not true. There is nothing in the World so low as a Bribe; and that he took Spanish Money for the Peace, is as well known, as that he was a Speaker at the Hampton-Court Conference against the Presbyterians. As to his Contempt of low Things, see Sir Anthony Welden: Salisbury had one Trick to get the Kernel, and leave the Scots but the Shell, yet cast all the Envy upon them; he wou'd make them buy Books of Fee-Farms; some 100 Pounds per Ann. some 100 Marks; and he wou'd compound with them for 1000 Pounds; which they were willing to embrace, because they were sure to have them pass without any Controul; and 1000 Pounds appear'd to them that never saw 10 Pounds before, an inexhaustible Treasure; then would Salisbury fill up this Book with such prime Land, as should be worth 10 or 20000 Pounds, and which was very easy for him being Treasurer, &c. These were his admirable Abilities.

P. 604

The Remembrance of the Gunpowder-Plot, kept the Sword of Justice keen against Popish Priests and Jesuits, and the King suffer'd two of them, George Fervis a Seminary Priest, and Thomas Garnet a Jesuit, to be executed: A Pardon was offer'd the latter, if he wou'd take the Oath of Allegiance, but he utterly refus'd it.

We have mention'd the Pyracies of one Tomkins in the beginning of this Reign, and now the Seas were infested by a Pyrate of an honourable Name, Sir Francis Verney, together with Ward, Bishop, Glanville, and others, some of whom were Renegadoes, and liv'd as Turks at Tunis in great State. Nineteen of these Robbers being taken, were brought to England, and executed at Wapping.

The Earl of Northampton was about this Time made Lord Privy-Seal, who, besides his being a Northampton's bad Character. reputed Papist, had a worse Character, a Man of no Morals nor Conscience, who stuck at nothing to gratify his Passions, and please his Appetite. Sir Anthony Welden says, he was the grossest Flatterer in the World, of so venomous and canker'd a Disposition, that he hated all Men of noble Parts, nor lov'd any but Flatterers. An Instance of his Hatred to brave Men, was what he said of Sir Robert Mansell: Body of God, I will be content to be damn'd perpetually in Hell, to be reveng'd of that proud Welshman. The same Knight, speaking of one Lake, whom he calls a Fellow of mean Birth, afterwards Secretary of State, says, he rose by Telling: "He let the King know the Passages at Court, and great Men, as who was Salisbury's Mistress, and govern'd all, who govern'd Northampton, and discover'd the Bawdry which did infinitely please the King's Humour." We see what Sort of Ministers King James employ'd; and Echard informs us, That upon this Earl of Northampton's Shoulders, the King laid the main Burden of all his Affairs. Northampton's Affection to Popery, appears by a Letter he wrote to Cardinal Bellarmine, wherein he said, Howsoever the Condition of the Times compelled him, and his Majesty urg'd him to turn Protestant, yet nevertheless his Heart stood with the Catholics, and he wou'd be ready to further them in any Attempt. The Arch-

He was Father to the Countess of Somerset, and his Wife the Countess of Suffolk had an Employment at Court, which was the most beneficial of any in the Reign of King Charles II. King James's Grandson. Sir Thomas Overbury did not stick to call her Bawd, too homely a Word for History. Sir A. W. joins Northampton in this gallant Employment. Copinger, says he, being a Bawd to Car, and the Countess of Essex's Lusts made him a Friend to Northampton and Suffolk, tho' he was but a Servant to Car.

A.D. 1609. Being supported by these Counsellors, to use the Archdeacon's excellent Words, the King join'd with Henry the IVth of France in the Mediation of a Peace between Spain and the United Provinces. The Account he gives us of this Negotiation is alone a sufficient Proof of the Inconsistency of his Panegyricks on King James's Wisdom with the Truth, and even with his own Relation of it. In this Treaty the States were acknowledg'd Free and Independent. This was the first Scene in which King James appear'd abroad, either as a Party or Moderator, since his Accession to the Throne of England; and tho' the Treaty prov'd of extraordinary Consequence, yet it is said that his Part in it was as mean as that of the King of France was glorious; and his Conduct towards the States for whom he mediated, and towards France with whom he join'd, was quite different from the Methods and Maxims of his renown'd Predecessor. So different, that even the Jesuit Orleans, who writes on the same side with Archdeacon Echard, owns ELIZABETH had been a great King, and JAMES was a good Queen. The Archdeacon proceeds: For besides several unusual Condescensions to the French in the Persons of their Ambassadors, which gave Foreigners a mean Idea of his Government, he was tax'd with being insincere in the Treaty, which he appear'd to promote and encourage. And what Opinion the French Ministers had of him in this Affair, appears from the printed Negotiation of Jeannin, the chief Agent for France; who in several Letters to the French King his Master wrote, That King James was never hearty in the Treaty, but had all along condemn'd the Hollanders for throwing off the Sovereignty of Spain upon the account of its bad Example. In Answer to one of which Letters, Henry IV. whose Opinion of King James was never very great, own'd his Knowledge of that King's ill Intentions towards the States; and withal told Jeannin, that his Carriage did not break his Sleep; and concluded his Letter with an Expression of Contempt rarely us'd among Princes of that Rank, which has been already repeated. All this is said of a Monarch, whom the same Reverend Historian a few Pages after characterizes in the most fulsome manner. As to his Mind he has receiv'd the highest Applauses and Commendations, that for Learning and Wisdom he was the Solomon of the Age. The above-mention'd Henry IV. of France so term'd him, but not exactly in the same Words, nor with the same Meaning; for taken in a literal Sense, he might as well have call'd him the Hercules of the Age. The Author of a Letter to King William has some judicious Reflections on his Majesty's Wisdom, the Subject of so much Eulogy in Ecclesiastical History. His Thoughts seem'd to be set on his own Power, and the Flattery of the Court was more pleasing to him than the general Interest of his Kingdom. He had got some superficial Skill in the Arts and Sciences, and a profound Knowledge, A.D. 1609 as he thought, in Divinity. He made his Court to the Clergy, that they being appriz'd of his great Learning might in their Writings celebrate his Fame; and truly they have not at all been deficient in suitable Returns. They insinuated to the People his great Knowledge in all Sorts of divine and human Learning. Hereupon at his first coming to the Crown he industriously assisted the Bishops against the Puritans; for which they almost ador'd his deep Learning, comparing him to Solomon. Sir A. W. of him: He was crafty and cunning in petty things; insomuch as a very wise Man was wont to say, he believ'd him the wisest Fool in Christendom. Welwood speaks of him thus: He writ and spoke in a Stile that border'd too much upon Pedantry. Bishop Burnet says, his Reign in England was a continu'd Course of mean Practices. I have seen the Original of his Letters to the Prince and Duke in Spain, which shew a Meanness that renders him very contemptible. The great Figure the Crown of England He is the had made in Queen Elizabeth's Time was so much Scorn of eclips'd, if not quite darken'd, during this Reign, that Age.

King James was become the Scorn of the Age. Now for Archdeacon Echard: He knew how to catch the Inclinations of the People at the first Rebound, not suffering them to mount higher than he could reach them; nor grow so strong, but he could either alter or divert them. He had an admirable Pregnancy of Wit, &c. It is too surfeiting to be repeated: His Knowledge hath been by some thought fitter for the Head of a Society than the Governor of a Kingdom. Why all this Panegyrick without Ground or Modesty? We may be assur'd of the Reason from what the same Writer tells us; He acted very laudably, and with great Reputation with respect to the Establish'd Church, both as to the Settlement of the Revenues, &c. Another such Writer in King Charles the First's Reign having for the same good Reason given him the same Praise, an Historian who wrote the Life and Reign of King Charles the Ist, animadverts upon it thus: "With no Colour at all of Sincerity the Writer talks at random, palpably and ridiculously rendering King James for the only politick, peaceable and pious King of his Time. A Prince, as he would have it believ'd, the Paragon for his Wisdom and Care, the Fruits whereof no rational Man could ever yet discern; when the plain Truth was, the right Measure of his peaceable Reign was well known to all Europe to be the only Occasion of all the After-Wars throughout Germany, and the Root of all those of his Successor throughout his Dominions. Those in Germany to the utter Undoing of his Son-in-law the Elector Palatine. He sat musing at home how to improve his Sovereignty, to devise Projects how to raise Moneys to satiate his needy and greedy Scots Courtiers by Privy-Seals, Benevolences, Sale of Forest Lands, Woods, Crown Lands, &c. wasting treble the Treasure in an idle Peace, which his Predecessor the Queen spent in a continu'd foreign War".

I have enlarg'd here on King James's Character, that the Reader might take it along with him thro' the Sequel of his Reign, and comparing it with his Actions, be convinc'd of the Truth of it, tho' directly contrary to the Writings of some Ecclesiasticks.

While his Majesty's Actions were so laudable to the Church of England, he condemn'd the Dutch for defending themselves against Popery and a Spanish Inquisition. We shall be oblig'd frequently to observe, that Ecclesiastical Historians, in Return for the Care King James took of their Revenues, complimented him with a divine, unlimited Prerogative; of which he was extremely fond, and left an Example of arbitrary Government to his Son, which ended in the most terrible Catastrophe that is to be met with in any History. In several

A.D. 1609. veral of his Proclamations, and most of his Speeches, he gives Intimation of his good Disposition to absolute Power, as in his Proclamation of the 8th of May, prohibiting all foreign Nations to fish on the British Coast without Licenses. Tho' we do sufficiently know by our Experience in the Office of Regal Dignity, (in which by the Favour of Almighty God we have been plac'd, and exercis'd these many Years) how far the Absoluteness of sovereign Power extendeth; and that in regard thereof we need not yield Account to any Person under God for any Action of ours. What is most strange in this is, that a Prince should have so strong an Appetite for Power, who, according to Henry IV. of France, had so little Capacity to make use of it.

Licenses for fishing were to be taken out at London and Edinburgh every Year, and Commissioners were appointed to grant them. But this Proclamation had no great Effect; and indeed Proclamations were too common in this Reign to be so much respected as they were in Q. Elizabeth's. Echard remembers this Proclamation for the Fishery, to shew his Majesty's wife Administration and paternal Care of his People; whereas if we may believe Sir Edward Peyton, it was all Grimace: For he took a small Rate only of the Hollanders, and granted them the Isle of Lewis in Scotland, and other Isles in Ireland to dry their Fish, by which they have enrich'd themselves above 40 Millions Sterling. He also permitted the French to fish on the Coast of England, who carry'd away the very Earth and Spawn of the Fish of Roches, Gurnet, Cunger and Haddock to Diep; where they have abundance, and we want. The Proclamation to confiscate all foreign Allum was a very considerable one in the Opinion of the Reverend Historian, that Commodity having been brought to Perfection in England by Sir John Bourchier.

It is a most unpleasant Labour to write a History without Facts; or if any offer, they are such as are not worthy Remembrance. Dr. Fuller says justly enough, The Reign of King James was better for one to live under than to write, having nothing to entertain Posterity. The historical Archdeacon takes no notice of this Defect in all his History of this King, which he writes with as much Pride and Pleasure, as if he was writing the Reigns of Edward III. or William III.

About this Time, according to Le Clerc, the Account of the Debt owing from the States of the United Provinces to England was adjusted 818408*l.* and the States engag'd to begin the Payment of it two Years after the Conclusion of the Peace; but a Truce being now concluded, King James was contented with the Payment of 40000 Florins, or about 3000*l.* every six Months during the Truce; which wretched Bargain was obtain'd for the States by the good Management of Barneveldt, as he set forth in his Remonstrance in 1618. The States General of the United Provinces some time after sent John de Bork Pensionary of Dort, Albert Vere Pensionary of Amsterdam, Elias Olden-Barneveldt Pensionary of Rotterdam, Albert Joachim Deputy of Zeland, Ambassadors to King James. They arriv'd at London the 24th of April, and had Audience the 27th. They had afterwards Conferences with the Ministers about the Proclamation which the King had publish'd concerning the Dutch Fishery on the British Coasts; to which these Ambassadors alledg'd, they had a Right according to the fourth Article of the Treaty concluded with the Archduke Philip, Sovereign of the Netherlands in 1495. In effect the King suspended the Execution of his Proclamation, and knighted the Ambassadors; so very well pleas'd was he with the Payment of the Florins before-mention'd.

A.D. 1610. The Reverend Historian opens the next Year

with another of King James's peaceful Triumphs A.D. 1610 in the Person of his Son Prince Henry, who was belov'd by every Native of Great Britain better than by his Father. He discover'd so much of an heroick Genius, that it gave Occasion for Suspicion, which ought never to enter into History; and therefore I omit what Sir Edward Peyton says of his Birth, and what the Lord Sinclair said at the Court of Denmark. He was much given to Tiltings, Barriers, and other martial Exercises on Horseback; while his Royal Father contented himself with hunting the timorous Hare. Sometimes the Sport was more generous, as a Stag-Chace, in which the young Prince accompany'd him; and it is said the King conceiv'd the first Jealousy of him at the End of such a Chace: For the Stag being kill'd 15 Miles from the Place where they were to lodge, the King did not care to go so far, and took up his Quarters much short of it. But the Prince resolving to lye where they first intended, went forward, and took away with him almost all the Company, who attended him out of Affection and Respect, and left only such Attendants with the King, as were oblig'd by the Duty of their Offices to attend him. The Prince was now sixteen Years of Age; and the King, either to raise Money, or do his Son Honour, receiv'd an Aid of his Subjects for the Prince's Knighthood. And to add new Splendor to this glorious Youth, continues the Archdeacon with his wonted Eloquence, "he not long after created him Prince of Wales after this solemn manner: Garret King at Arms bore the Letters Patents, the Earl of Suffex the Robes of Purple Velvet, the Earl of Huntington the Train, the Earl of Cumberland the Sword, the Earl of Derby the Rod, the Earl of Shrewsbury the Cap and Coronet. The Earls of Northingham and Northampton supported the Prince, who was only in his Surcoat and bare-headed. Being conducted to the King, and attended by 25 Knights of the Bath of eminent Families, Secretary Salisbury read the Letters Patents, while the Prince continu'd upon his Knees before the King, and at the accustomed Words the King invest'd him with the Robe, the Sword, the Cap and Coronet, the Rod and Ring; and then "with a Kiss the Ceremony ended". After this it was thought proper that he should keep his Court by himself. It is worth mentioning, that in this Session of Parliament the King was pleas'd to command that the Lords and Commons should sit together in the Court of Requests, the Lords sitting on the right Hand by themselves, and the Commons on the left Hand. The Prince's Tutor, Sir Thomas Challoner, was made his Chamberlain; Sir Edward Philips his Chancellor; And his Household being establish'd, Sir Charles Cornwallis was sent to Spain, to treat with that King for his eldest Daughter to be a Wife for him; which never took Effect: and the Infanta was given in Marriage to Lewis XIII. the French King. But King James's being baulk'd in this Treaty, did not discourage him from entring afterwards into a long and fruitless Negotiation at the same Court for the Marriage of his second Son Prince Charles with a second Infanta of Spain.

The Murder of Henry IV. of France by Procurement of the Jesuits, occasion'd a Consternation in the Court of England; and the King in a Pannick commanded by Proclamation, all Romish Priests and Jesuits to quit the Kingdom, and all Papists not to come within ten Miles of London. The Oath of Allegiance was also reviv'd, and solemnly taken by both Houses of Parliament to his Majesty's great Satisfaction. This Session of Parliament began the 16th of October; and, says Wilson, "though they were willing to secure their Allegiance to the King out of Piety, yet they were so stout, which he term'd obstinate, that " they

A.D. 1610. "they would not obey him in his Encroachments upon the publick Liberty, which he began then to practise; and the Parliament being willing to discover by the Light of Law and Reason what was the King's and what theirs, he dissolv'd them by Proclamation; setting forth, That he had propos'd many things far differing the Graces and Favours of former Times both in Nature and Value, in Expectation of a good Conclusion, not only for the Supply of his Necessities, but for the Ease and Freedom of his Subjects; but these being the two last Sessions little taken notice of, &c. he put an End to the Session. The Parliament had lately been very sparing of their Subsidies. They had also complain'd of his governing by Proclamations, and of the High Commission Court, where the Bishops exercis'd an intolerable Tyranny; tho' Echard with his usual Judgment and Sincerity tells us, it was a Preservation against Popery, and a Curb to the Lewdness of great Men, when Bancroft before-mentioned was at the Head of it. Wilson judges otherwise of it, and lets us know why it was complain'd of in Parliament thirty Years before it was abolish'd. The High Commission Court also began now to swell into a Grievance, every Man must conform to the Episcopal Way, and quit his Hold in Opinion or Safety. That Court was the Touchstone to try whether Men were Metal for their Stamp; and if they were not soft enough to take such Impressions as were put upon them, they were made malleable there, or else they could not pass current. This was the Beginning of that Mischief, which when it came to a full Ripeness made such a bloody Tincture in both Kingdoms, as never will be got out of the Bishops Lawy Sleeves.

The Causes of the Civil War. This is the main of my Design. This shews who were really the Cause of the Civil War, and all the Blood and Treasure that were consum'd in it; tho' the Lord Clarendon has in vain endeavour'd to impose the quite contrary upon us, and load the Presbyterians with what the Bishops were the Occasion of. The Thirtieth of January Sermons, Cathedral Sermons, Oxford Lectures and Sermons contain little else; as contrary as it is to the plain Truth told us by Mr. Wilson, who was contemporary with these things, and knew them and felt them, as did all good and sober Englishmen and Protestants.

A Speech of the King's. Before his Majesty parted with this Parliament he made a Speech to them, wherein he enlarg'd again on the high Prerogatives of Royalty, he compar'd the Power of Kings to that of the Almighty: "For as God can create and destroy, make and unmake at his Pleasure; so Kings can give Life and Death, judge all and be judg'd by none; they can exalt low things and abase high things; making the Subjects like Men at Chess, a Pawn to take a Bishop or a Knight."

To this Eloquence is added some Argument, which has just as much Strength as the other has Beauty.

"As it is Blasphemy to dispute with God, so it is Sedition in Subjects to dispute what a King might do in the Height of his Power."

The very Essence of Wisdom this, to talk thus before the most august and the most free Assembly in the World; a great Body of Nobility and Gentry well read in the Constitution, and very tenacious of their Liberties, to be thus documented by a Prince, who in seven Years Reign had acquir'd no other Glory than the Conquests his Ministers Spiritual and Temporal had made for him in the Star-Chamber and High Commission Courts. Our historical Archdeacon assures us, this Speech had many obliging Expressions; but his Majesty would not stay to have the good Effects of the Obligations he had laid upon them. He informs us also that the Parliament pass'd many good Laws. Dr. Fuller speaking of this very Session says, It may be found in the Records, though it be lost in the Statute Books, because nothing was enacted.

About this time dy'd Archbishop Bancroft, to whose Pride and Severity may be imputed all the Evils which occasion'd the Murmurs in this and the following Reigns: The Prelates, who afterwards follow'd his Example, continuing the Grievances in the High Commission Court as long as the Tyranny of that Court lasted, which was as long as it had a Being. Dr. George Abbot succeeded him in the See of Canterbury, and by his Piety and Prudence put a Stop for a while to the Rage of Persecution, and a Calm succeeded the Storm in which perish'd so many religious and conscientious Protestants.

By the Death of William Duke of Cleves and Juliers, the Succession to his Estates was like to have caus'd a general War in Europe. The House of Austria espousing the Cause of the Elector of Saxony, who pretended a Right to it by Virtue of a dormant Grant from the Emperor. Accordingly the Archduke Leopold, Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, seiz'd the City of Juliers in Prejudice of the Rights of the Elector of Brandenburg and Duke of Newburgh, who both had Pretensions to the Succession of Cleves. Mary de Medicis, then Queen Regent of France, was advis'd to support the Pretensions of Brandenburg and Newburgh in Opposition to Saxony, who was supported by the Emperor. The States of the United Provinces were jealous of any new Accession of Power to the Crown of Spain in their Neighbourhood, and therefore declar'd for Brandenburg and Newburgh. King James, who had never yet suffer'd his military Sword to be drawn in any Quarrel, cou'd not in Honour let two Protestant Princes, Brandenburg and Newburgh, be oppress'd, when the States had so generously offer'd to assist them. Thus was his Majesty drawn into a kind of War, which lasted but a few Weeks: For Maurice Prince of Orange, with the Assistance of the English and French Troops, invest'd the City of Juliers the 18th of July, and had it surrender'd to him the first of September. Sir Edward Cecil, Brother to the Earl of Salisbury, commanded 4000 English at that Siege, who behav'd with great Gallantry very much to the Honour of the Nation. Sir Hatton Cheek was Lieutenant-General, between whom and one of his Captains Sir Thomas Dutton there happen'd a Dispute, which ended in a Duel on Calais Sands, where Sir Hatton Cheek dy'd of his Wounds, and Sir Thomas Dutton with much Difficulty recover'd of his. After the Surrender of Juliers, the Princes of Germany met at Cologne to accommodate that Affair. The French Ambassador assisted at this Congress, but the King of England was not concern'd in it. And indeed considering the little Good that came of it, his Honour was not touch'd by losing that Negotiation.

In this Year a Design was set on foot to erect a College at Chelsea, for a Provost and twenty Fellows, who were to employ their Studies in controversial Learning, especially in the Controversy between Papists and Protestants. The College was built on a Piece of Ground call'd Thame-Shot, containing about six Acres, then in Possession of Charles Howard Earl of Nottingham, who sold it for a Reserv'd Rent of 7 l. 10 s. a Year. The King laid the first Stone, and gave all the Timber requisite for the Building, which was fetch'd out of Windsor-Forest. His Majesty also named the first Provost and Fellows; and the Parliament pass'd an Act to enable them to dig a Trench out of the River Lee, to erect Engines, Water-Works, &c. to furnish the City of London and Suburbs with Water, the Revenue of which was to be for their perpetual Sustentation. There was a Brief for a Collection in all the Parishes of England to carry on the Work, and Dr. Matthew Sutcliffe Dean of Exeter gave 300 l. a Year, and 4000 l. in Money to endow it, which he rais'd by Contributions. Others also contributed largely to this Foundation, yet not sufficient

The best Reason that is given for the Obstructions this Design met with, is in Fuller, The Patriots in Parliament suspected that this College would be too much Courtier; and tho' they consented to an Act in its Favour, they retarded Peoples Charities when they return'd into their Countries by their private Instructions: And truly when we consider how forward the Clergy were to advance the Authority Royal above the Laws, the Gentlemen of England might well be jealous of a Society set apart to preach and write in a manner as the King would have them; or, what was still worse, as Bancroft, the main Instrument in this Matter, should inspire them. Fuller adds, They conceiv'd this Foundation superfluous, to keep Men to confute Popish Opinions by Writings, whilst the Maintainers of them were every where conniv'd at and countenanc'd, and the Penal Laws not put in any effectual Execution against them. Thus do we see that his Majesty's consummate Wisdom and Care of the Protestant Religion, lay under Suspicion in those very Instances where he intended they should be most conspicuous. This College fell into Confusion even in its Infancy, and at last was so entirely dissolv'd, that in the Provostship of Dr. Daniel Featly, the third Provost, a good Part of the Estate with which it was endow'd by Dr. Sutcliff, was decreed back by the Lord-Keeper Coventry, to Mr. Halce, Sutcliff's Heir general; and the Lord Munson, who marry'd the Countess Dowager of Nottingham, on whom the Site of the College was settled for Life, sued for it, and 40 Years after recover'd it. He sold it to Duke Hamilton, by whose Delinquency it fell to the State, and consequently to the Crown, and is now the Spot on which stands the Royal Hospital of Invalids, the most magnificent and beautiful of any in Europe.

Now it was that the East-India Company got their Patent to be renew'd and enlarg'd. They built a great Merchant-Ship of 1200 Ton, call'd the Trade's-Increase. The King and Prince Henry went aboard it, and were entertain'd by Sir Thomas Smith Governor of the Company, to whom his Majesty gave a fair Chain of Gold, with a Jewel, in which was his Picture. This Ship was cast away on the Coast of Batavia in her first Voyage. The King himself built also a very large Ship, the largest that had till then been seen in England. As poor as these Events are, they are far from being the poorest in the Composition of King James's History.

There were at this Time three Courts kept with the utmost Splendor, and at an immense Charge; the King's at Whitehall, the Queen's at Somerset-House, which she fain would have had to be call'd Denmark-House, the Prince's at St. James's. The latter was so frequented by the most noble Youth, that it appear'd always as full, but more gay than the King's.

A.D. 1611. His Majesty was never without a Favourite, whom he was wont to caress and fondle in a manner which gave Offence to the most religious and chaste of his Attendants. Sir Edward Peyton says, He would tumble and kiss them as a Mistress. The Earl of Montgomery, younger Brother to the Earl of Pembroke, was the first English Man who was in special Favour with him; as it is said his elder Brother the Earl of Pembroke was with the Queen. He made Montgomery Knight of the Garter, and 'tis thought he might have got much more by the Affection the King had for him, if he had more minded his Majesty's Pleasures, and his own less. Hay Earl of Carlisle took Advantage of Montgomery's Negligence, and supply'd his Place always when he was wanting: However, the King never shook off Montgomery, but to his Death gave him as many Marks of his Good-will as the Earl seem'd to desire.

It is a general Opinion, that the Scots gather'd in the Harvest of his Majesty's Bounty, and that the English had only the Gleanings; which however is so far from Truth, that three or four English Peculators in this Reign, got more than the whole Scots Nation, excepting the Earl of Dunbar, who in nine Years time did not receive above 20000 Pounds in ready Money. The Earl of Montgomery, and the Earl of Dunbar, were both forced to give way this Year to a new Favourite Robert Car a young Scots Gentleman, who came into England with the King as one of his Pages; but when, according to the Custom of the English Court, Footmen were appointed to walk by the King's Coach instead of Pages, Robert Car went to travel, and liv'd some Years in France, where he acquir'd that Elegance of Breeding, which had a particular Charm with King James. Mr. Wilson says he was a Man of no Parts nor Birth; in which he injures him, for he was of as ancient a Family in Scotland as most in that Kingdom, and his Father had so eminently serv'd the Crown, that when, in the Catastrophe of his Fortune, he apply'd to his Majesty for Relief, he makes use of his Father's Services as an Argument to plead for him. As his Parts were not the most extensive, so neither were they contemptible for his Age, being scarce twenty Years old when the King took him first into Favour upon this Occasion. On the Coronation-Day, there was a Tournament to be at the Tiltyard, and Mr. Car riding in with Sir John Preston, Lord Dingwall, his Horse fell with him, and broke his Leg. He was immediately carry'd to Mr. Rider's House at Charing-Cross; and the King being inform'd of the Accident, went thither to visit him as soon as the Tilting was over. Pity has a very easy Passage to Love. Mr. Car's Youth, Beauty, soft Temper, and engaging Air, so won the Heart of the King, that he continu'd to visit him daily, and took all Care for his Recovery, which was retarded by the great Number of People of Quality, who, following the King's Example, crowded to see him, and make their court to him. His Majesty commanded a Restraint upon those Visits, that he might not spend his Spirits. He was no sooner well, than he appear'd at Whitehall, as it were, in the Arms of the King, and all the Courtiers ador'd this Rising-Sun, who was knighted and made Gentleman of the Bedchamber. His Majesty himself instructed him in the Latin Tongue, which he attain'd so perfectly as to write the King's Dispatches in it. His good Fortune was the less envy'd, for that he shew'd more Kindness to the English than to his own Countrymen, having no Friends nor Servants but were English. The Earl of Dunbar dying soon after, Sir Robert Car was made Lord High-Treasurer of Scotland. This Staff was follow'd by the Garter of England, with the Title of Baron of Branspeth and Viscount Rochester; Charles Duke of York, and the Earl of Arundel, being at the same time invest'd with that most noble Order to do the Favourite the more Honour. The King complains of Vorstius's Book.

It was in this Year that King James met with a Book of Conradus Vorstius, Professor of Divinity at Leyden, intitl'd Exegetis Apologetica, and dedicated to the States. His Majesty wou'd not lose this Opportunity to shew his Skill in Divinity; and having read that Book, he dispatch'd his Commands to Sir Ralph Winwood his Ambassador at the Hague, to complain to the States-General of certain blasphemous Tenents and atheistical Notions which he had discover'd in it; and to desire that he might not be elect'd Divinity Reader in the Univerfity of Leyden. It seems Vorstius had publickly recanted his sceptical Opinions, and had been a Professor fifteen Years in the County of Tecklenburgh in Germany, which first threw off the Papal Yoke in the Empire. He was recommended by the Landgrave of Hesse; and the States wrote to the King, that the Univerfity of Leyden had sent for him out of his own Country by that Prince's Recommendation. Prince Maurice also seconded the States Letter, and Vorstius was advanc'd to the Professor's Chair, notwithstanding his Majesty threaten'd to separate from the Union with the Dutch Protestant Churches if he was chosen. Sir Ralph Winwood deliver'd to the States-General a Memorial against the Election of Vorstius; which having no more Effect than his other Negotiations, he made a solemn Protestation, which clos'd thus: His Majesty is so sensible of the Violation of his Alliance with them, that if Reparation be not speedily made, he will further declare it in Print; which accordingly he did, and fell upon Vorstius's Books, with as much Success as he had fall'n upon Bellarmino. The Professor kept his Chair to his Death, which happen'd not long after. Men of Sense thought this unequal Controversy below the Majesty of a Monarch; and had it succeeded better, 'twou'd have been but a poor Triumph for the King of Great-Britain to have been too hard for a German Pedant.

Wightman burnt.

And Legat

P. 62.

King James came off more gloriously in an Affair of the like Nature in England; for one Edward Wightman having broach'd erroneous Doctrine in Warwickshire and other Places, he was prosecuted by Neile Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, who was afterwards question'd in Parliament, and canonically condemn'd by him. Upon which the King issu'd his Warrant to the Sheriff of Litchfield to burn Wightman in that City, which was executed. About the same Time Dr. King Bishop of London, prosecuted one Bartholomew Legat in like manner, and condemn'd him according to the Canons of Holy Church: Upon which a like Warrant was directed by the King to the Sheriffs of London, Sir Edward Barkham and John Smith Esq; to burn Legat in Smithfield, and he was burnt accordingly. Fuller tells us, He was excellently skill'd in Scripture, and his Conversation very unblameable. How preposterous, how monstrous does it seem for a Prince, whose Conversation was very blameable, to put a Man to Death for a Principle only, which he himself had often discours'd with him about? Legat deny'd the Divinity of our Saviour in the Terms of the Athanasian and other Creeds. When he was brought before Bishop King and his Brethren in the Consistory of St. Paul's, he disown'd their Authority, which, tho' a heinous Crime, did not deserve Burning. He continu'd firm in his Opinions, and his Death was not so well taken by the People, as to induce the King to let the Bishops make more such Examples. He prefer'd, A.D. 1611. says Fuller, that Hereticks hereafter, tho' condemn'd, should silently and privately waste themselves away in Prison, rather than to amuse others with the Solemnity of a publick Execution. Thomas Sutton's Hospital may be thought too particular an Event for a General History; yet the general Good that has accrue'd by it to Persons of all Ranks in this Kingdom, renders it worthy our Remembrance. This Gentleman Thomas Sutton Esq; was in his younger Years a Soldier; he afterwards turn'd Merchant, and the Tradition is, that he found in the Hold of a Pyrate Ship purchas'd by him, a prodigious Sum of Money, which by Usury produc'd that vast Treasure which enabled him to endow his Hospital with twenty Manors, to the Value of 8000 l. a Year, besides 13000 l. which he paid the Earl of Suffolk for the Charter-house, and 10000 l. he laid out in Building. His Foundation was for 80 decay'd Gentlemen, Soldiers and Merchants, and 40 Boys; in whose School has been bred some of the most eminent Wits and Scholars of our Age. The Founder dy'd the 12th Day of December 1611, which is an Anniversary Festival at the Charter-house.

Sutton's Hospital.

This Year, tho' Wilson and after him Echard places it in the Year 1614, was the Order of Knights Baronets establish'd. The Pretence was to raise Money to maintain Forces in the Province of Ulster in Ireland. Every Gentleman who purchas'd this Honour, paid down 1095 Pounds in three yearly Payments, for the Maintenance of thirty Foot Soldiers; and it has been customary for those Knights who have since been admitted into this Order by the King's Favour without Money, to have a Receipt endors'd on their Patent for the above-mention'd Sum, to be appropriated to the same Uses; and for Want of such Endorsement, King Charles II. in Resentment of some Misbehaviour, as 'twas term'd, of certain Baronets, compell'd them to pay the 1095 Pounds, as particularly Sir Thomas Pope Blount of Hertfordshire. Of the first ten Baronets, no less than six Families are now enobled, Sir Richard Molineux Lord Viscount Molineux in Ireland; Sir Thomas Mansel Lord Mansel; Sir Francis Leak Earl of Scarsdale; Sir Thomas Pelham Duke of Newcastle; Sir John St. John Lord St. John; Sir John Savage Earl Rivers. The King promis'd to make but 200, which induc'd many honourable Persons to buy this Knighthood, it being to be hereditary in their Families; and every Knight was to possess Lands to the Value of at least 1000 Pounds a Year; but both the Number and Value of the Knights were soon broke in upon by King Charles I. tho' King James did not exceed 204. These Knights brought him in 200000 Pounds, which enabled him to be so prodigal in his Bounty to the Viscount Rochester, to whom he gave 20000 Pounds at one time, and would have given him another 20000 Pounds, had it not been for Cecil Earl of Salisbury, and Lord-Treasurer, who imputing this Prodigality to his Majesty's not knowing the just Value of so many English Pounds, a twelfth Part of which would make 20000 Pounds Scotch, so order'd the Matter, that the King shou'd pass thro' the Room where the Treasure was laid on four Tables, 5000 Pounds on a Table, to be carry'd thence to Car. His Majesty started at the Sight of so much Money, and ask'd What it was to do? The Treasurer reply'd, 'Tis your Gift to Sir Robert Car: Swounds, Mon, the King's usual Oath, 'tis too much, let 5000 Pounds serve his Turn. His Majesty rais'd Money by selling all Sorts of Honours. A Knight-Bachelor 300 Pounds, an English Baron 10000 Pounds, an English Viscount 15000 Pounds, an English Earl 20000 Pounds. Vast Sums were collected by Compositions for defective Titles and Aflart-Lands, for Prince Henry's Knighthood, and the Princess Elizabeth's Marriage, by Benevolences, Privy-Seals never repaid, Sales of Mannors, hang'd.

The Execution of the Lord Sanquir, a Scots
Peer, for the Murder of John Turner a Fencing-Master, is recorded as a transcendent Act of Justice; and we will not lessen the Merit of it, by imagining that the Insolence of the Scots, which was then a crying Grievance, contributed to the fulfilling of it on the Person of this Lord who was hang'd. Sanquir was at Turner's Fencing-School
some Years before, and valuing himself on his own Skill thought to put an Affront on Turner's. The latter parry'd so dextrously with the Baron, that he push'd out one of his Eyes. The Lord Sanquir being some time after at the Court of France, King
Henry IV. ask'd him, How he lost his Eye? The Baron reply'd, 'Twas done by a Sword. And does the Man live who did it? said the King. Which so awaken'd the Lord Sanquir's Revenge, that coming to England, himself, one Gray and Carlisle, two of his Countrymen, went to Turner's House in Blackfriars, and with Pistols shot him dead.
They were all three taken, try'd, condemn'd, and executed; the Lord Sanquir at Westminster-Hall Gate, and the others at Tyburn. One Ramsay, a Scotsman, had lately switch'd the Earl of Montgo- merie at a Horse-race, and he tamely bore it, tho' he was much intreated to resent the Affront by the English who were then in Company. Sander- son assures us, Montgomery by his Tameness lost the Favour of King James, who, says he, hated a Coward. Which are both false: the King did not hate a Coward, nor did Montgomery lose his Favour.

Car's
Friendship
to Overbu- ry.

We have mention'd the great Friendship and Intimacy between Sir Robert Car, now Viscount Rockefester, and Sir Thomas Overbury; for he had now receiv'd the Honour of Knighthood, and was look'd upon as a Man who cou'd do any thing at Court by means of his Friend Car. Accordingly Addresses were made to him by Men of much superior Condition; and the most Noble and Powerful thought they cou'd not make a better
Use of their Interest than by obliging Sir Thomas
Overbury. His Father, Nicholas Overbury, Esq; was made a Judge in Wales, and himself was offer'd a Post of Honour and Profit; which he slighted, as having Aims higher than any of those Offers, his Friendship with Rockefester making him in a manner Master of all the Places the King had to dispose of. The Earl of Salisbury to strengthen his Family had made an Alliance with the House of Suffolk, by marrying his eldest Son the Lord
Cranburn to the Lady Catharine Howard, eldest Daughter to the Earl of Suffolk. The youngest Daughter, Lady Frances Howard, was about thirteen Years of Age, and Salisbury to ingratiate himself with the young Earl of Effex, then almost fourteen Years old, to whose Father he had been a fatal Enemy, negotiated a Match between him and the Lady Frances; which was accomplish'd, and the Earl went to travel, till both himself and his Countess were of a mature Age to consummate their Nuptials. The young Lady was in her Bloom, and her Beauty attract'd the Eyes of all the Youth of the Court. It made an Impression on the Heart of Prince Henry: but she was too fond of making Conquests, to preserve that glorious one. A.D. 1612.

The Countess, who was under the Influence of her Mother, appear'd in all her Charms to captivate the Favourite Rockefester, by whose Interest she and her Family flatter'd themselves they shou'd reap more solid Advantages than by a Dream of being belov'd by the Prince; who observing she met Rockefester in his Approaches to her, bestow'd on the Lady a Portion of the Contempt he had conceiv'd for her Lover. As he was once dancing with the Ladies, the young Countess letting her Glove fall, it was taken up and presented to him by a Courtier, who thought it wou'd have been an agreeable Present; but the Prince refus'd it, saying, I will not have what another has stretch'd.
The Earl of Effex was three or four Years upon his Travels, and then return'd with impatient Desire to possess that Beauty which was his own by the Laws of God and Man. He found her so little inclin'd to receive his Love, that she industri-ously avoided him, as one resolv'd to be for ever a Stranger to his Bed. The injur'd Lord took it for a maiden Shame, which wou'd wear off with Time; but his Impatience thinking every Minute an Age till she knew the Duty of a Wife, he apply'd to her Father the Earl of Suffolk, who was not acquainted with her Undutifulness, and desir'd him to reduce his Daughter to conjugal Obedience, he having no Distrust of his Ability or Vigor in the Performance of the Duty of a Husband. The Earl of Suffolk oblig'd the Countess of Effex to cohabit with him; who soon after their Cohabitation was seiz'd with a Distemper of a poisonous Nature, which brought him so near the Grave, that it had like to have been his Marriage-Bed. This Poison was suppos'd to be given him by Procurement of the Countess, it having a Quality which disabled him in the Enjoyment of her, that she might reserve herself entirely for the Viscount Rockefester, now Earl of Somerset. Her wicked Counsellor and Assistant was one Mrs. Turner, a Doctor of Physick's Widow, who carry'd her to one Dr.
Foreman, a pretended Conjurer, who by waxen Images, Philters and Drugs promis'd to captivate and invigorate Somerset, and at the same time debilitate Effex. But in the midst of all her wanton Hopes, she is flung into the deepest Despair by being carry'd down to Chartley Castle in Stafford- shire, where it was thought she might be wean'd from the Follies of the Town, and reconcil'd to a very fond and a very faithful Husband; which had a contrary Effect. Chartley was 100 Miles from her Happiness. 'Twas in the pleasantest Season of the Year; yet she shut herself up in her Chamber, and liv'd in perpetual Darknes. She never stirr'd out of it but in the Dead of Night; and her Behaviour to her Husband was such as might make him as weary of her as she was of him; yet he bore all her Sights without murmuring for some Months; but at last his Patience was quite worn out, and he wou'd break out into a little Passion; which she presently represented to her Father and Uncle the Earl of Northampton, as an intolerable Sowreness of Temper, which made her Life a Burthen to her, and render'd her the most unhappy of Women. Her wicked Confidants furnish'd her with Compositions to make her Husband impotent; and when the Effects shew'd their Power, she seem'd ready to admit of his Embraces; but as soon as by Absence he recover'd Spirits, she grew refractory, and wou'd not suffer him to enjoy her. Thus did they live together for some time; he in the Torment of slighted Love, and she in the Rage of adulterous Lust: In which sad State we must a while leave them to continue our History.

Many Noblemen, and especially Bishops, assisted at this Ceremony. Her having been a bigotted Papist, an inveterate Enemy to the belov'd Queen Elizabeth, a marry'd Wife to the Murtherer of her Husband, and a contracted Wife to another in the Life-time of that Murtherer, her dying without any Signs of Contrition for so many enormous Crimes, were of no Weight with these Prelates against her being Mother to the King, who had by Inspiration pleaded their Cause so stoutly at Hampton-Court.

Shirley the Persian Ambassador.

On the 26th of June arriv'd at London Sir Robert Shirley, Ambassador from the King of Persia to King James. There were three Brothers, Sons of Sir Thomas Shirley of Wiston in Suffex, who were all three knighted, as Sir Thomas Shirley, Sir Anthony Shirley, and this Sir Robert Shirley. The elder Brother Sir Thomas was the last of the three who put themselves upon Adventures in foreign Parts. The second Brother Sir Anthony Shirley went first, and serv'd with Sir Philip Sidney in the Low Countries. He was knighted by the Earl of Essex in Ireland, made a Voyage to America, enter'd into the Service of the King of Spain, who gave him a considerable Command in his Fleet; and King James recalling him, he disobey'd his Mandate, and was number'd among the English Fugitives. He behav'd well in the German Wars, for which the Emperor created him a Count of the Holy Empire. He also travell'd into Persia, and pass'd thro' Russia to the Caspian Sea, which himself wrote an Account of. He liv'd in Spain to a great Age. Sir Robert Shirley was taken into Favour by the King of Persia, who gave him his Niece in Marriage; and that she turn'd Christian, appears by admitting a Son she was deliver'd of in England to be baptiz'd, the Queen being Godmother and Prince Henry Godfather. Sir Thomas Shirley the elder Brother hearing of the Success of his two younger Brothers in their Travels, left his aged Father and a fair Inheritance in Suffex to share with them in the like Honours. But his Fortune was not equal with theirs, and his Voyages only qualify'd him to write a Book of them. The Travels of these three Knights were the Subject of a Comedy, entitul'd, The Travels of three English Brothers, Sir Thomas, Sir Anthony, and Sir Robert Shirley. The latter before he came to England had been sent Ambassador from the King of Persia to Sigismund King of Poland. He staid about a Year in England, and then leaving his Son behind him took shipping with his Lady for Persia. The Grandson of Sir Thomas Shirley was that Dr. Shirley, whose Dispute with Sir John Fogg caus'd a Division between the Two Houses of Parliament in King Charles the Ild's Reign. Archdeacon Echard, who is very fond of Stories of Ghosts, Apparitions, Blazing Stars, and every thing that has the marvellous in it, speaks of these three Brothers, as of Persons whose Adventures were an Ornament to the History of King James, whereas they are to be noted for nothing but their rambling Heads. The Dutch who judg'd soberly of Sir Robert Shirley, look'd upon him as a Tool of the King of Spain's, in whose Court he had made some Stay before he arriv'd in Holland; where he gave out he had a Commission from the King of Persia to treat with the States General about a War with the Turks; but Shirley producing no Letters from the Sophi Schah Abas I. authorising him to enter into a Treaty with them, the States, says Le Clerc, refus'd to give him Audience, suspecting he was suborn'd by the Spaniards, tho' Shirley brought a Wife with him whom he had marry'd in Persia.

We are now coming to the End of a Life, which was the most valuable to the English of any other in the World, that of their darling Prince Henry, whose admirable Qualities, as they endear'd him to all good Englishmen, so they render'd him terrible to their Enemies. He was adorn'd with Wisdom and Piety above his Years, had Strength and Agility of Body equal to any Man, was of an heroick Disposition, and an Hater of Flatterers and Flatteries; which made him reject the Courtship of Rochester with Disdain, not once giving him any Countenance, or admitting him into his Company. We are told as an Instance of his Piety, that being once a Stag-hunting, and the Stag when he was almost spent crossing the Road where a Butcher was travelling with his Dog, the Dog kill'd the Stag, which was so large the Butcher cou'd not carry it off. When the Prince and his Company came up, the latter did what they cou'd to incense him against the Butcher; to whom the Prince mildly reply'd, What if the Butcher's Dog kill'd the Stag, the Butcher cou'd not help it. The Company said, If your Father had been so serv'd, he wou'd have sworn so that no Man cou'd have endur'd it. The Prince answer'd, All the Pleasure in the World is not worth an Oath. If Echard cou'd produce so pious an Expression that came from the Mouths of his Becketts, his Lauds, and his other Saints, we shou'd have a much better Opinion of them than we have at present. This being a tacit Rebuke of the King his Father's prophane swearing, to which he was extremely addicted, was thought to have made ill Blood on the King's Side. The French Ambassador coming once to take his Leave of the Prince, and asking what Service he had to command him to his Master? Tell him, says the Prince, what I am doing. He was then tossing a Pike. 'Twas a generous Saying of his concerning Sir Walter Raleigh, for whom he had a high Esteem, No King but my Father wou'd keep such a Bird in a Cage. His Court was more frequented than his Majesty's, and by another Sort of Men, the most religious and worthy Noblemen and Gentlemen of their Years, agreeable to his own; which the King being often told of, he was heard to say, Will he bury me alive? The Prince, as all generous Minds ever do, abhor'd Persecution for Conscience Sake, and had Compassion for the Puritans, who in Return express'd a grateful Sense of his Favour; and this is one Reason why his Highness's immature Death is not so much suspected of foul Play by the rigid Ecclesiasticks, as by Protestant Writers. Some who knew the Offence the Prince had taken at Rochester, and Rochester's Resentment of it, talk'd hardly of it, as if Car had got him poison'd, being afraid of his martial Spirit, tho' temper'd with as much Virtue as ever dwelt in human Breast. Sir James Elphington observing Prince Henry's Aversion to Car offer'd to kill him; but the Prince reprov'd him with equal Piety and Gallantry, If there was a Cause to justify it I wou'd do it myself. And he said once upon some Offence given him by Rochester, If ever I am King I will not leave one of that Family unpunish'd; meaning the Howards, who were of the Cabal with Rochester, and under Engagements to support one another against all Opposers.

His Highness was not ill above five Days. Some say he was poison'd with a Bunch of Grapes; others, that it was with the Scent of poison'd Gloves. After his Death he was open'd by the King's Command. The Physicians present at the Dissection were Sir Theodore Maybern, Dr. Atkins, Dr. Hammond, Dr. Palmer, Dr. Gifford, and Dr. Butler, who reported that his Liver was pale, the Gall full of Wind, the Spleen black, the Lungs spotted with Corruption, the Midriff blackish, the Head full of Blood and Water, which was given out to clear the Suspicion of Poison; as if, says Wilson, no Venom cou'd produce such Effects. Sir A. W. writes, Prince Henry Death.

Coke, 711

A.D. 1612. Henry dy'd not without vehement Suspicion of Poison; and I wish I cou'd say Suspicion only. Sir Edward Coke, Lord Chief Justice, said on the Bench, God knows what became of that sweet Babe Prince Henry; but I know somewhat. "Surely, says Sir P. 123. "A. W. searching the Cabinets concerning Overbury's Murther, he lighted on some Papers that spake plain in that which was ever whisper'd, which had he gone on in a gentle way wou'd have fall'n in of themselves not to have been prevented; but this Folly of his Tongue stopp'd the Breath of the Discovery of that so foul a Murder, which, I fear, cries still for Vengeance".

P. 27. Sir Edward Peyton: Prince Henry falls mortally sick of a suppos'd Fever, but not without Suspicion of Poison. And as to the Dissection; When he was cut up to be inbalm'd, his Brain was Liver-bu'd and putrify'd; an Argument of Poison as was affirm'd by a most learned Physician Dr. Butler of Cambridge. Welwood judging by the Opinion of Mayerne and the other Doctors is doubtful in this Matter, but owns it was the general Rumour at that time that this Prince was poison'd; and adds, P. 20. "Whatever was in it, there is yet in Print a Sermon preach'd at St. James's upon the Dissolution of his Family, which boldly insinuated some such thing. And also Sir Francis Bacon, Lord Chancellor of England, in his Speech at the Trial of the Earl of Somerset, had some Reflections upon the Intimacy of that Lord with Sir Thomas Overbury, which seem to point that way, in so much that there were several Expressions left out of the printed Copy that were in the Speech". Bishop Burnet writes thus of it: Colonel Titus assur'd me, that he had it from King Charles the First's own Mouth; He was well assur'd he was poison'd by the Earl of Somerset's Means. Whether his Aversion to Popery hasten'd his Death or not, I cannot tell. I think this melancholy Incident is the most fairly represented of any thing in Mr. Echard's History; for notwithstanding Prince Henry's Aversion to Popery and Affection to the Puritans, he seems to allow the Suspicion of his being poison'd to be just.

The Death of this hopeful Prince made the whole Kingdom but as one House of Mourning, Whitehall the King his Father's Court only excepted. Never was Grief so sincere and so general, tho' his Majesty, according to Wilson, commanded that no body shou'd come near him in Mourning. His Highness dy'd the 6th of November, and was carry'd in a Hearse to Westminster the 7th of December, the Pomp of the Funeral being fully compleated by the People's Tears and Lamentations.

P. 63. Vassor informs us, that France was not sorry to hear of Prince Henry's Death; he seeming rather to have the Inclinations of the antient English Kings, than of the Kings of the Scottish Race. Thus we see how happy Foreigners thought us in the Government of the Royal House we are writing of. Vassor again: One can but very badly interpret the Sentiments which the Prince shew'd, when he heard of the Death of Henry IV. I have lost, cry'd he, my second Father. The common Opinion is, that young Henry had resolv'd to steal from the English Court, and go learn the Trade of War in France, as soon as that King march'd at the Head of his Army. Dr. Welwood explains this Matter farther: "I have seen some Papers that make it more than probable; that Prince Henry was not only acquainted with the Secret of Henry IV. but was engag'd in the Design for which his great Army was prepar'd". Vassor again: The Prince of Wales lamented the tragical End of Henry IV. And one of his Courtiers taking that Opportunity to tell him his Death wou'd be a Means to strengthen the King of England's Pretensions to the Crown of France; "Get you gone, you idle Flatterer, reply'd the Prince. Dare you talk to me of ma"king War against an Infant? I am ready to defend him against all who shall venture to attack him". Sentiments so truly heroical, that one cannot think he was inspir'd by King James. The French Author proceeds: "Some said the Father had a mind insensibly to efface the Memory of his Son, who a little before charm'd all England. Instead of taking Pains to discover the Secret of the hasty Death of the Prince, the King heap'd new Favours upon his unworthy Favourite, who was thought to be the Author of it. Shou'd I make a rash Judgment, if I shou'd say that his Majesty look'd upon himself as a Man happily rais'd from the Dead after the Death of his Son, whose Court had for some time been fuller than his own; and his saying, What will they bury me alive, was much reflected on, when the Prince of Wales dy'd a little after". This Prince's Affection to his Sister the Princess Elizabeth was no doubt the warmer for her Zeal for the Protestant Religion; as no doubt the Perverseness of his Brother Charles's Temper, and his early Bigotry caus'd the Coldness that was between them. Osborn tells us, P. 42. Prince Henry wou'd often make him weep; and tell him, he shou'd be a Bishop, a Gown being the fittest to bide his Legs, subject in his Childhood to be crooked.

There was at that time in the Court of England the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, who came to solemnize his Marriage with the fair and pious Princess the Lady Elizabeth, which was set a foot at first by the Encouragement Prince Henry gave it. A Marriage that has been productive of the greatest Blessing that ever happen'd to this Nation, in the Succession of that Princess's Posterity to the Throne of Great Britain, our present Sovereign King George II. being her great Grandson.

The Elector was install'd Knight of the Garter in February, together with the Proxy of Maurice Prince of Orange; and a Week after marry'd to one of the most lovely Princesses in the World. She was led to Church by her Brother Prince Charles and the Earl of Northampton both Bachelors, her Train supported by young Ladies. Her Robes were white, the Emblem of Virgin Innocence; her Hair dishevel'd, hanging down a Length upon her Back. She had a Crown of pure Gold on her Head glittering with the Lustre of Diamonds, and other precious Stones. Her Ladies were all in white, and so adorn'd with Jewels, that in the Imagination of the Spectators they form'd another milky Way. The King gave her in Marriage, Dr. Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury perform'd the Ceremony, and Dr. Montagu Bishop of Bath and Wells preach'd the Wedding Sermon. There appear'd in the enchanting Looks of the Royal Bride some sudden Flashes of Joy; which, says Echard after Wilson, were interpreted to be like Lightning before a Storm, Prefages of her future Misfortunes. She return'd from Church between the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Nottingham, two marry'd Men. The Feastings and Maskings which follow'd are, as Wilson justly observes, fitter to appear in a Prince's Court than in History. But our historical Archdeacon not thinking so justly as Wilson, has enter'd into the Detail of them, to which I refer; and shall only add, that their Highnesses the Bridegroom and Bride were splendidly treated by the City of London, who presented the beauteous Bride with a Chain of Oriental Pearl, by the Hand of the Lord Mayor Sir John Swinnerton. The English Nation in general were so well pleas'd with this Protestant Alliance, that they contributed largely to the Marriage Portion and Expence, notwithstanding the collecting it was a Revival of an old obsolete Custom. The Portion was but 40000*l.* whereas the Profusion in the Marriage Expences amounted to almost 60000*l.* The Charges of the Elector's Installment were 6000*l.* the Wedding Feast 2000*l.* the

Expence

A.D. 1613 the Naval Fight on the Thames 5000 l. &c. Which is another Proof of the little Value the King put upon Money, tho' he made Grants of so many Monopolies to raise it; and they were such Grievances, that he was forc'd to buy back several of them of the Grantees at large Sums of Money to ease Trade and Traders. He paid 6000 l. to the Earl of Dunbar for the Manor of Harrington in Derbyshire, which he had before given him. He paid 1500 l. to Sir Patrick Murray for relinquishing a Grant of Concealments; 18000 l. to Lord Aubigny for relinquishing a Grant of some Lands he had given him; 6000 l. to the Earl of Montgomery for giving up his Grant of Custodies; 2000 l. to the Earl of Dunbar for relinquishing his Grant of Logwood; 20000 l. to Sir Robert Car for the Manor of Shirburn which he had given him; 15000 l. to the Earl of Mar for relinquishing his Grant of the Manors of Minden and Chipley in Suffolk; 21000 l. to Sir William Wade and others, for relinquishing their Grants for Money out of Recufants Estates; 6000 l. to the Lord Sheffield for surrendering his Grant of a Pension; 11000 l. to the Earl of Nottingham for relinquishing his Grant of Wine Licenses; 1300 l. to Sir James Hamilton for surrendering his Grant of Customs in several Ports of Ireland, &c. Thus did this wise Monarch dispose of the Treasure which he compell'd his unwilling Subjects to pay him.

About the latter End of April, the Elector and Electress were convoy'd by the Lord High Admiral the Earl of Nottingham with a Royal Navy to Flushing. They were attended to Heidelberg by the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Arundel, the Viscount Lisle, the Lord Harrington, and several Ladies and Persons of Quality. They were receiv'd in almost every City of Holland, particularly at Amsterdam, with a Magnificence answerable to the Wealth of that City. And met with the like Reception in all the Cities thro' which they pass'd, till they arriv'd at Heidelberg the Elector's Capital, where the Palatine Court exerted themselves to compliment the English Princess and her Train, in a manner suitable to the Honour that was done them by this Alliance. The Lord Harrington dy'd in Germany to the great Grief of the Princess, who had liv'd many Years under his Tutelage.

The Earl of Salisbury surviv'd Prince Henry about six Months, and then gave way to Fate on the Road from Bath to London. He dy'd as little lamented as he had been belov'd; his best Quality being, that he was loth any one shou'd plunder his Master but himself. We have spoken of him more at large in the preceding Pages. His Death put Somerset in the entire Possession of the King's Favour. He took to himself the Office of Secretary of State; tho' he was no more qualify'd for it by his Learning, than what ten or twenty Romances, of which his Library was compos'd, cou'd furnish him with. He receiv'd all Pacquets, and answer'd them himself without acquainting either King or Counsellors; who were doubtless the wisest that cou'd be, by suffering such an unfit Secretary to rule as he list'd.

Effex and his Wife. We left the Countess of Effex in a languishing Condition with her Husband at Chartley; whence she got to London again in a few Months, and enter'd farther still in the criminal Correspondence between her and Car. The Earl of Northampton her Uncle was privy to it, and so was Sir Thomas Overbury; but so far from approving of it, that he wou'd call her Strumpet, and her Mother Bawd; which Language he aggravated with many odious Circumstances to irritate him against her; and when he understood that Rocheſter design'd to marry her, he oppos'd it with his most powerful Arguments, urging to him the Folly as well as Injustice of his marrying a Woman who had been disloyal to a most noble and worthy Husband. Car's Passion made him deaf to his Friend's good Counsel, which

A.D. 1613 instead of weaning him from his Mistress, set him against his Friend; and the Countess being inform'd of Overbury's Endeavour to break off the intended Marriage, she rail'd at him with all the Rage of a lewd Woman interrupted in her Lewdness, and complain'd of him to her Uncle Northampton, who provok'd Car more and more daily, by the false Colours he put upon Overbury's Actions and Discourses, till at last he agreed with the Earl and the Countess to rid themselves of him by Poison. Mrs. Turner, the Countess's Confident, told her, 'twas Pity Overbury shou'd live after he had defam'd so honourable a Lady; and rather than he shou'd not die, she wou'd kill him herself; accordingly she was the Agent to treat with Weston, her late Husband Dr. Turner's Servant, to poison him for 200 Pounds. But the Difficulty was how to come at him; it is therefore resolv'd to get him lodg'd in the Tower, to remove the present Governor Sir William Wade, and in his Place put Sir Jervas Elways, whom they cou'd confide in. To accomplish this, Somerset and Northampton move in Council, that Sir Thomas Overbury might be sent Ambassador to the Archduke in the Netherlands, which Somerset was to dissuade him from accepting, and consequently he wou'd for his Disobedience be immediately sent to the Tower. Somerset found it no hard Matter to gain his Ends upon Overbury, who look'd on the intended Employment as an honourable Exile, to lose him his Interest at Court by Somerset's Means; who, pretending he cou'd not live without his Company, nor serve his Majesty in his Offices without his Advice, encourag'd Overbury flatly to refuse going abroad, and for his Refusal he was sent to the Tower, Somerset incensing the King against him, by representing his Disobedience as a Contempt of his Royal Person and Authority. The Warrant for imprisoning Sir Thomas, did not confine him to a Chamber, but the Earl of Northampton and Car, both of the Privy-Council, wrote to Sir Jervas Elways, Lieutenant of the Tower, to keep him close Prisoner; and Sir Thomas Monson brought him a verbal Message, that he shou'd suffer no Letters, Tokens, or other Things, to be deliver'd to him. Weston is recommended to Sir Thomas Overbury as a very proper Person to attend him in his Confinement. Franklyn was immediately taken into Employment, and having some Knowledge of Drugs and Physick, his Business was to provide the Poison, which Weston was to administer. Mrs. Turner prepar'd the Tarts, Jellies, and other Vehicles, to convey the Venom, the Countess of Effex and Car receiving daily Informations of their Proceedings, and animating them in the diabolical Design by Rewards and Promises. The Countess sent the first Poison in a Glas of Blue Water, which she wrapp'd up in a Paper, and deliver'd to Weston's Son to carry to his Father, who meeting with Sir Jervas Elways as he was carrying it in one Hand, and Sir Thomas Overbury's Supper in the other, Weston ask'd him, Whether he should give it now? The Lieutenant, who was not yet let into the whole Secret, demanded What? Sir, says Weston, do not you know what's to be done? Elways, surpriz'd at the Discourse, sifted the Matter out of him, and then only charg'd him to defer it for that time. The next Day Northampton sent for Sir Jervas, and communicated the Plot to him at large, but cou'd not in two Hours prevail with him to give into it; at last, what with Flattery, and what with Threats, the Lieutenant, who had gone too far to be innocent, and knew too much to be safe, without going farther, bound himself by an Oath of Secrecy, to connive at Weston's and Franklyn's Doings; for which the Earl assur'd him he should receive 1000 Pounds. This is the same Earl, on whose Shoulders, the reverend Historian tells us, King James laid a great Part of the Burden of the State.

A.D. 1613. Sir Jervas Elways returning to the Tower, visited Sir Thomas Overbury, and then wrote a Letter to the Earl, giving him an Account of their Conversation, closing it thus; I see the Event, I desire it may be safely carried; what Service I may do in this, or any thing else, I will be faithful to your Lordship. Weston had now 80 Pounds in Money sent him by the Countess to hasten his Operations, and Mrs. Turner checks him for delaying them: Upon which he furnishes himself with Rosater, White Arsenick, Mercury Sublimate, Cantharides, Red Mercury, and three or four more poisonous Ingredients, which were given Overbury with his Meats and Broths, according as the Poison could be best conceal'd, and as he was advis'd by Franklyn. Tarts and Jellies were sent by Somerset to Sir Thomas Monson, whose Servant Simon Masters carry'd them to Weston, and he administer'd them to Overbury, whose Sauce, Salt, Drink, and whatever he swallow'd, had Poison in it of one kind or another. By this Means he began to grow extreme sickly, but having naturally a strong Constitution, and the Doses being in too small Portions, for their better Concealment, he seem'd to be in a likely way of getting through it, especially when conceiving a Jealousy of foul Play, he demanded to have Physick, and by the Help of a Bribe, got the Assistance of an Apothecary, who order'd him a cold Bath, advis'd him to eat sparingly, and be cautious of his Diet, which alarm'd the Conspirators, and fresh Orders were sent to the Lieutenant, to suffer no Body to have Access to him but Weston and his Accomplices, his own Servants not being admitted to speak with him at a Window. In this solitary languishing Condition, was the poor Gentleman left at the Mercy of Traytors and Murderers; and the Conspirators having Hopes of being soon rid of him, Somerset hastens to the Accomplishment of his wicked Will in the Marriage of the Countess of Essex. There was now no body to check them in their lawless Loves; and they could not be contented with a slight Taste of future Joys, they want a Surfeit of them; and weary of a transient Fruition at Copinger's and other Places of Assignation, to riot in a kind of perpetual Enjoyment by the Liberties of Marriage. To effect this, there must be a Divorce for the Countess, and the shameless Pretence was the Earl of Essex's Impotence, the Countess herself making a Complaint in Form; and her Father the Earl of Suffolk join'd with her in a Petition to the King, to appoint a Court of Delegates to hear and redress her great Grievance. What follows is the most scandalous Part of this Story, which is made important by the Share his Majesty had in it, as that is a Proof of the Piety and Wisdom so much extoll'd by Archdeacon Echard and other Ecclesiastical Writers. A Commission was thereupon granted to Dr. George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. John King Bishop of London, one of the Hampton-Court Conference, Dr. Thomas Bilson Bishop of Winchester, another of them; Dr. Lancelot Andrews Bishop of Ely, another; Dr. Richard Neile Bishop of Conventry and Litchfield, Dr. John Buckeridge Bishop of Rocheſter; Sir Julius Caesar, Sir Thomas Parry, Sir Daniel Dunn, Civilians, to hear and determine this vile Cause. The Lewdness of the Trial exceeds all the Obscenities of Farces and Lampoons; and the Sentence of the Prelates is not to be repeated by the chaste Pen of an Historian. The Earl and the Countess lying in one Bed, Nudus cum Nuda, Inspection of her Body, apt for Copulation, in the pious Sentence of Divorce, are Terms which immediately precede the invoking the Name of Christ, and setting God before their Eyes, Expressions which coming so very close after the Bawdry, have something so very shocking in them, that Posterity would not believe there were four Bishops Names to the Decree of Divorce, was it not extant, and sign'd

by Thomas Bilson Bishop of Winchester, Lancelot Andrews Bishop of Ely, Richard Neile Bishop of Conventry and Litchfield, and John Buckeridge Bishop of Rocheſter. The obscene Decree was founded on the pretended Nullity of the Marriage, the Countess having never been enjoy'd by the Earl, which was certify'd by a Jury of Matrons, the Lady Martha Tyrwhit, the Lady Alice Carew, the Lady Dalison, the Lady Anne Waller, &c. assisted by two Midwives, who reported, that upon Inspection, they found the Lady fitted with Abilities, &c. 'Tis not to be suffer'd in History. In short, they sign'd to it, that she was a Virgin uncorrupted; so very bare-fac'd a Fraud, that there was not a modest Man or Woman in England but was ashamed of it. The Countess's Character renders the Cheat as absurd as it is abominable; and it is no Excuse for the Ladies, that they were impos'd upon by a false Countess one Mrs. Finit, who was then too young to be other than Virgo intacta. The Countess pleaded her maiden Bashfulness as well as Purity, that she might be veil'd when the Ladies made their Inspection; accordingly 'twas order'd she should have a Vail, under which Mrs. Finit easily pass'd for her Ladyship, being also dress'd in the Countess's Cloaths. Sir Anthony Welden assures us he had this Information from Sir W. B. the very Gentleman who handed Mrs. Finit into the Place of Inspection. I will not remember what Welden says of Bishop Neile's Speech concerning the Proof of the Impotency in the Earl, and the Ability in the Countess, only that the Conclusion was; Aristotle's Problems was a modest Discourse to the Bishop's, who appear'd to be better study'd in that than in Divinity. Dr. Bilson Bishop of Winchester, was so zealous for the Divorce and the Nullity of the Earl of Essex's Marriage, on account of his Impotency, that when afterwards King James knighted his Son, he was generally call'd Sir Nullity Bilson. A. Wood assures us, that this Prelate was as reverend a one as ever England bred, and a great Upholder of the Church. And Echard says of Bishop Neile, That for his Merits he pass'd thro' all Degrees and Orders of the Church; which shews us plainly enough, that these Gentlemen do not put Piety and Purity in their Scale of Merit, with the same Weight as Bigotry and false Zeal. The Archbishop of Canterbury refus'd to be concern'd in this Bawdy Business, for which he ever after liv'd in Disgrace, excluded from the Council Table, and the Favour of the King on Earth, tho' he was favour'd by the King of Kings. His Majesty took upon him to convince Abbot, in a Treatise dedicated to the Unbelieving Thomas. The Bishop of London would not agree to the Divorce, and told Bishop Overal, He should not have been so earnest against it, but that he was persuaded in his Conscience the Countess's Witnesses swore falsely. The only Colour of Justice from the Beginning of it to the End, is, That the Earl himself, to get rid of so horrid a Mischief, acknowledg'd he had attempted to enjoy her many Times, but never did; which was imputed to her wicked Practices upon him, and her shunning his Embraces when she believ'd he was capable of Enjoyment. The Earl was oblig'd by the Bishops modest Decree, to pay back the Countess's Portion, being 5000 Pounds, which he could not have done without selling his Lands, had he not been help'd by his Grandmother the Countess of Leicester. That his Majesty was a Well-wisher to the Divorce, and Car's intended Marriage with the Countess of Essex, appears by his heaping more Honours and Riches upon him; for now it was that he made him Earl of Somerset, and giving her to him at the Solemnization of their Nuptials in Presence of the Queen, and a great Confluence of Bishops. The Pomp and Expence of this Wedding, for which the sober Part of the Kingdom had an Abhorrence, were equal to those of the Princess Elizabeth's; the Revellings, Maskings and profuse Entertainments

A.D. 1613. ments lasting as long; and to the Shame of the City, the new marry'd Couple, whom the Archdeacon very gallantly calls the Happy Pair, were invited to a Feast at Merchant-Tailors-Hall, to which they rode as triumphantly, as if their Triumph had not been over Religion and Virtue, Modesty and Chastity.

At the same Time that King James had so great a Hand in this odious Marriage, he busy'd himself also in the religious Controversy now carrying on with Warmth in Holland between the Arminians and their Opponents. Le Clerc tells us, He alter'd his Mind strangely with Respect to the Arminians, depending entirely on such Informations as were given him, which were very various, and a wise Man wou'd therefore not have depended upon them entirely.

A.D. 1614. As soon as Sir Thomas Overbury heard the before-mention'd Marriage was to be to-morrow, he told the Messenger, You had almost as good have said, I must die to-morrow, for I am sure now not to live long. He added to this some Reproaches against Somerſet for using him so ill, and endeavour'd afterwards by Letter to prevail with him to perform his Promise, and procure his Deliverance, which the Earl gave him Hopes of; and Sir Thomas was so well pleas'd with it, that he began to recover Strength, and as Comfort increas'd so did his Health. Weston applying to Mrs. Turner for more Pay, she told him, He must do his Business first, and he shou'd then want nothing; upon which he applies to a certain Apothecary, whom he hir'd to give Sir Thomas Poison in a Clister, which work'd as those Ruffians wou'd have had it, throwing Overbury into a languishing Disease, with racking Pains in his Bowels, of which he dy'd in September; and Weston gave the Apothecary Money to go beyond Sea, himself being amply rewarded by the Countess. To murder Sir Thomas's Fame, as they had murder'd his Person, the Earl of Northampton gave out he dy'd of the venereal Disease, tho' the Sores and Ulcers that appear'd on his Body, were the Effects of the poisonous Meats they had fed him with. Northampton did not long survive this Villany, and one may form a Character of him, by his being a Party in this Murder, by his mocking God and the World in professing the Protestant Religion, and yet corresponding with the Court of Rome, by the gross Flattery with which he abus'd the good Will of the King, and by so many other immoral Acts, that 'tis a wonder the reverend Historian cries him up for his capacious Mind. Sir Anthony Welden, who knew him intimately, says, He was no wise Man; yet the wisest of our Kings made him his prime Minister. Prince Henry was so irritated against him and his Cousin Suffolk, that he often said, If ever he were King, he wou'd not leave one of the Family in a better Condition than that of a Footman. Northampton with all his Faults, was chosen by the University of Cambridge to be their Chancellor, in which Office he was succeeded by the Earl of Suffolk; that learned Body having too great Value for his Majesty's Judgment to doubt the Qualifications of any Man whom the King delighted to honour.

The riotous Expences, and prodigal Bounty of the Court, exhausted the vast Sums which were illegally rais'd by Monopolies, Benevolences, raising the Value of Gold and Silver Coin Two Shillings in the Pound, and a hundred Schemes of Projectors; all which being still too little to supply that Profusion, a Parliament was summon'd, the Court Flatterers having assur'd the King they had Interest enough in the Counties to get such Members chosen, as wou'd do the Business for which he wanted them; instead of which, the Counties, Cities, and Boroughs, return'd those Gentlemen who were most likely to do the Business for which the Country wanted them. The Courtiers shew'd their Wisdom, by suffering Harſnet

Bishop of Chicheſter to put the Parliament out of Humour, by a Sermon he preach'd, pressing the Duty of rendering to Cæſar, as if what was paid to the King, was his Due before it was given by Parliament; and Bishop Neile mended the Matter much, by speaking despitefully of a leading Member of the House of Commons, for his Moderation and Charity to Protestant Dissenters, whom the Superſtition and Rage of such Prelates had driven not only out of the Church, but out of the Kingdom; which was so destructive to the Peace and Trade of the Nation, that the Bishops were forc'd to get a Restraint put upon Peoples removing beyond Sea. Thus they wou'd not let them enjoy Peace at home, nor give them Liberty to seek it abroad. Indeed they were allow'd afterwards to transport themselves to New-England, and the malicious Proceedings of the furious Bishops, did not hinder the Establishment of that Colony. There's no need of reflecting to gather from these Events who were the Men to whom we are to impute all the Discontents and Murmurs which now disturb'd, and afterwards inflam'd the Kingdom. The Parliament complain'd of the King's wasting the Publick Treasure, especially among the Scots; Somerſet, besides Money, having had to the Value of 100000 Pounds in Crown-Lands; and desir'd his Majesty to stem the Current of the future Access of that Nation to his Presence and Bounty. They also enquir'd into the Causes of the unexpected Increase of Popish Recufants since the Gunpowder-Plot; the Detestation of which they thought shou'd have utterly extinguish'd the whole Party, and this they found was owing to his Majesty's admitting Popish Lords into his Council. This is the Prince of whom Echard says, He acted very laudably and with great Reputation in Respect to the establish'd Church. The Parliament complain'd of the silencing of many diligent and watchful Ministers; most laudably done indeed. We read in Sir Edward Peyton, how laudable his Actions were in respect to Religion, and Virtue; "Strictness of Life, "which our Saviour requires, was imputed a Disgrace, and the vainest counted the wisest; so "that it was difficult to hear profitable Sermons. "Preachers were fitter for a Stage than a Pulpit. "A Puritan was stil'd a Devil. Thus began Goodness to dwindle, and Vice to spread far and near." The Parliament made Complaint of several Treaties for the Marriage of the deceas'd Prince Henry, and the present Prince Charles, with the Daughters of Popish Princes, all which dishearten'd the Protestant, and encourag'd the Recufant. The remonstrating these and other Miscarriages, to which the King and his Council had no other Answer, than the Lessons of Neile, Harſnet, and such like Prelates; and the Parliament's Backwardness to part with their Money, so disgust'd his Majesty, that he resolv'd to part with them, and a Dissolution soon follow'd, to the great Grief of the People, which was heighen'd by the arbitrary Proceedings against the chief Patriots in the House of Commons, whom the Archdeacon calls the tumultuous Members, many of whom were thrown into Prison. Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir Henry Yelverton, Sir John Savile, Serjeant Glanville, and Mr. Noy, were popular Members in this King's Reign, and not only frown'd upon but imprison'd. They were all bought off in the next, and those disinterested Patriots who were above Corruption, as Mr. Selden, Sir John Elliot, and others, continu'd their Opposition to the Male-Administration till King Charles the First left the Parliament, and rais'd an Army to maintain it.

The Parliament among other Monopolies, voted Alderman Cockain's Patent for dying and dressing English Cloth, to be a Grievance, upon which the Patent was recall'd and cancell'd. The Imprisonment of the Members of the House of Commons, was the greatest Violation and Invasion of their Copartners in the Government with their Kings. A noble Lord talking once of the Design the Stuart Family had to subvert our happy Constitution, which was first form'd by this King James, observ'd with Indignation, that the Lust of Power was monstrous in him, who was capable of no other Ambition than that of destroying the Rights and Liberties of his Subjects. Charles I. violated the Privileges of Parliament in or after every Session. Like his Father too he had Recourse to odious Methods of extorting Money from the People. King James compell'd them now to pay a Benevolence, and those that refus'd to pay, were to have their Names return'd to the Council, who prick'd them for Sheriffs, or sent them for Soldiers, or otherwise oppress'd them, as a Punishment for their Refractoriness, in not obeying his Majesty's Will and Pleasure, as their Fathers obey'd an Act of Parliament. The Benevolence succeeded so ill, that it brought in no more than 52909 Pounds; for, says Wilson, the most knowing Men supported their Neighbours tottering Resolutions, with assuring them that those Kinds of raising Money were against Law, Reason, and Religion.

This Summer the King of Denmark re-visited his Sister the Queen of England, and he was doubtless the more welcome for his delighting so much in Sporting and Drinking, which he did to Excess. He landed at Yarmouth with about forty Lords and Gentlemen in his Train, and came to Somerset-House, the Queen's Palace, before she heard of his Arrival in England.

Now was reviv'd the dissolute Way of Life which gave great Scandal to religious and virtuous Persons. When this King visited King James, his Brother-in-law some Years before, Sir Edward Peyton assures us the two Monarchs were so drunk at Theobalds, that the Briton was carry'd off in the Arms of his Courtiers, and the Dane was very rude with the Countess of Nottingham. King James was apt to be intoxicated with Wine, the strongest Greek Wines being most grateful to him. Coke tells us, when he was a hunting, he was attended by a special Officer, who was always at hand to fill him a Cup of Wine, so strong that a small Portion of it got up into Coke's Father's Head, and spoil'd his Sport. It is well known that the King of Denmark gave Wallestein, the Emperor's General, many Advantages in the German War, by his Drunkenness and Negligence. How the Time must be spent by two such Princes, who did not meet often, one may easily imagine: But such Happiness, says the reverend Historian, is rare among Kings: For notwithstanding all this Luxury, notwithstanding King James's prophane Swearing even in his usual Conversation, whereby he became contemptible, and his Example debauch'd the Manners of the English Nation; yet he was inspir'd with the Holy Spirit, in his Zeal for Episcopacy, if we may believe Archbishop Whitgift. There is a pleasant Story in Peyton, which runs thus in his own, not very elegant, Words: "Give me leave to repeat, that this King of Denmark ordinarily wou'd be drunk, and once when he was so, he bad Sir John Pooley, then his Servant, ask what he wou'd of him to the Value of half his Kingdom, and he should have it. Sir John finding his Master so beastly out of Tune, demanded a great Pair of Stags Horns, for which, when the King recover'd his Senses, he gave him 3000 Dollars." A Writer of the same Kidney with the Archdeacon, owns he often had his Load; and tho' he staid here but a Fortnight, there were more rioting and revelling during that short Stay in the Court of England, A.D. 1614 than had been known in so little time since the Reign of Canute. A rare Happiness, of which the Puritans were not sensible. Coke writes, "As King James gave himself up to Pleasure, so he did to Favourites and Flatterers, and scarce heard any Thing without the Prelude of Sacred, Peaceful, Wise, Most Learned, &c. These made him careless both of his domestick and foreign Affairs, the Thoughts of which disturb'd his Pleasures; and if at any time he was thoughtful or pen-sive, his Favourites made it their Business to mimic or ridicule those Things, especially the Puritans, whom the King hated; and for that Hatred the Ecclesiasticks dawb their Histories with so much gross Paint, representing him as the most sage and most orthodox Prince in the World. 'Tis true, his Majesty did affect much to shew his Skill in Divinity. No Dutch Theologue cou'd have more of the Cant, nor with more Zeal maintain any Doctrine he espous'd. We have seen how he concern'd himself in the Affair of Vorsius; but his Prejudice against him and his Party did not last long. The most rigid of the Bishops being profess'd Arminians, he was prevail'd with to write a Letter to the States of Holland, to tolerate the Remonstrants, who were the Arminian Party. The Contra-Remonstrants sent him a Memorial, to induce him to abandon the opposite Interest; but the King taking Offence at some strong Expressions in it, sent a Copy of it to the States, who dispatch'd the famous Grotius to give his Majesty fuller Information of what concern'd this Controversy. He was favourably receiv'd by the King and many Bishops, but Dr. Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, gave him as much Opposition as he cou'd, and his Negotiation produc'd no other Effect than a Confirmation of his Majesty's former Exhortation to the States, to forbid further Preaching or Writing upon the controverted Points, which were to be determin'd by a Synod.

The most considerable foreign Transactions this Year relating to King James, was his Envoy's assisting at the Conference at Santheim in Germany, for accommodating Matters between the Elector of Brandenburg and Duke of Newburg about the Succession of Cleves and Juliers; and his Ambassador Carlton's Credit with the Republick of Venice, where, at the Request of Emanuel Duke of Savoy, he procur'd Audience for that Duke's Minister Piscina, which the Senate had till then refus'd.

The Earl of Suffolk being made Lord-Treasurer on the Death of Salisbury, the Earl of Somerset succeeded Suffolk as Lord-Chamberlain, and he and his Father-in-law engros'd the King almost wholly to them, insomuch that the Queen herself seem'd to have the least Share of him. Somerset rul'd without a Rival, and no body pretended to Favour at Court but by his Means, and in what Proportion and what Manner he pleas'd. Having resign'd his Office of Secretary of State, Sir Ralph Winwood, King James's Ambassador in Holland, was recall'd and prefer'd to it, Car still assuming the Management of it as much as if he was still Secretary. Winwood was a Man of Parts, and too much Spirit to brook the Slavery Somerset wou'd have impos'd upon him; and the Queen observing the Secretary's Discontent at Car's Conduct, did what she cou'd to increase it. Winwood acquainted her Majesty with the Favourite's Miscarriages and Weaknesses, and did not give the best Turn to his Words or Actions. This private Correspondence grew at last into a Combination, and the Archbishop of Canterbury, hoping Affairs cou'd not be worse by a Change, enter'd into it with a Resolution to have Somerset outed, and a new Favourite put in his Place; for King James cou'd no more be without a Minion, than his Grandson King Charles cou'd be without a Mistress.

A.D. 1615

A.D. 1615. It continu'd to be whisper'd about every where, that Prince Henry was poison'd by Somerſet, which coming to the Queen's Ear, who was enough provok'd againſt him before, by his alienating the King's Affections from her, and engroſſing them to himſelf, ſhe openly encourag'd Winwood and other Courtiers to talk freely againſt him, in which they were not ſparing, eſpecially when they ſaw the King began to caſt a friendly Eye on Mr. George Villiers, a young Gentleman newly come to Court from his Travels. He was a younger Son of Sir George Villiers of Leiceſterſhire, by his ſecond Wife Mary Beaumont, a Woman of a mean Family, according to Sir Anthony Welden; and Coke tells us, She was entertain'd in Sir George Villiers's Family as a Cook-Maid, but her ragged Habit cou'd not ſhade the beautiful and excellent Frame of her Perſon, which Sir George taking notice of, prevail'd with his Lady to remove her out of the Kitchen into her Chamber. The Earl of Clarendon, or whoever wrote the Hiſtory which has his Name to it, makes Villiers the eldeſt Son of Sir George, by Mary Beaumont; which is not true, for ſhe had an elder Son John Viſcount Purbeck, Son of the ſame Mary. There is ſomething very whimſical in the Vanity of this Set of Men; they will not only be the wiſeſt, the braveſt, the handſomeſt, but they will alſo be the eldeſt, as Buckingham is made to do Honour to the Friend of Laud.

P. 80.

I am ſenſible that to enter into the Particulars of a private Man's Life, is too biographical for a general Hiſtory, but there is no avoiding it in ſuch a Reign as this, where the greateſt Events, ſuch as they are, turn upon the Paſſions and Vices of Minions and Favourites. Sir George Villiers above-mention'd, was of an antient Family, but having ſettled his Eſtate in Jointure on his firſt Wife and their Iſſue, there was ſo little left for his Wife Beaumont and her Children, that George Villiers their Son had but an Allowance of 50, ſome ſay 30 Pounds a Year, even after he came to Court. He was very handſome, and had the Glittering of a French Education, having liv'd ſome Time at Paris. But his higheſt Ambition, when he made his firſt Appearance at Court, was to marry the Daughter of Sir Roger Aſton, who had been King James's Barber in Scotland; and if he cou'd but have made her a Settlement of 80 Pounds a Year, he might have had her to the Ruin of his future Fortune: For before the Marriage was concluded, it was obſerv'd, that the King look'd favourably upon him, which being a Promise of his growing Greatneſs, he gave over all Thoughts of the Match, and wedded himſelf to the Favour of his Maſter. There was no body more instrumental in his Advancement, than good Archbiſhop Abbot, who had an Averſion to Somerſet for his Marriage with the Counteſs of Effex, and a vicious Courſe of Life. The Archbiſhop being inform'd of the Dawn of Favour which ſhone upon Villiers, and taking him to be of an Age and Diſpoſition fit to receive ſuch Impreſſions as the Queen ſhou'd give him, he propos'd to her the recommending him to the King, as a Means to ſet aſide Somerſet, who had behav'd very inſolently towards her Maſteſty. The King affected to have the Queen believe that her Recommendation was the greateſt Merit his Favourites cou'd have, which he pretended to give a Colour to his Fondneſs of them, and that ſhe might not complain of his Affection to Perſons whom he lov'd for her ſake. Her Maſteſty ſaw thro' this thin Diſguiſe, and had been ſo ill uſ'd by Minions, that it was a long time before the Archbiſhop cou'd prevail with her to ſpeak in behalf of Villiers. At laſt ſhe conſented, but told his Grace, You will live to repent it, for I ſee ſomething in this young Man, that will render him more intolerable, if he becomes a Favourite, than any of his Predeceſſors. Somerſet's Pride and Avarice made the Archbiſhop conclude, that let the Change be as bad as it wou'd, it muſt be for the better; and he took upon him A.D. 1615. to inſtruct Villiers himſelf, as to his Conduct towards the King and Queen. The young Gentleman learnt his Leſſons ſo perfectly, that he repeated them to Archbiſhop Abbot, and promis'd to obſerve them.

Sir A. W.

In the Beginning of his Fortune he was affable and courteous, and ſeem'd to court all Men as they courted him. He obtain'd Suits of the King gratis, for which Somerſet made all Suitors pay extremely; and did good Offices for all thoſe from whom he had receiv'd any, which were not a few. The Proſpect of his Riſe having excited ſeveral Perſons of Rank to be aſſiſting towards it; ſome in ſo low a degree as to contribute to his Dreſs, which was equally rich and gorgeous, his Maſteſty's Eye being attracted by ſhew much more than his Judgment was by Genius. Sir A. W. ſays, one ſent to his Mercer and Taylor to put good Cloaths on him; another to his Sempſtreſs for curious Linnen; others took upon them to be his Bravos, and all Hands help'd to piece up the new Minion. The King's firſt gracious Look was follow'd with a Preſent of 1000*l.* and the Place of Cupbearer, that he might be near in Attendance. Somerſet took the alarm, and did his utmoſt to give a Check to the Growth of this riſing Favourite, and gave his Rival great Advantages by his Preſumption, and an Imagination that the King wou'd not, nay durſt not contenance that Rivalſhip, if he appear'd to reſent it. Whatever Reaſon there was for it is uncertain; but ſure it is that his Maſteſty was deſirous that Villiers ſhou'd ſeem to owe his good Fortunes as well to Somerſet as to the Queen; and order'd Sir Humphry May to let Car know Sir George Villiers, newly knighted, wou'd deſire his Protection; which if he granted, it wou'd do himſelf a Pleaſure. Sir George waited on Somerſet half an Hour after, and paid him this Compliment: My Lord, I deſire to be your Servant and Creature, and to take my Court Preferment under your Favour, aſſuring your Lordſhip you ſhall find me as faithful a Servant to you as ever did ſerve you. The Earl turn'd quick upon him with this ſhort Answer, I will have none of your Service, and you ſhall have none of my Favour. I will if I can break your Neck, and of that be confident. This Defiance put Villiers more on his Guard, and he and his Friends never reſted till they had remov'd Somerſet from the King's Prefence for ever; and they met with an Opportunity to do it much ſooner than they expected.

Secretary Winwood in Diſguſt at Somerſet's ingroſſing the Powers and Benefits of his Office, and leaving him an empty Name only, having receiv'd ſome Intimation of Overbury's being poiſon'd, he never left ſearching into that dark Conſpiracy till it came to Light, and diſcover'd it to the King. It is ſaid, Sir Ralph Winwood receiv'd the firſt Information of this wicked Buſineſs from the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who detected it by ſome Papers found in a Trunk, which was brought to him by a Servant of Overbury's. It is alſo ſaid, that one of his Servants petition'd the Lord Chief Juſtice Coke to examine Wefſon as to what he knew of his Maſter's Death, which had been conceal'd near two Years. The Apothecary who fled beyond Sea being ill paid, confeſs'd that a poiſon'd Clifter had been given Overbury; and his Confeſſion being deliver'd to Winwood, he ſhew'd it to the King; which was ſo ſtrong a Confirmation of the other Diſcoveries, that his Maſteſty cou'd not reſuſe giving the Earl up to Juſtice; tho' to prevent its having Effect againſt him, the King had granted him a Pardon ſo full, that had he committed a hundred Murders it wou'd have clear'd him. The Clauſe was taken by Sir Robert Cotton out of a Pardon granted by the Pope to Cardinal Wolfey to this Purport: That the King out of his mere Motion and ſpecial Favour did pardon all, and all

A.D. 1615. all manner of Treasons, Misprisions of Treasons, Murders, Felonies and Outrages whatsoever by the said Robert Earl of Somerset committed, or hereafter to be committed: As the Romish Bulls pardon all Sins past, present, and to come. The strongest Terms were us'd to make it the more firm; and when it was engross'd the Earl carry'd it to the King, who sign'd it; but the Lord Chancellor Ellesmer refus'd to affix the Great Seal to it; and gave his Majesty such Reasons for it as satisfy'd him, and contributed much to the Disgrace of Somerset, who retir'd pensive to Whitehall in dismal Apprehension of the Discovery of Overbury's Murder, which he justly suppos'd was the Occasion of the Lord Chancellor's Scruples about passing his Pardon. By Virtue of his own Warrant as Privy-Counsellor, all Trunks, Chests, Boxes, Studies, and every Place where he suspected any Letters might be deposited which concern'd the Conspiracy, were diligently search'd, that they might be made away with: But some Papers escap'd the Search, and fell into those Hands that knew how to make the best Use of them. The King being inform'd of the Murder by Secretary Winwood, gave Orders to the Lord Chief Justice Coke to prosecute the Matter; and as his Custom was when any troublesome Affair happen'd, went himself into the Country to be out of the Noise of it; which however follow'd him where-ever he went. He sent for all the Judges to Theobalds; and in the midst of a Circle of Court Lords and Gentlemen kneeled down, and spoke to this Effect: My Lords the Judges, It is lately come to my hearing, that you have now in Examination a Business of poisoning. Lord, in what a most miserable Condition shall this Kingdom be, if our Tables shou'd become such a Snare, as none wou'd eat without Danger of Life, and that Italian Custom shou'd be introduc'd amongst us; therefore I charge you, my Lords, as you will answer it at the great and dreadful Day of Judgment, that you examine it strictly without Favour, Affection, or Partiality. And if you shall spare any of this Crime, God's Curse light on you and your Posterity: And if I spare any that are found guilty, God's Curse light on me and my Posterity. How well this agrees with these Words in the Pardon, which he some time after granted to the Countess of Somerset, who was the greatest Criminal: *We have of our special Grace and mere Motion pardon'd, remitted, and remis'd; and by these Presents for our selves, our Heir, and Successors, do pardon, remis, and release Frances Carre late Countess of Somerset, the Slaughter, Killing, Poisoning, Bewitching, Death, Felony, and felonious Murther of Sir Thomas Overbury. The Effect of his Majesty's most dreadful Imprecation fell heavy on the Princess Elizabeth Queen of Bohemia, and her royal Family, as was then particularly observ'd. How visible it was in the Fate of King Charles the First her Brother and his Offspring, needs no farther Observation; and it is impossible to read this Speech and Execration without trembling, whatever Archbishop Whitgift and Archdeacon Echard have been pleas'd to say of King James's Piety. From Theobalds his Majesty went to Royston accompany'd with Somerset, who took his Leave of him there, and never with more seeming Affection than at this time. When he kiss'd his Majesty's Hand, the King hung about his Neck, saying, For God's sake when shall I see thee again. On my Soul, I shall neither eat nor sleep till you come. Then lolling about his Neck he said, For God's sake give thy Lady this Kiss for me; which he repeated at the Stairs-head, at the Middle of the Stairs, and at the Stairs-foot. But the Earl was scarce in the Coach, when his Majesty turn'd about and cry'd, I shall never see his Face more. What a Comedy is this? says Vassor. *Good God! Are Princes, whose high Birth and Station ought to inspire them with noble and sincere Sentiments; I say, Are Princes capable of such a Base- ness; nay, to give it its right Name, of so black a A.D. 1615. Perfidiousness!

The first who was try'd for the Death of Overbury was Richard Weston, who was convicted, condemn'd, and executed; as was also Mrs. Turner. derers pa- Sir Jervas Elways the Lieutenant's Turn was next. nish'd. At his Trial a Letter was produc'd written by the Earl of Northampton to Somerset, so full of Bawdry, that the Lord Chief Justice cou'd not read it. Elways being convicted and condemn'd, was hang'd on Tower-hill. James Frankley was for the same Crime executed at Tyburn. But Sir Thomas Munson's Trial was put off, after he had been arraign'd at Guildhall.

In April the next Year, the Earl of Somerset and his Countess were brought to their Trial. A.D. 1616, The Countess pleaded guilty, but the Earl was try'd by his Peers, convicted, and both of them condemn'd. The great Estate he had heap'd up by the King's Prodigality and his own Parsimony was given to some of the Courtiers. The Earl and Countess liv'd many Years after. The latter dy'd miserably, and the Charms of her Person were so entirely lost, that at her Death it was as loathsome as it had been bewitching in the Bloom of her Youth. They had one Daughter, who marry'd the Earl, afterwards Duke of Bedford. A Lady as distin- MS. guish'd by her Virtue as her Rank; and such Care was taken to conceal from her the odious Character of her Mother, that she had heard nothing of this Story till a Year or two before she dy'd; when a History of those Times happening in her way, she read what concern'd the Countess of Essex's Divorce; upon which she exclaim'd against the Malice and Falshood of the Author, and was persuaded by the Lady who gave me this Information, that no other Writer had ever mention'd it; and it was a Lye invented out of Envy to the Earl of Somerset's Favour and Fortune.

The Whisper of Prince Henry's being poison'd was reviv'd upon the Trial of Somerset, and continu'd as long as this King liv'd; and his giving Car 4000*l.* a Year after he was condemn'd, and keeping Correspondence with him to his dying Day, was not the way to put a stop to it. Sir A. W. p. 22.

Tho' King James wou'd not assist the Prince of Conde and the French Protestants, who offer'd in such Case to prevent the double Marriage between France and Spain; yet the English Ambassador at Venice propos'd a League between his Master and that Republick against the House of Austria: But the Senate, says Vassor, understood very well the Character of King James, and thank'd him with as much Civility as possible, tho' they cou'd not rely on the Promises of a Prince, who cou'd patiently suffer the Archdukes of the Netherlands, in Sight of England, to take Possession of the Dutchies of Cleves and Juliers, in wrong to the Elector of Brandenburg, a Protestant Ally. Doubtless this Negotiation wou'd have been mention'd by Echard, as an illustrious Instance of his Majesty's Wisdom, had it come to his Knowledge. The King undertook the Affair of an Union among Protestants of all Nations, and wrote to the Reform'd Churches of France assembled at Tonneins. He also invited that Eminent Divine Monsieur Du Moulin to his Court, where he was well receiv'd for about three Months, but the Project came to nothing; tho' according to Vassor, it was more becoming his Royal Dignity than to scuffle with Perron and Bellarmine. He adds, 'Tis true King James very seldom took the right Side, or else slightly forsook it whenever he had taken it; and instead of applying himself to pacify the Troubles in the United Provinces, he increas'd them out of a Design to be reveng'd of Barneveldt, whom he hated probably for over-reaching him in the Bargain for the Cautionary Towns. Indeed he hardly ever did any thing considerable for a Protestant or publick Interest abroad; and when Bonniwet the Envoy from the French Protestants desir'd

The King by Sir Thomas Edmunds his Ambassador offer'd his Mediation to accommodate Matters between Lewis the XIIIth and the Prince of Conde; but the French Ministers wou'd not suffer Edmunds to sign the Treaty. This Slur on his Majesty's Mediation was not so inglorious to him, as his delivering up the before-mention'd Cautionary Towns, which Le Clerc places some Years before. Those Cities, Brill, Flushing and Rammekins are look'd upon as the Keys to the three famous Rivers, the Maese, the Scheld, and the Rhine; and were put into the Hands of the English for the Money Q. Elizabeth lent the States, which with the Interest amounted to some Millions. Barneveldt, one of the most able Ministers of that Age, being well inform'd of the low Estate of King James's Exchequer, occasion'd by his prodigal Bounty and extravagant Expences, and of his Favourite's Readiness to take Money, thought the Juncture proper for the States to recover those Towns at a cheaper Rate than the Payment of what they ow'd upon them. Accordingly he set himself at the Head of a pompous Embassy from Holland, and bestow'd his Flattery and Bribes so well, that he obtain'd Restitution of the three Cities for a tenth Part of what was due to the Crown of England. Upon which Vassor writes thus: The English loudly cry'd out against their weak and covetous King, who had sulli'd his own Reputation, as well as disparag'd the whole Nation, by his so shameful a Treaty. They publicly reproach'd him for having been so scandalously put upon by the Dutch, or betray'd by his Favourites and Ministers. Mr. Echard tells us, he freed himself from those Towns to prevent Propositions from Spain, where he was beginning a Treaty by his Ambassador Sir John Digby, to marry his Son Charles Prince of Wales to the Infanta; which Treaty tended visibly to the weakning of the Protestant Interest, and expos'd the King's Honour to the Insolence and Caprice of the Spanish Ministers. The new Favourite rose so fast, that the People had hardly time to remember the Honours that were conferr'd upon him. Not long after he was knighted; the King created him Baron Whaddon, Viscount Villiers, and made him Master of the Horse to the Queen; then Gentleman of his Bedchamber, Privy-Counsellor, and Knight of the Garter. He was soon after created Earl of Buckingham, and made Justice in Eyre, Master of the King's Bench-Office, Steward of Westminster, Constable of Windsor Castle, and Lord High Admiral of England. The Lord Chancellor Ellesmer having incur'd his Displeasure, the Seals were taken from him; and to mortify him the more, Sir Francis Bacon his intended Successor, whom the Lord Chancellor hated, was sent to demand them of him; but the old Chancellor refus'd to deliver the Seals to him, and sent them to the King by a Servant of his own. Sir Edward Coke was discharg'd from his Office of Lord Chief Justice, and Sir Henry Montagu put in his room. Sir Edward Coke had highly disgust'd the Court and the rigid Churchmen, by his opposing Archbishop Bancroft's Articles against granting Prohibitions at Common Law; as also by opposing the Favourite Buckingham in the Disposal of a Law Patent. He might have been restor'd, if he wou'd have given a Bribe; but he answer'd, A Judge ought not to take one, nor give one. The Earl of Suffolk, Lord Treasurer, having lost his main Supporter the Earl of Somerset, stood in a very tottering Condition, till he fell under a Fine of 30000*l.* for his and his Lady's Misdemeanors. Suffolk's White Staff was given first to Sir Henry Montagu, and then to Sir Lionel Cranfield, afterwards Earl of Middlesex: A Man of so mean Birth, that, to use Welden's Words, none but a poor-spirited Nobility wou'd have endur'd his perching on that high Tree of Honour. Sir John Bennet, Judge of the Prerogative Court, was now discharg'd for Bribery, and Sir William Byrde put in his Place. Sir Henry Yelverton, Attorney-General, was also remov'd for adding some Clauses to the Charter of London, and Sir Thomas Coventry made Attorney in his room. His Majesty came in Person into the Court of Star-Chamber, and made a Speech like a Sermon, in which are these most eloquent Expressions: Another Sort are Gentlemen of great Worth in their own Conceit, and cannot be content with the present Form of Government, but must have a Kind of Liberty in the People, and must be gracious Lords and Redeemers of their Liberty; and in every Cause that concerns Prerogative give a Snatch against Monarchy, thro' their Puritanical Itching, after Popularity. The next Words shew us what it was that gave the King such Offence. Some of them have shew'd themselves too bold of late in the Lower House of Parliament. We see here that King James made a Jest of the People's Liberty, and what Opinion he had of the Purity of the Reform'd Religion, appears by his comparing it to the Itch. 'Tis true, he intimates that the Piety and Virtue of the Puritans had made them popular; and it was therefore an Excess of Wisdom in him to frown upon and oppress them in favour of bigotted Ecclesiasticks, who were hated by the People, and careld by him only for advancing the Prerogative above those Laws, which the Patriots in the Lower House of Parliament asserted and endeavour'd to maintain.

About this Time dy'd the Lady Arabella Stuart, Lady Arabella first Cousin to the King, being the Daughter of the Lord Charles Stuart, younger Brother to the Lord Darnley his Majesty's Father. This Lady is the same who was mention'd in Raleigh's Conspiracy; and for marrying Sir William Seymour, afterwards Marquis of Hertford, without the King's Consent, she was imprison'd in the Tower, where she liv'd many Years; and dying there about the Time that Sir Thomas Overbury's Death made the most Noise, Wilson tells us it set Mens Tongues and Fears at Work. These are the Halcyon Days on which the Archdeacon bestows as many Flourishes as his Rhetorick cou'd furnish him with. In these peaceable Times the Temple of Janus was shut, Halcyon Days shin'd round the Island, and the Influence of the King's peaceful Mind had almost an universal Operation. Whereas it was never pretended that this King's Counsels had the least Influence on the Nations around us. Wilson gives another Picture of these Times of Peace even where he spoke of the Halcyon Days. "Nothing now but Bravery and Feasting, the Parents of Debauchery and Riot, flourish'd amongst us. There is no Theme for History where Men spill more Drink than Blood. When Plots and Contrivances for Lust in dark Corners are more practis'd than Stratagems of War; and when the Stages with silken Pageants and Poppers that slacken the Sinews, are more frequented than those Theatres of Honour, where Industry, brawns and hardens the Arms. Peace is a great Blessing, if it bring not a Curse with it; but War is more happy in its Effects than it, especially if it takes away the

A.D. 1617. "Distemper that grows by long Surfeits without "destroying the Body. But since these Buskind
 "Ornaments are wanting, we must imbellish our "Discourses with such Passages as paced up and "down in the Sock of Peace". Instead of these just and natural Reflections, the Archdeacon, whose Function methinks shou'd have inspir'd him with some such Sentiments, extols the King's Care of the Church's Revenues; however, he acknowledges that the Book of Sports, which was publish'd next Year, was an Encroachment on the Sabbath, and gave both King and People more Liberty to profane it. All Ministers who refus'd to read that impious Book in their Churches were impris-on'd and suspended by the High-Commission Court;
 and I do not find any better Reason for this Impiety and Persecution than what Echard gives us:
The King was a great Lover of Sports. Dr. Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, and several other Bishops, strenuously oppos'd the Profanation of the Lord's Day by Authority; and great Numbers of Divines not only refus'd to read the King's Declaration, but preach'd zealously against Sabbath-breaking, tho' warrant'd by his Majesty; whose main Argument was, to prevent the Protestants in Lancashire turning Papists to have the same Privileges of Plays and Pastimes on the Lord's-Day, as the Popish Priests allow'd their Followers. King
James took notice of the Want of these Sunday Sports in his Journey thro' Lancashire to Scotland, where he stay'd about three Months; and at his Return set forth his Declaration for Dancing, Leaping, Vaulting, Shooting, Maygames, Whitsun-Ales, Morrice-Dances, Maypoles on the Sabbath-Day. It is sad to recount, says Dr. Fuller, what Grief and Distraction was occasion'd by this Declaration in many honest Mens Hearts. Sanderfon, as sagacious a Writer as ever wrote for this Profanation of the Lord's-Day, informs us, "That several Counties
 "excell'd in some of these Pastimes; and to en-
 "ertain Community with their Mirth, the Court
 "Progresses took Delight to judge of their Wa-
 "gers in the Journey to Scotland; which the Peo"ple observing, petition'd the King to be merry
 "in Breach of the Law of God, and all Laws Di"vine and Human since the Profession of Chri"stianity". This Book, according to Wilson, was a Trap to catch conscientious Men, whom they cou'd not otherwise with all their Cunning ensnare. He blames the Court Prelates for promoting, as they did, the Dancing-Book. "These and other such "Machinations of the Bishops to maintain their "temporal Greatness, Ease and Plenty, made the "Stones in the Walls of their Palaces moulder a"way, and come to nothing". For it is not to be conceiv'd, what Offence this Sabbath-breaking gave to the People in general, and how it strengthen'd the Puritan Party, who cry'd out against it as a national Sin, which was threaten'd with national Vengeance. Yet the wise King not only commanded the Book of Sports to be publish'd, but affected to give an Example to his Subjects by putting the Lord's-Day to the same Use he enjoin'd by his Book; and it was observ'd, that his Carriages commonly set out on a Sunday, when he remov'd his Court from one Place to another.
 Thus they pass'd thro' London soon after the Declaration was made publick on a Sabbath-Day in Time of Divine Service; and making a very great Clutter and Noise, the Lord-Mayor, Sir George Bolles, commanded them to be stopp'd. The Officers belonging to the Carriages return'd immediately to Court, and complain'd to the King of this Violence; upon which his Majesty in a great Rage swore, he thought there had been no more Kings in England but himself. However, having cool'd upon it a little, he sign'd a Warrant to the Lord Mayor to let them pass; which he obey'd with this Answer, Whilst it was in my Power, I did my Duty; but that being taken away by a higher

Power, it is my Duty to obey: Which being told A.D. 1617.
 the King, he was so touch'd with it, that it is said he sent the Lord Mayor his Thanks for it.

Sir Ralph Winwood, the King's faithful and honest Servant and Secretary, dying, his Majesty made Sir Robert Naunton and Sir George Calvert Secretaries. Sir Robert was a zealous Protestant, and Sir George a Papist of the Spanish Faction, which flourish'd as much as the King's Countenance cou'd make it; and by their Power and Influence the Papists not only grew bold but insolent, making Profelytes daily among the looser Sort of People.

The Earl, now Marquis of Buckingham, having Buckingno Rival in the King's Favour, provided for his ham's Kin-Family as well as himself, and brought a Crowd dred ad-of them from their Country Cots to Court. His vanc'd.

 themselves, and put on a Court Dress and Air.
 The Women Kinsfolk were marry'd to Earls, Earls eldest Sons, Barons or chief Gentlemen of the greatest Estates; nay, the very Kitchen Wenches, according to Welden, were marry'd to Knights el- P. 1354

 "A strange Alteration! The King, who formerly the Earl of Denbigh; his elder Brother John Villiers was made Viscount Purbeck; his younger, Christopher Villiers, Earl of Anglesey. One of his Cousins was marry'd to Sir Anthony Ashley; another to Sir Christopher Perkins. Purbeck marry'd the Lord Chief Justice Coke's Daughter; and the Marquis himself took to Wife one of the fairest, noblest, and richest Heiresses in England, the Lady Catherine, Daughter to Francis Earl of Rutland.

 It is evident, that such a Train cou'd not be supported in such Grandeur and Expence without draining the King's Exchequer; and 'twill not be pretended that it was an Instance of his Majesty's Wisdom to waste the publick Treasure on a numerous, worthless Family, not one of whom had any personal Merit, but the Favourite himself, who look'd well, dress'd well, danc'd well; and that was all. To supply the Profusion of *Bucking-as well as all Honours and Dignities Ecclesiastical and Civil. Welden informs us the Lord Chan- P. 1294

The Catastrophe of Sir Walter Raleigh's Fate
 happen'd about this Time. He had been releas'd out of the Tower two Years before; but his Estate being taken from him, and little or nothing left for his Subsistence, his Wants put him upon a Project to recover his ruin'd Fortunes by an Expedition to America. Authors differ as to the Time and Cause of his Release out of the Tower.
 Some say it was for curing the Queen of a Distemper by a Chymical Preparation; others attribute it to the Merit of his History of the World, which he compiled during his Confinement, and was for many Years the best History of the Kind extant. It was publish'd about three Years before his unfortunate Voyage to Guiana. But the true

Reason

A.D. 1617. Reason of his Enlargement seems to be the Injustice and Scandal of keeping a Man of his Worth longer in Prison, for a Crime which was too ill prov'd to deserve fourteen Years Imprisonment; and the true Reason of his adventuring to America in his old Age, was his Impatience under that Poverty which the Forfeiture of his Estate had reduc'd him to. There is something strangely incompatible in King James's Conduct with respect to this Expedition. He is in perfect Amity with Spain, his Ambassador Digby is treating for a Match between the Infanta and his Son the Prince of Wales, and yet he grants a Commission to Sir Walter Raleigh to seize those Mines which the Catholick King claim'd as his. Sir Walter is in that Commission still'd his beloved and faithful Servant, Dilecto & Fideli, which was incompatible with the Attainder he lay under, and a direct Pardon or a Nullity; for a Man who was dead in Law, cou'd not in common Sense have a Power of Life and Death over other Men, as he had by this Commission. And if it was a Pardon, which it must be, or it was Nonsense, the cutting off his Head afterwards for an obsolete Attainder, was as much a Murder, as the cutting his Throat wou'd have been before he was attainted. This is the plain Fact, and plain Argument, which will not bear further Reflection. 'Tis thought Sir Walter, who had been at Guiana 21 Years before, was deceiv'd himself in the Information he had of Gold Mines there. However, he set up Marks to direct him to them when he came thither again. Captain Keymis, A. M. of Baliol-College Oxon, had been his Companion in the Guiana Voyage A. D. 1595, and brought with him a Piece of Ore, which very much resembled Gold: Sir Walter, who was a great Chymist, made an Experiment of it, and we are told, deceiv'd Keymis by representing it as real Gold, whereas all he meant by it, was to raise Contributions for his intended Voyage, and so repay the Contributors out of the Wealth he got in America, or never see England more. Every one knows the ill Success of this Enterprize, in which many Persons of Condition engag'd, as Sir John Pennington, Sir Warham St. Leger, Sir John Fern, Captain Parker, Captain North, Brother to the Lords North and Mounteagle, Captain Chudleigh of Devonshire, Major Pigor, Captain Thornhurst. The Fleet consisted of about 12 Sail, two of which deserted before they reach'd Guiana, commanded by Captain Whitney and Captain Woollaston. Most of the Officers fell sick, and Sir Walter himself was so weak, that he was carry'd in a Chair. When they arriv'd at Guiana, Captain Keymis was detach'd with five of the smaller Ships, to sail up the River Orenoquo to discover the Mine. He had with him five Companies of Foot commanded by Captain Walter Raleigh, the General's eldest Son, Captain Parker, Captain North, Captain Chudleigh, and Captain Thornhurst. The Marks which had been left for their Direction in the first Voyage, were either worn out or remov'd by the Spaniards, who had rais'd several Fortifications there since the Year 1595; a certain Proof that they claim'd the Country of Guiana, and King James commission'd Sir Walter to invade it by seizing the Mines, at the same Time that Digby was commission'd to conclude a Treaty of the strictest Alliance with the King of Spain, Keymis lost several Men by Shot from those Forts in his Passage up the River. No Mine was to be found, and that the Voyage might turn to some Account, Keymis attack'd St. Thomas, a Spanish Town: Mr. Raleigh, Sir Walter's Son, was kill'd in the Assault, but the Town was taken and plunder'd; a downright Breach of the Peace, and contrary to King James's Command, that they shou'd enter upon no Part of the King of Spain's Dominions, other than the Country where the undiscover'd Mine was, which was as much a Part of the Spanish Dominions as Me- xico and Peru; for the Pope had given the King of Spain all that Continent of America, and he had no better Title to any part of it. The Country where the Mine was said to be, had been described by Sir Walter as exactly as he cou'd; to which Description was added the Number of Ships, the Complement of Men, the Ordnance of every Ship. A Draft of the whole was given to the King, who gave it to Gondemar the Spanish Envoy; and we are told a Copy of it was found by Keymis at St. Thomas, when he took the Town. I do not think this deserves the severe Reflections which are made on it in History: For King James cou'd do no less than satisfy his Brother of Spain, that the Armament was not intended against his Subjects, but was made by Adventurers in quest of Riches, which being not yet discover'd, cou'd be no body's Property. No fair way of arguing, for the Proprietor of any Land, has the Propriety of every Mine within the Bounds of it discover'd or not discover'd. The sacking of St. Thomas, was certainly a Breach of Sir Walter's Promise to the King upon his Allegiance, not to commit offensive Hostilities against the Spaniards; and when Keymis return'd from his Enterprize without News of the Mine, Raleigh was perplex'd to the very Soul, telling him he had un*done him, by wounding his Credit with the King past Recovery, but he might assure himself to have a Share of his Majesty's Displeasure.* Keymis, in great Anxiety, retires to his Cabin, and shot himself with a Pistol. Sir Walter hearing the Noise, ask'd What it was? Answer was made, Captain Keymis has shot off a Pistol in his Cabin to cleanse it: But Keymis's Man entering the Cabin, found his Master weltring in his Blood. The Pistol having a little Bullet, only crack'd the Ribs, which being too slow for his Fury he desperately thrust a Knife in after it up to the Hilt, and expir'd. Sir Walter wou'd have prevail'd with his Followers to sail directly to France, where he was promis'd Protection. But the Majority was for returning home, and accordingly the Fleet first put into Ireland, and then into Plymouth, where Orders were come to seize Sir Walter as soon as he arriv'd, to appease the Spanish Ambassador, who dinn'd the Kings Ears with the Sack of St. Thomas. Sir Lewis Stewkely, Vice-Admiral of Devon, a Kinsman of Raleigh's, apprehended him, and brought him to London the 9th of August in the following Year. Being committed to the Tower, he form'd a Design to escape with the Privy of his Cousin Stewkely, who betray'd him, and receiv'd the Reward of his Villany when he was afterwards hang'd for counterfeiting the Coin. Sir Walter was re-taken on the Thames, examin'd by the Lord-Chancellor and Privy-Council, and warn'd to prepare for Death. On the 28th of October he was convey'd to the King's-Bench Bar in Westminster-Hall, where Sir Henry Montagu Lord-Chief-Justice, demanded of him why Sentence of Death pass'd upon him fifteen Years before, shou'd not be executed. He pleaded his Commission Dilecto & Fideli Waltero Raleigh, and that the King's belov'd and faithful Servant cou'd not be a Traytor. The Court over-ru'd his Plea, the best that cou'd be made in Justice and Reason, and order'd him to be executed the very next Day. It is a very melancholy Consideration, that there have always been found among the Learned in the Law, even the most eminent, such as wou'd sacrifice their Learning and Conscience to the Pleasure of the Prince. The French Ambassador the Baron de Chesne interceded for Sir Walter Raleigh, but his Fate was resolv'd, and his Blood given to Gondemar as the Price of St. Thomas. Had he been try'd for exceeding his Commission, and infringing the Treaty of Peace with Spain, and been found guilty, there wou'd have been a Colour of Justice in cutting off his Head. But unless he cou'd have been punish'd for another Man's Crime, himself knowing nothing of Keymis's Attempt against gainst St. Thomas 'till 'twas done, his Life could not have been taken away on that Account; and to behead him for a Treason which had been laugh'd at for a dozen Years, was the boldest Act of Injustice and Cruelty that ever was committed in a Christian Country, a daring Insult against Law and Humanity. The People wish'd Raleigh's Head on Secretary Cabelet's Shoulders, and clamour'd so much against the Execution of an antiquated Sentence, that King James thought it necessary to publish an Apology, which, says Osborn, according to the Mode of weak and ill-consulted Princes, render'd the Condition of that Proceeding worse in the World's Opinion. The Wisdom of granting the Commission to Sir Walter, and the Justice of taking away his Life for a Crime committed fifteen Years before, if ever it was committed at all, are fit Topics for such Panegyrics as Sanderson and Echard.

Sir Walter Raleigh's Death reviv'd the Treaty of Marriage with the Infanta of Spain, to which King James afterwards sacrific'd the Interests of his only Daughter the Queen of Bohemia and her Royal Family, who were the Care of Providence for the Good of Religion, and the Glory of this Kingdom. It is not deny'd, that a Toleration of Popery was a separate Article of the Marriage Treaty; and how consistent that was with his Majesty's Zeal for the Protestant Church of England, is left to the Reader's Consideration. The Spaniards flatter'd him with Hopes of Two Millions of Gold as the Infanta's Portion; and the King who, as Coke writes, was never poorer, cou'd not resist the Temptation, tho' every reasonable Man in his Kingdom, but himself and his Minions, cou'd see 'twas only a Bait to lead him into Spanish Measures, and promote the Interest of the House of Austria, which in good Policy he shou'd always have oppos'd, as his glorious Predecessor Queen Elizabeth had done. The Head of his Ministry, and in a Manner of his Monarchy, was the Marquis of Buckingham, who indulg'd himself in all Riot and Luxury. His Majesty being so far from discountenancing him in it, that Sir Edward Peyton informs us he encourag'd and assisted him. The Baronet writes thus: "To please this Favourite, the King gave Way to the Duke to entice others to his Will. Two Examples I will recite. First, the King entertain'd Sir James Crofts, and his Daughter, a beautiful Lass, at Newmarket, to sit at Table with the King. This he did then to procure Buckingham the easier to vitiate her. Secondly, Mrs. Dorothy Garway, being a rare Creature, King James carried Buckingham to Culford to have his Will on that Beauty; but Sir Nicholas Bacon's Sons convey'd her out of a Window into a private Chamber, and so disappointed the Duke of his wicked Purpose." Sir Edward Peyton was then at Culford, and assisted the two Bacons in that cleanly Conveyance. He adds, Truly that Day a sober Man was hard to be seen in King, Prince, and Nobles. His Majesty wrote a Letter to the Pope, That there shou'd be a Toleration for Popery, when he had brought his Affairs to his Bent in Great-Britain. The Letter was discover'd by a lucky Chance to the seven Years Parliament, and complain'd of in the Remonstrance to the King, who made the Scottish Secretary own this Act, and affirm it was his, and not the King's, promising him to take him off at last with Advancement, but contrary it occasion'd the Secretary's Ruin. The King and Prince sign'd an Article, that the Pope shou'd be satisfied in his Conscience with respect to the tolerating Papists before he granted the Dispensation. Notwithstanding which, his Majesty appear'd very zealous for suppressing the Arminians in Holland, and restoring Peace to the Protestant Church. The Arminians, as has been receiv'd, were term'd Remonstrants, and the opposite Party Contra-Remonstrants. The former had Barneveldt for their Leader, who out of Hatred to the Prince of Orange, enter'd into Intrigues tending to the Destruction of the Government, for which he lost his Head, and one of his Accomplices, the famous Hugo Grotius, was condemn'd to perpetual Imprisonment, but made his Escape in a Trunk, which his Wife told the Guard was full of Arminian Books, that were to be immediately burnt.

To put an End to this Controversy, the States-General resolv'd to call a national Synod at Dort, and amongst other Princes and States, invited King James to send some Divines to represent the Reformed Church of England, who accordingly appointed Dr. Carlton Bishop of Landaff, Dr. Hall afterwards Bishop of Exeter, Dr. Davenant afterwards Bishop of Sarum, and Dr. Ward Archdeacon of Taunton, to assist at that Synod. Excellent Divines! And had our national Church been always blest with such Fathers, the dreadful Words Schism and Persecution had never been met with in our Histories. One of King James's Injunctions to them was, That they conform themselves to the Confessions of the Neighbour Reformed Churches, and hold good Correspondence with them. How does this agree with Laud's forbidding the Dutch and *Walloon*s to worship God after their own manner, and with the Lord Clarendon's Panegyrick on King Charles II. for refusing to go to the Protestant Church at Charenton in France? The States-General allow'd these four Divines Ten Pounds a Day for their Entertainment; and King James sent after them one Balkanqual a Scottish Divine, but a Hater of the Scottish Church, to represent her. He had a particular Seat erected for him, which Fuller tells us discompos'd the Uniformity of the Building, which was extremely regular before. Dr. Joseph Hall falling sick, return'd to England for Recovery of his Health, and Dr. Thomas Goad Chaplain to Archbishop Abbot, was sent to supply his Place. This Synod having agreed upon a Confession of Faith, known by the Name of the Belgick Confession, the English Divines protested against what related to Discipline, and approv'd of all the doctrinal Points; which shews us, what few of the rural Clergy have not the least Notion of, that the Church of England is the very same with the Church of Holland in Matters of Doctrine; and then I think we need not scruple to conform to her on account of Discipline. The fierce Moutagne, Author of the Appeal, which we shall hereafter have Occasion to speak of, fell furiously upon these reverend English Doctors, for approving any thing which the Dutch Protestants approv'd. The States-General gave them at their Departure a Medal of Gold, and 200 Pounds to bear their Expences back. This Synod condemn'd Arminianism; but tho' it sunk here, it rose again in England, and was cherish'd by the most rigid of the rigorous Churchmen in Opposition to Puritanism, or rather to the Purity of the Christian Religion.

Considering of what poor Materials the History of this Reign consists, we must not omit the Arrival of Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spolato in England. He had been fourteen Years Archbishop of that See in Dalmatia, under the State of Venice, and pretending Conscience, he renounced the Errors of the Church of Rome, and conform'd to that of England about a Year before he arriv'd here. He said the Romish Church was mystical Babylon, the Pope a Nimrod, a Tyrant, Schismatick, Heretick, and even Antichrist himself. It seems he had a Pique against the Pope, Paul V. for making him pay 500 Crowns a Year out of his Bishoprick to a Suffragan, and in a Fury left Italy. He made but a short Stay in the United-Provinces, not liking their Presbyterian Government, too mean for his archiepiscopal Spirit. Coming to England, he was receiv'd by King James with as much Favour as if he had been a real Convert. He soon found out the King's Foible, and flattering him for his Learning and Knowledge

A.D. 1618. in Divinity, obtain'd several rich Presents and profitable Preferments, his Majesty sending him a fair Basen and Bowl of Silver, the Archbishop received it with this Compliment; Misit mihi Rex Magnæ Britannicæ, &c. The King of Great-Britain has sent me a Silver Basen to wash from me the Filth of the Roman Church, and a Silver Cup to mind me to drink the Purity of the Gospel. He was soon after made Dean of Windsor, with the good Parsonage of West-Islesly in Berkshire annex'd to it, and Master of the Savoy; which Benefices he was no sooner possess'd of, than he began to be very vexatious to his Tenants, and intended to question all his Predecessors Leases at the Savoy; but Dr. King Bishop of London, reprimanded him so severely for it, that he dropp'd that Design. Dr. Fuller owns King James was deluded with this Man's false Spirit, which must be taken for another Evidence of Wisdom. Gondemar the Spanish Envoy taking Offence at a Jest the Archbishop made upon him, told King James he was still a Papist in his Heart, and he wou'd prove it. To effect it, he wrote to his Master the King of Spain, to demand de Dominis's Pardon of the Pope, with a Promise of Preferment, and a Cardinal's Cap, if he wou'd sign a Recantation of what he had said and written against the Catholick Church. Spolato readily embrac'd the Motion, and sign'd the Recantation, which was presented him by Gondemar, who carry'd it immediately to the King. His Majesty order'd the Matter to be kept secret, De Dominis being at that very Instant an importunate Petitioner for the Archbishoprick of Tork, vacant, as it was thought, by the suppos'd Death of Matthew, which his Majesty denying him after he was convinc'd of his Falshood, Spolato desir'd leave to depart the Kingdom, and was commanded so to do within twenty Days, and never to return. This Message startled de Dominis, who expected to be courted to stay in England; and when he found the King was in earnest, he made all the Interest he cou'd to be permitted to stay, but all being in vain, he shipp'd himself with Count Swartzenbourg the Imperial Ambassador, and return'd to Flanders, from whence he went to Rome, where he liv'd on a small Pension paid him by Pope Gregory XV. whose Successor Urban VIII. prohibited the Payment of it; and upon Information of some Expressions of his in Praise of the Books he had written against Popery, he was seiz'd and thrown into Prison, where he dy'd, and his Corpse being excommunicated after his Death was burnt in the Field of Flora. Of this Spolato Dr. Fuller writes thus: "He was the first who, professing the Protestant Religion, us'd the Word Puritan to signify the Defenders of Matters of Doctrine in the Church of England. For merely the Word was only taken to denote such as dissented from the Hierarchy in Discipline and Church Government, which now was extended to brand such as were Anti-Arminians in their Judgments. As Spolato first abus'd the Word in this Sense, so we wish he had carried it away with him in his Return to Rome; whereas now, leaving the Word behind him in this extensive Signification, it has since by others been improv'd to asperse the most orthodox in Doctrine, and religious in Conversation." By this we see that the Divines and others, who were persecuted by Land and the Arminian Prelates, were the most orthodox and religious, according to the Testimony of a Divine of our own Church; and how wise and how pious must King James be, to ridicule and hate the most religious and orthodox of his Subjects? Let it be remember'd that the Term Puritan, us'd as a Reproach, was the Invention of this Arch Apostate and Impostor Antonio de Dominis Archbishop of Spolato.

ance of one in Libra for twenty-eight Days together. Echard, who, as has been observ'd, affects every where the marvellous, will have it to prognosticate the Death of Queen Anne, Consort to this King; but doubtless the Swelling which attends Hydropick Distempers, was a much more certain Prognostication of her Majesty's dying of the Dropsy. Her Character is various according to the Ingenuity or Information of the Historians. Read Sir Edward Peyton, pag. 27, 28; and Echard, pag. 395, and you will as soon reconcile two Contraries as their Histories: The latter says she was a peaceable and dutiful Wife, and a virtuous and pious Queen; the former represents her as amorous, luxurious, and the Reverse of Piety and Virtue, inasmuch that she endeavour'd to corrupt her Son the chaste Prince Henry, the Example of whose Life was a tacit constant Rebuke of his Father's and his Mother's. "She so initiated him in the Court of P. 27. "Cupid, as one Night she shut him under Lock "and Key with a beautiful young Lady now dead, "which shew'd her Love to the Sport," &c. I care not to repeat any more of it, and shou'd not have repeated this, but to shew the Reader what sort of Piety the Archdeacon's Book is set out with; for Mary Queen of Scots was also, as he records it, a most virtuous pious Princess.

This Year his Majesty created Robert Sidney Lord Viscount Lisle Earl of Leicester, William Lord Compton Earl of Northampton, William Lord Cavendish Earl of Devonshire, and Robert Lord Rich Earl of Warwick.

About the beginning of the following Year, the Earl of Northumberland was discharg'd out of the Tower, where he had been confin'd ever since the Gunpowder-Plot for harbouring his Cousin Thomas Piercy, one of the Plotters. His Liberty was procur'd him by the Lord Hay Viscount Doncaster, who marry'd his Daughter the Lady Lucy without his Consent. This Lady, was the same who under the Name of the Countess of Carlisle, made the most shining Figure in the Court of King Charles I. as a Beauty, Wit, and even as a Politician. The old Earl wou'd give her nothing, nay, he cou'd hardly be brought to accept of his Liberty from the Hands of a Son-in-law, whom he thought unworthy his Alliance. The Earl valu'd himself on the Antiquity and Nobility of his Family, and hearing that the Favourite Buckingham was drawn about in a Coach and Six Horses, he rode through the City of London in a Coach with Eight Horses, which had never been seen in England before.

Countess of Carlisle.

Now it was that the Troubles in Bohemia involved Germany in a cruel War. The House of Austria had possess'd themselves of that Kingdom, which was elective, and in the Person of Ferdinand Brother to Charles V. made it hereditary under Pretence of Ferdinand's Claim in Right of his Wife Anne Sister to Lewis King of Bohemia and Hungary, who was slain by the Turks in the Battel of Mohatz an hundred Years before. Maximilian the Son of Ferdinand succeeded him, not only as Emperor, but as King of Bohemia and Hungary. His Son and Successor the Emperor Maximilian II. held also both these Kingdoms: The same did his Brother the Emperor Rodolph. The great Power of the House of Austria, render'd all Attempts of the Bohemians to recover their Liberty abortive. Rodolph was a worthy Prince, and granted a Toleration of the Protestant Religion as well to the Austrians as Bohemians; and the latter were so easy under the good Government of Maximilian II. and Rodolph, that they were insensible of the Loss of their Freedom. Rodolph's Brother and Successor Matthias, was a mild but a weak Prince; and the Popish Party prevail'd upon him to surrender his Right to the Kingdom of Bohemia to his Cousin Ferdinand Archduke of Austria, Son of Charles younger Brother to the Emperor Maximilian I. This Archduke Ferdinand had not the least Pre-

A.D. 1619. tence of Right to the Crown of Bohemia, either by Election or Succession, for Anno Wife of Philip III King of Spain, had the hereditary Right, her Mother being the eldest Daughter of Maximilian II. However, Ferdinand was declar'd Successor to Matthias, without Consent of the States of Bohemia, who were enough incens'd before by the Tyranny of the Austrian Governors, under the weak Government of Matthias. They assembled to represent their Grievances to the Emperor, especially those that concern'd Religion, those Governors having shamefully violated the Toleration granted them by Maximilian and Rodolph. The Austrian Ministers, instigated by Jesuits, instead of redressing their Grievances, insulted the principal Senators, and exasperated that Body to such a degree, that they fell upon them, and flung Count Martinitz Slabata the Emperor's Chief Justice, Smefansius one of the Council of State, and Fabricius the Secretary, out of a Window in the Castle of Prague. This daring Act was like drawing the Sword, and the Desperateness of the Action oblig'd them to throw away the Scabbard. The Count de la Tour, a Leading Senator, made a pathetic Speech to the States against the Tyranny of the Austrian Governors, and Ferdinand's Succession. The Citizens of Prague and the Bohemians in general, took Fire after the Example of the Count, and chose a Council of thirty to undertake the Government till they could restore the Constitution, and elect them a King, as most certainly it was their Right to do in opposition to Ferdinand, who not long after succeeded Matthias in the Empire, by the Vote of George Duke of Saxony, who, tho' a Protestant, was prevail'd upon to abandon the Interest of Religion, and declare for one of the most cruel Persecutors the Reformation ever met with. The like did Maurice Duke of Saxony, in the Time of the Emperor Charles V. and how the House of Saxony have behav'd in our own Times, will, in the Case of the Massacre of Thorn, be remember'd with Horror. The Bohemians did not think themselves oblig'd to acknowledge Ferdinand's Election to the Empire, and much less to the Kingdom of Bohemia, for he was not legally their King: He was consequently no legal Elector as King of Bohemia, tho' his Vote was taken as such for himself, and without his own Vote for himself, he could not have carry'd it. The States of Bohemia therefore disclaim'd his Election as invalid, and protested by Oath against his Claim to their Crown.

During these Commotions, King James and his Favourite Buckingham, were in full Peace, and enjoy'd all the Pleasures which usually attend it in a luxurious Court; but that he might not seem to have forgotten the Continent in this Lethargy of State, he sent the Viscount Doncaster to mediate a Reconciliation between the Emperor and the Bohemians, who carrying nothing but good Words and good Cloaths with him, the Effects of his Negotiation were equal to the Substance of it. His Majesty's Mediation was neglected by both Parties, and the Bohemians offer'd their Crown to Charles Duke of Savoy, tho' a Papist, on account of his better Title to it by Heirship, his Mother being a younger Daughter of Maximilian II. King James did his utmost to excite the Duke of Savoy to accept of this Offer, but the Pope and King of Spain dissuaded him from it, and then the States had Recourse to Frederick Elector Palatine, who besides that he was a zealous Protestant, had amass'd great Riches, and could give them the best Assistance of any Prince in the Empire, if King James, the Elector's Father-in-law, would assist him according to his Ability. The Prince of Anhalt, Count de Holoch, and the Baron Done, were most intimate with the Elector Palatine, who did not at first hearken to the Offer of the Crown made him by the Bohemians, who knew too little of King James's

The King neglected abroad.

Temper and Genius, in making the least Dependence on Succours from him. They apply'd to the before-mention'd Lords in a manner that succeeded, and the Elector accepted of the Royal Dignity, without concerting with his Father-in-law, who had a good Pretence to preserve his pacifick Counsels, his Son having so rashly involv'd himself in a difficult and dangerous Affair without his Consent. Baron Done was immediately dispatch'd to England to excuse the Suddenness of the Acceptation, but his Reception was as cold as could be expected from a Prince who dreaded every thing which had the least Look of War, tho' his Majesty's Pretence was, that he would not countenance any People in a Power to dispose of a Kingdom. Archbishop Abbot earnestly solicited him to assist the new King; and not being able to attend the Council himself on account of Sickness, he wrote to Sir Robert Naunton Secretary of State. My humble Advice is, there is no going back, but a countenancing of it against all the World, with ringing of Bells, and making Bonfires in London, so soon as it shall be certain of the Coronation. I am satisfied in my Conscience the Cause is just, God having rejected that proud and bloody Man, who would have made the Kingdom not elective; and when God hath set up the Prince a Mark of Honour to all Christendom, to propagate the Gospel, and protect the Distressed, I dare to do no other, but to follow where God leads. Our striking in will comfort the Bohemians, honour the Palgrave, strengthen the Union, stir up Denmark, &c. He closes his Letter thus: This from my Bed, and when I can stand, I hope to do better Service. Such Sentiments as these were sure to gain him the mortal Hatred of all Enemies to the true reform'd Religion; and one may suspect that such Sentiments as these provok'd the Earl of Clarendon, or his Editors, to say of this Archbishop, He was a Man of no Credit, and totally ignorant of the Constitution of the Church; an Assertion equally bold and false. The Elector was crown'd King of Bohemia at Prague about two Months after. But King James would not suffer Bonfires to be made, nor the Bohemians to be comforted, nor the Palgrave to be honour'd, as that most reverend Father advis'd; and one cannot enough lament the Loss of this Opportunity to establish the Protestant Religion in Germany; for it is plain that a small Assistance would at first have supported the King of Bohemia; 10000 Men, and 100000 Pounds in Money more than he had, would have driven the Austrians out of the Kingdom; and the new King's Success at first would have so encouraged the Protestant Princes and States, that Ferdinand would soon have been oblig'd to give up an imaginary Title for Peace. Had King James committed no other weak and scandalous Act of Government, this alone had been sufficient to have render'd all Eulogy on his Wisdom idle and ridiculous. Instead of Assistance, he sent Embassies. Sir Richard Weston afterwards Lord Treasurer, and Sir Edward Conway afterwards Secretary of State, were his Ambassadors to the Emperor Ferdinand. I have often wonder'd how Men of any Distinction for Parts or Rank, could be got to go on such Errands, which were sure to make them contemptible wherever they came. Ferdinand had proclaim'd the King of Bohemia Traytor, and given his Electoral Dignity to the House of Bavaria, who enjoy it to this Day. The Duke of Saxony undertook to put the Imperial Ban in Execution, and invaded the Bohemian Provinces with an Army of 20000 Men; Forces were immediately rais'd on both Sides, and some English Volunteers permitted to serve under the Prince of Orange, who oppos'd Spinola General of the King of Spain's Army, which invaded the Palatinate. It is not to be question'd but the States General would vigorously have seconded his Majesty's Endeavours to preserve that Electorate for his Son-in-law; and that

A.D. 1620. that Spinola would not have set foot in it, had he not been sure of King James's standing Neuter, and tamely seeing the Ruin of his Daughter, and a numerous Royal Family. Sir Horatio Vere commanded one Regiment only of about 1200 English in the Prince of Orange's Army, and had with him the young Earls of Oxford and Essex his Nephews, Captain Fairfax, afterwards the famous General Fairfax, Sir Gerard Herbert, Captain Burroughs, and several other brave Officers, who distinguished themselves in that Service.

English in the Prince of Orange's Army.

But King James disown'd his Son-in-law's Proceedings by his Agent Cottington in Spain; and the English who serv'd in the Palatinate were look'd upon only as Auxiliaries in the Dutch Army. Spinola was put to it by the Prince of Orange and the Hollanders only, what then would have become of him if a good Body of English Troops had join'd the Dutch? The Prince of Anhalt made head against the Imperial Army in Bohemia; and the Forces on both Sides being pretty near equal, had King James sent or hir'd Troops to have join'd Anhalt, the Battel of Prague could not have ended so fatally. 'Twas fought on the 18th of November, and the Prince of Anhalt and the Bohemians were entirely routed by the Imperialists; and the King and Queen left Prague the next Day, taking little with them of the Treasure which some say the King had been too sparing of, considering his Kingdom, nay his All was at Stake. Anhalt his General made his Peace with the Emperor, and enter'd into his Service. The Spaniards reduc'd all the Electoral Territories, except two or three Towns garrison'd by the English under Vere, Herbert, and Burroughs. The Matter is now left to Negotiation; which is manag'd by King James with as much Resolution as he had exerted in the Conduct of the War. The Truth is, his Majesty was afraid the Court of Spain would break off the Treaty of Marriage, which was still spun out, if he did any thing by War or Negotiation to offend the Emperor. As he dreaded Arms, so he avoided in all Treaties to insist on Articles which might in the least put it to the Hazard. The King of Bohemia's accepting that Crown is allow'd to be a rash Action by all Writers; but the greatest Part of the Rashness consists in his doing it in Despight of King James's unactive pacifick Temper; knowing, as he must know if he knew any thing after having been so nearly ally'd to him almost ten Years, that he lov'd nothing in the World so much as Flattery, Ease and Pleasure, and hated nothing in the World so much as Action and Peril. Gondemar the Spanish Ambassador, to lull him into a yet deeper Sleep, assur'd the King that his Master was in earnest for the Match; and besides the two Millions, would make a Present of the Palatinate to the Prince of Wales at the Marriage, upon which Sir John Digby, who negotiated that Matter in Spain, is made Baron of Shireburn, and Vice-chamberlain to the King. How did People in those Days acquire Honour and Dignities! Digby coming to England, Sir Walter Aston was dispatch'd into Spain to keep the Treaty alive till Digby's Return thither. The Courtiers who were in the Popish Interest, as Arundel, Worcester, Calvert, Weston, and others, made their Court to the King by promoting the Match out of Zeal to that Religion. Buckingham and all his Dependants did the same. The Duke of Lennox and the Marquis of Hamilton were not so active; and the Earl of Pembroke oppos'd it as much he could without hazarding his Majesty's Favour. In the mean time Gondemar was as much of the King's Cabinet Council as any of them, except Buckingham. The Papists were so proud of his Protection, that nothing less than a Toleration was in their Hopes and Expectations. He got Discharges for a Multitude of Jesuits and Priests; and among others for one Baldwin, who was accus'd to have had a Hand in the Gunpowder Plot. He procur'd a Squadron of Men of War to be sent to the Mediterranean under Sir Robert Mansel against the Algerines, who were become too strong for the Spaniards. He bought up Ordnance, and all Sorts of warlike Stores, which he shipp'd for Spain to supply the Spanish Magazines, even while the Arms of Spain were battering the few English that remain'd in the Palatinate. Secretary Naunton taking notice of the Spanish Ambassador's Influence at Court, and his unjustifiable Conduct, was remov'd, and Sir Edward Conway put in his Place. The same whom we heard of in Conjunction with Weston employ'd in the Affair of Bohemia, where these two Ministers could only obtain a Pass for them to return peaceably after the Loss of the Battel of Prague. Conway was so little qualify'd for the Post which was given him, that King James was wont to say, he had a Secretary who could neither write nor read. Naunton was a Man of Learning, Abilities and Honesty, and consequently very unfit to be of this King's Council at this time. His Majesty was probably jealous of Sir Robert Naunton's Learning, affecting to be himself the greatest Professor in his Court. Gondemar knew the Affectation, and never fail'd to compliment him on that Article. The Spaniards Conversation was full of Point and Conceit, which was a way of Wit then much in Vogue. He had some Scholarship, but for the Jest sake would talk false Latin to make the King merry; and when his Majesty laugh'd he would say, You speak like a Pedant, and I like a Gentleman. By such small Subtilties he insinuated himself so far into the King's Affection, that he gain'd his Belief in whatever he said to him, especially relating to the Treaty of Marriage. The Court Ladies partook of his Favours, which consisted more in Presents than Amours; and there was no Lady of any Eminence for Wit or Raillery, whose good Word he did not by that Means engage.

This Year Sir Henry Montague, Lord Chief Justice, bought the Lord High Treasurer's Staff for 30000*l*. which however he did not keep long, for within the Year he was made Baron Kimbolton, Viscount Mandeville, Lord President of the Council, The Treasurer's Staff being given to Sir Lionel Cranfield, who, according to Sir Anthony Welden, had been an Apprentice to a Mechanick in London, and serv'd three broken Citizens. Himself got a small Place in the Custom-House, where he acquir'd some Knowledge of the Revenue, and became a Projector. As such he was entertain'd first by Somerset, and afterwards by Buckingham. Such Sort of Instruments being very necessary to such Sort of Statesmen, who spend the publick Treasure faster than it comes in. Cranfield's chiefest Merit was his marrying a Kinswoman of the Favourite, Anne Brett, Daughter to the Countess of Buckingham's Sister; for otherwise, as Welden tells us, he was nothing but a Pack of Ignorance folder'd together with Impudence. And his Fortune was answerable to his Merit; for tho' he was Lord Treasurer, he did not long hold his Office, being two Years after convicted of Corruption by his Peers with this Censure, *Thou Lionel Earl of Middlesex shalt never sit, or have any Voice in this House of Peers, and shalt pay for a Fine to our Sovereign Lord the King 20000*l. His Posterity had been degraded had it not been for the Votes of the Bishops Bench. Upon which Welden remarks, I verily believe it is one Cause that they will themselves be degraded.

I have mention'd some of Villiers's Amours, and by whom he was befriended in them. Wilmington confirms what Welden said of him, If his Eye could out a wanton Beauty, he had his Setters that could spread his Nets. And one may easily imagine there could not be much Religion there, where was so much Lewdness. What it was in Appearance the rigid Churchmen made their Advantage of,

Lett. 61.

Is it not prodigious, that a Prince who was as wise as the belov'd Son of David, shou'd commit the Reins of Government to a callow Youth of no more Capacity than is sufficient to qualify a modern Beau? A foreign Author writes of him, He was the most stiff and imperious Man in the World, and his Proneness to Love made him a very improper Person for Negotiations. Again; The Design of a War with France was above the Reach of a voluptuous Man, very incapable of managing so great an Affair, as the weak Execution made apparent. The subtil Spaniard Gondemar observing what an ill Choice King James made of his Ministers on account of their Youth, told him in Raillery, He was the wisest and happiest Prince in Christendom to make Privy-Counsellors sage at the Age of twenty one, which his Master the King of Spain cou'd not do till sixty. How fit Buckingham was for an Admiral and General, in both which Stations we shall hereafter find him, appears by this Verse which was in every one's Mouth:

Mars ad Opus Veneris, Martis ad Arma Venus.
In Venus Wars he's Mars, in Mars's Venus.

P. 98.

For an old King, says Coke, he having reign'd in Scotland and England 51 Years, to doat upon a young Favourite scarce of Age, yet younger in Understanding, tho' as old in Vices as any of his Time, and to commit the whole Ship of the Commonwealth both by Sea and Land to such a Phaeton, is a Precedent without any Example. One may see by all King James's Actions, that when he gave himself up to any one of his Favourites, he did it entirely, and the Strength of his Wisdom cou'd put no Restraint upon it. Why is it that Buckingham has so glorious a Character in the Lord Clarendon's History? Did not that grave Chancellor know he was prodigal, voluptuous, rash and inconsiderate? Cou'd those Qualities escape him? No, doubtless; but he had another Quality which aton'd for all his bad ones; he was a Friend to Laud, and favour'd Arminianism and Popery. A Prince under the Influence of such Counsels must needs be a zealous Defender of the Religion and Liberties of his Protestant Subjects. Not only Buckingham, but his Mother had a Hand on the Helm of the State. Few Places were dispos'd of without her Consent. As much Court was made to her as to her Son, and much more than to the King himself. She was an Apostate to Popery, and protected the Romish Jesuits and Jesuitesses, or female Jesuits: of which Order there were no less than 200 English Damsels of good Birth and Quality. The Countess of Buckingham's Favour to the Papists was so notorious, that Gondemar wrote to Spain, there was never more Hope of England's Conversion to Rome than now; for there are more Prayers and Oblations offer'd here to the Mother than to the Son.

Parliament.

The King's Wisdom.

The Projector's Schemes for raising Money having generally fail'd, and the Treasury been a long time empty, there was no way left to supply the Profusion of the King and his Minions, but what they thought the very worst way of all, the Calling a Parliament, who they doubted not wou'd be ready enough to give Money, if they cou'd be made believe his Majesty wou'd employ it for the Recovery of the Palatinate. The People of England had it very much at heart out of Affection to the Queen of Bohemia, whose Zeal for the Protestant Religion had endear'd her and her Royal Family to all good Protestants.

The Parliament met the 13th of January, and King James open'd it with a long Speech, as polite and eloquent as the former Speeches. I shall only repeat a Passage or two, to shew how consummate was the Wisdom which the Earl of Clarendon

Clarendon dwells so much upon. A Parliament is a thing compos'd of a Head and a Body, the Monarch and the two Estates. It was first a Monarchy just as it was among the Jews. After this rate Saul came before the Judges. Then after a Parliament. There are no Parliaments but in Monarchical Governments: for in Venice, the Netherlands, and other free Governments there are none; that is, the Senate of Venice is not call'd a Parliament, the Assembly of the States General of the United Provinces is not call'd an English Parliament, they are only Free Governments. The Advantage of a Monarch to tell them, That hunting after Grievances is the Spirit of the Devil, makes a Parliament a much greater Blessing than the Liberty of a Senate or Diet. In this Speech the King jumbled together the Jesuits and the Puritans. A wise way to open a Session, which he was so much in want of. He told them the Reason he had not to approve of his Son-in-law's Acceptation of the Crown of Bohemia, as not holding with the Jesuits to dispose of Kingdoms, but with the Popish Emperor Ferdinand to make all Opposition Rebellion. He acquainted them with the Expence of the Lord Doucaffer's Embassy, 3500*l.* Whereas Wilson assures us 'twas at least 50000*l.* and the King own'd he had sent the King of Bohemia only 10000*l.* which Sums were not proper to appear together in comparison. The Parliament knew well enough what was meant by Subsidies for Recovery of the Palatinate. That the Favourites were at their Wit's End for Money, and having been the Source of all the Grievances, they resolv'd to proceed upon them in the first place. Several Petitions were deliver'd from Persons imprison'd and ruin'd by Projectors and Informers, who had been active in promoting those illegal Exactions to which the King's Necessities and ill Counsels had driven him. The chief Actors in the great Patents for Inns, Alcoholises, and gold Thread, were Sir Giles Mompeyson and Sir Francis Mitchel, who, according to Wilson, grated the Bones and suck'd out the very Marrow of the People, and whose Oppression was thoroughly ripp'd up and laid open by the House of Commons. The Marquis of Buckingham was known by every one to be at the Head of these Projects, Mompesson being his Creature, and Mitchel brought from the Brothels at Clerkenwell; where, Wilson says, he pick'd up a Livelibood by granting the Whores Licenses, to an Office at Westminster, that he might be near at hand to obey the Commands he receiv'd from Court. The King was sensible Villiers lay under the Imputation of these Grievances: yet in a Speech to the Peers he said, I remember that since the Beginning of this Parliament Buckingham hath told me, he never found such Quiet and Rest as in this Time of Parliament from Projectors and Informers, who at other times miserably vex'd him at all Hours. There was no manner of Disguise in this Application of the King to the Lords in Recommendation of his Minion; but it was a Sort of Insult on their Understandings to commend him for opposing the very thing which they all knew he had promoted; and the Commons were now preparing to call him to Account for that and other Grievances, as appears by a Letter from Sir Anthony Ashley to Buckingham: Cabala. Your Lordship may be most assur'd, that your Adversaries continue their Meetings and Conferences here in Holborn, how to give his Majesty some foul Distaste of you, as making you the only Author of all Grievances and Oppressions whatsoever for your private Ends; and I hope to be able in a few Days to give you good Overture of an uniting Oath taken to this Purpose amongst them. The Parliament however contented themselves with falling upon the Under-workers in the odious Business of Patents. Sir Giles Mompeyson fled the Kingdom, his Escape being facilitated by Buckingham himself. But his Friend and Partner Sir Francis Mitchel met with a Punish-

Willf. 158.

He was degraded of his Knighthood with Ceremonies of Debasement, and sentenc'd to ride thro' the whole City with his Face to the Horse's Tail, and a Paper on his Breast declaring the Foulness of his Crime. After he had been sufficiently expos'd to the Scorn of the Rabble, he was thrown into Finsbury Goal, and good Part of the Money he had got by his wicked Practices was squeez'd out of him by Fine.

L. Chan. Bacon's Fall. About the same time fell the famous Lord Chancellor Bacon, un de plus beaux Genies de Siecle, one of the greatest Genius's of the Age, according to a French Critick, who quotes a witty Saying of his which shew'd his Disposition; Money is like Dung, good for nothing till 'tis spread; and truly he spread it abroad so lavishly, that having no Heap left for himself, he to support his Profusion suffer'd his Servants and Officers to set many things to Sale, which were inconsistent with the Integrity of a Judge; and the Charge of Bribery and Corruption was but too fully prov'd against him. Wilson writes, that what he rak'd in and strew'd for one way, he scatter'd and threw abroad another; for his Servants being young, prodigal and expensive Touths, his Treasure was their common Store, which they took without Stint, &c. He lost his Peerage and the Seal; and it was debated whether he shou'd carry the Title of Viscount St. Albans to his Grave; which he did. When his Fine was in Debate, a Member of Parliament mov'd it might be 40 s. only; for if more he cou'd not pay it. But whatever his Fine had been, Buckingham, who advanc'd him, cou'd easily have got it off.

Full. 88. His Successor in the Chancery was Dr. John Williams then Dean of Westminster, soon after made Bishop of Lincoln, with a Promise from Villiers of a better Bishoprick when it fell. Welden tells us his Promotion was owing to the Hopes which Buckingham's Mother had of marrying him. But the Lord-Keeper Williams thought otherwise of that Marriage than did Dr. Williams Dean of Westminster, which, says the same Author, was the Cause of his Downfall. The same Author informs us, that the late Chancellor Bacon had been degraded, if it had not been for the Bishops Votes. He adds, "St. Albans was so very a Slave to Buckingham, and all that Family, that he durst not deny the Command of the meanest of the Kindred, nor oppose any thing. By this you see a base Spirit is ever most concomitant with the proudest Mind; and surely never so many Parts, and so base and abject a Spirit, dwelt together in one earthen Cottage, as in this Man. I shall not remember his Baseness, being out of his Place, of pinning himself, for very Scraps, on that noble Gentleman Sir Julius Caesar's Hospitality, that at last he was forc'd to get the King's Warrant to remove him out of his House; yet in his Prosperity, the one being Chancellor, and the other Master of the Rolls, did so scorn and abuse him, as he would alter any thing the other did". The Letters which Bacon wrote to several Courtiers on King James's coming in, prove that there was indeed something very abject in a Mind the most enlighten'd of his Age in all good Literature, especially that to the Earl of Salisbury begging the Place of Solicitor-General, and another to Sir Edward Coke, then Attorney-General, on the same Subject. Villiers cou'd do no less than procure a Pardon for a Person, who had paid such a slavish Submission to his Pleasure; and the Lord-Keeper Williams took notice of the irregular Proceedings of the late Chancellor Bacon in the passing of it, writing thus to Buckingham: "His Majesty and your Lordship do conceive that my Lord of St. Albans Pardon and Grant of his Fine came both together to my Hands, and so your Lordship directs me to pass the one and the other. But his Lordship was too cunning

"for me; he pass'd his Fine, whereby he hath deceiv'd his Creditors, ten Days before he presented his Pardon to the Seal; so as now in his Pardon I find his Parliamentary Fine excepted, which he hath before the sealing of the same obtain'd and procur'd; and whether the House of Parliament will not hold themselves mocked and derided with such an Exception, I leave to your Lordship's Wisdom". The Lord-Keeper acted like a faithful Counsellor; but I do not find his Counsel was hearken'd to. Dr. Williams had been Domestick Chaplain to the Lord Chancellor Egerton, and very much in his Favour. A little before the Chancellor dy'd he sent for Williams, and said, If you want Money, I will leave you such a Legacy as shall furnish you to begin the World like a Gentleman. Sir, says the Chaplain, I kiss your Hands; you have fill'd my Cup full; I am far from Want, unless it be of your Lordship's Directions how to live in the World if I survive you. Egerton reply'd, Well, I know you are an expert Workman—Take these Tools to work with; they are the best I have. So he gave him some Books and Papers written all with his own Hand, being Directions concerning the well ordering the High Court of Parliament, the Court of Chancery, the Star-Chamber and Council-Board; as if he foresaw that he wou'd have Occasion of such Knowledge in the Course of his Fortune.

Sir Edward Villiers, half Brother to the Marquis of Buckingham, was as deep in the Mire as Mitchel the Projector and Informer; but Williams, advis'd the Marquis to send him on an Embassy out of the way, and leave Mompesson and Mitchel to the Resentment of the Parliament. Williams had been sworn a Privy-Counsellor before the Seal was given him; and when he took it, there was great grudging among the Lawyers, that the chief Post in the Law shou'd be given to a Doctor of Divinity. It seems indeed a little preposterous to Laymen, who have no Rule to go by but Reason and common Sense, which seem to make the Vocation of the Holy Ghost and a Judgment-seat in a Law-Court very incompatible. Williams, who had refus'd to be Chaplain to the Lord Chancellor Bacon, accepted of a Commission from him to be a Justice of Peace in Northamptonshire; and an Historian who was let into the Secret, but had not Wit enough to keep it, tells us his being made Lord Keeper was only to prepare the way for filling the Courts of Judicature with Churchmen, who wou'd have fix'd firm Footing there, says Sanderson, had King James liv'd to have effected his Desires. Dr. Williams was doubtless a Man of great Abilities; and besides the Directions in the Lord Ellesmere's Manuscripts for his Conduct, he kept Sir Harry Finch, a Lawyer, in his House five or six Months to advise with him upon all Occasions.

Things were not carry'd so swimmingly in Parliament, as to make the King fond of their Company. The Commons enter'd into a Debate about the Growth of Popery, which was their constant Complaint from the Beginning to the End of the Reigns of the House of Stuart; of whom but one had the Courage to own himself a Papist, and to run the Country for so doing; but every one of them conniv'd at, if they did not encourage it. The Commons also canvass'd the Spanish Match: But his Majesty had a Party in that House strong enough to prevent their falling on his Ministers. This Party were still stronger in the House of Lords. All the Courtiers, and most of the Bishops, according to Wilson, steering by his Compass. Prince Charles was almost always present in the House to awe the Members: Yet there were some gallant Men, continues my Author, who aim'd at the publick Liberty more than their private Interest. If any thing were spoken in the House, that did in the least reflect upon the Government, or touch the Courtiers thought, that noli me tangere the Prerogative,

The Lord Spencer, to excite that generous Spirit, put the House in mind of their generous Ancestors, in which the Earl of Arundel cut him short, saying, My Lord, when these things you speak of were doing, your Ancestors were keeping Sheep. A very poor Jest; and the poorer, for that the noble House of Spencer were Barons long before that of Arundel.*

Lords Arundel and Spencer quarrel.

If it reflected on the Lord Spencer's delighting in Flocks of Sheep, as we are told, it was a Reflection which no Man could have thought on, who had any Love for his Country. The Lord Spencer retorted, When my Ancestors were keeping Sheep, yours were plotting Treason. This touch'd Arundel to the Quick, and refer'd to the Earl of Surrey and Duke of Norfolk beheaded in the Reigns of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth. The Court Party could not but be sensible he had been the Aggressor by an absurd, ridiculous Affront on a young Nobleman of great Honour and Merit. Lord Spencer shew'd himself ready to justify his Words by his Actions. But they were both commanded out of the House, who took into Consideration the Offence Lord Arundel had given, and he was order'd to give the Lord Spencer such Satisfaction as they prescrib'd, and upon Arundel's Refusal he was committed to the Tower. The Lord Spencer was readmitted to his Seat, as was also the Lord Arundel upon his Petition and begging Pardon. Two Days after the Parliament was adjourn'd; but the Commons before they parted, notwithstanding the King had engag'd his Crown, Blood and Soul for the Recovery of the Palatinate, agreed upon this Declaration:—The Parliament for the Palatinate.

“Commons assembled in Parliament taking into “most serious Consideration the present State of “the King's Children abroad, and generally afflicted Estate of the true Professors of the Christian Religion, meaning the Presbyterians in the “Electorate, profess'd by the Church of England “in foreign Parts; and being touch'd with a true “Sense and Fellow-feeling of their Distresses, do “with unanimous Consent, in the Name of themselves and of the whole Body of the Kingdom “whom they represent, declare unto his most Excellent Majesty and to the whole World, their “heartly Grief and Sorrow for the same, &c. and “do solemnly protest, That they shall be ready to “the utmost of their Powers, with their Lives “and Fortunes, to assist him”. Such was then the Sense of the Nation with respect to the Support of the King of Bohemia and the Protestant Religion: Such their Sense continu'd; and only King James and his Courtiers, who were most concern'd to support them, abandon'd both. The King, says my Author, was pleas'd with the Declaration, intending to make his Market of it, but not to enter into the War for which they declar'd. The Lord Digby had been sent Ambassador into Germany to treat with the Emperor for the Restitution of the Elector Palatine's Hereditary Dominions. A very hopeful Errand! The Duke of Bavaria was in Possession of most of them by Ferdinand's Donation; and 'twas likely so powerful a Prince as that Duke would be wheedled or menac'd out of them by Embassies. The Lord Digby made his Addresses first to the Emperor, then to the Duke of Bavaria, and lastly to the Archduchess at Brussels; and all, according to Wilson, to as little Purpose as if he had staid at home. These Embassies were the Subject even of Wallon Wit, which was ever at as low an Ebb as ours is now; and in a Farce acted in the Spanish Netherlands, a Messenger was introduc'd bringing News in haste, that the Pala- tinate would shortly be replenish'd with a most formidable Army; for the King of Denmark would furnish 100000 pick'd Herrings, the Hollanders 100000 Butterboxes, and England 100000 Ambassadors. Must not the Heart of every good Englishman weep Blood, to think that a Nation so renowned and happy before King James came to the Crown should become the Scorn of Beggars, and K. James's the Jest of Fools? Edward himself acknowledges that this King was pictur'd abroad with a Scabbard without a Sword. And again: With a Sword which none could draw out, the several tugg'd at it. At Brussels he was painted with his Pockets hanging out, and no Money in them, nor in his Purse. Had it been possible to divide the King's Reputation from that of the Kingdom, the just Indignation which glow'd in every honest English Breast would have been somewhat mitigated. But the Kingdom was disgrac'd with the King, the Weakness and Cowardice of this Administration made them despis'd by the most despicable People, and render'd them the vile Object of Flemish Drollery and Dutch Mirth. Edward owns Great Britain was said to be grown Little England, which had lost its Strength by changing of Sex, a King Elizabeth for a Queen James. The most moving Part of the Infamy which was thrown on our Nation, is the Picture of the unfortunate Queen of Bohemia, the most belov'd and worthy Princess in the World, expos'd in the Netherlands like a poor Irish Munster, with her Hair dishevel'd, and her Child on her Back, the King her Father carrying the Cradle after her. Every one of these Pictures had Mottoes, expressing the Scorn in which our Neighbours held our pacifick Monarch. Such Derisions and Reflections were put upon him, says the historical Archdeacon. What Sentiments must those Englishmen have of this Reign, who liv'd in the Days of the Veres, the Norris's, the Drakes, the Rawleighs, and a hundred other illustrious Names in the glorious Reign of Queen Elizabeth? Could such Englishmen content themselves amidst so much Shame and Disgrace, as Edward does with his Majesty's acting very laudably, and with great Reputation for the Establish'd Church, when at the same time he pointed all the dreadful Artillery of his Wit and Learning against the Puritans, who were by much the greater Body of English Protestants?

The Lord Digby at his Return from his fruitless Embassy in Germany, made a Speech by Command of the King to both Houses of Parliament, informing them how he had been amus'd by the Emperor, scorn'd by the Duke of Bavaria, and slighted by the Archduke. These are the Laurels our Heroes brought home with them from abroad in this Reign. Digby concluded there was no way to recover the Palatinate but by Arms, and the King doubted not of their granting him the necessary Subsidies. The Ministers talk'd after the same rate: But neither the King nor his Ministers had Credit enough with the Parliament to gain their Belief, as they flatter'd themselves they should. For according to my Author, As the King's Suits and Intreaties were slighted and disregarded abroad, so his Intentions were suspected and fear'd at home. The Parliament knew his Inclinations were for Peace. Gondemar's Power over him boded ill to the pretended War; and Letters had lately appear'd from the King to his Brother of Spain, promising great Indulgences to the Papists. Digby was also dispatch'd to Spain to close some way with the House of Austria, either by Marriage or Treaty. But the King had to do with cunning Gamesters, who smil'd to see how earnest he was for it; they had the Sign given out of his Hand, and saw all the Game he play'd, so faithless was the Council about him. Here's Wisdom, here Politics, here a laudable Care for the Reform'd Religion! Here all the Virtues and Blessings which distinguish'd this Reign from all others! if one could believe

A.D. 1621. believe the Editors of the Earl of Clarendon's History, or Archdeacon Echar'd. The King saw the English were generally averse to the Spanish Match, and that the Insolence of the Papists alarm'd them daily; yet insensible of any ill Consequence of the general Discontent, he went on in his Way. The Parliament which had been adjourn'd in June to February, was summon'd to meet before its Time; to hear Digby's Relation of his Embassy; and they were so ill satisfy'd with it, that taking the State of the Nation into Consideration, they agreed upon a Remonstrance, of which the Popish Secretary Calvert, Weston, and others, giving the King notice, he went out of Town, and retir'd to Newmarket; for his Majesty's Custom was to run from Business, if he did not like it. The Remonstrance was drawn up in November, and set forth The Growth of Popery, the distress'd Estate of the Protestants, the disastrous Accidents to his Majesty's Children abroad, express'd with Rejoicing, and even with Contempt of their Persons. The Arminian and Popish Faction were suffer'd to insult the Royal Family of Bohemia; to rejoice at those Misfortunes for which all good Englishmen and Protestants were in the deepest Affliction, and treat Persons with Contempt. It is hardly credible, but so it was; and the same Faction, when Land was at their Head, would not admit the Prayers for the Queen of Bohemia and her princely Children into our Liturgy. Such Well-wishers have the rigid Churchmen been to the Palatine House, and their Successors the Royal House of Hanover.

The King's Wisdom.

Stuarts never did a great thing in England

The Remonstrance farther sets forth the great Armies rais'd by the King of Spain, of whose Alliance the King was so fond: The Expectations of Papists from the Spanish Match, the daring bold Behaviour of Romish Priests, the great Resort of People to Mass-Houses, the licentious printing of Popish Books, the Sabarms of Jesuits, the common Indiscretions of all Christendom. Then the Parliament propos'd Remedies for these growing Evils; That his Majesty would not omit this just Occasion speedily and effectually to take the Sword in hand; that he would publicly avow the aiding of foreign Protestants, the French King having newly laid Siege to Roebelle and Montauban, the remaining Strength of the Reformed in France. But our King contented himself with sending an Ambassador Henry Viscount Doncaster, to mediate a Peace between them; and, as Wilson has it, he only follow'd the French King from Camp to City, and from City to Camp, with as little Success as his Majesty's Ambassadors had had in Germany. The same Author here very wisely remarks on King James's Wisdom, and the Blessings of his peaceable Temper, the Subject of such a Torrent of Praise in the History of the Rebellion, and Archdeacon Echar'd's. "Our King's Intentions aiming at Peace, he took, as he thought, the best way to it, which was to intreat for it, but that would not prevail, for the Voice of Intreaty cannot be heard for the Trumpet. In War one Noise must expel another. The Parliament saw the Danger the Protestant Religion was in, and thought it their Duty to let the King see how inclinable they were to support the falling Condition of it with their Lives and Fortunes: But the King would be call'd Rex Pacificus to the last. His Heart was not advanc'd to glorious Achievements. "God will not many Times make use of some Men to do great Things." This last Reflection extends thro' the Reign of this Royal House, during which not one great Thing was done for the Protestant Religion, or the Liberty of the Subject, but what came with an ill-will, and did not last long. Before the House of Commons had had an Opportunity to present their Remonstrance to his Majesty, Sir Thomas Richardson their Speaker, receiv'd a Letter from him, imputing the drawing of it to sly Spirits, who debated Matters far above their Reach and Capacities. Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Sir Robert Naunton, Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Noy, Sir Henry Fane, Sir Edward Coke, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Hampden, Serjeant Strode, Serjeant Glanville, and an hundred other such Members of this Parliament, had not the Reach and Capacity of Secretary Conway, who could hardly write or read, and of the Favourite Villiers, whose Reach and Capacity consisted in the elegant Cut of a Coat, or in a nice Step in a Courtant. I am sensible Satyr and Mirth are inconsistent with the Sobriety and Gravity of History; but what can provoke Mirth and Satyr, like talking of Capacities and Reach in an Administration which was a Jest to People who had till then been a Jest to all the World.

King writes to the Speaker.

The King in his Letter intimated, that to enquire into his Government, was a Breach of the Royal Prerogative, and commanded the Speaker to let the House know, that none shou'd presume to meddle with his deep Matters of State, nor his Son's Match with the Infanta, nor the Honour of the King of Spain; which Points, if they are touch'd in the Paper prepar'd, he will not deign to bear it. This imperious way of treating the Parliament, was so well imitated by his Son, that he never met nor parted with one in any tolerable Humour; and how this wise Conduct ended, will be seen hereafter.

Wisdom.

The Parliament however sent him their Remonstrance, with a Petition, in which they declared, that the Welfare of Religion and State, were fit for parliamentary Consideration, and could not otherwise come fully and clearly to his Knowledge; and whereas his Majesty seem'd to abridge them of the ancient Liberty of Parliaments, Freedom of Speech, they were now forc'd to pray that it may be allow'd, and the Doubts and Scruples rais'd by his Letter to their Speaker, be remov'd. His Majesty was very uneasy at this Petition, and us'd the twelve Members who were sent with it, a little roughly, insinuating that their giving Advice about his Son's Match was High Treason. Excellent Reason! He might as well have insinuated that it was Adultery. For to give good Advice, with all due Submission and Affection, can no more have a traitorous than a lewd Design in it. He added, They ow'd their Privileges to the Grace of his Ancestors; that is, all the Saxon Kings were arbitrary despotick Princes, who squander'd their Prerogative on the People, as this King did his Money on his Minions; and the Saxons had no Right to any thing but what their Kings gave them; which is a Proof that his Majesty knew as much of History as he did of Divinity.

More Wisdom and good Manners.

Learning.

About this Time the Lords of Parliament consider'd how cheap they were made by the Multitude of Scottish and Irish Viscounts, who had bought their Titles. They were not Natives of those Kingdoms, but private English Gentlemen, who purchas'd that Honour to have Precedence of the English Barons, contrary, says Echar'd, to the Laws and Customs of England. Thirty-three Lords, among whom were the Earls of Oxford, Huntington, Essex, Lincoln, Dorset, Salisbury, Warwick, sign'd a Petition to his Majesty to put a Stop to this Breach of their Customs and Laws. The King was so angry with them, that he could not help shewing it, particularly to the Earl of Essex; I fear thee not, Essex, if thou wert as well belov'd as thy Father, and hadst 40000 Men at thy Heels. I can scarce believe his Majesty said so, tho' we are told it by an Archdeacon, there not being a Man in Great-Britain, who could think King James would not have been afraid of Queen Elizabeth's Earl of Essex with half 40000 Men at his Heels. The King did not alter the Precedence claim'd by the Scottish and Irish Viscounts, who had paid for their Title, but restrain'd himself in those Creations for the time to come.

spoken of.

There happen'd an Incident in this Session of Parliament, which we shou'd not have had from Echard, if he had come to the Knowledge of it. I shall take it almost verbatim from Mr. Ambrose Philips, Fellow of St. John's College Cambridge: "When the Privilege of the Nobility was debated, and almost carried by a Majority, that the vouching of their Honour shou'd pass with them for an Oath, the Bishop of Lincoln prevented it by the Force of his Reasons; but the Debate continuing very long that Morning, an aged Bishop very infirm in Health, desir'd to be excus'd if he cou'd not stay it out. With all our Hearts, said some Lords, you may all of you troop home as fast as you please; and the Earl of Essex press'd it more passionately than any, desiring to know if their Lordships were not content to throw their Doors open, and let all the Bishops out if they would. The Bishop of Lincoln, then Lord-Keeper, said he wou'd put it to the Question if commanded." But I do not find it was insisted upon.

His Majesty wrote to Secretary Calvert and Sir Thomas Richardson, to take off the Edge of some sharp Expressions he had us'd; and as it is a sure Sign of Wisdom to be convinc'd of one's Error, and own a Mistake, so the mistaking is a sure Sign of Weakness. The Parliament were not satisfy'd with this Softning, when their Privileges had been so solemnly attack'd. They expected a Dissolution, and resolv'd before they broke up, to assert those Privileges in as solemn a manner as they cou'd. To this End they drew up a Protestation, That the Liberties, Franchises, Privileges, and Jurisdictions of Parliament, are the ancient and undoubted Birthright and Inheritance of the Subjects of England; and that the arduous Affairs of State, the making of Laws, and Redress of Grievances, are proper Subjects for Debate in Parliament; that every Member of right ought to have Freedom of Speech, and the Commons to treat of Matters in such Order as in their Judgments shall seem fittest; that every Member hath like Freedom from all Impeachment, Imprisonment, and Molestation, other than by Censure of the House, for any speaking concerning parliamentary Affairs. But to shew that they minded his Majesty's Business as well as their own, they gave him two entire Subsidies to enable him to begin the War for Recovery of the Palatinate.

The Parliament in Queen Elizabeth's Time petition'd her to marry, and she lik'd it, as King James himself said: But he thinks it Presumption in the Parliament humbly to beseech him, for the Good of Religion, to permit his Son to marry a Protestant Princess, telling them, if they had fix'd on any Place or Person, he wou'd have thought it High Treason; so many Degrees high was the King's Spirit mounted above a Woman's to humble Subjects, and so many Degrees lower than hers was his Spirit to dare Enemies.

Wilson,
p. 186.

A.D. 1622.

His Majesty was so incens'd at the Protestation, that by the Advice of Buckingham, he dissolv'd the Parliament on the 6th of January, by Proclamation; in which he laid all the Blame upon the Commons, at least on those fiery Spirits above-mention'd. Bishop Laud is said to have drawn that huffing Proclamation, so rash in Thought, and harsh in Expression, that the Lord-Keeper Williams advis'd to have it soften'd before it was publish'd, but Laud was never for making Abatements, and so it pass'd to the general Discontent of the whole Nation. The Lord-Keeper was very much troubled at it, seeing plainly of what dangerous Consequence it might be, and how much his Majesty trespass'd against the true Principles of English Policy, by quarrelling with his Parliament; and he did all he cou'd to persuade the King to make it his earnest Endeavour to unite with them when they were assembled next. A Week before the Parliament was dissolv'd, the King hasten'd to Town from

Ambrose
Philips,
p. 98.

hunting, and call'd a Council, at which the Judges assisted; he declar'd before them all, that the Protestation was void, and sending for the Journal-Book belonging to the House of Commons, he tore it out with his own Hand. The Dissolution of the Parliament added Fuel to the Flame, which began to heat the whole Kingdom. The Infringement of their Privileges disgusted the People whom they represented, and who thought it not above their Reach and Capacity to observe, That a Prince who suffer'd the Protestants of Germany and France to be extirpated, ought not to have born the Title of Defender of the Faith; that he might almost have purchas'd such a Country as the Palatinate with the Money spent on Embassies; that the promising the French Protestants Assistance, without assisting them, had only made them the more resolute to their Ruin; that all that was got by the King's Negotiations, was this arrogant Saying from the Constable de Luines in France, to Sir Edward Herbert, What has your Master to do with us or our Affairs? "Where-as the English Fleets, the Glory of the World, if employ'd, wou'd have taught the French Pride to know, that he who strikes with Passion, will many times thank them that take him off by friendly Admonition." All this Echard calls sawcy talking; and yet he repeats the most sawcy of all; it was mouth'd out that he was no King, but a Fidler's Son, otherwise he wou'd not suffer such Disorders at Home, and Dishonours abroad. To stop People's Mouths, a Proclamation was publish'd against talking of State-Affairs, which was never known in any good Reign, such as Queen Elizabeth's, and all the Reigns since the Revolution; it being a plain Confession that the Affairs of State cannot stand the Test of Truth.

As soon as the Parliament was broken up, the King exerted his Royal Power against several of the leading Members of both Houses; the gallant Earl of Oxford was committed to the Tower for speaking against the Ministry, the weakest and wickedest that ever govern'd this Kingdom; the Earl of Southampton was confin'd for speaking the Truth of the Duke of Buckingham, who had spoken disorderly in the House of Peers. Mr. Selden, Mr. Pym, Sir Robert Philips, Mr. Mallory, were committed to the Tower for their Freedom of Speech; Sir Thomas Crew, Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir Nathaniel Rich, and Sir James Perrot, were sent into Ireland with a trifling Commission; Sir Peter Haymen, one of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, was commanded to serve in the Palatinate, where his Service cou'd be of no use. Sir Edward Coke, late Lord Chief-Justice, was not only imprison'd in the Tower for the like Offence, Freedom of Speech in Parliament, but the Locks and Doors of his Chambers in the Temple were seal'd up, his Papers, and among others, several Securities for Money were taken away. None of his Children or Servants were suffer'd to come near him, and in this Confinement the King su'd him for 30000 l. an old pretended Debt due from Sir William Hatton to Queen Elizabeth, which was prosecuted with all Severity imaginable, tho' Sir John Walter, the Attorney-General, return'd the Brief that was sent him, with this Expression, Let my Tongue cleave to the Roof of my Mouth, whenever I ope it against Sir Edward Coke. The shutting up these Gentlemen, some of the most eminent of the Kingdom, merely by virtue of the Authority Royal, is an Instance of arbitrary Power not to be match'd but in French, Turkish, or Russian History. The Example was follow'd by this King's Son, as was that of raising Money without Act of Parliament, by Order of Privy-Council only. Letters were sent to the Judges and others, to move them to contribute for the Defence of the Palatinate, as was pretended, and the Names of those who refus'd, were order'd to be certifi'd to the Council-Board. The like Letters were directed to the High-Sheriffs of Counties,

Those who would not contribute, were return'd as disaffected. "These, says Mr. Coke, were the Ways which this "pacifick King took in and out of Parliament, "which I believe, except in the Reign of Edward "the IVth, were never practis'd by any of our "English Kings; and all this under the specious "Pretext of recovering his Son-in-law's Patrimony, prodigally to squander among his Favourites, "especially Buckingham, whose Avarice could not "be supported otherwise by the Revenues of the "Crown, and the selling of all Places sacred and "civil. These were his Majesty's noble Achievements over his Parliament, who presum'd to "advise him for his own Honour and the Nations Safety." Another way of managing leading Members in the House of Commons, was to bribe them by Places and Honours, which was also practis'd in the next Reign. Sir John Saville, Knight of the Shire for the County of York, was now bought off from the Country Interest by being made Comptroller of the Household, a Privy-Counsellor, and not long after a Baron.

K. James boasts that his Mother was a Martyr for Popery. H. J. Lach. p. 20.

Cab. 211. K. James' Letter to the Pope.

The Lord Digby was sent to Spain to forward the Treaty of Marriage with the Infanta Maria, Sister to Philip IV. King James smother'd the Way on his Part by his Indulgence to Papists; and when those who had near Access to his Person, remonstrated to him against that Marriage, and that Indulgence, the only Answer they could get from him, was, His Mother had been a Roman Catholic, and dy'd a Martyr for that Religion. Gondemar boasted he had procur'd the Release of 4000 Papists. Before Digby departed the King wrote a Letter to Pope Gregory the XVth, address'd thus; To the most holy Father, &c. greeting, and all manner of Felicity. With what Reputation his Majesty acted for the Church of England? He then tells the Pope, He doubts not but his Holiness, out of his singular Piety, will further what he has been endeavouring. This Epistle is from the Defender of our Protestant Faith to him whom all true Protestants term Antichrist. Again; That which remains for us further to say concerning this Matter, this Gentleman, our Subject, George Gage, will deliver unto you more at large; praying your Holiness that you will give him in all Things Credence and Belief; beseeching Almighty God, from our Hearts, to preserve you in Safety, and to grant you all other Happiness. His Majesty prays from his Heart, that all other Happiness may be granted to the Pope by Almighty God; in which Happiness must be included the utter Extirpation of the Reform'd Religion, without which no Pope will ever think himself happy. How does this agree with the Prayer in King Edward VI. Liturgy, From the Tyranny and all the detestable Enormities of the Bishop of Rome, good Lord deliver us?

And encourages Popery, 193, 194.

Having mention'd the Lord Digby's Embassy to Spain, we cannot omit taking notice of his Reception there, which, according to Wilson, was so short of the Respect due to an extraordinary Ambassador of the King of England, that a Messenger might have hop'd for better. The Spaniards treated him as scurvily as if he had come from such a sort of Monarch as one of the Indian Kings in Queen Anne's Time: Yet to quicken the Business in England, his Majesty commanded the Lord-Keeper Williams to issue Writs under the Great-Seal, requiring the Judges in every Circuit, to enlarge all Papists who were imprison'd according to Law for Recusancy.

Archbishop Abbot's Misfortune

About this Time a sad Accident happen'd to that most reverend Prelate Dr. George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, in Bramsbill-Park in Hampshire; where, by the Invitation of the Lord Zouch, he was at a Buck-hunting. The Keeper running amongst the Herd of Deer to bring them up to the fairer Mark, and the Archbishop sitting on

A.D. 1622.

Horseback, let fly a barb'd Arrow from a Cross-Bow, which unhappily shot the Keeper in the Left Arm, and he dy'd of the Wound immediately. The Archbishop's Enemies, who were all the rigid Clergy, did their utmost to have him depriv'd for this involuntary Crime, which the most bitter of them could not mount higher than casual Homicide. The learned Sir Henry Saville, his Grace's old Friend, ask'd Sir Edward Coke, Whether a Bishop might hunt? Which it was urg'd he might not do by the Canons; but those Canons had never been admitted as Laws in England; and the Lord Coke reply'd, There's an old Law, that when a Bishop dies he shall leave his Dogs to the King. If a Bishop might not hunt that Law was useless. Laud was one of the Prelates, who, in Hopes of rising by the Archbishop's Fall, alledg'd that the Homicide, tho' involuntary, tainted the archiepiscopal Function; and his Conscience was so scrupulous, that he did not think the Orders Dr. Abbot conferr'd afterwards were valid; but sober Clergymen, even Dr. Andrew Bishop of Winchester, who was not thought to be very well with the Archbishop, reprov'd those who condemn'd his Irregularity, as they term'd his hunting; tho' some Years after, when Dr. Faxon was talk'd of for breeding the best Dogs in England, the Sport was then regular, and the Sportsman worthy to be call'd from his Game, and to be made Bishop of London. The Archbishop was so mortify'd at this Accident, that he retir'd to an Almshouse he had built at Guildford; which the King hearing of, took Compassion upon him, and said to a Lord who was speaking of it, It might have been my Chance or thine. His Grace not long after receiv'd an Order to return to his Charge at Lambeth, and to make the Widow of the Deceas'd some Amends for the Loss of her Husband, he settl'd twenty Pounds a Year upon her, which Pension got her another Husband in a very little while. The Bishoprick of St. David's becoming vacant about the same Time, Dr. Laud the turbulent Oxonian, was presented to it by Recommendation of the Lord-Keeper Williams, whom the Duke of Buckingham put upon it. Echard confesses he was charg'd not only with Arminian but Romish Tenets; and his Temper was so fiery, that Judge Whitlocke foretold He would set the Nation in a Flame. Nay, King James himself, who was hardly prevail'd with to prefer such an exceptionable Person, said to the Lord-Keeper, who importun'd him for Laud, Is there no Hold but you will carry it? then take him to you; but on my Soul, you will repent it; which the Keeper did in a few Months, owing his Disgrace to the Intrigues and Ingratitude of this lordly tyrannical Prelate, who concern'd himself so much with the State, that he made himself a part of it; and we are consequently necessitated to speak more of him than he deserves. I mean not on account of his low Birth; for having Capacity enough to go thro' an academical Education with some Reputation, it is no Blemish to his Character that his Fortune was made by himself, if he had taken none but warrantable Ways in the Progress of it. After he was made Bishop of St. David's by the Recommendation of the Lord-Keeper Williams, he by the same Favour retain'd his Prebend at Westminster, and had a Living of 120 l. a Year given him in his own Diocess of St. David's, for which Laud return'd his Thanks to Bishop Williams by Mr. Wynne in these Words, My Life will be too short to requite his Lordship's Goodness: But, according to Coke, his Favours were not eighteen Months planted, when Laud became the Bishop's sharpest Enemy; and his Malice grew so high, that the Countess of Buckingham took notice of it. Rashworth assures us, He was suspected of Popery while he was a Member of St. John's College Oxon, inasmuch that it was with Difficulty he got to be chosen Head of his House; where he presid'd when Dr.

A.D. 1622. Robert Abbot, the Archbishop's Brother, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, spoke thus of him in a Sermon preach'd at St. Maries on Easter-Day 1615. "Men under Pretence of Truth, and preaching against Puritans, strike at the Heart and Root of Faith and Religion establish'd amongst us. This preaching against Puritans, was but the Practice of Parsons and Campian. Is it not worth minding from whom Laud learn'd his Lessons against Protestants, according to the Bishop of Sarum's Information? Again; "When these Jesuits came to England to seduce young Students, some of the latter, who were afraid to lose their Places if they shou'd professedly be Papists, were counsell'd by Campian and Parsons to speak freely against the Puritans, and that shou'd suffice; and these Students cannot suppose they are accounted Papists, because they speak against the Puritans. If some of them do at any time speak against the Papists, they do beat a little upon the Bush for fear of troubling or disquieting of the Birds that are in it. They speak nothing but that wherein one Papist will speak against another. The Papists beyond the Seas can say they are wholly theirs, and the Recusants at Home make their Brags of them. In all Things they keep themselves so near the Brink, that upon any Occasion they may step over to them." Laud himself was at the preaching of this Sermon, which was Fuel to his fiery Spirit, and gave this Account of it to his Patron Bishop Neile; I came Time enough to be at the Rehearsal of it upon much Persuasion, where I was fain to sit patiently and bear my self abused almost an Hour. I wou'd have taken no notice of it, but that the whole University apply it to me; and my own Friends tell me I shall sink my Credits, if I answer not Dr. Abbot as King James answer'd Bellarmine. Wilson confirms what Abbot said, The King's Animosity against Puritans was thought to be fomented by the Papists, whose Agent Bishop Laud was suspected to be. Coke says, The principal Stickler herein was Dr. William Laud, a Man of a most turbulent and aspiring Disposition; and one of the first Acts for which he was taken notice of, was to marry the Earl of Devonshire to the Lady Rich, Mother to Robert Earl of Warwick, when her Husband was alive, at which King James was highly incens'd. While he was at Oxford, his Business was to pick Quarrels in the Lectures of publick Readers, and send Informations of it to Bishop Neile, that he might fill the Ears of King James with Discontents against honest Men, who took Pains in their Places, and settled the Truth, which he call'd Puritanism, in their Auditors. Archbishop Abbot said of him, He was Buckingham's inward Counsellor, sitting sometimes privately with him whole Hours, feeding his Humour with Malice and Spite. As there was hardly a lewder Man upon Earth than Buckingham, what Notion can one have of the Piety of his Confessor and Counsellor? Laud's Contrivance to ruin his Patron and great Benefactor Bishop Williams Lord-Keeper, takes up almost a Volume of Bishop Hacket's Life of that Prelate. Coke's Indignation was so rais'd by reading it, that he expresses it thus: "You there see villanous Instruments, Perjuries, Subornations, and keeping back of Witnesses, razing Records, the displacing Sir Robert Heath from being Lord-Chief-Justice, because he wou'd not do Laud's Drudgery, and bringing in Sir John Finch, who would jurare in Verbo Magistrum." It would be endless shou'd one go about to repeat every thing that is said of this Laud's Fury, Pride, Insolence, Cruelty, Ingratitude, Superstition, &c. after Authors of undoubted Credit; one of them, the celebrated Mr. Locke, says of Laud and his Followers, they wou'd do the worst of Things by the worst of Means, enslave their Country, and betray them under the Masque of Religion. We will now see what the Lord Clarendon or his Editors say of him, his other Advocates being too mean and too partial to be taken notice of. "The advancing of him was infinitely to the Benefit and Honour of the Church. Need one go any further? The Reader can have no Conception that any Thing more notoriously against the Truth cou'd be said of him, unless I repeated it out of the HISTORY OF THE REBELLION. "No Man was more plentifully replenish'd with a good Conscience, and a most sincere worthy Intention; the Splendor of his pious Life, and his unpolish'd Integrity; his singular Abilities and immense Virtue, and his Writings, more advanc'd the Protestant Religion, than it had been from the Reformation. He was the best provided of any Man with Innocence of Heart, and Integrity of Manners. To call him Papist was a senseless Appellation, his Heart being always set upon the Advancement of the Church."— Enough surely to shew us what Metal the Characters in that History are made of, especially where the Author or Authors add, He had hitherto avoided Court Business and Matters of State; which I may venture to assert, is one of the falsest Things that ever was asserted in History. He had been a Privy-Counsellor, and as we have mention'd after Archbishop Abbot, was the Confident of Villiers, who certainly did not consult him about Cases of Conscience; and when he went with the Prince to Spain, this very Laud, who had hitherto avoided Court Business, was left his Agent at Court. The Bishop being afraid he shou'd be left out of the High-Commission Court, on account of his persecuting Spirit, he immediately apply'd himself by Letter to Buckingham, in which are these Expressions: Since by his Majesty's gracious Goodness, and your Grace's sole Procurement, I am made a Governor, I wou'd be loth to be excluded, but am sure my Lord of Canterbury will leave me out, as hitherto he hath done. If his Majesty be not pleas'd to command that I shall be in, I humbly desire I may be depriv'd. He is begging a Power to domineer and oppress, out of the Innocence of his Heart, the Integrity of his Manners, out of his Piety and his immense Virtue, as we just now read in the History of the Rebellion. Here he affirms it was by the sole Procurement of the Duke of Buckingham, that he was made Bishop of St. Davids; whereas Bishop Hacket assures us it was Bishop Williams that procur'd the Bishoprick for him: and A. Wood, who ador'd Laud, as much as he lov'd Adoration, owns it was done by the Endeavours of Dr. John Williams. Granting that Villiers did recommend him to the Lord-Keeper, to say that therefore he was the sole Procurer of the Bishoprick is false; for Williams was forc'd to struggle for him, and was more than once discourag'd in his Suit by the King. True it is, Laud had already thrown off the Protection of his Patron, and been very instrumental in his Disgrace; the Ingratitude of which, within a few Months after he had made him a Bishop, wou'd not agree with owning his Promotion to him, without more Shame than he was capable of.

General History wou'd not admit of so large a Digression concerning a particular Person; if that Person had not thrust himself into most of the State Affairs we shall be oblig'd to relate for twenty Years of our Period, and if it was not to enlighten a little those we shall find him concern'd in.

King James was still in Hopes that he shou'd preserve his Reputation abroad, according to Echard, by pushing forward the Treaty of Marriage: But our Archdeacon tells us not how that Reputation was acquir'd: indeed he does tell us that the Lord Vaux, a Papist, had Liberty to transport 4000 Men to reinforce the King of Spain's Armies, both against his Majesty's Confederates of Holland, where his banish'd Children had Refuge, and even against his banish'd Childrens Country, the Palatinate itself,

He requir'd that the Romish Priests, who came to England, shou'd be subject to no Laws but what they brought with them; that the Children of the Infanta shou'd be bred in the Popish Religion; that she might have a Church and a Chapel open to all Comers; which being a perfect Toleration, King James did not care to venture on so bold a Step, and wrote several times to the Earl of Bristol for an Abatement; which he not being able to obtain, the King and Prince sign'd the Articles which the Earl sent them; and by which it was agreed, that Papists shou'd not be interrupted in the Exercise of their Religion, nor be vex'd with any Oaths in order to the same. More cou'd not be done by them to oblige the Pope, unless all Penal Laws had been repeal'd, Church Lands restor'd, and the National Church been turn'd into what it was before the Reformation; yet all this did not satisfy the Spaniards. They only amus'd King James with a Treaty of Marriage, while their Arms in Conjunction with the Emperor's reduc'd the whole Palatinate; and then the King of Spain declar'd himself to his Favourite the Conde Olivarez in a Letter written to him not long after the Earl of Bristol arriv'd at Madrid. The King my Father declar'd at his Death, that his Intent was never to marry my Sister the Infanta Donna Maria with the Prince of Wales; which your Uncle Don Balthazar understood, and so treated this Match ever with Intention to delay it; notwithstanding it is now so far advanc'd, that, considering all the Averseness of the Infanta to it, it is time to seek some Means to divert the Treaty; which I wou'd have you find out, and I will make it good whatsoever it be. But in all other things procure the Satisfaction of the King of Great Britain, (who hath deserv'd much) and it shall content me, so it be not in the Match. Thus, according to Wilson, was our King deluded; his Honour blemish'd, his Love among his Subjects diminish'd, his Childrens Patrimony destroy'd, &c. But my Lord Clarendon, or the Christchurch Men, affirm, without any manner of Reservation, he had more Knowledge than any other Prince of his Age. Which Knowledge could not unriddle the strange Conduct of Spain; and himself, Son and Favourite were so puzzled with the Remora's which happen'd in the Treaty, that a most chimerical Project was started for the Prince of Wales and Marquis of Buckingham to go themselves to Madrid, and remove them all by their Presence. The Match it self was like to be attended with such ill Consequences with regard to the Religion and Liberties of England, that no body who wishes well to them can read the Story, and much less write it with Pleasure. The Palatinate being entirely lost, Count Mansveldt, who commanded there for the King of Bohemia, march'd thro' Lorraine and Luxembourg, and enter'd the Netherlands, where he fought his way thro' the Spanish Army under Corduba. In which Action the Duke of Brunswick had his Arm shot off, and many English and Scots Gentlemen signaliz'd themselves out of Love to the Queen of Bohemia. Of these let us remember the brave Sir Charles Rich, Brother to the Earl of Warwick; Sir James Hays, Knevet, Hume, and Helburn, who behav'd very gallantly. Count Mansveldt join'd the Prince of Orange's Army, and they oblig'd Spinola to raise the Siege of Bergen-op-Zoon. A plain Indication, that if the Money given by the Parliament for the Palatine War had been employ'd even now for that Service, the Spaniards instead of making Conquests in Germany wou'd have been hard put to it to have preserv'd what they had possess'd themselves of in the Ne-chevanth. With that Money the Prince of Orange, who made head against Spinola without it, wou'd have been enabled to make such a Diversion in the Low Countries, as wou'd not have permitted the Spaniards to have march'd their Armies into Germany.

The Emperor at this time held a Diet at Ratibon, in which the Affair of the Elector Palatine was canvass'd by the Popish and Protestant Parties. The latter argu'd strenuously for his Restoration; the former justify'd the Emperor in transferring the Electorate to the Duke of Bavaria. The German Protestants had the Palatine's Interest so much at heart, that without any Solicitation of the King of Great Britain, who by no means interest'd himself so much in it, they did of themselves oblige the Emperor to consent, that the Investiture of the Duke of Bavaria shou'd not be prejudicial to the Children of the Palatine. There was a private Treaty carry'd on by some of King James's Ministers, that the young Prince Palatine shou'd be bred up in the Emperor's Court under pretence of marrying his Daughter; but in effect, says Wilson, to be train'd up in the Popish Religion. This Matter is touch'd in a Letter of the Conde Olivarez to his Master the Catholick King. This will reduce the Prince Elector, that was an Enemy to the Obedience of the Church, by breeding his Son in the Emperor's Court in the Catholick Doctrine.

It did not require more Knowledge than any Prince of the Age had, to have foreseen that a powerful Assistance sent to Count Mansveldt, or the Prince of Orange, and a powerful Negotiation at the Imperial Diet in Conjunction with the Protestant Princes, wou'd have recover'd the Palatine's Dominions with more Expedition and Honour than an odious tedious Marriage Treaty, in which King James at last gave up the Palatinate, ordering the Earl of Bristol not to insist upon it as a Condition of the Marriage. What Opinion Foreigners had of the King's Tameness and Negligence in this Affair, may be seen by that of the Learned and Noble Spanheim. The Protestant Religion was thereby entirely rooted out of Bohemia, the Electoral Dignity transferr'd from the Palatine Family, the Palatinate itself lost, the Liberty of Germany overthrow'n; and what must be an inexpressible Loss to a Nobleman as much superior to King James in Learning as the King was to him in Dignity, The famous Library at Heidelbergh remov'd to Rome. The Mules that carry'd the Books over the Alps had each a Silver Plate on his Forehead, wherein was engrav'd FERRO BIBLIOTHECAM PRINCIPIS PALATINI. All which Mischiefs are in a great measure owing to the Influence his Majesty permitted the crafty Gondemar to have over him; insomuch that the Conde wrote the Duke of Lerma, I have lull'd King James so fast asleep, that I hope neither the Cries of his Daughter and her Children, nor the repeated Solicitations of his Parliament and Subjects on their Behalf, shall be able to awaken him.

As full as this cunning Spaniard was of his Conceits, he was often rebuff'd by the Repartees of the English, who hated him and his Errand. Vere Earl of Oxford being flatter'd by him for his great Actions and Qualities, reply'd, I know of but two memorable things in my Life; I was born in Eighty-eight, and christen'd the Fifth of November. As the King was once praising the Plenty of Provisions in England, especially Fish and Fowl, and saying, One County had more than all Spain: Yes, says Gondemar, but my Master has the Gold and Silver Mines in the East and West Indies. And I by my Soule, reply'd the King, have much ado to keep my Men from taking them away from him.

If the Adventures of Prince Charles and Buckingham had come into the Head of Miguel Cervantes, it wou'd have carry'd his Quixotism much higher than

The Prince as it is thus represented by other Writers. "It his Journey was such an Adventure as Don Quixote never to Spain. dreamt of; that because the King, the Prince's Coke, 126. Father, was poor at home and despis'd abroad;
 "which is not deny'd by Authors who deny every "thing else; therefore by making his only Son an "Hostage in another King's Court, where the "Maxims both of Religion and State were direct"ly contrary, he should think to persuade the "King of Spain to overturn all, and also get such "a Portion as was fourfold more than any Prince
 "before had: As also that the King of Spain should "restore the Palatinate, because the King knew
 "not else which way to get it; yet the Journey
 "must be made, it being Buckingham's Pleasure
 "to have it so; so stark blind does Poverty and "Covetousness make Mens Understanding and "Reason". This Language is a little rough, as indeed is that Writer's Manner, but the Sentiments are just; and the Gravity of the Lord Clarendon's History of this Journey turn'd into a Jest by a Saying of Archy the King's Fool, an Officer who seems to be very superfluous in that Court: When his Majesty was once merrily dispos'd, that Under-Courtier told him he must change Caps with him. Why? says the King. Why? Who, replies Archy, sent the Prince into Spain? But what, said the King, wilt thou say if the Prince comes back again? Why then, quoth the Fool, I will take my Cap from your Head, and send it to the King of Spain.

There is more good Sense couch'd under this Buffoonry of Archy, than in the pompous Relation which takes up so many Pages of the History of the Rebellion very faithfully copy'd by Archdeacon Echard. The Reasons which induc'd the Prince to take this Journey are too wild and romantick to find a Place in sober History; but they were back'd to the King with some Menaces from Buckingham, as unfit for him to speak as his Master to hear. If you go from your Promise, his Majesty having been surpris'd into a Consent to it, it will so disoblige the Prince that he can never forget it, nor forgive the Rascal who has been the Cause of it; which put an End to the King's Imprecations and Deliberations upon the Matter. The Journey was consented to, and the two Persons nam'd who were to attend the Prince and Marquis, both very grateful to his Majesty, Sir Francis Cottington and Endimion Porter. The Lord Clarendon tells us the former had been the King's Agent in Spain. Wilson says indeed he had been a sort of Clerk to Sir Charles Cornwallis when he was Ambassador there. Porter had been Mr. Edward Villiers's Man; and being taken into Buckingham's Bedchamber was remov'd thence to the Prince's. There was another Attendant who was not to be so much entrusted, one Sir Richard Graham, who serv'd first in Buckingham's Stable. It is not, continues Wilson, to vilify the Persons, being Men in this World's Lottery as capable of Advancement as others; but to shew in how poor a Bark the King ventur'd the rich Freight, his Son, having only the Marquis to steer his Course. The Prince and he had false Beards, and went by the Names of Jack and Tom Smith; but their profuse Living render'd their Quality suspected.

The Journey.

At Dover the Mayor took them into Examination, which oblig'd Buckingham to discover himself. They were then permitted to embark; and landing at Bologne the 18th of February, they rode Post to Paris, where they saw the Court incog. and in particular the Princess Henrietta Maria; whose Eyes afterwards so inflam'd the Prince's Heart, that, according to Wilson, it set the Three Kingdoms a fire. At Bordeaux the Governor, the Duke d'Espernon, offer'd them the Civilities of his House; but Cottington, who, says my Author, had the least

Mien of a Gentleman, let him know his Companions were only travelling for Improvement, and had not Breeding suitable to his Grandeur. Grammont, Governor of Bayonne, had some Suspicion of them; but it being in Time of Peace, he ask'd no Questions.

A.D. 1623.

On the 6th of March they arriv'd at Madrid, about 800 Miles in 18 Days from their setting out. They alighted at the Earl of Bristol's House, who was strangely astonish'd at the Sight, having not been let into the Secret. The King of Spain had receiv'd Information of it, and 'twas presently rumour'd that some great Persons were arriv'd; who were the next Day known to be the Prince of Wales and Buckingham. The Earl of Bristol went first to Court, and had private Audience of the King, who sent his prime Favourite and Minister the Count-Duke d'Olivarez to congratulate his Highness's Arrival; who did it in a most submissive manner, the Spanish Stiffness bending so low as to embrace the Prince's Thigh; and in huge swelling Words he exaggerated the Honour his Highness's Presence did the Court of Madrid: An Obligation so great, that he deserv'd to have the Infanta thrown into his Arms. He also complimented the Marquis of Buckingham, telling him, Now the Prince of England was in Spain, his Master and he would divide the World between them. Which Rodomontado and others were swallow'd glibly enough. About 10 a-Clock at Night the King of Spain came in a close Coach to visit the Prince, who having Intimation of his coming met him in the way; and their Interview was with all the endearing Marks of Friendship and Affection which could be expected from such great Princes. The next Day came Gondemar, who had been succeeded in his Embassy in England by the Marquis Iniosa; and after many Compliments in his usual Strain, he added, I have strange News to tell your Highness, for an Englishman is this Day sworn of the Privy Council to the King of Spain; meaning himself, who, he said, was an Englishman in Heart. The next Day the King and Prince went to take the Air in their Coaches at the Prado, where the latter had the first Glimpse of his fair Mistress. A Day or two after his Highness made his publick Entry on Horseback from the Monastery of St. Jerom to the Royal Palace with the same State the Kings of Spain use at their Coronation, the King himself riding under the same Canopy, and giving Precedence to the Prince of Wales. The Marquis of Buckingham and the Count-Duke d'Olivarez follow'd the Royal Canopy. Then came the Earl of Bristol between two of the eldest Counsellors of State; and then Sir Walter Aston between two Spanish Courtiers. The Cavalcade was the most splendid that can be imagin'd; the Grandees, the chief Magistrates of Madrid, the Officers of the Guard, and the Guard themselves glitter'd in Cloth of Gold and Silver, and the Ladies shin'd in the Balconies with a Lustre of Diamonds not to be purchas'd but with the Treasures of Peru and Mexico. The Scaffolds erected in the Streets for the several Councils of Spain, were cover'd with the richest Tapestry; and all the way as the King and Prince pass'd, they were entertain'd with painted and gilt Pageants, where the best Comedians and Dancers shew'd the utmost of their Skill to divert so glorious a Company. The Queen and Infanta were Spectators of the triumphal Entry at the Court Gate; but they soon retir'd, the Queen to receive the Prince, and the Infanta to her Apartment. The King and Prince embrac'd when they alighted, and pass'd immediately to the Queen's Quarter, who receiv'd them at her Chamber Door, and conducted the Prince to the Cloth of State, under which were three equal Chairs, where the Queen sat in the midst, the Prince on the right Hand, and the King on the left, with a Circle of the noblest and fairest Youth of both Sexes in the Court

A.D. 1623. Court of Spain. Madam, said the Prince, the Honour of this Day's Solemnity is due to your Majesty, which conveys me hither to kiss your Princely Hand; and so he stoop'd to her Knee. Sir, said she, it is to your Highness, and in such manner as to the Royalty of Spain, due and done to your excellent Merit. After about half an Hour's Conversation in French, she reconducted the King and Prince to her Chamber Door. The King accompany'd his Highness to an Apartment prepar'd for him in the Royal Palace. The two Infants, the King's Brothers, receiv'd the Prince of Wales at the Entrance into that Apartment, and all three conducted him to his Bedchamber. An Hour after the Queen's Major Domo brought a Present of a fair Balon of massy Gold, a curious embroider'd Night-Gown, and other things of great Value. A Present was also sent by the Countess d'Olivarez to the Marquis of Buckingham, who, it is said, took it as an Act of Gallantry, and not of Ceremony; and fancy'd the Spanish Favourite's Lady encourag'd him to make Advances to her; which were incompatible with the Importance of his Negotiation, and the Severity of the Manners in Spain. The King gave Orders that his Highness shou'd have Keys to all his private Lodgings, even to his Bedchamber. The Prince was attended by Grandees and Titulados; and had all Honours paid him except that for which he came. He had never any better View of the Infanta than at a Distance, tho' he earnestly su'd for it, and was promis'd it from Day to Day by Olivarez. At last he was inform'd he cou'd not see the Infanta as a Lover till the Dispensation came from Rome.

English Noblemen in Spain.

For the greater Glory of his Highness's Court in Spain, the Marquis of Buckingham was created a Duke. The Patent was brought by the Viscount Doncaster, now Earl of Carlisle; with whom went several English Noblemen and Gentlemen, and others going before and coming after, the Prince was circled with a splendid Retinue of his own People; as the Lord Kensington, Captain of King James's Guard; the Earl of Denbigh, Edward Lord Kimbolton, the Lord Viscount Rochford, and others. The Outside of the Reception he met with was gallant and promising. But the grand Affair became every Day more intricate. The Spaniards doubted not of making him a Convert; for he seem'd to be so enamour'd, that they thought he wou'd at any rate have purchas'd the Enjoyment of his beauteous Princess. Sanderson, an Historian very much in Credit with Echard, affirms, There never were any Proposals or Design to alter the Prince's Religion. But Echard himself tells us, "The Pope us'd all his Endeavours to cause the Prince to turn Catholick; the Spaniards promis'd him great Assistance if the English shou'd rebel; Orations, Processions and pompous Shows were made to allure him; Popish Books were dedicated, and Popish Pictures presented to him". The Pope himself wrote him a Letter, in which, according to Wilson, he us'd all the Rhetorick of his Cabalistical Consistory and holy Chair to charm him to his Obedience. The Archbishop of Embrun was told by the Duke of Buckingham, that when the Prince demanded to be admitted into the Infanta's Company, he was refus'd unless he wou'd first make Profession of the Catholick Religion before six or seven Witnesses at least, to which they endeavour'd to persuade him with all the Artifices imaginable. He was permitted to write to her, as he did several times, and receiv'd an Answer, which the Prince believ'd to be written with the Hand of the Infanta; but it appear'd afterwards to be compos'd by one of her Ladies of Honour. The Prince of Wales return'd a civil Answer to the Pope; wherein he says, It has been his greatest Care to be united to his Holiness; that he had always been far from encouraging Novelties, and to be a Partisan of any Faction against the Catho-

lick Religion. That he will seek Occasion to take away Suspicion, and desir'd but one Religion and one Faith; having resolv'd in himself to spare nothing that he has in the World, his Estate and Life, for a thing so pleasing as the uniting us to the Church of Rome: for no Man in his Wits can think the Pope wou'd unite himself to the Church of England. He then implores the Almighty to give his Holiness Health and Happiness. How does this agree with Archbishop Abbot's Letter to King James when he heard of the Articles in Favour of Papists, which were the Conditions of Marriage: *I beseech you to take into Consideration what that Act is, what the Consequence may be. By your Act you labour to set up the most damnable and heretical Doctrine of the Church of Rome, the Whore of Babylon. By this you shew yourself a Patron of those wicked Doctrines which your Conscience tells you are superstitious, idolatrous, and detestable. And hereto I add what you have done by sending the Prince into Spain without the Consent of your Council, the Privy or Approbation of your People. The Drawers of him into this Action, so dangerous to himself, so desperate to the Kingdom, will not pass unquestion'd and unpunish'd. He closes all thus: And now, Sir, do with me what you please. Why shou'd Echard doubt the Truth of King James and the Prince's swearing to the Articles which contain'd this Toleration, when the Archbishop so severely rebukes him for it? His only Reason is, that so trifling an Author as Nalson does not speak of it, and that what the Archbishop charges the King with directly is not probable. The Articles being sworn, and the Dispensation come from Rome, his Majesty cry'd out in a Transport, All the Devils in Hell cannot break the Match. To which one softly reply'd, There is not a Devil left in Hell; they are all gone to Spain to make it. Wilson informs us how the Dispensation was obtain'd. The Pope finding by the Prince's Letter, and some other private Intimations, his good Affection to the Roman See, thought it high time to dally no longer, but to draw him altogether with "the Cords of Love". The Articles which Nalson does not speak of, and therefore Echard does not believe them to be true, were confirm'd in Council, and the following Privy-Counsellors sign'd them as Witnesses: John Bishop of Lincoln, Lord Keeper; Lionel Earl of Middlesex, Lord Treasurer; Henry Viscount Mandeville, Lord President; Edward Earl of Worcester, Lord Privy-Seal; Lodowick Duke of Richmond and Lenox, Lord Steward; James Marquis of Hamilton; James Earl of Carlisle; Thomas Earl of Kelley; Oliver Viscount Grandison; Lancelot Bishop of Winchester; George Lord Carew; Arthur Lord Chichester; Sir Thomas Edmonds; Sir John Suckling; Sir George Calvert; Sir Edward Conway; Sir Richard Weston; Sir Julius Caesar.*

Most of these Counsellors were profess'd or suspected Papists, and the others set their Hands against their Wills. The Articles being sworn, the King gave the Spanish Ambassador a Royal Entertainment; and, as Wilson avers, took a private Oath to observe certain other Articles in Favour of the Romanists, and for the free Exercise of Popery in all his Dominions. The Encouragement this gave the Papists appear'd by the Boldness and Insolence of their Priests and Jesuits, who dar'd the Protestants to Disputations, and insulted them with this Question, Where was your Church before Luther? Many were perverted by their sophistical Arguments; particularly one Edward Buggs, Esq; a Gentleman of London, 70 Years old, whom they seduced in a Fit of Sickness. After his Recovery he was troubled in Conscience, and desir'd a publick Dispute; which was held at the House of Sir Humphry Lind between Dr White and Dr. Featly Protestants, and Father Fisher and Father Sweet Jesuits; where Featly handled the Argument with Disputations.

There was another Disputation, which wou'd have been of greater Consequence had the Person perverted been as eminent for Piety as Quality, I mean the Countess of Buckingham, the Duke's Mother, who had all along been in secret a Papist, and now declar'd it openly. The same Jesuit Fisber was the Countess's Champion, and the same Dr. White Dean of Carlisle oppos'd him; as did also the Lord-Keeper Williams, who advis'd the Disputation to clear the Duke's Character and Bishop Laud. The Dispute was held in Presence of the King, and a numerous Conflux of Persons of Quality. There were three Conferences, the first was manag'd by Dr. White, the second by Bishop Williams, and the third by Bishop Laud, his Majesty being Moderator. The partial Heylyn says, Bishop Williams only put in a word or two sometimes; which is false. For the second Conference was manag'd entirely by him, as Bishop Hacket affirms; and if he was not so vain as Laud to print his Disputation, Bishop Hacket gives us this Reason: He never wrote any thing with Intention to let the World see it, unless Necessity constrain'd him. But notwithstanding the Advantage the Protestant Disputants had in the Argument, the Countess remain'd unconverted, knowing full well that neither the King nor her Son had her Conversion at heart.

Bishop
Hacket,

About this time happen'd a very sad Accident in Blackfriars, where a great Auditory of Papists were assembled to hear Father Drury preach: The Floor of the Chamber falling down kill'd the Priest, and near 100 of his Congregation, maiming and bruising most of the rest.

Spanish
Match.

To return to Spain: We must observe that when the Articles were sworn, and the Dispensation arriv'd, the Infanta was stil'd Princess of England by those who favour'd the Match, and they were not many; so general was the Hatred to our Religion. The Prince was admitted Access to her in Presence of the King; and great was the Talk of celebrating the Nuptials, and her embarking for England, when on a sudden News came of the Pope's Death, which render'd the Dispensation null. But the Spaniards to keep the Prince in heart promis'd to procure another from the new Pope; and if a new one was not soon chosen, to have it from the Dean of the sacred College of Cardinals. The Prince's Impatience was stunn'd at this Delay; and the Court of Spain having given the Duke of Buckingham some Occasion of Disgust, it took off the Edge of his Zeal for the Match, and ended in as great Zeal against it. Wilson tells us, that Disgust arose from a Trick that was play'd him by the Countess d'Olivarez, who put a distemper'd Strumpet to Bed to him, when the Assignment was made for herself; and this is the general Report of Historians, who have written of the Journey to Spain. But the Author or Authors of the History of the Rebellion, who affect every where to be as directly against the Truth as is the Cause they wrote for, resolv'd not to leave the Character of this fast Friend to Laud with such a foul Spot, and wipe it off at the Expence of the Countess: She was then an old Woman past Children, of so abject a Presence, in a word, so crooked and deformed that she could not provoke his Appetite. Sir Anthony Weldon says in so many words, She was a very handsome Lady; and it was plotted between her Husband and her to palm a Stew upon Buckingham instead of that Beauty. Weldon was a Courtier contemporary with this Affair; and it is impossible he shou'd mistake a crooked, deform'd old Hag for a beautiful Lady. Sir Edward Peyton, Knight of the Shire for the County of Cambridge, who much frequented the Court at that time, tells us, Olivarez foisted a foul Courtesan into his Bed, instead of his Lady often solicited by

Buckingham. Sir Walter Aston, who wish'd as A.D. 1623: well to the Cause as the Lord Clarendon, gives good Reason to believe the Lady was neither ugly nor coy; for in one of his Letters to the Duke after he was gone he writes, The Condesa of Olivarez, bids me tell you she kisses your Grace's Hands, and prays for you by Name daily. Larrey, a French Historian, speaks of the Duke's Passion for this Countess. Buckingham's Resentment was just kindled, when he receiv'd a Letter from the Queen of Bohemia. The Archbishop of Embrun writes, that Buckingham shew'd him a Letter of the King of Bohemia's dated at the Hague, wherein he intreated him to take care that the Restitution of the Palatinate be inserted in the Marriage Treaty; and as an Acknowledgment of this Favour, and also as a Testimony of the perpetual Friendship he intended to contract with his Grace, he propos'd that his Daughter, about seven Years old, shou'd be marry'd to the Duke's eldest Son; ro which Embrun found him much inclin'd: for he told him the King was not very averse to it. So much greater was his Affection to his Favourite than to his Family. The Queen of Bohemia in her Letter desir'd all his Friendship in behalf of herself and her Children. Accordingly he aggravated the Delays and Provocations of the Spaniards in his Letter to the King. At which his Majesty was so provok'd, that he wrote the Duke to bring back his Son with all Speed; but if his youthful Follies shou'd tie him to a long Expectation, he charg'd him by his Allegiance to come away and leave him. This Letter was immediately shewn to the Prince, and so wrought upon him, that he took a sudden Resolution to return to England; of which the Spanish Ministers having Notice, they were mightily concern'd, it destroying all their Hopes of completing the Prince's Conversion if he staid out the Winter; and in case of Consummation of the Marriage, then they hop'd the Infanta might prove with Child in the Spring, which wou'd give them a Pretence to keep her there till she was deliver'd, that so the Child might be bred up a naturaliz'd Spaniard. For whatever they did before, the Spaniards did now sincerely intend the Match, to secure the great Advantages they had obtain'd for the Papists in England. The Marriage Articles being stil'd at Rome, For the Augmentation and Weal of the Roman Catholicks, Olivarez upbraided Buckingham with a Promise that the Prince shou'd turn Papist. The Duke said it was false; and hot Words pass'd between them to their mutual Resentment, especially on the Side of Buckingham, who made haste to embark aboard the English Fleet at St. Andero, which was sent to fetch the Infanta. He little regarded Ceremony at his Departure, and told the Count-Duke very frankly, I am oblig'd to the King, Queen, and Infanta in an eternal Tie of Gratitude; but for yourself, you have so far disoblig'd me, that I cannot without Flattery make the least Profession of Friendship for you. The Duke took no Leave of the Countess, and little of any one: he left the Prince to manage his own Business. His Highness took an Oath to solemnize the Marriage ten Days after the Dispensation came from the new Pope. The King of Spain took an Oath that it shou'd be solemniz'd. A Procuration was seal'd by the Prince to the King and his Brother Don Carlos, and left in the Hands of the Earl of Bristol, who was not to know the Contents till the Dispensation came from Rome. His Highness oblig'd the King to swear to the Solemnization of the Match, alledging the Infanta might retire into a Cloyster, and defraud him of a Wife; and there was some Reason to be jealous of it, for whatever is said of her Inclination to the Marriage, is said to put a Colour on the Folly and Rashness of the Prince's Journey to Spain, and his long Stay there. Who that has read the Catholic King's Letter to Olivarez before-mention'd, and

The Count-Duke says the Princess was resolv'd to put herself into the Descalzas, an Order of bare-footed Nuns, rather than she wou'd marry the Prince of Wales. But Archdeacon Echard, one of the most credulous Writers that ever assum'd the Title of an Historian, tells us, because it is for the Credit of King Charles I. She had many Divine Duties, he means Masses, perform'd for the Safety of the Prince's Return to England; and that she said at their parting, If the Prince lov'd me, he wou'd stay for me; his Highness telling her, My Heart can never be out of Anxiety, till you have past the intended Voyage, and are safe on the British Land. Echard assures us, she said with a Blush, what wou'd rather become the Mouth of a formal Pedant, than a gay young Princess, If I am in Danger on the Ocean, or compos'd with the rolling brackish Waves, I shall cheer up myself, and remember all the Way to whom I am going. Very likely this to come from the Mouth of a Lady who wou'd never let him see her but with Ceremony, tho' he was very desirous of it. He was always ogling her when in her Presence, and once climb'd up a high Wall to have a Sight of her in a Garden. He presented her with a Necklace of Pearls of inestimable Value, which was return'd upon breaking off the Match; tho' it be now indifferent, says Wilson, whether the French or Spanish have them. He also made most of the Court Lords and Ladies Partakers of his Bounty, and Buckingham enrich'd the Spanish Beauties with Diamonds and Pearls.

The Prince's Return. The King of Spain brought the Prince to the Escorial, where he was magnificently entertain'd; and when they parted, his Majesty told his Highness, Nothing in the World cou'd more oblige me, than the Confidence you had in me to put yourself in my Hands, being unusual with Princes. But I, who value my Honour above all earthly Things, am the more endear'd to you, in that you gave me an Opportunity to express it. He protested, he earnestly desir'd a nearer Conjunction of brotherly Affection with him, for the more entire Union between them. The Prince reply'd, I am sensible of those high Favours I have found during my Abode in your Court and Presence, which has set such an Estimation on his Worth, that I know not how to value it; but I will leave a Mediatrix who shall make good my Defects, if you will do me the Honour, and make me so happy, as to preserve me in the good Opinion of her, my most fair, my most dear Mistress. They then embraced, and went their several Ways. A Marble Pillar was erected in the Place as a Monument of their parting. The Prince was attended to St. Andero by Cardinal Zapata, the Marquis Aytone, Count Gondemar, Count Monterey, Count Barajas, and other Grantees, who were all royally entertain'd aboard the English Fleet riding off that Port; but a Tempest rising as they were getting ashore again, frighted the Dons so much, that they were soon weary of the Sea-Coasts, and return'd to Madrid. At St. Andero Cardinal Zapata deliver'd his Highness a Packet of Letters seal'd up, in which the Prince, when he open'd it, found all the Letters written by him to the Infanta, folded up and seal'd as he sent them. A plain Indication that they resolv'd he shou'd never make any way in her Affections, and never have her, if they cou'd not have whatever they demanded in Favour of Popery and Papists. Father Orleans affirms, that King James and Buckingham being both inclin'd to the Church of Rome, design'd chiefly by this Match to dispose the Affairs of England to an entire Re-union with the Papal See. Heylin discovers another main Design of that Treaty, which was, by the Assistance of an Army of Spanish Papists, to destroy the Puritans in England. His own Words are, The near Alliance with the Court of Spain, wou'd arm the King with Power to suppress that Faction. I doubt not his Party were very angry with him; and call'd him Idiot, Fool, Babler, and an hundred Names, for discovering a Secret which made the Matter a thousand times worse than the Puritans themselves thought it was.

While the Prince was at Madrid, he receiv'd a Letter from the Pope, Gregory XV, dated April 20th 1623; which was not clandestinely deliver'd to him, but by the Pope's Nuntio, in Presence of the greatest Court Lords; and the Prince did not fail to send his Holiness a most dutiful and complaisant Answer; wherein he says, He will make it his Business for the Remainder of his Life; to have but one Religion and one Faith with the Pope, seeing that we believe in one Lord Jesus Christ. And again; 'Tis certain I shall never be so affectionate to any Thing in the World, as to endeavour an Alliance with a Prince who hath the same Sentiments of the true Religion with myself. Here he affirms that the Idolatries of the Romish Church, the Harlottries of the Whore of Babylon, are the true Religion. If so, what then must the Protestant Church of England be? And what does all the pretended Martyrdom come to? His Behaviour in Spain was agreeable to the pious Sentiments in his Letter to the Pope. Howel, his Secretary, who was with him at Madrid, says, He made no Shew of the Protestant Religion at the Royal Palace where he lodg'd, but on the contrary, his Carriage in that Respect was such, that the Spaniards took him for a good Catholick: And foreign Accounts say, He there from a Balcony saw a Procession, and bow'd his Knee to the Host; which I do not remember as something strange and surprizing; for as during his whole Life and Reign he countenanc'd and favour'd Papists, so might he from the same Principle comply with, and occasionally conform to Popery. I have seen a Vindication of this Letter with as much Reason and Eloquence as might be expected in so noble a Cause, but too mean and vile to deserve a sober Answer.

The Fleet setting sail for England, arriv'd at Portsmouth the 6th of October, and on News of his Highness's being landed, the whole Kingdom was in a Blaze; for there were few who had not Fears of some ill Accident or other happening to him in Spain; and wise Men did not impute the King of Spain's letting him go to his Honour. Monsieur Spanheim reflects upon it thus, in his Life of Louisa Juliana, Daughter to William Prince of Orange, and Mother to the King of Bohemia, Father of the Princess Sophia Electress of Hanover; so nearly were the Houses of Hanover and Orange related. Never Prince, says the learned Spanheim, was more oblig'd to a Sister than Charles I. was to the Queen of Bohemia, since it was only the Consideration of her and her Children, who were then the next Heirs after him to the Crown of England, that prevail'd with the Court of Spain to permit him to see England again.

While the Prince and Buckingham were at St. Andero, the Conduct of the Spaniard in delaying the Marriage, was much aggravated by the Duke, and the Prince reflecting upon it seriously, grew every Day more and more cool in it. One Clark, a Creature of Buckingham's, was dispatch'd to Madrid, with Orders to Bristol not to deliver the Powers left in his Hand, till he had further Directions. These Counsels were too late. The Prince had sworn to the Marriage, and the Earl of Bristol was so troubled at this Double-dealing, that he resolv'd to deliver the Procuracion within ten Days, if the Dispensation came, and justify himself by the Authority he had receiv'd from the King under the Great Seal of England, unless he had a Command from his Majesty to the contrary within a limited Time. Bristol had negotiated this Affair in the Reign of Philip III. the Infanta's Father, and built very much on the Merit of having obtain'd a Portion of two Millions, four times as

A.D. 1623. much as had ever been given with an Infanta of Spain. It mortify'd him extremely to see the Building he had rais'd in so tottering a Condition, the March, as he wisely conjectur'd, being now very uncertain. After the Prince's Departure, he follow'd the Negotiation closely, was daily at the Palace to attend the Infanta, and was assisted in it by the Countess de Olivarez. The Duke of Buckingham was jealous he wou'd rather push the Matter forward, than put it back; he therefore left Clark behind him to be a Spy upon him. When the Letter about stopping the Procuration was deliver'd to Bristol, he was equally troubled and surpris'd, telling Clark, it must for a Time be conceal'd, for he fear'd if the Spaniards shou'd come to the Knowledge of it, they wou'd stop the Prince.

King James being at Royston when the Prince and Duke came Post to London, they both hasten'd thither, and gave him a fair and plausible Account of their Proceedings, laying all the Blame on the Delays of the Spaniards and Bristol's Miscarriages; which the King, as an indulgent Father to his Son, and a kind Friend to his Favourite, took in current Payment without further Examination. The Prince and Duke fell in with those Lords of the Council who had ever been averse to the Marriage. These were of Opinion that a Parliament shou'd be called, as the best Remedy for all Evils; and that the fraudulent Dealings of the Spaniards shou'd be laid open. The News of a Parliament to be summon'd for that Purpose, was receiv'd with universal Joy throughout the Nation. An absolute Command was sent to Bristol to suspend the Delivery of the Proxy till Christmas tho' the Dispensation came, and to demand the Restitution of the Palatinate and Electoral Dignity, which were neglected in the Conclusion of the Treaty. The King cou'd not say a Truth himself, which all the Kingdom said while 'twas negotiating, It wou'd be very strange in him to receive one Daughter in Joy, and leave another in Sighs and Tears. There was a Clause in the Procuration left by the Prince, that the Power of that Instrument shou'd expire at Christmas; so that the Execution of it was to be respite'd till it was invalid. Thus was the Marriage effectually annull'd, and the Design kept secret for the greater Affront to the Spaniards, who made all solemn Provisions for accomplishing it, they being now in earnest after such ample Toleration was granted to the Papists. Thus when King James wou'd have sacrific'd all his true Interests to the Marriage, the Spaniards amus'd him with a fraudulent Treaty, and now he is wean'd from it they are as fond of it as ever he had been. An Embassy was sent from Spain to England, to congratulate the Prince's safe Arrival. The Ambassador was instructed to go to Flanders, Germany, and Italy, and make known to the Princes how near the Marriage was to Consummation.

In the beginning of December, the new Pope's Dispensation came to Madrid, upon which Bonfires were made throughout all Spain, and the Artillery was every where fir'd. The Polish Envoy at Court, whose Errand was to obtain the Infanta for that King's Son, disappear'd when he understood the Dispensation was come, and saw the Preparations which were making for the Wedding. A Day was set to celebrate it, the 9th of January; a Tarras was erected between the Court and the next Church, near a quarter of a Mile in length, cover'd with Tapestry, and all Things were appointed in the highest State for so great a Solemnity. Presents were providing in the Court of Spain for King James and the Prince of Wales. The Infanta's Family was settled, and it seems by what we read in Wilson, the Dispensation had made a Conquest over her maiden Modesty. She us'd her best Skill amongst the Sweets of Spain, to cloath her Lord and Husband with some Suits of perfum'd Amber Leather, some embroider'd with Pearl, and some with Gold. She had long practis'd the English Tongue to make it natural by the Help of her two Jesuit Tutors Wadsworth and Boniface. She had begun to draw the Letters she intended to send the Prince her Husband, and the King her Father-in-law, on the Day of her Espousals. Her Journey into England was resolv'd about the beginning of March; and in the height of her Expectations, and the Expectations of the King and Kingdom of Spain, fell all this glorious Fabrick at once, the Earl of Bristol declaring by Command of his Master, that without the Restitution of the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity, the Treaty shou'd proceed no farther. Four English Messengers, Killingrew, Wood, Griesly, and Dacres, follow'd each other at the Heels with Dispatches, confirming the Earl of Bristol's last Instructions. The King of Spain gave his Answer, That the Palatinate was none of his to give, and the Electorate was in the Power of another; but if the Emperor and Duke of Bavaria would not yield to Reason, he wou'd arm himself against them. Words were now a Coin which King James wou'd not be paid with, tho' he had had no other Payments from Spain since he had had any thing to do with her. The Earl of Bristol receiv'd Instructions to demand no more Audiences, nor deliver no more Letters to the Infanta, who was no more stil'd Princess of England. Such was the End of a Treaty which had lasted seven Years; a sort of Farce wherein the English were the Bubbles to the Catastrophe, and then the Tables were turn'd on the Spaniards. When one has read the Greek and Roman Histories, where every Thing is grand by itself, or by Circumstances, what a poor Impression must a seven Years Treaty of Marriage make? How tedious must it seem to both Writer and Reader? and what a Waste of Time to both? Yet without this Transaction, these seven Years of this Reign wou'd have been a sort of Vacuum; and the Necessity of saying something, is the greatest Part of its Importance, considering how inglorious it was thro' the whole Course of it; for the breaking a Marriage which had been so solemnly sworn, was certainly as dishonourable an Action as the negotiating it was a weak one: But it was a politick one, if we consider the Bent of the Nation, which was generally against it. 'Tis suppos'd the Expence of the Embassies to Spain during those seven Years, of the Prince and Duke's romantick Journey, the Presents given away by all of them, and by the King of England to accomplish this Match, amounted to a Sum not much less than the promis'd Portion.

'Twas a common Saying concerning King James, that he took Physick, and call'd Parliaments both alike, using both for meer Need, and not caring for either how little Time they lasted. We have mention'd the Prince's having seen the Princess Henrietta Maria in France. Her Youth and Beauty gave her some Advantage of the Infanta; and the Duke had no difficult Task to alienate his Affections from the King of Spain; and turn them towards a Daughter of France. The Earls of Holland and Carlisle were sent thither to feel the Pulse of that Court, which beat as it was wish'd, and the Treaty of Marriage was begun and ended in fewer Months than that with Spain continu'd Years. The latter cou'd not handsomely be broken by the King and Prince, who had solemnly sworn to it; and therefore a Parliament is summon'd to meet the 12th of February, but the King put it off a Week longer to mourn for the Death of the Duke of Richmond, who was that Morning found dead in his Bed.

On the 19th of February the Parliament met, Parliament and his Majesty made a Speech to them, which had less Cant and fewer Texts in it than his former Speeches. He told them he wou'd advise with them in Matters relating to his Estate and Dignity; and

A.D. 1624. and that as he had endeavour'd by this and the like Ways, to procure and cherish the Love of his People towards him, so he does hope, and his Hope is exceeded by Faith, that never any King was more beloved by his Subjects. Mr. Coke desires his Readers to compare this with what the King said and did last Parliament, when he boasted he had broken the Necks of three Parliaments, which were all that were in his Reign but this. He then ask'd their free Counsels about his Son's Match, the debating of which had formerly given him so great Offence. He spoke slightly of the Prince's Journey to Spain, but highly commended the Duke of Buckingham's Conduct, in whom he ever reposed the most Trust of his Person. He added, as God shall judge me, I never thought or meant, or in Word express'd any thing that savour'd of a Toleration of Popery. A tremendous Appeal this! Upon which my Author makes these Reflections, very natural indeed, but easily like to escape the Conception of an Historian, such as Echard, who sinks all this King's unhappy Qualities, for the sake of that most happy one his Zeal for the Church. "How was Archbishop Abbot mistaken, says Coke, when he wrote his dissuasive Letter against the King's Proclamation for the Toleration of Religion to Roman Catholics? How was my Lord-Keeper Williams mistaken, after the King had directed him and other Commissioners to draw up a Pardon for all Offences past by Roman Catholics, with a Dispensation for those to come in, putting a Stop to the Prohibition sent the Judges and Bishops to execute any Statute against them, If the King had never meant, nor in Words express'd, as God was his Judge, any thing that savour'd of a Toleration of Popery. Heylin, Echard, and such Writers, may take Pleasure in writing such History as this, but it must needs be shocking to all those that do not think his Favour to the rigid Ecclesiasticks sufficient to atone for worse Incidents even than this. His Majesty refer'd them to the Prince and Buckingham for what related to the breaking off the Spanish Match, and concluded thus: I speak as a Christian King, that never any wayfaring Men in the burning, dry, sandy Deserts, more thirsted for Water to quench his Thirst, than I thirst and long for the happy Success of this Parliament, that the good Issue of it may expiate and acquit the fruitless Issue of the former; which does not seem to be said with the greatest Depth of Wisdom, since this Parliament had by much a Majority of the same Members as the last; and the House of Commons shew'd by the Choice of their Speaker Sir Thomas Crew, that they came together in the same Temper, that Gentleman having lain under his Majesty's Displeasure for doing his Duty, and speaking freely in Parliament: But tho' they knew, says Wilson, there was an Intention of tolerating Popery; pray remember the dreadful Appeal before-mention'd; Yet they were silent, they seal'd up their Lips, and would not see the Light that discover'd it. That worthy Patriot Sir Robert Philips, Knight of the Shire for the County of Somerset, was one of the first who spoke in this Session; he said, This Day's Debate makes me call to mind the Customs of the Romans, who had a Feast once a Year for their Slaves, at which Time they had liberty to speak. After grievous Sufferings of many violent Oppressions, we have, as these Slaves had, a Day of Liberty of Speech, but shall not, I trust, be herein Slaves; for we are Freeman, not Bondmen. The Romans after their Feast were Slaves again, but it is our Hope to return Freeman. "This Gentleman, says a modern Author, left such an Example of publick Spirit to his Posterity, as it will be for their Glory to imitate. Warwick has a Fling at this Speech in his Memoirs, tho' he does not mention it. Sir Robert Philips spoke again thus; I more fear the Violation of publick Rights at Home than a foreign Enemy; the un-

accustom'd Violences trench into all we have; our Religion is made vendible by Commissions: Alas! Now a Toleration is granted, and Men for pecuniary annual Rents dispens'd withal, whereby Papists, without fear of the Law, practise Idolatry, and scoff at Parliament and all. Why is there nothing of all this in Echard's History? How comes it that those whose Duty it is to take Care of our Religion, to teach it and inculcate it, seem to have less Concern for it than Laymen, whose Duty only it is to learn and practise? Sir Robert Philips in another Speech said, It is well known the People of this State are under no other Subjection than what they did voluntarily consent to by the original Contract between King and People; and as there are many Prerogatives and Privileges conferr'd on the King, so there are left to the Subject many necessary Liberties and Privileges, as appears by the common Laws and Acts of Parliament, notwithstanding what those two Sycophants Sibthorp and Manwaring have prated in the Pulpit. How different are these Things from those in the Archdeacon's Books? Sir Robert Philips, an hundred Years ago, asserted the Rights of the original Contract, which Filmer, Brady, the Oxford Decree, Hicks, Lesley, Hill, T--p, Swift, &c. deny with so much Assurance, and which so many others of the Clergy have condemn'd as a Fiction since the Revolution. The House went directly to the Business of the Spanish Treaty, in order to which Buckingham made a full Narrative of it before both Houses in the Banqueting-House, and at the End of every Passage, he call'd the Prince to witness to the Truth of what he said, who always answer'd I or Yes. Throughout all his Discourse, he labour'd to make the Earl of Bristol as hateful to the Parliament as himself had been, laying on him the whole Blame of the Spanish Delays, and charging him with deceiving the King in his Advices of the Intentions of that Court, both as to the Marriage and Restitution of the Palatinate. He said those Delays put his Highness on the Journey to Spain, to which the King was persuaded to consent by the Prince's Reasons: That Bristol had advis'd him to turn Papist to facilitate the Match: That the Spaniards hoping the Toleration would cause a Rebellion, offer'd the Prince an Army to suppress it: That his Highness finding he was only delay'd, left a Proxy with Bristol to conclude the Marriage when the Dispensation came, but forbade him to deliver it, which however Bristol would have done, and made the Espousals, if Griesly had not brought a Revocation of the Proxy over Night. He clos'd all thus: If the drawing of us out of Darkness into Light, did deserve Thanks, we allow'd it to the Prince, who by the Hazard of his Person, and by his great Care and Industry, had done this for us. The Duke's Narrative was receiv'd by both Houses with universal Applause; old Murmurs were forgotten, and they could scarce contain themselves from acknowledging him to be the Preserver of the Nation. The Prince having escaped the Danger he had thrown himself into by the Spanish Journey, had made his Royal Person more dear to them than ever, as 'tis usual in human Minds to sympathize with such as have been in extream Peril, and to turn their Compassion into Loye. The Duke having been the Companion of the Prince's Dangers, and having led him thro' them, contrary to the Expectations and Fears of the King and Kingdom, the Rashness of his first Counsels were forgotten in the Safety of the last; and the Merit of breaking the Match more than atton'd for the Offence in forwarding it. Thus from a Grievance the Duke became a Favourite to the People as well as to the King; and the Parliament having taken the Treaty of the Marriage with Spain into Consideration, advis'd the King to break it off, and proclaim open War, offering their Lives and Fortunes for the Reco-

A.D. 1624. very of the Palatinate, and the Electoral Dignity; so dear were our most gracious Sovereigns Royal Ancestors to the good People of England in all and the worst of Times. Upon this Declaration the King determin'd to send instantly to Spain, to signify to that King, by his Ambassador, that the Parliament advis'd him to break off the Treaties, and recover the Palatinate by War. A Dispatch was drawn to this Purpose, but the King immediately repented of it, and wrote this Letter to Secretary Conway: "I doubt not you have heard what a stinging Petition against the Papists the Lower-House hath sent to the Higher-House this Day, that they might jointly present it to me. You know my firm Resolution not to make this a War of Religion; and seeing I would be loth to be Coney-catch'd by my People, I pray you stay the Post that is going into Spain, till I meet with my Son, who will be here to-morrow Morning. Do it upon Pretext of some more Letters to send by him, and if he should be gone, hasten after him to stay him upon some such Pretext, and let none living know of this in the Love of me, and before two in the Afternoon to-morrow ye shall without fail hear from me." The King was not rightly inform'd of the Contents of that Petition, there being no such terrible Thing in it as a War of Religion, only a War for the Recovery of his Son-in-law's Dominions, which he told them in another Speech he would consider of, after he had thank'd them for their Advice, and represented the Difficulties he lay under. He also valu'd himself for the Title of Rex Pacificus, and said War was Malum necessarium, a necessary Evil, as some say of Women. The Parliament, to animate him, offer'd him three entire Subsidies, and three Fifteenths, which they assur'd him was the greatest Aid that ever had been given. The Earl of Clarendon, if it was he who wrote the History of the Rebellion, says, They rais'd great Mountains of Promises, but never made them good, which too often falls out in such Counsels. Wilson on the contrary charges the King with promising much, and performing little. Such sort of Slurs on parliamentary Proceedings were common after Queen Elizabeth's Death, the Kings of the House of Stuart having had an Aversion to Parliaments, and with good Reason, because their Government could never stand the Test of them; they therefore put as much Disgrace on their Counsels as could be done with Safety. Coke assures us the Money was not only given, but squander'd away in carrying on a French Treaty.

Bristol.

The War with Spain being the Consequence of breaking off the Match, and that a Work of the Duke of Buckingham's, the Author of the History of the Rebellion tells us, "The King was infinitely offended, and wanted only a resolute and brisk Counsellor to assist him in destroying the Duke, and such a one he promis'd himself on the Arrival of the Earl of Bristol, whom he had recall'd, and who had the best Head of any Minister employ'd in the Marriage Treaty, or indeed in any other of King James's Affairs. The Earl had some Friends in Parliament, who sent him Information of what the Duke had said against him; and his Lordship to prepare the Way for a good Reception at home, wrote to his Grace; "If there have happen'd any Errors or Misunderstandings, I hope you will pass them over; and for any thing that shall personally concern my particular, I shall labour to give you that Satisfaction as may preserve your Friendship; and if that shall not serve the Turn, I shall not be found unarm'd with Patience against any thing that can happen to me." It was talk'd in Spain that his Life would be in danger, and he was so well with that Court, as to have an Offer of Protection and Honour from the King; of which Sir Walter Aston

A.D. 1624. wrote thus to Secretary Conway: "The Conde Olivarez told the Earl they had receiv'd large Advertisements out of England, by which they understood the hard Measure that he was likely to suffer by the Power of his Enemies; and that the only Crime which they could impute to him, was for labouring to effect the Marriage, which his Master could not but take much to heart; and held himself oblig'd to publish to the World the good Service that my Lord had done unto the King of Great-Britain; and therefore for the better Encouragement likewise of his own and all other Ministers that should truly serve their Masters, he was to offer him a Blank Paper, sign'd by the King, wherein his Lordship might set down his own Conditions and Demands; which he said he did not propose to corrupt any Servant of his Majesty's, but for a publick Declaration of what was due to his Lordship's Proceedings. He said farther, that in that Offer he laid before him the Lands and Dignities that were in his Master's Power to dispose of, out of which he left it at his Pleasure to chuse what Estate or Honour he should think good." The Earl reply'd, He was very sorry to hear this Language us'd to him; that his Catholick Majesty ow'd him nothing, but that what he had done was upon the King his Master's Commands, and without any Intention to serve Spain; and that howsoever he might have Reason to fear the Power of his Enemies, yet he trusted much upon the Innocency of his own Cause, and the Justice of the King, and that he could not understand himself in any Danger; but were he sure to lose his Head at his Arrival there, he would go to throw himself at his Majesty's Feet and Mercy, and rather there dye upon a Scaffold, than be Duke of Infantada in Spain, the Title which probably was offer'd him.

Before his Arrival in England, the Marquis Iniofa the Spanish Ambassador, had complain'd by Spanish Letters to his Master, that he could not procure a private Audience, tho' he had often desir'd it; and the War being near breaking out, the Marquis and his Brother-Ambassador Don Carlo de Colonna, resolv'd to be reveng'd on the Duke of Buckingham, whom they conceiv'd to be the chief Author of the Neglect they met with: Accordingly they drew up a Paper, wherein they represented, "That King James was kept as much a Prisoner by the Prince and Duke's Emisaries, as ever was King John of France in England; that the Prince and Duke had contriv'd at Madrid to take the Administration of the Government from him: In order to which a War was to be begun, and Forces rais'd under that Pretence; that the Duke had traduc'd his Majesty as a slothful unactive Prince, who abandon'd his only Daughter and her Children; that he had divulg'd the King's Secrets with respect to his Majesty's and their Master's Designs about the Hollanders; that he was guilty of corrupt Dealing with the Ambassadors of several Princes; and that the Duke encourag'd the Puritans in their Wishes to have the Succession settled on the Princess Palatine and her Children, after the Demise of the King." We see by this, that the Protestants in England always long'd for the Government of the Bohemian Line, and their good Wishes were at last crown'd with Success in the Reign of our late glorious King and his present Majesty. This Paper contain'd several bold Untruths, which the Spanish Ambassadors doubted not would terrify King James, and his Terror make a Breach between him and Buckingham: But it was some time before they could get an Opportunity to deliver it. At last Iniofa and Don Carlo, being accidentally at Court, when there was but a very thin Circle, Don Carlo held the Prince and Duke in earnest Discourse, while Iniofa slept

A.D. 1624. slip the Paper into the King's Hand, with a Wink that he shou'd put it into his Pocket. At the Bottom of the Paper they pray'd his Majesty to admit Don Francisco Carondelet, Secretary to Iniofa, to a private Audience when the Prince and Duke were in the House of Lords; which was perform'd by the Earl of Kelly, who introduc'd Don Francisco and a Jesuit, nam'd Maestro, to the King; and they confirm'd the Contents of the Paper, tho' one may well question the Truth of their Evidence. However, it wrought so upon the King that it threw him into a Fit of Melancholy; and the next time he saw Buckingham he cry'd out, Ah Stenny, Stenny; for so he ever call'd him in Familiarity; Wilt thou kill me? At which Buckingham started, and said, Who, Sir, has abus'd you? His Majesty recollected that he had gone too far, if he intended to prevent the Mischief; so he sat silent, and the Duke fell into a violent Passion, finding somebody had been with the King in his Absence. Upon Enquiry he understood it was Father Maestro, and that he had been introduc'd by the Earl of Kelly. Buckingham in a Fury demand'd of him, How he durst bring any one to the King without his Leave? Kelly did not disown it, nor shew any Fear of him; which was enough for the Court to foresee that the Duke's Fall was not so far off as he imagin'd. 'Tis true, the King defended him to one of the Spanish Ministers; but cou'd not help saying, He had noted him a turbulent Spirit of late, and knew not how to mitigate it; so that casting up the same, he doubted it might come to his Turn to pay the Reckoning. Bishop Hacket in the Life of Bishop Williams informs us, that in this Perplexity the King prepar'd to take Coach for Windsor, and found a slight Cause to leave Buckingham behind. As his Majesty was putting his Foot into the Coach, the Duke besought him with Tears in his Eyes to let him know the Charge against him, swearing he wou'd clear himself of it, or confess it. The King would not satisfy him; but express'd his Sorrow, that he was the unhappy Man alive, to be forsaken of them that were dearest to him; and weeping as fast as the Duke did, he made haste with the Prince to Windsor. Contrary to this, the Author of the History of the Rebellion asserts, there appear'd no Marks or Evidence that the King did really lessen his Affection to him to the Hour of his Death. The Prince of Wales in Discourse with Bishop Williams said of Buckingham, He hath lost the good Opinion of my Father, and I myself am in little better Condition. The Lord Keeper Williams having Information of what had pass'd went immediately to the Duke, whom he found lying on his Couch in such Confusion and Desperation, that he seem'd perfectly stupid. He wou'd neither rise up nor speak, tho' press'd to it by the Keeper, who told him, He believ'd God's directing Hand was in it to stir up his Grace, to advance him to those Favours which he possess'd to do him Service at this Extremity. He intreated him to hasten after the King to Windsor, and not to stir out of his Presence, but carry himself in the most amiable manner to prevent the Access of his Enemies, who probably might put the King upon dissolving the Parliament, which might prove very fatal to his Grace at that Juncture. The Duke, as waking out of a Dream, took his Advice, thank'd him, and posted away to Windsor. When he was gone, the Lord Keeper set himself to discover what the Charge was; which he did by means of a Mistress kept by Corondelet the Spanish Secretary, who got the whole Secret out of him, and even procur'd a rough Draught of the Paper Iniofa had given the King. He soon after had an Opportunity to pump the Contrivance out of Don Francisco, who having a Friend that was a Priest, and lodg'd in Drury-Lane, the Keeper order'd him to be seiz'd on purpose to get the Spaniard to his House; for he doubted not he wou'd come to interceed for his Friend. Francisco earnestly soliciting the Enlargement of the Priest, Bishop Williams reply'd, Wou'd you have me run such a Hazard: he is a dead Man by our Statutes. Now the Eye of the Parliament is so vigilant upon the Breach of Justice, especially in this Kind, to the sadding of our godly Men, who detest them that creep here out of Seminaries above all Malefactors, because they come with an Intent to pervert them who have liv'd in the Bosom of our Church. "My Lord, says Francisco, let not the Dread of Parliament trouble you; for I can tell you, if you have not heard it, that it is upon Expiration". They then enter'd into a long Conversation, and upon Hopes of obtaining the Priest's Liberty, Francisco open'd himself at large concerning Iniofa's Project; which when the Spaniard was gone the Lord Keeper wrote down, and carry'd the Paper to the Prince, who was return'd to St. James's. His Highness was equally surpriz'd and pleas'd at the Discovery, the more for that the Lord Keeper had taken the Pains to vindicate the Duke as to every Article of Iniofa's Charge in the same Paper. Buckingham's Surprize and Pleasure were much greater still. The Prince deliver'd it to the King, who read it deliberately, and at several Stops said 'twas well, very well. At the End of it he embrac'd both the Prince and Duke, and express'd great Joy at the Detection of the Spaniard's Machinations against them. Buckingham put the Prince upon writing a Letter of Complaint to Spain; but the Catholick King wou'd not receive it, knowing the Contents of it, and that it was to demand Satisfaction for Iniofa's Conduct; which was so far approv'd of by King Philip, that he sent the Letter unopen'd to Iniofa, who, as my Author affirms, sent it thus to the Prince. It will be seen in the Sequel of this History, how grateful the Prince and Duke were to the Lord Keeper for this good Office, which supported them both in the King's Favour and Affection, when they were in the most tottering Condition.

As soon as the Earl of Bristol arriv'd in England, he receiv'd a Letter at Dover from the Lord Conway, commanding him in the King's Name to retire to his House, and not come to Court. Upon which the Earl petition'd that he might make his Answer in Parliament to any Charge against him, to prevent which he was committed to the Tower; and tho' he was soon releas'd, it was on Condition he made a Submission, and retir'd into the Country.

The Disgrace of the Earl of Middlesex, which has been spoken of, happen'd about this time. He had given the Duke Offence by checking his extravagant Demands on the Treasury to answer his Profusion in Spain; and Buckingham took hold of this Opportunity to ruin him, when he had the Parliament on his Side. He easily got an Impeachment against Middlesex sent from the House of Commons to the Lords. Upon which his Majesty told him, He was in this Fit of Popularity making a Rod to scourge himself; and turning to the Prince, who was as forward in this Impeachment as Buckingham, he said, When I am dead you will have your Belly-full of Parliament Impeachments; and will remember to your Sorrow, how much you have contributed to the weakning of the Crown by it. Kings who are for arbitrary Power have all Impeachments in Abhorrence, for that they call the Ministers of it to Account, and are Barriers to the Liberties of the People. He knew enough of the Disposition of his Son to foresee that his Government would render frequent Impeachments necessary; and this Foresight is extoll'd as prophetic by Archdeacon Echard.

The Parliament was not in so good Humour with the Court, but they began to pry into the secret Treaty of Marriage with a French Prince, and to express their Fears that it would contribute Buckingham in Danger.

Earl of Bristol order'd to retire.

A.D. 1624. to the Growth of Popery. To prevent which they deliver'd a Petition from both Houses, wherein they pray'd his Majesty, That upon no Occasion of Marriage or Treaty, he would take away or slacken the Execution of the Laws against Jesuits, Priests, and Popish Recusants. The King told them in his Answer, that his Heart bled when he heard of the Increase of Popery. I hope this will be remember'd when we come to the Archbishop of Embrun's Negotiation to convert him and his Kingdoms to that Religion. That it was as Thorns in his Eyes, and Pricks in his Sides. He could not have been an honest Man, if it had not been his Desire to binder it. If he was not a Martyr, he was sure he was a Confessor, never King having suffer'd more ill Tongues. He protested he had never dispens'd with the Laws. How well this agrees with Lord Keeper Williams's Letter to the Judges: "His Majesty having resolv'd to grant some Concession to the Papists, hath commanded me to issue Writs under the Broad Seal, requiring you in every Circuit to discharge such as are in Prison. You are to make no Niceness or Difficulty to extend his princely Favour to them for any Church Recusancy whatsoever; as refusing the Oaths of Supremacy, dispersing Popish Books, saying of Mass, or any thing which doth touch or concern Religion". In the Close of the King's Answer to the Petition of both Houses, he tells them, they had given him the best Advice in the World, and might assure themselves that by God's Grace no such Conditions should be foisted in upon any other Treaty whatsoever. And in a Month or two after, such Conditions were agreed to in the French Treaty of Marriage, particularly that all English Catholics should be no more enquir'd after for their Religion, nor constrain'd to take the Oath, which contains something contrary to the Catholic Religion, &c. And generally that they should receive more Grace and Liberty in favour of the Alliance with France, than had been promis'd them in Consideration of that with Spain. Upon all which Wilson makes these just Reflections: "If the King had seriously consider'd the Minute of this Petition, and the very last Clause, wherein the Glory of God, and the Safety of his Kingdom so much consisted, as the Parliament wisely express'd and foresaw, and which the King says is the best Advice in the World, and which he promis'd so faithfully to observe in the next Treaty of Marriage for his Son, it might perhaps have kept the Crown on the Head of his Posterity: But when Princes break with People in those things which concern the Honour of God, God will let their People break with them; which Maxims hold in all Powers, whether Kingdoms or Commonwealths".

Amboyna. The Cruelties and Rapine of the Dutch at Amboyna in the East Indies will never be read by an Englishman without Horror and Resentment. The English had five Factories in Amboyna, one of the Spice Islands called also Setibe. The chief Factory was at Amboyna, the Capital of the Island, from whence the English supply'd not only Europe, but Persia, Japan, and other Countries with Spices. They had a Fort at Amboyna for the Security of this valuable Trade; and being better belov'd in the Spice Islands than the Dutch, the latter, who were the stronger in India, under some Pretext surpriz'd the Fort, and possess'd themselves of the English Factories. This did not satisfy them; they resolv'd to extirpate that Nation in those Parts; and pretending the English had plotted with the Natives to recover the Fort by Treason, they massacred some of them in a most horrible bloody manner, and made the rest Slaves not only in that Island, but at Poleroon and other Places to the Number of 1800. They also seiz'd their Effects to the Value of 400000*l.* This wicked and barbarous Action deserv'd the most exemplry Vengeance. The Honour and Interest of England were deeply concern'd in it. But how was it resented by King James: He only sent a Message to the Dutch Ambassador, that he had never heard nor read a more cruel and impious Act. But he added, I do forgive them, and I hope God will; yet my Son's Son shall revenge this Blood, and punish so horrid a Massacre. Neither his Son, nor his Son's Son struck a Stroke to revenge it, unless we allow that King Charles the Second's War to destroy the Dutch Protestants, and facilitate the Conquest of their Country by France, was to revenge the Wickedness and Cruelty of their Countrymen at Amboyna 50 Years before. Oliver Cromwel indeed when he gave Peace to the Hollanders oblig'd them to make what Satisfaction they cou'd, after a bloody and expensive War, for the Massacre at Amboyna. And since the Revenge was taken by him, this barbarous Action wou'd doubtless not have been so often aggravated by certain Historians, were it not more to render the Dutch odious, as they are Presbyterians and Republicans, than as they were Enemies to the Trade of England.

With what wonderful Delight does Echard dwell on the History of the Treaty of Marriage with the Princess Henrietta Maria, Daughter to Henry IV. of France. To which Alliance are in a great measure owing all the Miseries this Kingdom has ever since been involved in by the Principles and Practices of the Papists. The States General of the United Provinces recommended to the King a Protestant Lady of high Quality with a vast Fortune; but either not being the Daughter of a King, or being a Protestant, his Majesty wou'd not hearken to the Proposition. I have mention'd the Earl of Holland's being first sent to Paris on that Errand, where he appear'd so forward in the Business, and Richlieu the prime Minister was so well inform'd of King James's Apprehension of a second Disappointment in the Marriage of his Son, that tho' Lewis XIII. told the Earl of Holland, he had rather have the Prince of England to be his Brother than any other Man in the World; yet Richlieu stood off, telling him his Master, who was the eldest Son of the Church, should not abate any thing of what was granted to the Catholic King. And Coke says more was granted to Richlieu than to Olivarez. However, it is a dear Match with both the Earl of Clarendon and Archdeacon Echard, who are almost in as much Joy about it as the Bridegroom himself. It must be on account of that Lady's inveterate Hatred to Presbyterians; for excepting the Good she did England by that excellent Quality, they have not one Reason to speak of this Alliance but with Sorrow and Lamentation. The Princess's Portion was but 800000 Crowns; of which 2 or 300000 were to be laid out in Jewels, and for the rest she was to have a Jointure of 40000*l.* a Year. If she dy'd childless before her Husband, the Moiety of her Portion was to be return'd; and yet this Portion was to be paid at several Payments. Father Berulle of the Oratory, afterwards Cardinal, was sent to Rome to obtain a Dispensation; and to dispose his Holiness to it, he was order'd to explain the Benefit this Marriage wou'd be to the English Papists, since King James and the Prince wou'd oblige themselves by Oath no Favour of more to enquire after Catholics, nor punish them when discover'd; to enlarge all that had been imprison'd, and restore what Money or Goods had been taken from them: in a word, to treat them with more Favour than they cou'd have expected from the Alliance with Spain.

This was the least of the Papists Expectations; for there was now a secret Treaty on foot, carry'd on by the Archbishop of Embrun and Monsieur Dageant, a Creature of Richlieu's, for the Conversion of the Kingdom to Popery; and it was almost brought to Perfection. Dageant tells the Story with so many Circumstances, that Echard thought himself

A.D. 1624. himself obliged to take notice of it; but endeavours to invalidate the Credit of the Author, who writes it thus: "The King of England, at the Recommendation of our King, did often mitigate and abate the ordinary rigorous Proceedings against the Roman Catholics in that Country. He was also very well pleas'd with the Propositions that were privately offer'd to him on behalf of his Majesty, tending to reunite him to the Bosom of the Church; insomuch that after some reiterated Conferences, which were manag'd to that Effect in the King's Presence without communicating any thing of it to his Council, the Archbishop of Embrun made a Voyage into England, as it were without any Design, in the Habit and under the Name of a Counsellor in the Parliament of Grenoble, whom Curiosity had induc'd to see England. He had no sooner set his Foot on Land at Dover, but the Duke of Buckingham came to meet him; and having saluted him, whisper'd him thus in the Ear: Sir, You who call yourself a Counsellor of Grenoble, being the Archbishop of Embrun, are very welcome in these Dominions: You need not change your Name, nor conceal your Quality, for you shall receive nothing but Honour here, especially from the King my Master, who hath a particular Esteem for you. Indeed the King treated him very honourably, granted him several Favours in behalf of the Catholics, and even permitted him to administer the Sacrament of Confirmation to them in the House of the Ambassador of France. There were near 18000 Persons to whom nothing was said in the Entry at the Door, or elsewhere, tho' there was a great Concourse of People to see the Ceremony. During the Time he resided there, he had several Conferences with the King, whom he satisfy'd as to all the Points in Controversy; and who wrote a large Letter to the Pope, in which he acknowledg'd him as the universal Father of the Christian Church, and the Chief of all Catholics; assuring him, that after he had taken care of these things to which he had agreed, he wou'd openly declare himself. In the mean time he promis'd not to suffer any Search to be made in his Kingdom after Priests". In his Letter to the Pope, he desir'd his Holiness to vouchsafe that the Goods of the Church, which were now the Inheritances of private Families might remain so. He said he wou'd have profess'd the Catholick Religion before now, but that he desir'd first to gain over his Brother-in-law the King of Denmark, whom under another Pretence he had solicited to come to England, where he hop'd to convert him; and they two being joined together, wou'd draw after them almost all the Northern Countries. The Duke of Buckingham, and the English Gentleman who carry'd the King's Letter to the Pope, were the only Persons of King James's Subjects to whom he discover'd these Intentions. The Duke had promis'd to follow him, and had made a considerable Progress in his Conversion, at the same time that he pretended to be the Head of the Puritans to preserve his Popularity in the Parliament, and had consulted with Dr. Preston of Cambridge, how the King might seize the Dean and Chapter Lands; but he met not that Encouragement from the Doctor which he expected, and that made him the more inclinable to hearken to the Advice of the Lord Keeper Williams, who dissuaded him from that Project. King James solicited Monsieur Dageant to prevail with his Master Lewis XIII. to make use of his Interest with the Electoral Princes who were his Friends, that the Duke of Savoy might be elected King of the Romans, as he design'd to do with those Electors who were Friends to him, promising to assist Savoy with Forces in his Election and Instalment. But King James was too well known to be trusted by either the French

King or Duke of Savoy; and Dageant did not undertake the Affair. What he speaks of the Conversion was confirm'd eleven Years after by the Archbishop of Embrun's own Narrative, which he wrote at the Desire of Cardinal Richlieu, who demanded of him by Letter, Whether there was certainly at that time any Negotiation depending between his Holiness and the King of Great Britain concerning his Conversion. In Answer to which the Archbishop wrote a full Relation of his Reception at the English Court, and his Conferences with King James; in which, besides what is related by Dageant, we find he had two Hours Audience of his Majesty at Royston when he first came over; and represented the Grievances of the Catholics with such Success, that he cou'd not but acknowledge the peculiar Providence of God. For at that first Meeting, Orders were given to release the Catholics out of Prison; and suspend the Execution of the Laws against them. The People complain'd of his administering the Sacrament of Confirmation to so numerous a Congregation, but to no purpose; his Majesty answering them, He does nothing contrary to my Pleasure. At this time, and all others, says the Archbishop, wherein I had the Honour to see this King, he was so well pleas'd with my Propositions, that he freely disclos'd his Thoughts to me; and when I propos'd to him to grant Liberty of Conscience to the Papists, as the most effectual Means to give full Satisfaction to the Pope, he put his Hand upon mine and said, I plainly see you are the Person appointed by God, in whom I ought to confide and reveal the Secrets of my Heart. Afterwards he very freely acknowledg'd the good Opinion he had conceiv'd of the Catholick Faith, protesting to me that during his Minority, his Tutors having perceiv'd his Inclination to the Roman Religion, he ran great Hazard of being assassinated. Then as to the Toleration of Popery, he propos'd to have an Assembly of English Prelates and Divines, in Conjunction with an equal Number of Foreigners to meet at Bologne, after the Marriage with the Princess Henrietta Maria was consummated, with Consent of the French King and the Pope, to whom he wou'd write concerning it; and that I shou'd carry his Letter to the Pope, for whom, he said, he had a great Affection and Respect. This Assembly were to reunite the Church of England with the French and other Popish Churches. It wou'd have extraordinary and admirable Events, says the King, who promis'd to negotiate the Matter with the Princes in Germany, and the principal Puritan Lords in England and Scotland, that it might end to the great Advantage of the Catholick Church. The Archbishop proceeds: "As soon as I arriv'd in France, I gave the King a particular Account of all things, who was pleas'd to signify that he was very well satisfy'd with the good Designs of the King of Great Britain; and declar'd, that a Report was already spread abroad in France, that I had treated with that King about his Conversion, of which he had been inform'd by several Persons. I reply'd there were the same Suspicions in the Court of England: That the King of Great Britain had earnestly enjoin'd me to keep the Matter secret, and that I was oblig'd to beseech his Majesty to do the like. But all these generous Resolutions were made void by King James's Death. The first News of which was brought me at Maf by the King himself, who express'd his Regret in these Words, All our Hopes of England are lost". When the Archbishop of Embrun wrote this Narrative for Richlieu, Lewis XIII. was alive, and cou'd not but remember the Conversation he had with him about King James's Conversion to Popery; which that Prelate durst not have averr'd in the Royal Presence, and repeated it to the Cardinal Richlieu, had it not been true. Lewis XIII. was sure to see this Narrative, and Embrun wou'd not have mention'd the Discourse

He adds, That when Buckingham came afterwards to Paris to conclude the Treaty of Marriage with the Princess Henrietta Maria, "he persuaded him to use his Endeavours to prevail with his new King to keep a good Correspondence with the Pope, and to that End to maintain a trusty Catholick Agent at Rome; but he desired that the Proposition might come first from the King with whom I discours'd on this Subject; and he consented to it, ordering me to impart it to Monsieur Tronson, that he might put him in mind of it on the Road as he accompanied the new Queen of England, which I believe his Majesty may remember". Such were like to be the happy Effects of a Match, which was to restore the ancient Correspondence between the Pope and King of England, and settle an English Ambassador at Rome. But there is no Hint of any Danger from it in the History of this Alliance with France written by Archdeacon Eubard. The Pope easily granted a Dispensation for the Marriage with the Princess Henrietta Maria. But it did not take effect in this King's Life-time, tho' he liv'd long enough to sign the Articles; and the Author of Richieu's Life tells us, he swore to release all Catholick Prisoners, and to prohibit for the future their being ill treated for their Religion.

Papists in Places.

Indeed they were so far from being ill treated, that the Parliament, to use Wilson's Words, "bolted out divers of the Nobility and Gentry of Eminency, possibly affected, that had earth'd themselves in Places of high Trust and Power in the Kingdom, as if they meant to undermine the Nation;" as Francis Earl of Rutland, Sir Thomas Compton, the Earl of Castlehaven, the Lord Herbert, the Lord Colchester, the Lord Petre, the Lord Morley, the Lord Teinham, the Lord Windsor, the Lord Eure, the Lord Wotton, the Lord Scrope, Sir William Courtney, Sir Thomas Brudenel, Sir Thomas Somerset, Sir Gilbert Ireland, Sir Francis Stoners, Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Francis Howard, Sir William Powell, Sir Francis Lacon, Sir Lewis Lewkner, Sir William Auberric, Sir John Gage, Sir John Shelley, Sir Henry Carvel, Sir Thomas Wiseman, Sir Thomas Gerrard, Sir John Philpot, Sir Thomas Russel, Sir Henry Bedingfield, Sir William Wray, Sir John Conway, Sir Charles Jones, Sir Ralph Coniers, Sir Thomas Lamplugh, Sir Thomas Savage, Sir William Moseley, Sir Hugh Beeston, Sir Thomas Riddall, Sir Marmaduke Wivel, Sir John Townsend, Sir William Norris, Sir Philip Knevet, Sir John Tasborough, Sir William Selbie, Sir Richard Titchborn, Sir John Hall, Sir George Perkins, Sir Thomas Penruddock, Sir Nicholas Sanders, besides Esquires and Gentlemen. These were dispers'd and seated in every County, who were not only in Office and Commission, but had Countenance from Court, by which they grew up and flourish'd; so that their Exuberance hinder'd the Growth of any Goodness or Piety their Malice pleas'd to drop upon. We have mention'd Count Manfvelde's March into the Netherlands, when he could no longer maintain himself in the Palatinate; and the King to make good Part of his Promise to the Parliament, sent a Man of War, commanded by Sir John Chudleigh to bring him into England, where he was royally entertain'd at St. James's. Orders were soon given to raise six Regiments of Foot of 2000 Men each, to be commanded by the Earl of Lincoln, the Lord Doncaster, eldest Son to the Earl of Carlisle, the Lord Cromwell, Sir Charles Rich, Sir John Burroughs, and Colonel Gray. These Forces were design'd to pass thro' France into Germany, Passage having been promis'd them by the French Court, and even an Addition of Strength. Instead of which, notwithstanding the Treaty of Marriage was at that time depending, when the English Fleet with Manfvelde's Army aboard came before

Calais, the French dally'd with them so long, that Manfvelde was forc'd to sail to Zealand, where his Soldiers were serv'd as bad as at Calais; and not suffer'd to land. Provisions falling short, the Fleet sail'd up to Guertenberg in Brabant, where they far'd no better than at Calais and Zealand. Thus by the Detention of the Soldiers so long aboard, a Pestilence broke out and rag'd so extremely, that Multitudes were thrown into the Sea; and when afterwards they were suffer'd to land in the Territories of the States of the United Provinces, there was not a Moiety of them left; and those that remain'd fit for Service had not only the Spaniards to fight with, but their own Countrymen, whom the King had permitted the Lord Vaux and Sir William Parham to transport into Flanders in the Service of the King of Spain. My Author says he was present when the noble Earl of Southampton dy'd of a Lethargy at Bergben-op-Zoom, as he was conveying to England the Corpse of the Lord Wriothesley his eldest Son, who dy'd of a burning Fever at Rosendale this Winter. About the same time dy'd the Marquis of Hamilton, suspected to be poison'd, the Symptoms being very presumptuous, his Head and Body swelling to an excessive Bigness, full of great Blisters of various Colours, which with other suspicious Circumstances caus'd such a Clamour at Court, that Physicians were order'd to inspect the Corpse; but the Matter, according to Wilson, was huddled up and little spoken, only by Dr. Egleham a Scotsman, who exclaimed against Buckingham as the Author of it. 'Tis true, poisoning was more practis'd than it had been at any time in England; for not only Sir Thomas Overbury was murder'd after that manner, but, as we have hinted, there were more than Whispers that Prince Henry, the Duke of Richmond, and this Marquis went the same way. We are told his Majesty shou'd say when he heard of Hamilton's sudden Death, If the Branches be thus cut down, the Stock cannot continue long. Sir Anthony Welden tells us, the King had some Suspicion that he shou'd be so serv'd by his often saying to the Earl of Montgomery in his last Sickness, For God sake look I have fair Play.

This Sickness began with some Fits of an Ague, which turn'd to a Tertian, and is not reckon'd dangerous in the Spring. Wilson thinks his full feeding, and continual Use of sweet Wine, set the gross Humours at work; which was sufficient to turn his Ague into a Fever, and that enough to carry the greatest Monarch out of the World without the Help of Poison. Six Days before he dy'd the Duke apply'd Plaisters to the King's Wrists and Belly; and the Countess of Buckingham tamper'd with him in the Absence of the Doctors, giving him a Medicine to drink. The King complain'd of the Plaister, and his Physicians disallow'd of the Drink, insomuch that some of them refus'd to meddle further with him till the Plaisters were remov'd, his Majesty finding himself the worse for using them, which occasion'd Droughts, Raving, Fainting, and an intermitting Pulse. When some of the Doctors would have imputed these Effects to a Cold taken, the King cry'd, No, no; it is that which I had from Buckingham; who told him, as we read in Wilson, they were approv'd Medicines, and wou'd do him much good. Some of his Majesty's Physicians and Servants muttering against them they were frown'd upon, and others making a Noise were forc'd to fly for it. My Author adds, "Tho' the still Voice was silenc'd by the Duke's Power, yet the Clamour made so deep Impressions that his Innocence cou'd never wear them out. One of Buckingham's great Provocations was thought to be his Fear, that the King being now weary of his too much Greatness and Power, wou'd set up Bristol his deadly Enemy against him to pull him down. This Medicine was one of those thirteen Articles

 Cambridgeshire; by the Witness of divers Physicians, especially Dr. Ramsey, in full hearing at a Committee. Sir Dudley Diggs, another Member, said, I forbear to speak further of the Plaister in regard of the King's Honour. Osborn speaks of the Poison. Coke avers the Proof was next to positive.
 The Article concerning that Poison is in Rushworth, and more at large in Whitlocke. Bishop Burnet writes, My Father was then in London, and did very much suspect an ill Practice in the Matter; but perhaps Dr. Craig my Mother's Uncle, who was one of the King's Physicians, possess'd him with these Apprehensions, for he was disgrac'd for saying he believed the King was poison'd.
 To these Testimonies
 MS. let me add that of a noble Person now living, who told me, that Dr. Craig Physician to the King, invited six Lords to Supper at the Bear-Tavern at the Bridge-Foot, a House then of as much note as Brown's is now. The Duke of Lauderdale's Father was one of those Lords: The Doctor then assur'd them, that if they had Courage and Interest enough to protect him, he wou'd accuse the Duke of Buckingham of High-Treason for poisoning the King, and wou'd prove it. When he had so said, the Lords remain'd silent some Time; at last Lauderdale's Father said, He wou'd not advise
 P. 113. him to do it for his own sake; however he was of Opinion they shou'd consider of the Matter, and have another Meeting upon it, but they never met. Dr. Fuller informs us, that the Countess of Buckingham contracted much Suspicion to herself and her Son, for applying a Plaister to the King's Wrists and Belly, without the Consent of his Physicians, upon which the King grew worse, a Piece of it eating down into his Belly. The Physicians refus'd to administer Physick till the Plaisters were taken off, and then his Fits were easier, as Dr. Chambers testify'd; notwithstanding which the Plaisters were laid on again contrary to the Advice of the Doctors; and his Majesty growing worse, Mr. Hayes, one of the King's Surgeons, was call'd out of his Bed to take them off again.
 Mr. Baker, a Servant of the Duke's, made a Julep, which the Duke brought to his Majesty; the King drank twice of it, but refus'd the third time. After his Death a Bill was brought to his Physicians to sign that the Ingredients of the Julep and Plaisters were safe, but most of them refus'd it, and gave the same in Evidence before a select Committee of Parliament two Years after. Contrary to all these Suspicions and Proofs, the Earl of Clarendon, or some body in his Name, affirms, There was not the least Colour or Ground for it, as appear'd upon the most malicious Examination; which surely is enough to give every impartial Man a just Idea of his Impartiality. Echard informs us that the Lord-Keeper Williams, hearing of the King's desperate Condition, went and presented himself before him. But probably he had not heard that the Duke was afraid of the Lord-Keeper's Attendance, infomuch that he wou'd not at first give him leave to attend, as by this Close of a Letter from the Lord-Keeper to Buckingham, dated the 22d of March, five Days before the King's Death; I am extremely sorry to hear what a grievous Fit his Majesty had this last Night. Cabala. The Plaisters were apply'd, and the Drink given the 21st of March. And now am an humble Suiter again that I may come and look upon his Majesty; resolv'd to say what I shall never cease to say, God bless him.

 "It were worth the Knowledge, says Welden, what the King's Confession was; or what other Expressions he made of himself; but that was only known to Bishop Williams; who it was thought had babbled something which incens'd King Charles I. and Buckingham's Hatred so much against him." Among the few Things which cou'd be preserv'd of his Majesty's Death-bed Sayings, one is that calling to the Prince his Son, he recommended to him to love his intended Wife, but not her Religion; which doubtless he never said, tho' 'tis affirm'd by Echard, it agrees so little with the Progress he had made to unite the Church of England with the Popish Churches. And how needless was such Advice, if the royal Father had known his Son to be so zealous a Protestant as the Lord Clarendon represents him? Four Days before the King dy'd, he desir'd to receive the Holy Sacrament; and some one asking him, Whether he was prepar'd in Point of Faith and Charity, he said he was, and gave humble Thanks to God for it.
 He repeated the Articles of the Creed one by one, saying at the End of them, I believe them all as they are receiv'd and expounded by that Part of the Catholick Church which is establish'd here in England. Whatever I have written of this Faith in my Life, I am now ready to seal in my Death;
 adding, I forgive all Men that have offended me,
 and desire to be forgiven by all Christians whom I have in any wise offended. Having receiv'd the Sacrament, he profess'd some Hours after to the Standers-by, They cou'd not imagine what Ease and Comfort he found in himself since the receiving it; and so he gently departed on Sunday the 27th of March, in the sixtieth Year of his Age, having reign'd in England twenty-two Years and three Days. The Papists, who thought themselves pretty sure of him, crept much about the Chamber-Door when he was dying, but the Lord-Keeper Williams commanded them, as a Privy-Counsellor, to keep at a greater Distance. If they cou'd have got Access to him, we shou'd doubtless have heard true or false, that he dy'd a very good Catholic.

From the Actions of this Prince, one may easily form his Character; and like a Picture after the Life, the Blemishes must be drawn as well as the Beauties, to preserve the Likeness. Notice has been taken that he was a Lover of Peace, and that he valu'd himself much on the Title he acquir'd by it of Rex Pacificus. But was not that Love of Peace rather a Fear of War, or a Love of a State of Inaction and Indolence, or an immoderate Desire of Sport and Pastime. He is generally allow'd to be a Lover of Learning, but it border'd more upon Pedantry, than rose to a compleat Understanding. Coke explains what sort of Learning it was; "The Learning wherein he and his Flatters boasted, was a Scandal to his Crown, for "all his Writings against Bellarmine and Perrone,
 "were only Brawls and Contentions, without any
 "Learning, about the Papal Power of King-killing,
 "it being before exploded by the Nation, and "the asserting such a Power prohibited." This Quality has been touch'd upon elsewhere, and so has almost all the Qualities of King James in the Course of his History. Nay, even Heylin, who otherwise

A.D. 1625. therwise speaks so honourably of his Zeal for the Bishops, cannot help confessing he was not the wisest Man, nor the wisest King of the British Nations; that tho' he much pleas'd himself with boasting of King-craft, wise Men cou'd see what that King-craft was; it being no hard Matter to prove, that in all publick Treaties and Negotiations, and many private Conferences and Debates of Council, he was outwitted, and made use of to other Mens Ends, by almost all that undertook him. He is highly extoll'd for being most bountiful; but how was that Bounty dispens'd, on Favourites and Flatterers? and how was the Money rais'd, by Monopolies, Benevolences, and other unlawful Ways? I have heard the late Duke of Ormond prais'd by the Disaffected for his Generosity and Liberality; a Panegyrick which is a Scandal to common Sense and common Honesty. He was liberal and generous to his Creatures, but at the Expence of his Creditors: He wou'd give but not pay. King James had nothing of Cruelty in his Nature, unless he was surpriz'd into it by Fear; and the same Disposition that made him hate the spilling of Blood in War, turn'd the Bent of his Mind towards Mercy in Peace: But I can't say, as Dr. Fuller does, that not one Person of Honour was put to Death in his Reign, since Sir Walter Raleigh, a Person of more Honour than we meet with in his History, was not only put to Death, but without Justice or Reason. His Wisdom was next to infinite, if we may believe Sir Francis Bacon and other Panegyrists. Echard quaintly expresses it, He caught People's Inclinations at the first Rebound; but he confesses others thought his Wisdom was indeed Craft, and had more of Subtily in discovering Mischiefs, than of Ability in surmounting them. He adds, some thought this Quality wicked, and those that were foster-mouth'd term'd it an exquisite Skill in Dissimulation; in which he so much delighted, that it seems to be the greatest of all his Blemishes. Sir Anthony Welden is very coarse in his Expressions on this Subject, but what he says is not the less true; He was so crafty in petty Things, as the circumventing a Courtier, or changing a Favourite, that a wise Man was wont to say of him, He was the wisest Fool in Christendom. For my own part, I cannot help distinguishing between Dissimulation and Falshood; I do not think the professing and promising a Thing, and not doing it, or doing the contrary, is to dissimble, but to deceive. Besides, King James's Disguises were so thin, that very weak Eyes might easily have seen thro' them. Dr. Fuller frankly gives us the Reason why this King's Wisdom is so magnify'd by Echard, Sanderson, Clarendon, and that sort of Historians; No King of England ever did so much to preserve the Revenues of the Hierarchy. His Wit, says the same Doctor, was piercing, tho' his Majesty was wont to stoop to his Mirth. It had the Edge of Pun and Quibble, and did, according to Echard, too often descend to inferior Jest. The Archdeacon puts the greatest Affront that can be on the Genius of England, by affirming that the Genius of this King was suitable to that of the Nation. Thus when Edward III. and Henry V. were spreading the Glory and Terror of their Arms over the Dominions of France; when Henry VIII. was at Bologne and Tournay, and the English Name was terrible to all its Enemes; when the Genius of the Nation exerted itself in breaking the Power and humbling the Pride of Spain, it was

A.D. 1625. exactly like that of King James. It appear'd the same afterwards in Essex, Fairfax, Blake, in Talmaish, Churchill, and a thousand glorious Names, in whom the Genius of England shin'd out with so much Lustre. Mr. Echard assures us, That in spite of Calumny he was eminent for Chastity; which was remarkable in a Court so loose and luxurious. The Nonsense of which spoils the Eulogy; it being impossible for a Man who is himself very chaste, to encourage Lewdness and Luxury in others; and every one will allow that Luxury and Lewdness can never prevail at Court, without the Countenance and Favour of the Sovereign. The same Historian asserts, that he was pious and religious; and the next Words are another Instance of his Consistency; Yet in his Passion he wou'd be guilty of the profanest Oaths and Curses. Welden tells us, he was infinitely inclin'd to Prayer, but more out of Fear than Conscience. What follows of his Character in general, is taken from Coke; it is expressed with Acrimony enough, but has too much Truth in it: "He neglected foreign and domestic Affairs to wallow in sensual Pleasures, only great in making himself little, not below'd at Home, and contemptible Abroad. He squander'd away the sacred Patrimony of the Crown amongst Flatterers and Favourites; he neglected the Increase of the Royal Navy, and suffer'd the Dutch to fish on our Coasts, contrary to Treaty: He debauch'd and effeminated the Genius of the English Nation by a dissolute Life, that became more scandaliz'd for Swearing and Drinking than in any Age before: He broke all the Measures of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth, by which they made themselves Arbiters of Christendom. While he was fearful of all his Enemies, he exercis'd tyrannical Power over his Parliaments. He suffer'd the French King to suppress the Reform'd in France, and the Emperor of Germany to subdue the Protestants in the Empire, as well as his own Son-in-law: He left an empty Exchequer, and a vast Debt upon the Crown, at the same time that he was engag'd in a foreign War, the Money that was given him for it being all wasted on the French Treaty."

If these Things are true, as is sufficiently shewn in his History, let the Imitators of the Earl of Clarendon invert his Character, and he will then appear the wise, the pious, and the glorious King they wou'd paint him; but the Bishop of Salisbury in The History of his own Times, shews what those Authors were who flatter'd him, and what the King was whom they flatter'd. "I have seen the Originals of about twenty Letters he wrote to the Prince and Duke of Buckingham while they were in Spain, which shews a Meanness as well as a Fondness that render him very contemptible. The great Figure the Crown of England had made in Queen Elizabeth's Time, who had render'd herself the Arbitrer of Christendom, and was the Wonder of the Age, was so much eclipsed, if not quite darken'd during this Reign, that King James was become the Scorn of the Age; and while hungry Writers flatter'd him out of measure at home, he was despis'd by all abroad as a Pedant, without true Judgment, Courage, or Steadiness; subject to his Favourites, and deliver'd up to the Counsels, or rather to the Corruption of Spain."

During the R E I G N of King CHARLES the First.

A.D.1625.

PRINCE Charles, now Charles the First King of England, was at Theobalds when his Father dy'd, and the Lords of the Council attending there, order'd him to be proclaim'd at the Palace Gate; and notify'd it to the Lord Mayor, that the same might be done at London, where News of the King's Death came in Sermon-time. Bishop Laud being then preaching at Court broke off his Discourse, to which his Congregation was too much disturb'd to hearken.

The new King was proclaim'd the same Day in London and Westminster with the usual Solemnities; and in the Evening came to Whitehall in a close Coach, attended by the Duke of Buckingham and that eminent Divine Dr. Preston, who apply'd Comfort now to one, now to the other, on so sad an Occasion; tho' we have Reason to believe they did not want Comfort so much as the Doctor apprehended.

The next Day his Majesty was congratulated on his Accession to the Throne by the Nobility and foreign Ministers; and a Proclamation was publish'd; wherein he promis'd to shew himself a benign and gracious Sovereign.

On the 23d of April the Corpse of the deceas'd King was remov'd from Theobalds to Somerset-House, and carry'd thence in great State on Saturday the 7th of May to Westminster-Abbey, where it was solemnly interr'd. King Charles himself walked as chief Mourner between the Earls of Arundel and Pembroke, his Train born up by twelve Peers. The Funeral Sermon was preach'd by the Lord-Keeper Williams with high Strains of Rhetorick and Commendation, says Echard. How well grounded, one may perceive by the Bishop's commending him for being eminent in War.

The Funeral Solemnities are follow'd with those for the King's Marriage with the Princess Henrietta Maria of France, whose Zeal for the Romish Religion Cardinal Berulle so highly extoll'd to the Pope. The Earls of Holland and Carlisle were at Paris his Majesty's Ambassadors and Commissioners to compleat the Ceremony of the Espousals. The King's Proxy was the Duke de Chevreuse of the House of Guise; and on Sunday the 11th of May N. S. the Marriage was solemniz'd in the Church of Nostre Dame. The French King and Monsieur his Brother gave her to the Duke de Chevreuse. The Cardinal de Richlieu perform'd the Rites according to the Superstition of the Church of Rome. The News of which was not confin'd to the Walls of Paris, says Mr. Echard very elegantly, but resounded thro' all the Streets of London, where it was generally receiv'd with unusual Expressions of the most dilated Joy; which if it had been more true would have been a melancholy Proof of the People's having lost their Senses, as well as their Honour in the last Reign. A Foreigner tells us, "It was taken for an ill Omen, that this Marriage was celebrated in the immediate Time of the Funeral, and that the Joy for the one should mix with the Grief for the other, there being but one Night between the two Ceremonies." That there were Rejoycings is not to be doubted; but

A.D. 1625. but one may well doubt whether these Appearances of Joy were so unaffected, as the deep Concern all good Englishmen and good Protestants were in at the King's marrying a bigotted Papist, and entering into Alliance with a Prince, who had render'd himself the most arbitrary of any Monarch in Europe by the Counsels and Ministry of a tyrannical Priest. General Ludlow thought thus of it: "In the Beginning of his Reign he marry'd a Daughter of France, who was not wanting on her Part to press him upon all Occasions to pursue the Design of enlarging his Power; not omitting to solicit him also to mould the Church of England to a nearer Compliance with the See of Rome; wherein she was but too well seconded by the corrupt Ministers of State, whose Influence upon the King was always greater than could well consist with the Peace and Happiness of England". If such Reflections as these could have been conceiv'd by the Historian Echard, he would not have dwelt with so much Delight on the joyous Circumstances of this Popish Wedding. Besides the Earls of Holland and Carlisle, the Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Montgomery, were sent to Paris to fetch the Queen. Buckingham behav'd there with so much Vanity and Indiscretion, that it was a Scandal to the vainest Court in Europe. He had the Ambition to make his Addresses even to the French Queen, and was not so ill receiv'd as French Authors would have us believe; nay, one of them owns "he was so far from being ill receiv'd by the Queen, that he left the Chevalier Balhafer, his Confident, to carry on the Intrigue with her; that this Agent succeeded so well, that he brought him precious Favours from that Princess, as her Garter, a Diamond of great Value. The Cardinal had his Spies; but to no purpose: Those Argors were deceiv'd; but he still suspected something, and the Hatred between the two Rivals was redoubled". Buckingham had once contriv'd to pay her a private Visit, and consummate the Amour; but the Cardinal had Intimation of that very important Secret, and had the Duke gone to the Assignment he would have been assassinated. He had notice that his Plot was discover'd, and gave it over with a Menace, I will see and speak with her in spite of the Power of France. A true Gasconade; or rather a Threat, which would have founded well in the Mouth of Don Quixot in Pursuit of his charming Dulcinea del Toboso; for not the Power of England could have forc'd the French Queen out of her enchanted Castle. Yet this is the Man whom the Lord Clarendon, or the Oxonians, cry up for his good Parts and Qualities. He was Bishop Laud's Friend and Patron, and deserv'd on that Account as much Praise as is given him.

Buckingham's Amour with Anne of Austria.

Madame de Motteville, who was this Queen's chief Companion and Confident, speaks of it very tenderly; yet one can't help observing that the Duke of Buckingham was enough favour'd by the Wife of Lewis the XIIIth to give Jealousy to her Husband. "No wonder, says Motteville speaking in her Memoirs of the Duke of Buckingham, if with such amiable Qualities he had such aspiring Thoughts; such a noble, tho' so dangerous and unwarrantable a Passion; and that he had the good Luck to persuade those who were Witnesses of it, that his Addresses were not troublesome. The Queen far from keeping it a Secret made no Difficulty to tell me afterwards, that whilst she was young she could not imagine that the pleasing Conversation which is commonly call'd honourable Gallantry was blameable. There was a great Rumour about a Walk she took in the Garden belonging to her Apartment, when she went to conduct the Queen of England to Amiens. All her Retinue were there; and the Duke of Buckingham advancing to entertain her with Discourse, Putange, Master of her Horse, stepp'd aside for a few Moments, A.D. 1625. thinking it ill Manners to hear what the Duke had to say to her. By chance they came to a By-walk, where they were unobserv'd; and the Duke was so importunate with her, that she cry'd out. Putange running to her, she chid him for leaving her". The Duke of Buckingham's Passion put him upon another very bold Action. Tho' he had taken Leave of the Queen-Mother and the Queen at Amiens, in order to conduct the Queen of England to the Sea-side, where the English Fleet waited to transport her to Dover; yet he left Henrietta Maria at Boulogne, pretending he had receiv'd an Express from his Master, which brought him Orders to treat of an Affair with the Queen-Mother. Accordingly he hasten'd back; and after some Discourse with that Queen about his chimerical Negotiations, he went to wait upon Anne of Austria, whom he found all alone in her Bed. This Princess knew of his coming by Letters from the Duchess de Chevreuse, one of the Ladies who accompany'd the Queen of England; and she talk'd of it before Madame Nogent with a Smile; so that she was not so much surpriz'd at the Sight of him, as at the Liberty he took in kneeling down by her Bed-side, and kissing her Sheet with such extraordinary Transports, as shew'd his Passion to be violent to a degree of Distraction. The Queen's Confusion was so great, that for a long while she said not a word. But the Countess de Launoi told him, it was not the Custom in France to do as he did. To which he reply'd with great Presence of Mind, I am no Frenchman, and am not oblig'd to conform to the Custom of France. Then addressing himself to the Queen, he caress'd her aloud in the tenderest Expressions that could be; and her Majesty only complain'd that he was too bold, bidding him rise and be gone. He obey'd; and after having seen her again the next Day in Presence of the whole Court, he departed with a full Resolution to return again to France as soon as possible. Every thing relating to him was told Lewis XIII. to the Queen's Disadvantage, inasmuch that several of her Domesticks were turn'd away. Putange, Master of her Horse, was banish'd; as were also two of her Women Datal and Laporte, and her Physician. It is probable that the Jealousy of Cardinal Richlieu, who was also in Love with Anne of Austria, was the Occasion of this Rigor.

The dismal Consequences of the French Match are lively represented by Echard himself, notwithstanding the Pains and Pleasure he took in writing of it. "It prov'd one great Occasion of the Calamities of the Nation, and against the main Bent and Genius of the People. For almost all the Protestants took the alarm, as if the Marriage had been only made to introduce the Roman Catholicick Religion; King James having in effect condescended to many Particulars in Favour of the Queen's Domesticks and the English Papists, and taken so little care for the Education of the Children to be born of this Marriage, that unless he was resolv'd to break his Word, the Articles of the Contract were judg'd to be a Design to strengthen the Romish Party in England". Which being the whole Truth of the Matter, we shall make no Flourishes upon it, as the Archdeacon has done, only remember that the young Queen was attended to Bologne by Monsieur her Brother, and a numerous Company of Lords and Ladies: That she embark'd aboard an English Man of War, convoy'd by a Fleet of near 30 Ships of the Royal Navy: That after a tempestuous Passage she arriv'd at Dover, where the King met her, and receiv'd her with great Marks of Affection and Tenderness, and consummated the Marriage at Canterbury; where, as the reverend Author very gallantly expresses himself, the Duke de Chevreuse of the House of Guise, who perpetrated the bloody Massacre at Paris, resign'd her to

A.D. 1625. those Embraces which he ever prefer'd with conjugal Purity; of which something will be said hereafter. From Canterbury the Royal Pair went to Gravesend, Where, says the Archdeacon, they enter'd their Imperial Barge, and pass'd up the River in a triumphant manner; tho' the Triumph appear'd much more at Somerset-House, where, according to him, a Popish Chapel was open'd, a Convent of Capuchin Fryars establish'd, and greater Numbers of Priests and Jesuits repair'd than had been seen in England together since the Reformation, which began to cause Uneasiness and Murmurs in the People. Nor must we forget that amidst the Exultations for this blessed Marriage, the City of London was in Mourning and Lamentation, the most dreadful Pestilence that ever had been known in Europe then raging there, above 40000 dying this Year of the Plague; and a French Historian represents these Things very fair, tho' there is no Light of them in Echard and other such Historians. "This publick Rejoicing suited ill with a Time of Mourning; fatal Predictions were not wanting on the Queen's Entry in such a calamitous Conjunction, as if she had brought in her Retinue all the Scourges that were to make the Kingdom desolate: Such said they was the Entry of the Horse of Troy, which was welcom'd with Shouts of Joy by that City, tho' it contain'd their Ruin, &c.

A Pestilence.

Laud.

We have seen in the Reign of the Father what Hope the Duke of Buckingham had to continue in the same Degree of Favour with the Son. The Archdeacon tells us, King Charles was charm'd with some Qualifications which really were very wonderful; and then leaves off without telling us one of them. Larrey indeed is more particular, He had not charm'd but bewitch'd him, causing him to make Peace and War, to revenge his private Injuries, obliging him to dissolve his Parliaments to save him from being impeach'd; and in short, engaging him in all his Piques; thus sacrificing his Country, his Religion, his Master and Benefactor to his own Ambition. After this manner almost all Historians speak of him, except the Author of The History of the Rebellion, whose Work is the Reverse of Fact and Character in almost all Places. He assures us, He was not by Nature ambitious; and the Experience he had gain'd, if he had liv'd longer, and his jealousy of his Master's Honour, might have repair'd many Inconveniences, &c. Coke lets us know why it was that the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard cry up his Qualifications as really wonderful. "His only Support was Laud Bishop of St. David's, who from being an Informer was become his Vicegerent; a List of all the eminent Men for Promotions in the Church is given him; those whom Laud wou'd have prefer'd were noted O for Orthodox, and those whom he lik'd not, were mark'd with P for Puritans. These two stopp'd up both the King's Ears from any other Doctrine in Church or State, but what was infus'd by them." It is extremely pleasant to read what Excuse the Archdeacon finds for this King's sacrificing his own and his Peoples Interests to Buckingham's Pride and Avarice: A young and good-natur'd Prince, how this tallies with this Prince's Mother's Account of his Perverseness and Obstinacy, may suffer in the Opinion of such as know not how to make candid Allowances for the Heights of Friendship, and the Necessities of rewarding Services. While he is himself making one of the most idle Reflections that ever disgrac'd History, he calls in question the Judgment of his Readers, who do not know that a Prince may ruin himself and his Subjects out of Love to a Favourite, and finding himself under a Necessity of rewarding those that never did him any real Service.

I shall not imitate this sagacious Historian in drawing the Characters of Archbishop Abbot, Bishop Williams, and Bishop Laud. What he says of them all is arbitrary and partial, founded on no Facts, and faint Copies of the Lord Clarendon's, which having the same Infirmities, I shall content myself with relating what Persons did, and let the Reader determine what they were.

The Earl of Clarendon, or whoever else wrote the History that goes by his Name, opens it with two or three Misrepresentations, which well consider'd, will give any impartial Man a Disgust to the whole Work. He intimates that the Parliaments of England were not for a War to recover the Palatinate out of Zeal for the Protestant Religion, but out of Wantonness, and having surfeited with uninterrupted Pleasures. He then sets forth the ill Condition of the Exchequer at King James's Death, but does not say a word of that King's having wasted the Money upon his Minions, which had been given only for that Use. The present King's Wants put Buckingham upon calling a Parliament to supply them, or rather his own. The People of England were so much of the same Mind as at the last Election, that very few new Members were elected.

The Parliament met on Saturday the 18th of June at Westminster, and chose the last Speaker Sir Thomas Crew to fill that Chair. The King made a Speech to them in Substance, That the last Parliament had engag'd his Father in the War of the Palatinate, which was of Necessity to be prosecuted and supply'd. He then urg'd his great Wants and Charges, and concluded with a Compliment which had been seldom paid by Sovereigns, The veiling his Crown to the two Houses. The Lord-Keeper Williams spoke to the same purpose: But there was not one Word said in either of their Speeches of any Steps taken towards redressing Grievances, and putting the Laws against Papists in Execution, pursuant to the Petition of the last Parliament. No Excuse was made for misemploying the Subsidies which they had given for the Palatine War, only a peremptory Demand of more Money to be expended as the King and Buckingham thought fit. Yet, says Echard, there were many Reasons to dispose People to a general Concurrence and Satisfaction; and it cannot be deny'd that there were all the wise and just Measures that a new King cou'd take to render himself acceptable to his People, and considerable to the World: So notoriously against Truth and Reason, that almost all Historians do deny that there was one wise and just Measure taken. On the contrary, about a Month before the Parliament met, the King order'd the Lord-Keeper to cause a Suspension of the Laws against Papists. The Keeper apprehensive of his Fall, thought it was to no purpose to give his Advice, or to scruple those Orders; but when a Warrant came soon after from his Majesty to pass a Grant for 2000*l.* a Year to the Lord Conway for twenty-one Years, Bishop Williams boggled at it, telling the King, He durst not do it for fear of infringing his Duty to his Majesty, and drawing some Danger upon himself: The Reasons he gave with much ado prevail'd; but he made the Lord Conway his Enemy. His Majesty in the Declaration he sent the Lord-Keeper for granting full Liberty of Conscience to Papists, notwithstanding the Rigor of the Laws, whether penal or pecuniary, said, It was his Will they shou'd stand discharg'd. Thus we see that in almost the first Moon of his Reign, he set up a despotick Power against the Constitution, and his Will against Law, in Pursuance of the Design form'd by King James to introduce arbitrary Government, which his Son prosecuted more openly and avowedly. He granted a general Pardon to all Papists under Prosecution, not only as Papists, but as Criminals, and releas'd twenty Priests from Goal: So soon did the sad Effects of the Popish Alliance with France appear, and so kind was the young King to the young Queen, who, as the reverend Historian writes with a kind of Transport,

76 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1625. was in the Bloom of her Youth and Beauty, about sixteen Years of Age, a Lady of excellent Air and Presence, of a warm Zeal against the Church of England, a great Spirit, and of no less Proactivity in her Looks than Activity in her Motions. But he speaks not of the Parliament with the same Pleasure: And we are told, that according to the fluctuating and unsteady Counsels of Parliaments, they grew weary of the War; which is not true; they were not weary of the War, they were only grown weary of giving Money to feed the Pride and Luxury of Favourites, who were the Cause of the Grievances for which they could have no Redress. The Parliament had the same tender Sentiments of the Sufferings of the Royal House of Bohemia as the last had, but they insisted on an Account of the last Supply, before they were willing to trust a lavish Ministry with a new one. They desir'd to have Grievances redress'd, before they enabled the Court to live a while without them, and so long continue the Hardships the People labour'd under in Spirituals and Temporals.

Ships lent the French King.

It was about six Weeks after this King's Accession to the Throne, that the Duke of Buckingham as Lord-High-Admiral, treated with the Marquis d'Effiat the French Minister, for a Squadron of English Men of War to join the French Fleet, which was fitting out against the Protestants at Rochelle, whose Admiral the Duke de Soubise was Master at Sea, and could relieve that City as Occasion requir'd. Echard endeavours to excuse this King's assisting the French Papists to destroy the only remaining Strength of the Protestants in France, on Account that the Treaty for so doing was made in King James's Time. A vain Pretence to throw the Odium on the Memory of the Father, to purge the Son of it: As if there was any Treaty made by King James himself without the Influence, if not the Direction of the Prince of Wales and Duke of Buckingham, who are now executing what was then agreed upon: And as if the French had not broken that Treaty by refusing to let Count Mansfeldt land his Army at Calais, and the English Ministers might not have recover'd the false Step they had made in promising Assistance to the French King against the Reform'd in France, had King Charles not been willing to oblige his Brother-in-law and his Queen, by arming the English Protestants against their Brethren in France. The reverend Historian assures us, There had been great Increase and Affluence of Trade in King James's Reign; and Coke writes, The Trade of the Nation was not only decay'd, but the Seas were ignominiously infested with Pyrates and Enemies, to the Loss of very many of the Merchants and Subjects of England; which is the more likely, for that when de Effiat demanded the Men of War that were to join the French Fleet, there was but one, the Vanguard, fit for such Service; so Buckingham, by his Power of Lord-Admiral, prest seven great Merchant-Men, and put Officers and Soldiers aboard them; as the Great Neptune Sir Ferdinando Gorge Commander, the Industry Capt. James Meyer, the Pearl Capt. Anthony Tench, the Marygold Capt. Thomas Daws, the Loyalty Capt. Jasper Dare, the Peter and John Capt. John Davis, the Gift of God Capt. Henry Lewen; all under Admiral Pennington in the Vanguard.

P. 190.

On the 8th of May the Duke caus'd Warrants under the Great-Seal to be issu'd to summon the Companies aboard that had been rais'd for the French Service, giving out that they were to be employ'd against Genoa, and no more French Soldiers or Seamen to be shipp'd on the English Ships, than the English Seamen and Soldiers could master. But no sooner were those Ships arriv'd at Diep, than the Duke de Montmerency, Admiral of France, offer'd to put two hundred Men into the Industry, and the like Number into every one of the rest, declaring they were to fight against the City and Inhabitants of Rochelle. Tho Pennington A.D. 1625. was as good a Tool for such bad Work as could have been employ'd, yet Sir Ferdinando Gorge, the other Captains and their Crews, abhorr'd this Service, refus'd to take the French Men on board, and engage in it, notwithstanding the Rewards Montmerency tempted them with, and the Threats he made use of to frighten them. So Pennington return'd to England. The Duke de Rohan, and the Rochellers, hearing what had happen'd, dispatch'd Monsieur de la Zouche to solicit the King on their Behalf, that the Ships might not return to France in that Employ. Buckingham told him the King his Master was oblig'd, and the Ships must and should go out. This Matter was transacting before and after the Session of Parliament, When, as in Echard we read, there had been no Measures taken but what were just and wise; and when, as the Lord Clarendon or the Christ-Churchmen affirms the Duke had given the Parliament no visible Cause of Disgust; and again, they had no Crime at all to impute to him. How little Regard have these Historians to save Decencies with their Readers, and by preserving some Probability to give a Colour to their Belief. Three Weeks after the Session was open'd, the Lord Conway wrote a Letter as from the King to Vice-Admiral Pennington, signifying that the Command of that Squadron was assign'd over to the French King, who was to put aboard the English Ships as many French Men as he pleas'd: But the Captains of the Ships represented, that the Propriety of them being in the Merchants, they could not therefore deliver them without sufficient Security for all Losses and Damages which might happen. The Duke de Chevreuse, the Marquis de Effiat, and Monsieur Villanclerc's, offer'd to be bound for it, but the Captains would not take their Bond; upon which Sir John Hippeley, and Sir Thomas Dove, remonstrated to the Duke the Danger of such an Enterprize, and had almost dissuaded him from it; but the French Ambassadors persisting in the Demand of the Ships, Meyer and Tench who were deputed by the rest to protest against the Service, were prevail'd upon to return to Diep, being assur'd privately that Means should be us'd to prevent their going against Rochelle; instead of which, when they arriv'd there, they were follow'd by a Letter from the King to Pennington, commanding him positively to deliver up the Ships to the Marquis de Effiat for the French King's Service; and in case of the Captains Backwardness or Refusal, to use all forcible Means to compel them, even to sinking; which no doubt will be remember'd, when the Ecclesiastical Historians are declaiming on his Majesty's Zeal for the Protestant Religion. Pennington threaten'd the Captains accordingly, telling them it was as much as their Lives were worth, if they deliver'd not their Ships to the French; he himself bravely surrender'd the Vanguard, and commanded the other Captains to follow his Example, which they all refusing, and immediately weighing Anchor to be gone, Pennington fir'd at them, and forc'd all of them to come back except Sir Ferdinando Gorge, who to the Honour of the Nation and himself, scorn'd so base an Action, bore his Fire, and made Sail for England. Mr. Edward Nicholas a Servant of Buckingham, whose Merits for future Preferment began on this noble Occasion, was sent to Diepe to persuade the English Captains to serve; but tho' he us'd all his Rhetorick, he prevail'd not, not one of the Officers or Seamen would take French Pay, a poor Gunner excepted, who was soon after kill'd in charging a Canon. Nicholas, that Man of Honour, Integrity, and Virtue, as the above-mention'd Historians represent him, took a Diamond Ring, and a Hatband The Reign set with Diamonds, which the French Ambassador begins ill. Such were the first Actions of this Reign, so prudent

One would have thought that the main Business of an English Parliament, was to take Care of the Protestant Religion, but the reverend Author tells us, that Care of theirs retarded the main Business, which was to give Money to be as laudably expended as were the three last Subsidies. However, the House not thinking like that Divine, enquir'd into the Execution of the Laws against Priests and Jesuits, and complain'd of the Growth of Popery and Arminianism; the latter at least under the Protection of Laud and his Brethren; one of whom Mr. Richard Mountague was question'd by them for his Appello Casarem, contriv'd, says Whistlocke to put a Jealousy between the King and his Subjects, and to encourage Popery. His Majesty had not sat three Months on his Throne, before the Parliament saw into the Design of the Laudian Priesthood, to create Jealousies between him and them; which Jealousies daily increasing by the Countenance that was given them, created such a Division as ended in a Civil War. The historical Archdeacon tells us that Mountague gain'd Reputation by his Writings, and was too hard for the famous Selden; which I think is sufficient to confirm the Judgment we have made of his Character. A French Author calls Mountague Un étrange Homme, a strange Mortal; and tho' a Papist, owns he play'd Casaubon a rascally Trick, Un Vilain Tour, that he abus'd and insulted the Learned at pleasure, calling the great Scaliger, Stultus Philosophus, a Fool of a Philosopher. A Man of this Temper was a fit Instrument to be employ'd by Bishop Laud. The Book he was question'd for was stild, with equal Elegance and Modesty, A new Gag for an old Goose. So ingenious and polite are the chief Writers of the Party if it is our good Fortune to light upon them. 'Twas publish'd in King James's Reign, taken notice of by the Parliament, and suppress'd by Archbishop Abbot, who disciplin'd Mountague on that Occasion, for which this Parliament gave his Grace Thanks, and summon'd Mountague to appear at their Bar for reprinting his Book with a Dedication to the King; and a Defence intitled, Appello Casarem, which they voted to be contrary to the Articles establish'd by Parliament, to tend to the King's Dishonour, and the Disturbance of Church and State, obliging him to enter into a Bond of 2000 Pounds to appear again upon Summons. The Spirit of this Reign, and by whom it was influenc'd, appears in the making this obnoxious Priest Chaplain to the King in a few Weeks after King James's Death. He would now have been severely censur'd, according to Dr. Fuller, had not his Majesty interpos'd, sending a Message to the House of Commons, that those Things, which were then spoken and determin'd concerning Mountague without his Privy did not please him; adding, that being his Chaplain, he thought he might have as much Protection as the Servant of an ordinary Burgeß; which is like the Sophistry of the Court Arguents in those Days. No Servant to Lord or Commoner was protected in Offences against the publick Peace, and nothing could be more offensive than endeavouring to create Jealousies between his Majesty and his Subjects. This Air appear'd early in the King's Speeches and Messages, and agreeing so exactly with the Airs and Manners of John Buckeridge Bishop of Rochester, John Howson Bishop of Oxford, and William Laud Bishop of St. Davids, one may easily imagine by whose Counsels King Charles was guided. These three Bishops wrote a Letter to Buckingham, which began thus, We are bold to be Suitors to you in Behalf of the Church; and then they plead for Mountague and his Opinions, concluding with severe Reflections on the Synod of Dort, perhaps out of Pique to the pious and learned Dr. Carleton Bishop of Chichester, who wrote against Mountague; as did also Dr. Sutcliffe Dean of Exeter, Mr. Wootton Divinity Professor at Gresham College, and several other orthodox Divines; so far was Mountague from being the Church, as Laud and his Brethren seem'd him, distinguishing their own rigid Party from the Protestant Church of England, and engaging the King in that fatal Distinction he contriv'd as if not encourag'd their persecuting the most religious and worthy Ministers to the general Discontent of the Nation, as will too plainly appear hereafter. Mountague's Business occasion'd the first Breach between the King and the House of Commons, who were as backward in giving Subsidies as the King was in redressing Grievances. They presented a Petition concerning Religion, as it was in Danger from Popery and false Doctors, praying that he would revoke his Order for suspending the penal Laws against Papists. His Majesty told them their Address was of too great Importance to give a precise Answer to it, but he would do it in a little Time; which Echarde calls a distinct satisfactory Answer to their Petition for Religion: Indeed it so satisfy'd the Commons for the present, that they gave two Subsidies, the Papists to pay double.

The Pestilence all this while increasing, and the Members of Parliament flying from it into the Country before the Supplies which were still wanting were voted, it was propos'd in Council at Hampton-Court three Weeks after the opening the Session at Westminster, to adjourn it to Oxford. This Motion came from Buckingham, but the Lord-Keeper Williams, who was then in very good Terms with the Duke, oppos'd it, saying, It was not another Place, but another Temper, that must do his Majesty's Business; that the Plague had so overspread the whole Land, no Man who travell'd knew where to lodge in Safety, for which Reason the Lords and Commons would not take it kindly to be forced abroad in such a mortal Time; and 'tis likely when they come together, they will vote out of Discontent and Displeasure; that his Majesty was ill-advis'd to give Offences, tho' small ones, in the beginning of his Reign. Admirable Counsel, had there been any Disposition in the Prince to hearken to it. Mountague's Affair was but a small Offence, considering the Smallness of the Man; but the King's intermeddling in it, as it were out of Spite to the Parliament, drew it into Consequence. Bishop Williams again, The House of Commons hath given two Subsidies, and tho' they remove to Oxford, yet it is the same Session; wherefore if they alledge, that it is not usual for the House to give twice in a Session, tho' I wish heartily they would, yet how shall we persuade them out of their Custom if they insist upon it? And it is not prudent in the King to run a probable Hazard of a Denial. To all this the Duke reply'd, That publick Necessity might sway more than one Man's Jealousy; upon which the Lord-Keeper requested that he might speak a few Words with the King in private; and it being granted, he told his Majesty, That the Lord Duke had Enemies in the House of Commons, who had contriv'd Complaints, and made them ready to be preferr'd, and would spend the Time at Oxford about them; and what Folly it were to continue a Session that had no other Aim but to bring the Duke upon the Stage? But if your Majesty think that this is like a Hecker, quickly known, but hardly cur'd, my humble Motion is, that this Malady or Maltree, call it which you will, may sleep till after Christmas: For I hope to give such Account by that Time, by undertaking with the chief Sticklers, that they shall supersede from their Bitterness against your great Servant, and that Passage to your weighty Council shall be made smooth and peaceable. And why do you conceal this from Buckingham? says the King: the Keeper reply'd, Good Lord, Sir, I faint would I begin at that End, but he will not hear me with

A.D. 1625. with Moderation. 'Tis thought this Discovery made by Bishop Williams, compleated the Duke's Hatred against him, and hasten'd his Fall: For Buckingham now grown jealous, the natural Effect of Danger, defy'd the Lord-Keeper and his Confederates to do their worst, and persisted in his Desire to have the Parliament remov'd to Oxford that he might clear himself: So rash, so inconsiderate were this King's Counsellors who had his Ear. The Lord Clarendon, or whoever drew those Characters, tells us the Duke was a wiser Man than any Servant or Friend he had. It is not in this Character only, but in all the rest that the Author seems to affect to be as directly contrary to the Truth and Likeness as possible. Was the Duke wiser than the Lord-Keeper? For it is not pretended that Williams would not on any Terms have preserv'd his Friendship, had not Buckingham been weary of being his Friend. It is plain by the wise and faithful Counsel Bishop Williams gave for his Preservation, that the Lord-Keeper exceeded the Duke of Buckingham as much in Ability as Buckingham exceeded him in Power. King James knew this full well, and told the Earl of Carlisle, If I had sent Williams into Spain with my Son, I had kept Hearts Ease and Honour, both which he wanted. The Characteristicks in the History of the Rebellion, are for the most part made up of the like arbitrary Assertions, without the least Proofs from the Facts, which will be very easy for me to prove in the general, or in particular Instances, when I am call'd upon, if I have not done it sufficiently already. The Lord-Keeper had promis'd the Parliament at their breaking up, that the Laws against Popish Priests should be put in Execution; yet on the very next Day, the 12th of August, his Majesty caus'd a Warrant to be seal'd to pardon six of them. Bishop Williams thought it a burning Shame for him who was of the reform'd Religion, to affix the Seal to such a Warrant, which was brought twice to him, and he both Times refus'd to pass it. This Design was to ensnare him, but another was caught by it. The Duke of Buckingham moved the King to command it be seal'd in his Sight at Hampton-Court, which when it came to be known, took off the Odium from the Keeper, and threw it upon the Duke.

Obj. H. L. p. 34. p. 422. Parliament at Oxford.

On the first of August the Parliament met at Oxford in the Divinity-School. Heylin and Echard, two Authors of equal Credit and Discretion, seem to think the Speaker of the House of Commons had too much Honour done him in being permitted to sit in the Professor's Chair. The judicious Heylin says, The placing the Speaker there, first put them into a Conceit, that the determining in all Points and Controversies in Divinity did belong to them. As much as to say, if he had been plac'd in the Professor of Musick's Chair, he would immediately have fall'n a fiddling. Echard, every whit as judicious as Heylin, apes even this stupid ridiculous Reflection. Sir Thomas Crew's being plac'd in the Divinity-Chair, was thought so much to inspire the House of Commons with controversial Knowledge, that from thence no Parliaments were without a Committee for Religion. After this wise way of thinking, if Serjeant Crew had fate himself down in the Coronation-Chair at Westminster, Crew instead of Cromwell would have laid violent Hands on the Crown. There is nothing in History so silly as this childish Reflection of these two historical Priests, let the Reader be Judge, and assure himself that there are not two Historians of their Kidney in more Estimation among them; which shews us how well they are furnish'd with History. The Speaker had no sooner taken this envied Seat, than Sir Robert Philips of Somersetshire, complain'd he had seen the above-mention'd Pardon for the six Fryars and Jesuits, bearing Date the very Day after the Lord-Keeper had in his Majesty's Name promis'd the Laws against them should be rigorously put in Execution. The House was immediately in a Flame, finding themselves dealt with so doubly. The Cry was at first against the Keeper, who being a Protestant Bishop, should not have dar'd to have done such Wrong to his Religion. The Lord-Keeper was clear'd by the Evidence of Bembo Servant to the Clerk of the Crown, who confess'd he brought it to the Seal, but it stopp'd there. It was afterwards sent by Secretary Conway's Servant Derick, but it still was stopp'd, till the Duke, as has been observ'd, got the King to command that it should be seal'd at Hampton-Court. Both King and Duke were very uneasy at this Discovery, and truly they had good Reason to be so, for this Proceeding was as mean as it was dangerous; to promise a Thing one Day, and do the contrary the next, in Defiance of the Laws, was a very hopeful beginning of a Reign, and cou'd not but preface it would have as happy an End. The impartial Author of the History of the Rebellion, sinks the lending the French King Ships to destroy the Protestants at Rochelle. Sir John Pennington had Intelligence that the English Ships were intended against Rochelle; he told the King of it, whose Answer was, Pennington go and deliver your Ships; which he would not do without a Warrant under his Majesty's own Hand for his Discharge, which the King gave him. The French making some Difficulty to restore those Ships, the same Pennington was forc'd to seize above an hundred French Vessels by way of Reprisal, and then the English Ships were deliver'd. 'Tis worth remembering that only two English Sailors assisted against Rochelle in the Ships King Charles lent King Lewis, such an Abhorrence of that Service had our Seamen, it being against Protestants, and to enslave a free People. The Author or Authors of the History of the Rebellion, sink also this Pardon to the Popish Priests as not within his Period, but he takes Notice, and wrong Notice too, of the Proceedings of this very Parliament concerning the Duke of Buckingham, and the War for the Recovery of the Palatinate. The Commons desir'd a Conference with the Lords in Christ-Church, where Sir Edward Coke open'd the Complaint against Conway, not without glancing at the Duke, who was accus'd also for abusing the King's Favour, by assuming to himself the Disposal of all Offices by Sea and Land. Bishop Williams hasten'd to Woodstock, where the King and Duke then were; and after having acquainted the Duke with the Disposition of both Houses, he spoke to him as follows; My Lord, I am come unsent for, yet because your Grace made me, I must and will serve you, tho' you are one that will destroy that which you made. Let me perish, I deserve to perish ten times, if I were not as earnest as any Friend to save you from perishing. The Sword is the Cause of the Wound, but the Buckler is in Fault if it do not defend the Body. You brought the two Houses hither, my Lord, against my Counsel: My Suspicion is confirm'd, that your Grace will suffer for it. What's now to be done, but to wind up the Session quickly. The Occasion is for you, because two Colleges in the University, and two Houses in the Town, are visited with the Plague; let the Members be promis'd fairly and friendly, that they may meet again after Christmas; requite the Injuries done to you with Benefits not Revenge, for no Man that is wise will shew himself angry with the People of England. Confer one or two of your great Places upon your safest Friends, so shall you go less in Envy, and not less in Power. At the Close of this Session declare yourself to be the forwardest to serve the King and Commonwealth, and to give the Parliament Satisfaction. Fear them not when they meet again in the same Body, whose ill Affections I expect to mitigate. But if they proceed, trust me with your Cause, when it is transmitted to the House of Lords, and I will lay my Life upon it to preserve you from

I am sensible the Keeper did this more to serve himself than his Patron; but the Advice was good, and let the Motive be what it will, a wise Man will always embrace the Counsel of Wisdom. Mr. Ambrose Philips charges Heylin on this Occasion with a notorious Falshy, to the great Detriment of the Bishop's good Name, as if he had been base and ungrateful to the Duke, whereas he prov'd in a Paper he deliver'd the King about a Week after, that he had done his utmost, and more than any one, to screen the Duke from parliamentary Prosecution.

The Secretaries Conway and Cook, after the King had reminded them of the War he had been led into, and the Supplies wanting to carry it on, urg'd new Reasons for them from the State of Affairs in Germany, France, the Low-Countries, Denmark, Sweden, and Italy. The Lord-Treasurer added the Debts of King James above 300000 Pounds, his Majesty's Debts and Expences in four Months time above 200000 Pounds, and 300000 Pounds for the Navy, in all about Two Millions; tho' it was not likely the Ministry cou'd obtain near such a Sum, when the Parliament talk'd of nothing but the Misapplication of the Treasury, Grievances, Buckingham, and Mountague. When the Ministers mention'd an intended War, the House desir'd to know what War? This so reasonable a Motion was ill taken, and scorn'd by the King: For even then, says the Historian, it evidently appear'd that he meant to rule by Will and Pleasure. To shew his Resentment at this Motion, he commanded Serjeant Glanville to attend the Fleet at Plymouth, saying, He shall there understand what he so much desir'd to know; and breaking this Parliament before they had given him Money, he sent Sir Sackville Crow with the Crown-Jewels to pawn them in the Netherlands.

We are often told by Echard, and other such History Writers, that the last Parliament, as was remember'd to this, led King James into the War, and that the latter left his Son in it. The Author of the History of the Rebellion charges them as wavering and inconstant for it. But, what an impartial Author he is? Takes not the least Notice of the Reasons given in this House of Commons for postponing a further Supply: Tho' the former Parliament did engage the late King in a War, this is not oblig'd to be carry'd blindly, where sound Counsels are wanting: It is not usual to grant Subsidies twice in one Parliament, and no Grievances redress'd. It was spoken by Sir John Elliot, who desir'd to know, whether the Money design'd for the Palatinate, did not maintain the Ships sent against Rochelle, which was levell'd against Buckingham: Yet Echard so wisely copying the History of the Rebellion, even in Falshy affirms, this Parliament had no Crime to impute to him but what was as well known to the last. He and his Original might have said as well known before the Crime was committed as after. Cou'd the sending Ships against the Protestants in France, cou'd the pardoning the six Romish Priests, contrary to the King's Word, be known to the last Parliament? The present House of Commons, whom they wrongfully thus abuse, knew him so much better now than he was known last Year, that they order'd Enquiry to be made, Whether he broke not the Marriage with Spain out of Spleen to Olivarez; and whether he made not the Match with France upon harder Terms? Was the Match with France better known before than after it was made? The Parliament cou'd easily prove, that two Millions of A.D. 1625. Money was stipulated by the Conditions with Spain, and but 800000 Crowns by those with France, which certainly were much harder Terms.

"The Commons, says Dr. Fuller, not so careful to save their own Persons from the Plague, Popery encourag'd. as to secure the Land from a worse and more spreading Contagion, the daily Growth of Pope-ry, presented a Petition to his Majesty, containing sixteen Particulars of the Causes of Grievances, and Remedies to redress them; to every Clause of which, according to Echard, his Majesty answer'd in a parliamentary Way, with so much Fairness and Satisfaction, that nothing cou'd be desir'd more. We shall see whether any Thing more was desir'd, in the Sequel of this History; but while the Parliament seem'd in a pretty good Humour, on the Close of the King's Answer, Buckingham made a Speech, putting them in Mind of the good Opinion the last Parliament had of him for his Conduct in the Spanish Treaty of Marriage, and he made no question but speaking now with the same Heart, he shou'd be as acceptable to them: He then enter'd into a particular Justification of himself, and gave several of his Actions so plausible a Turn, that many of the Members began to think him not so bad as was represented: But Sir John Elliot when a Debate about him arose, apply'd to him most of the Miscarriages of the late Reign, and this ever since he was concern'd in the Ministry; and speaking of the further Supply which was desir'd, he said, They ought to be better secur'd from domestick Foes, before they engag'd against foreign Enemies; and that the great Sums given for Honours and Offices, wou'd go far in fitting out the Fleet. The Truth is, the Nation had no liking for an Expedition which was the Contrivance of Buckingham, whom they did not like. He intended the War against Spain, and they were for carrying it on in the Palatinate or Low-Countries. His Intention was to shew the Spaniards his Power and Resentment; their Desire was to recover his Majesty's Brother-in-law's Dominions, and preserve the Protestant Religion in Germany, which was never named by the last King and this, but only as a Pretext to demand Money, which when rais'd, was sure to be apply'd to such Uses as wou'd increase the Grievances. Some Members were for going on the Supply, which the Necessity of the publick Affairs requir'd; but others said Necessity was a dangerous Counsellor, and liable to be us'd as a continual Argument; that those Ministers who had thrown the King and Kingdom into such Necessity ought to answer for it; and that there was as much Necessity for redressing Grievances as for granting more Subsidies: Upon which it was agreed to send his Majesty a short Declaration of their loyal Intentions to serve him in due Time and in a parliamentary way, beseeching him to rest assur'd of their true and hearty Affections, and to esteem the same to be the greatest Security and Reputation a just King can have, and to account all such Enemies and Slanders of the Commonwealth who shall dare say the contrary. The contrary was said by Buckingham, Laud, Neile, Weston, and in a word by almost every one who had Access to the King's Person with the least Degree of Favour.

Nothing is more apparent than that his Majesty's screening Buckingham and Montague from Parliamentary Punishment made the first Breach between him and his People; and there cou'd be no Hope of a Reconciliation, while such Counsellors as Laud and Neile had his Ear upon all Occasions. He saw plainly the Commons wou'd give him no Money, till he had given them Satisfaction as to Buckingham, and other Grievances. But as much as he wanted it, he resolv'd to raise it without them; that is, without Law or Right, rather than let Justice be done on those Offenders, who had flatter'd him with an Opinion that he cou'd not him-

The Lord-Keeper Williams, with whom sided the Lords of the Council, begg'd of him with Tears not to dissolve the Parliament; and remember'd him of his Father's last Advice, to part with them always in Friendship, especially with his first, and to call them often. King James had experienc'd the many Inconveniences of being at Variance with his Parliaments; and King Charles's Want of Temper or Wisdom appear'd signally in protecting his Favourite in direct Opposition to the Sense of the Nation. We are not to regard what is said in Clarendon's and Echard's Histories of his Majesty's Firmness, so much to his Detriment and Dishonour. Impartial Writers do here begin the Division which parted him and his People for ever. Here, I say, at the abrupt Dissolution of this his first Parliament four or five Months after his Father's Death, "The King's Love for Buckingham, says Larrey, appear'd signally on this Occasion: If he wou'd have abandon'd him to the House of Commons, they wou'd immediately have granted him the Subsidies he demanded; but he chose rather to renounce them, and in some measure the Affections of his People, than sacrifice his Favourite". What follows shews us how sincerely the Author of the History of the Rebellion and Archdeacon Echard deal with us, when they declaim on his Qualifications as really wonderful. "Thus Buckingham was the fatal Beginning of that Misunderstanding which continu'd ever after between the King and his Subjects in those great Assemblies of Parliament, which are so dear to the Nation; and yet his Ascendant over his Master was not owing either to his Charms or Capacity, but to the Weakness and ill Fortune of the King. If the King had too much Complaisance, or rather Blindness for his Favourite, the Favourite had but too little Regard for his Master's Interests and Glory; for instead of sacrificing his Fortune to his Master, he sacrific'd his Master to his Ambition". Such was the Fate of this Monarch during the whole Course of this Reign. For Laud and his Brethren wou'd never let him once give into moderate Counsels in religious Matters, tho' the Bent of the Nation was Puritan, and tho' his Government might have been easy and glorious by it; and even in the Catastrophe of the Civil War, when his Royal Life was in Danger, his Chaplains at the Isle of Wight Treaty, Partizans of Laud, wou'd not let him secure his own Dominion, unless he secur'd theirs also. How he was manag'd by his Favourites, and how inflexible he was in any Opinion they infus'd into him, the Source of all his Misfortunes, may be seen by what the French Author adds. "Those that succeeded Buckingham had the same Power, and the King was as tender and as much bewitch'd to them, suffering himself to be govern'd, and having no Will but theirs. Firm on this Head, or rather opinionated to such a Degree, that nothing cou'd convince him to the contrary. A Person who prov'd too true a Prophet foretold of him, I wish this Prince may be well inspir'd when he comes to the Throne, for if he takes the wrong way all is lost; opinionated as he is, and willing absolutely whatever he wills. Nothing can make him change his Resolution, when it's once taken. Lilly says the same of him: "He was noted to be very wilful and obstinate by Queen Anne his Mother, and some others who were about him in his Infancy. His Mother being once told he was very sick and like to dye, said, He wou'd not dye then, but live to be the Ruin of himself, and occasion the Loss of his three Kingdoms by his Wilfulness".

The King's Firmness is Obstinate.

Parliament.

The Parliament had Notice that they were to be dissolv'd; and when the Usher of the Black Rod came to call the Commons up to the House of Lords, they being in a grand Committee wou'd not suffer the Speaker to resume the Chair, till A.D. 1625. Mr. Glanville the Chairman had made a Report in Form of a Protestation, as a Sort of Direction to the next Parliament to take up the Business of Buckingham and Grievances where they left it, and where it was broken off by this sudden Dissolution.

The Plague raging at London, the Court, King, Reybold, Queen, and French Attendants, was prodigally kept at Salisbury, where the King and the Lords of the Council were to seek how to defray the Household Expences, the Purveyors not having wherewithal to supply the King and Queen's Table: Upon which he sends for the Farmers of the Customs, and oblig'd them to supply him with more than they cou'd well spare. He pres'd the City of Salisbury for a Loan of 1000*l.* and Bristol for another Loan of 3000*l.* Several Aldermen of Bristol came to excuse the Payment, but they were thrown into Goal, where they lay till the Sum was brought to Court. Fifty Thousand dy'd of this Plague at London; so great was the Mortality that the City was almost uninhabited. I have read somewhere, that in July this Year, a Man walking from Somerset-House to St. Antholine's Church in the City met only three Persons in the way; yet the Desolation hinder'd not the Rejoycings of the Court upon the King's Marriage with a bigotted French Papist.

The great Plague.

Much Talk there was of a Fleet with Land Forces on Board, but whither they were to be sent none of the Council knew but the Duke; yet the Lord Clarendon's Indignation rises against the Parliament for not giving Supplies towards an Expedition, which was under the Management of a Person whom they were about to impeach. To make good the Deficiencies, Letters were issu'd under the Privy-Seal to raise Money by Loan. The Persons to whom they were directed were tax'd by the King himself in what Sums he pleas'd, which Echard calls borrowing Money of his Subjects with their own Consent; tho' he confesses the Names of all who wou'd not lend were to be return'd to him, and the Fear of the Consequence did doubtless contribute much to the Consent of the Lenders.

Warrants were granted for disarming Papists; which had the good Effects that all such Warrants had in the former Reign, and will have in this. I must own the Lord Clarendon, or his Editor's Representation of these Matters are quite contrary to mine. I find myself at a great Loss in this Work, in that I can make little or no Use of his Six Volumes of History; nay, I am rather perplex'd than help'd by it, being every now and then oblig'd to clear up Matters which are very much darken'd by the Dust he raises. The Events are so chang'd by the Turn he gives them, and the Gloss he puts upon them, that none will ever have a just Idea of Things or Persons as they are there represented.

Octavo;

Let us instance in the Lord Wimbleton's shameful Expedition to Cadiz. The Author of the History of the Rebellion asserts, it was undertaken with the Advice of Parliament, and the universal Approbation of the People; whereas Whistock assures us, not one even of the King's Council knew of it but Buckingham; and Sanderson, who is a Champion in the same Cause with the Lord Clarendon, affirms, that Sir Robert Mansel, Vice-Admiral, and the most experienc'd Sea-Officer in England, declar'd against the Undertaking; the Lord Chichester, another old Officer, did the same; but the Duke of Buckingham, who knew as little of military Affairs as any other Courtier, approv'd of it, and that was enough. The Lord Wimbleton had a Fleet of 80 Ships, on which were embark'd about 10000 Soldiers. They sail'd the 8th of October, and soon met with a furious Storm common in Autumn, which separated the Fleet; and sunk one of the best Ships, which with all the Crew

A.D. 1625. was lost. The Author of the History of the Rebellion says there was not a Ship lost, and upon the matter not a Man, to diminish the Shame of this disgraceful Enterprize. About the latter End of the Month the Fleet, which had join'd again, arriv'd at the Streights Mouth; and a Council of War being held, the gallant young Earl of Essex, Vice-Admiral, in Emulation of the Glory his Father had formerly won there, was for attacking the Forts at the Mouth of the Harbour of Cadiz, which was not thought practicable; only the Fort Puntal that very much incommoded the Men who attempted to land, was attack'd and carry'd by Sir John Burroughs. This Fort open'd and shut the Entrance into the Harbour; and the English by the Help of the Puntal might either have attack'd the Galleons that were in the Port, or have intercepted those that were expected from America with Plate. The Spaniards were so alarm'd at the taking this Fort, that King Philip was putting himself at the Head of his Army, which was to march against the English; but Olivarez represented to him the Necessity those Troops would soon be under to abandon that Conquest and return home, the Winter Season advancing so fast. The Governor of Cadiz dispatch'd some light Frigates to give Advice to the Galleons homeward bound from New Spain, that they should steer to Cape Finistre, and get into the Groyne. One of these Advice-Boats fell into the Hands of the English, who believing the Spaniards would accordingly make for Corunna, lay off that Port to intercept the Plate Fleet. But the Galleons by good Luck missing all the Advice-Boats sail'd directly to Cadiz, from whence the English were gone to wait for them at the Groyne. Great Faults were committed by the Lord Wimbleton and his Officers. They mis-spent their Time ashore in intrenching themselves in the Puntal instead of attacking the Bulworks, which in the Surprise of the Spaniards at the Loss of that Fort, they might easily have carry'd. They suffer'd both Soldiers and Seamen to come ashore for Refreshment, who surfeiting themselves with new Wine it threw them into Distempers, which kill'd great Numbers of them. Notwithstanding this Sickness and Death, the Earl of Clarendon very quaintly assures us, all the Ships, and upon the matter all the Men were seen. Every Ship, and upon the matter every Man was not only sav'd but seen; and those Seamen and Soldiers who were left dead drunk ashore when the Ships came away, the Generosity of the Spaniards sent them all back again. I will make no Remark upon this fine Flourish; if the Reader can believe a word of it, he has a stock of Faith enough to run thro' the Roman Legends. F. Orleans affirms the Loss of Men to be very considerable. Larrey says, the Ships and Men that return'd were seen indeed, but with Murmuring and Indignation. The Complaints ought to have been against Buckingham, but his Credit or good Fortune turn'd them on Wimbleton, who laid the blame on others; however, he was for some time not admitted into the King's Presence. And thus ended an Expedition, which was the more inglorious for that in Queen Elizabeth's Time the English put the Coasts of Spain and Portugal in a Blaze, burnt Cadiz, menac'd Lisbon, brought off the Galleons and Carracks loaden with the Silver of Mexico and Peru, and carry'd Terror to the old and new World. But as Larrey so words it, Those Days of Glory and Triumph for England were pass'd. This famous Enterprize was preceded by no Declaration of War. The most that was like it was a Proclamation to recall all English Men out of the Spanish Service. The Duke of Buckingham and Earl of Holland went at the same time to the Hague, where they concluded a League with the United Provinces, and with the Ambassadors of France and Denmark; but neither England nor Holland reap'd any Advantage by it.

The King of Denmark did indeed take Arms, A.D. 1625. and one of his Reasons was the Recovery of the Palatinate, his Nephew's Dominions. Some Troops were sent to his Assistance from England. But it is said he miscarry'd by a too frequent Use of the Bowl. His drinking out of Reason lost many Battels to the Emperor's General Wallestein. The Miscarriage of this King in the Invasion of the Empire is by Eckard, and all of 'em, imputed to the Parliament for not giving the Money the Court wanted; which however they would gladly have given him, if the King would have satisfy'd them that the Subsidies should have been better spent than the last were, and that due Remedies should be apply'd to the Distempers of the State.

At the Close of this Year Coke sums up the several Articles of Male Administration in the first nine Months of King Charles's Reign, which may be thought too invidious to repeat: But as the Facts are true, let Posterity know the Mischief and the Cause of it.

1. The protecting a seditious, virulent, ill-natur'd Priest, Richard Mountague, in Opposition to the Sense of the Parliament.
2. The dispensing with the Laws against Papists in Compliance with the French Treaty.
3. Breach of Word with the Parliament concerning the Execution of those Laws.
4. The War upon the King of Spain without Declaration.
5. The lending Ships against the Protestants at Rochelle.
6. The abrupt Dissolution of the Parliament to screen Buckingham from Punishment.

If these Facts are true, and no body will pretend to disprove them, what fine Histories must Clarendon's and Eckard's be, where they are either all sunk; or if any of them are mention'd, 'tis with such Explanations as alter the Nature of them, and render them the Subject rather of Applause than Complaint.

I have said nothing of the Squadron of Ships that was sent to join the Dutch, and block up Dunkirk. They also being sent out of Season were dispers'd by a Storm, and left the Coasts of England expos'd to the Insults of 22 Dunkirk Men of War with Land Forces, which alarm'd Ireland as well as England. But why should we wonder that all the Enterprizes of a certain Set of Men since the Death of Queen Elizabeth, have been inglorious both at home and abroad? The Rights and Liberties of the People, the Defence of which acquires true Glory, are what they never had at heart, and their Interests have always been separate from those of the Publick.

Tho' the Plague was still raging, insomuch that the Term was adjourn'd to Reading, it did not at all soften the hard Hearts of those evil Counsellors about the King, who endeavour'd to engross his Affections by alienating them from his Subjects. However, there was no living without Money, and that which the Loan brought in made but ill Payment for the Clamour and Discontent which it occasion'd; 'twas therefore resolv'd to call a Parliament, but little Care was taken to have them meet in a better Humour than they parted with the last; nay, so wild was the way of thinking, that Sir Edward Coke, late Lord Chief Justice of England, and other Gentlemen, who in the last Parliament had appear'd against the Duke, were prick'd for Sheriffs, and so cou'd not be chosen Members.

A.D. 1625.

Sir Edward Coke was then near 80 Years old; and it was barbarous to put a Gentleman of his Age, who had been Lord Chief Justice of both Benches, into the inferior and troublesome Office of a Sheriff. He excepted against several Parts of the Sheriff's Oath, and by Advice of all the Judges, one of his Exceptions was allow'd, and order'd to be left out of the Oath for the future. Of Sir Robert Philips, Coke says, I revere his Memory, and shou'd be glad I knew any of his Descendants to whom I cou'd acknowledge it. But if any of those Descendants shou'd have degenerated, and been as great Enemies to Liberty as Sir Robert was a Friend to it, Mr. Coke did not lose much in the Loss of that Wish of his. Sir Thomas Wentworth, who was at this time another Patriot, receiv'd the same Marks of the Court's Displeasure. Such Methods were not likely to put former Grievances out of mind; and when the Parliament met, we shall soon see them brought upon the Stage again: Tho' to stop their Mouths concerning Popery, the Bishops were order'd to proceed against Papists by Excommunication, and shutting the Church-Doors against those that durst not come within them under Pain of Damnation. All convicted Papists were by Proclamation confin'd to their Places of Abode, or within four Miles of it. But no Orders of this Kind had the Effect that was pretend- ed. The Papists knew well enough the King was compell'd to do what he did by the Complaints of the Parliament, and they abated very little of their Intolerance. It was thought necessary to declare, that the King wou'd give up Mountague to Justice. Upon which Laud said very gravely, if not very foolishly, I seem to see a Cloud arising, and threatening the Church.

Williams's Fall.

We have taken notice of Buckingham's Displeasure against the Lord-Keeper Williams, and his Disgrace is the least we cou'd expect from it: But his Merit and Services requir'd some Colour for displacing him; which not being to be found, the Ministry reviv'd a Proposition made by the Keeper Williams himself to King James, That the Office of Lord Chancellor or Lord Keeper shou'd be Triennial; and Bishop Williams having enjoy'd it above four Years, must according to his own Proposal surrender the Seal. If the Queen cou'd have befriended him he had stood still; for he was in her Favour by reason of the Speech he made to her in French at her coming to Whitehall. The Keeper having Intimation of the Counsels that were taking against him, wrote a Letter from Foxley in Berkshire to the King at Salisbury justifying his Conduct in Parliament, especially concerning the Duke; who having read the Letter cou'd not but own that the Justification was valid; but Buckingham said he had other Proof against him, which cou'd not appear while he was in Office for People wou'd be afraid to accuse him. The Lord-Keeper offer'd to answer any Accusation in a legal Way; and that it was preposterous to punish first, and afterwards condemn. He said the Wrong done him wou'd soon starele others; for who that had any thing to lose wou'd think himself secure upon such Precedents? Then the Triennial Trust was trump'd up; so that, says Mr. Ambrose Philips, his Enemies cou'd lay no Accusations to his Charge; and all his Crime was their Hatred and Malice. To prove which he quotes Sir Anthony Welden, p. 176. Bishop Williams's Ruin was determin'd not upon any known Crime, but upon Circumstances and Examinations to pick out Faults committed in his whole Lifetime. This Bishop has never a good Word from the Laudeans on account of his opposing Laud's superstitious Innovations; and therefore it is that the Author of the History of the Rebellion says very falsely, as well as affectedly, He was generally thought so very unequal to the Place, that his Removal was the only Recompence and Satisfaction that cou'd be made for his Promotion. What a Conscience this Author had? The famous Lawyer Judge Hobart being desir'd by Buckingham to certify the Lord-Keeper's Inabilities and Ignorance, upon which he wou'd engage to throw him out, and he shou'd succeed him, the reverend Judge reply'd, My Lord, Somewhat might have been said at the first; but I shou'd do the Lord-Keeper great Wrong if I shou'd say it now. Mr. Ambrose Philips writes of it thus: "Never was the Court of Chancery better order'd than in his Time. Mr. Evelyn, one of the fix Clerks, and in his Time the best Head-piece of the Office, took Pleasure in saying, as many yet know, that the Lord-Keeper Williams had the most towering sublime Wit that he ever heard speak, and that his Decrees in all Causes were just; that the Lord Conway did seldom alter any thing he had settled before him but upon new Presumptions; and that he spoke of him always in Court very honourably". Echard too speaking of this Bishop has also a Fal- sity: He was sequester'd from the Council-Table, and the Presence of the King, before the Seal was taken from him. When the Lord Conway came to him with a Message from his Majesty about surrendring the Seal on the 15th of October, the Lord-Keeper ask'd him, If he was restrain'd from the Council-Board before the delivering the Seal? Conway reply'd, I know of no such Intent. After which the Keeper had Audience of the King him- self; and among other things he petition'd, "not to be commanded from the Council-Table, but that his Absence may be left wholly to his own Discretion". His Majesty answer'd, I ever intended it so, and never said a word to the contrary. But Echard has said a word to the contrary; and it is a melancholy Reflection to consider, that two such Historians as the two last mention'd shou'd have so long impos'd upon a Number of credu- lous Readers with whom a great deal of Pains must be taken, and perhaps in vain with many to undeceive them, and set them right again. On the 25th of October, Sir John Suckling, Comptrol- ler of the Household, brought a Warrant from the King to the Lord-Keeper to deliver the great Seal to him; which Bishop Williams did accordingly: But, says Ambrose Philips, with no Signs of Unwillingness, as one intimates; for he was glad to hear that so worthy a Person as Sir Thomas Coventry, Attorney-General, was to succeed him. One can hardly meet with one Fact which is not thus dis- figur'd in their Histories.

The Coronation was on Candlemas-Day; and there are so many large Descriptions of it, that we shall say the less, there being nothing which makes it more different from other Coronations than the striking out that Part of the antient Oath, That the King shou'd consent to such Laws as the People shou'd chuse; and inserting, Saving the King's Royal Prerogative; which was become the only Topick for Court Preachers, Cathedral Preachers, and all the Preachers in England, who sought Preferment under Laud, to whose Management is imputed the Alteration made in the Coronation Oath; and it is not to be question'd, but if he was one of the Committee appointed to prepare that Oath, the Change which was made in it was his own. Cook in his Appeal says, It was charg'd upon the late Archbishop, that he emasculated the Oath, and left out very material Words, as which the People shall chuse. The Author of the Life and Reign of King Charles, printed by Reybold, mentions the same thing, clear forgetting or slighting the grand and more essential Part of the Coronation Oath, which is confidently averr'd the late Archbishop purposely emasculated. Lilly affirms positively, He was crown'd at Westminster, where William Laud alter'd the old Coronation Oath, and fram'd another new. Dr. Fuller writes of it thus: Others did equally consent, tho' Bishop Laud was most active. Notwithstanding which Echard asserts, The Oath was the

The Bishop of Lincoln, as Dean of Westminster, had a Claim to officiate at this Solemnity, and wrote a Letter to the Duke that he might be permitted: Which Letter begins thus; Being come hither according to the Duty of my Place to do my best Service for the Preparation to the Coronation, &c. I do most humbly beseech your Grace to receive a Creature of your own, by bringing me to kiss his Majesty's Hand. But it stood him in no stead; tho' Bishop Andrews, as Dean of Westminster, attended at the Coronation of King James, yet Bishop Williams had Orders to absent himself, and to depute one of the Prebendaries in his place. He resolv'd not to name Bishop Laud, who by his Favour had kept his Prebend, and sent the King a List of all the Prebendaries to chuse whom he pleas'd, and he immediately pitch'd upon Laud at the Desire of Buckingham. Echard in the Description of this Solemnity has certain Circumstances, which add very much to its Importance, and to the Dignity of his History. "The King omitted riding thro' London to save Charges. 'Twas a bright Day, and nothing was lost nor broken; not a Crewel, nor a Fork. The Theatre was clear, and there was very little Noise. The King was array'd in White, contrary to the Custom of his Predecessors, who usually wore Purple." And this not out of Necessity but Choice, to declare that Virgin Purity with which he came to be espous'd to his Kingdom, laying aside the Robe of Majesty to cloath himself in the Robe of Innocence". Is it not Pity the Fact is false, there being so many pretty Conceits and Jingles in it; for Whitlock assures us, his Robe was White Sattin, Purple not being to be had. There never was so small a Portion of a Reign, scarce ten Months, which had been charged with so much Male-Administration; yet the Reverend Author plays with Virgin Purity and Robe of Innocence, as if he had been describing the Virgin Purity of Edward VI.

The new Parliament met on the 6th of February; and the new Keeper Coventry made a Speech to them, which turn'd on the Necessity of a good Understanding between the King and them; but he gave the Pre-eminence to the former, and fix'd the Center of Authority there without distinguishing between the Executive and Legislative Power, that a Power superior to both might be understood to be in the King. He protested the King's Intentions were good; and the Parliament were very uncivil not to take the Keeper's Word for it. Tho' the Court had good Reason to hope well from the Choice of the Speaker; Sir Heneage Finch, Recorder of London; yet they soon shew'd the same Spirit and Resolution as appear'd in the Oxford Parliament. They immediately fell upon the shameful Expedition to Cadix, the Misemployment of the King's Revenue, evil Counsellors, favouring of Papists, notwithstanding what Echard tells us of his Majesty's having given them full Satisfaction in that matter, Loans, Taxes, and Mountague; for it seems Laud would not yet let the King give up that Incendiary to Justice. To cool them in their Warmth, the Privy-Council requir'd Neile, Bishop of Durham, Laud's Patron, to apprehend such of his Majesty's Subjects as shou'd be present at Mass, and commit them to Prison. The Attorney General sent Letters to the Judges, to direct their strict Proceedings against Recusants in the Lent Circuit; which had no better Effect than other the like Orders in this Reign as well as the last. For among other Grievances we find this complain'd of by the House of Commons:

1. The Increase and countenancing of Popery.
2. The Diminution of the Kingdom in Strength and Honour.
3. Plurality of Offices in one Hand.
4. Sales of Honours and Places of Judicature.
5. Delivery up of Ships to the French.
6. Misemployment of three Subsidies and three Fifteenths.

Wh. 3.
III Practices in the State.

These Grievances were debated for Redress but a few Days after the Archdeacon declaim'd upon the Virgin Purity of the Government, which is otherwise represented in Larrey. "What is there to be expected from a Prince, who suffers himself to be absolutely govern'd by such a Minister as Buckingham? And what Security is there for the Laws in Church and State, unless the Parliament take care and punish the Attempts of those ambitious Disturbers of the publick Peace, Traytors to God and their Country. The House of Commons talk'd in Terms pretty near like these, which the House of Lords did not seem to disapprove. Popery was dreaded, and arbitrary Power not to be born. The King might easily have appeas'd them, by giving them the reasonable Satisfaction they desir'd; but he chose rather to save his Favourite". Can Clarendon or Echard be impartial? Can they indeed be true without remembering a word of these things?

I shall not enter into the Detail of the Prosecution of Mountague, only sum up the Charge against him in brief, as the Committee who had the Case before them did, that it may be seen what a fit Man he was to make a Bishop, and what Sort of Bishops were in Favour with King Charles. "There are divers Passages in his Appeal full of Bitterness, Railing, and injurious to other Persons, disgraceful and contemptible to many worthy Divines of this Kingdom, and other reform'd Churches beyond the Seas; impious and profane in scoffing at Preaching, meditating the holy Scripture, and all Shew of Religion". Laud said Mountague's Cause was the Cause of the Church. "All which do aggravate his former Offences, having proceeded from pernicious and enormous Heat against the Peace of the Church, and the Sincerity of the reform'd Religion publickly profess'd, and by Law establish'd in this Kingdom. All which Offences being to the Dishonour of God, and of mischievous Effect and Consequence against the Church and Commonwealth of England, and other of his Majesty's Realms and Dominions; the Commons in Parliament assembled do hereby pray, that the said Richard Mountague may be punish'd according to his Demerits in such exemplary Manner, as may deter others from attempting to presumptuously the Peace of the Church and State". His Punishment was first the Bishoprick of Chichester, and then that of Norwich; which shew'd sufficiently that all those who wou'd, like him, in Contempt of the Parliament and Constitution of England, assert a despotick Power in Church and State, might expect the same Reward to the full Satisfaction of their Pride and Avarice.

There was no Demand of Supplies in the Keeper's Speech; but Sir Richard Weston brought a Message from the King, representing the pressing State of Christendom, and his Majesty's Patience in waiting so long to hear what they had resolv'd about Supplies. To this handsome Message was tack'd a politick Indication, That the King wou'd not accept of less than he wanted, and 'twas not fit to depend any longer on Uncertainty. A new Style brought into the Speeches from the Throne since King Charles was on it. He affected very much to speak on Maistre, and to let his Subjects know that he took what they gave him as their Duty, and not their Gift. If they had any Grievances to be redress'd of which his Majesty was not sensible, they Favour to Papists.

A.D. 1626. they must complain in a mannerly way without the least Reflection on his or his blessed Father's Government. Such Speeches as these could not but open the Hearts and Purles of an aggrieved People. The Commons return'd a general Answer promising a Supply. The King sent to them again, that they should apply to redress Grievances, not to hunt after them. Good Sense and good Reason this, to redress what they did not know; for they could know nothing without Enquiry. But there must be no stirring any thing for fear, as Coke phrases it, of throwing an ill Odor on the former or present Administration.

In the Debate of these Matters, Mr. Clement Coke Member for Ailsbury, Son to Sir Edward, warm'd perhaps as much with his Father's Injuries as with those of the Publick, said in the House of Commons, 'twas better to die by a foreign Enemy, than to be destroy'd at home, according to Warwick, but he can't help erring, he said suffer at Home, and not be destroy'd; and the Saying was highly resent'd by the Court, who had wrought so upon the Upper-House, that they appointed a Committee to consider of the Defence of the Kingdom, and the Safeguard of the Seas; and they advis'd the equipping a Fleet of Ships immediately to act against Spain, and another to guard the Coasts and Trade, which they sent to the House of Commons, who they were sure would not take it well to have Matters that requir'd Money come from the House of Peers to them, who had yet come to no Resolution about raising any. The King sent them a Message that he was as willing to bear and redress Grievances as any of his Predecessors, but would not allow any of his Servants to be question'd; which has the same Infirmary as his last Message, and is not only against Reason, but against Common Sense. Can evil Counsels be remedy'd without questioning evil Counsellors, or Grievances be redress'd without questioning the Cause of them? 'Twas added, I see you especially aim at the Duke of Buckingham; I admire what has so alter'd your Affections; I desire you to hasten the Supply, or it will be worse for you. A small Portion of natural Understanding would have inform'd these Counsellors, that a King could not have said any thing more poorly, and that tho' two or three private Persons may be menac'd without Danger, yet that it is very dangerous to threaten a whole Nation. The Messages which follow are all in the same Strain, and so worded, that one may easily perceive the King was in the Hands of Men of Laud's Temper, and not likely to get out of them. His forbidding the Parliament to question the Duke, which was their undoubted Right to do, made them more zealous in the Prosecution. Dr. Turner Burgefs for Shaftsbury, whom Warwick calls by his own Name, an inconsiderate inconsiderable Court-Dependant, began the Charge with Six Queries.

" I. Whether, as Admiral, he had not caus'd the Loss of the King's Royalty in the Narrow Seas?

" II. Whether the late ill Successes of the Fleet had not happen'd by the Admiral's not having personally executed the Place?

" III. Whether the Duke had not engross'd all great Offices, and preferr'd his undeserving Kindred?

" IV. Whether he had not sold Places of Judicature?

" V. Whether his Mother was not Patroness of the Romish Party?

" VI. Whether he had not by his Profusion wasted the King's Treasury?

This occasion'd the moving two other Questions:

" Whether these six Heads, which were grounded on Common Fame, should be debated in Parliament?

" Whether an Accusation upon common Fame, A.D. 1626. by a Member of the House, be a parliamentary Way?

Sir Thomas Wentworth, Mr. Noy, Mr. Selden, Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir John Elliot, Mr. Sandys, and other leading Members, being for the Affirmative, it was resolv'd, That Common Fame is a good Ground of Proceeding for the House of Commons. Whitlock mentioning Sir Thomas Wentworth with Noy and Selden, 'tis probable there was a Vacancy when his Shrievalty was out, and he got into the House.

The Court taking the Alarm, a Message is brought by Sir Richard Weston, a most ungracious Messenger, taking notice of the seditious Speech of Mr. Coke and Dr. Turner's Articles against the Duke of Buckingham, but indeed against the Honour and Government of the King and his Father. As Mountague is the Church, so Buckingham is the State. His Majesty cannot suffer an Enquiry on the meanest of his Servants, much less against one so near him; and wonders at the foolish Impudence of any Man, that can think he should be drawn to offer such a Sacrifice, much unworthy the Greatness of a King, and Master of such a Servant. He desires the Justice of the House against Delinquents, that he be not constrain'd to use his Regal Power; as was done some Years after, when he enter'd the House in Person to seize five of their Members. This Language would hardly become the Chairman of a Quarter-Sessions to a petty Country Jury, which is the lowest of all Images, much less of a Monarch of Great-Britain to the most illustrious Assembly in the World. Dr. Turner explain'd himself, saying, To accuse upon Common Fame, is warranted by the Imperial Law, and by the Canons of the Church; that this House in the Time of Henry VI. did accuse the Duke of Suffolk; and that Sir Richard Weston himself, the Bearer of this wise Message, did present the common Undertakers upon common Fame. The next Day the Doctor wrote a Letter to the Speaker, to excuse his not attending the House by Reason of Sickness, and submitting to their Judgments, but not acknowledging any Fault. Sir Richard Weston's Message had the Effect which generally attends Precipitation and Rashness, and which Archy might easily have foreseen. The Parliament grew still the more warm against the Duke, who was the great Grievance; and the King's supporting him against the Cry of his People, made the Grievance still the greater. Whitlock tells us, Sir John Elliot made a bold and sharp Speech. Echard calls this being in a Fury; Sir William Walter told the House that the Cause of all Grievances, was that which was in the Court of Lewis the XIth of France; all the King's Council ride upon one Horse, as did Oliver the Barber, who govern'd Lewis as much as Villiers govern'd Charles. Amidst these Agitations the Commons remember'd the King's Necessities, and voted him three Subsidies, and three Fifteenths, to which they afterwards added a Fourth. This shew'd that their insisting upon Redress of Grievances, was not a Pretence only to put off Supplies. His Majesty resenting their Proceedings against his Favourite, more than their dutiful Behaviour in the Supply, summon'd both Houses to attend him at Whitehall, where he declared to them with the usual Prudence and Temper, That he call'd them for several and distinct Reasons; the Lords to thank them for their Care of the Publick, and the Commons to tell them of their Errors. That is, Villiers and Laud understood the State and Interest of the Nation better than Wentworth, Noy, Selden, Diggs, &c. 'Tis all of a Piece, and the Keeper is taught to imitate his Master's engaging Style. After the great Affairs are settled, and Satisfaction given to the King's Demands, he will hear and answer their just Grievances, as the just Grievances in the last Parliament were

A.D. 1626. "answer'd after the Subsidies were given. His Majesty excepts to the not punishing Coke and "Turner." He then prais'd the Duke and his Merit from King and Parliament, declaring his Majesty's Pleasure that they proceed no further in the Enquiry touching him. Could any Men in their Wits imagine, that 500 Gentlemen, Representatives of a powerful People, could look with any thing but Contempt on the Person that dar'd to bully them; yet so it is, and Conventry goes on; The Supply is not suitable to the Engagements; his Majesty requires a further Supply, and your Resolutions of it by a Day, else you are not to sit long, nor will the King expect a Supply this Way: He will have Recourse to Loans, Benevolences, Ship-Money, Monopolies, and the like: He will no longer suffer the Parliament to raise Money for the publick Service, which I think was as direct a Menace as could be, that he would no longer maintain the Constitution. Himself spoke after the Keeper, and mentioning Coke, said, It is better for a King to be invaded, and almost destroy'd by a foreign Power, than to be despis'd by his own Subjects: remember the calling, sitting, and dissolving of Parliaments is in my Power. And should he not also have remember'd, that the raising of Money for the Support and Defence of himself and his Kingdom, was in the Power of the Parliament? The Wisdom and Moderation of these Counsels are equally conspicuous and exemplary. The King wants Money, and yet irritates those that are to give it; the Ministers are conscious of the Weakness and Errors of the late Management, and yet treat those who are to amend it, as Fools and Scoundrels:

Coke, 223 For besides the foolish Impudence in the fine Speech above-mention'd, Conventry told them the King had taken notice of their suffering the greatest Council of State, Villiers and Laud, to be censur'd and traduc'd by Men whose Tears and Education cannot attain to that Depth. The famous Selden, the Glory of the English Nation for Learning and Abilities, did censure evil Counsellors, and his Education is here censur'd. Coke and Turner are meant indeed, but Selden, Glanville, Pym, Herbert, Wandsford, Sherland, and other principal Members before mentioned, did also severely censure the Duke. Whitlocke observes there were in this House many Persons of extraordinary Parts and Abilities; and as to their Estates, one may make a Judgment by what H. L'Estrange says of the next Parliament, consisting in a manner of the same Members, Their Estates modestly estimated, were able to buy the House of Peers, the King excepted, though an hundred and eighteen, thrice over; a proper Assembly this, to bear the Insults of a weak and imperious Administration. Sir John Elliot, one of the leading Members, is represented by Echard as out of his Wits; but as he begins his Character and Account of him with a staring Falsity, we are not oblig'd to believe the rest of it: He was a Man of a new Family, his Authority is Dr. Prideaux Grandson to Elliot; and yet with all this Evidence it is notoriously false: How then shall we give Credit to him, when he has no other Evidence but his own frail Word? My Authority is Mr. Brown Willis, Son-in-law to Daniel Elliot Esq; Sir John's Grandson, who in his Notitia Parliamentaria, writes thus: Of the Antiquity of the Elliots, it being expected I should say something, I hope the Reader will pardon my making a little Excursion, while I shall only remark, that they flourish'd ten Generations before they seated themselves at St. Germain's about the Year 1540, which was almost an hundred Years before this new Gentleman Sir John Elliot appear'd, who was in the thirteenth or fourteenth Generation. I hope this is sufficient to teach us not to take the Archdeacon's Word in his Characteristicks.

Such Speeches and Messages as we have been repeating, could not but set the House in a Flame, and fill every honest English Heart with Indignation. The House of Commons immediately resolv'd themselves into a Grand Committee, order'd the Doors to be lock'd, and all Proceedings to cease. His Majesty being inform'd of the great Exceptions taken at his last Speech, commanded the Duke of Buckingham to give Satisfaction at a Conference to be held between both Houses, according to Echard: It is thus related by Larrey, "The Commons would not forbear their Prosecution, and all they could be brought to shew their Deference to the King, was to consent that Buckingham should come by his Order to the Parliament, which should be extraordinarily assembled on that Account in the Painted-Chamber, and there in Presence of Lords and Commons, give Account of his Administration and of all his Employments. The Houses met accordingly at the Place appointed, Buckingham did not fail to be there, and appear'd with all the Moderation and Humility of a Man before his Superiors." We read in Clarendon, He had a great Contempt for the Parliament. "He thought to carry his Point by this humble and moderate Carriage, and deliver'd a study'd Discourse on all his Actions and Negotiations as Ambassador and as Admiral, &c." He said he did nothing in single Counsels, excus'd his not going with the Fleet, his Master commanding him into the Low-Countries to treat with the Ministers of Denmark, Sweden, and Holland. He gave a plausible Turn to most of the Allegations against him, and express'd himself at the Close of the Speech, in the Manner which he thought would be most effectual to take off the Edge of their Resentment. "Join unanimously with your Sovereign to support the Protestant Religion, assist him to relieve Part of his Family, persecuted by the House of Austria for Religion's Sake; re-animate the first Ardor of the English Nation for the Recovery of the Palatinate, and haste to establish the King's Sister and his Nephews in their Estates and Dignities." What must one have thought of the Lords and Commons of England, if they could have been impos'd upon by his pretended Zeal for the Protestant Religion, when they all knew very well that his Family were most of them rank Papists, and himself the greatest Protector they ever had here since the Reformation? It is true, the People desir'd nothing more passionately than that the Interests of the Royal House of Bohemia, the Heir of which is our present gracious Sovereign, should be vigorously supported; and the Duke's naming the Assistance of a Family who was so dear to them, had the greatest Effect upon the two Houses, but not sufficient to put a Stop to the Prosecution. The Lord Conway spoke afterwards by his Majesty's Command, and vouch'd for the Duke that whatever he had done was by Order: To answer the Charge of mis-spending the publick Money, he gave an Estimate of the Expence of the Fleet and Army, the Succours sent to Count Mansfeld, and of the building several Forts in England and Ireland; but it was by no means satisfactory. The Commons being return'd to their House, every Member in his Place made a Protestation, Whether he heard Mr. Coke speak the Words charg'd upon him or not, and every one deny'd the hearing of them. They then drew up a Remonstrance, which was presented to the King, denying those Words said to be spoken by Mr. Coke, excusing Dr. Turner, and avowing their Proceedings against the Duke, or any other Subject; praying the King not to give ear to officious Reports of private Persons for their own Ends. They expected a present Answer, which, says Echard, possibly might have had happy Effects, if it had been a good one. Then Buckingham must have been punish'd, Laud disgrac'd, Mountague silenc'd, evil Counsellors remov'd, the Palatine War carry'd on with Vigor, Papists prosecuted, Puritans reliev'd, Peace

A.D. 1626. have been restor'd to Church and State, and the Civil War have been prevented. Instead of a present Answer, the King said he cou'd give no present one; and then the reverend Historian offers two Reasons for it, which as they are jumbled together make but ordinary Work: The King was either conscious of his own Integrity and the Duke's Fidelity, or perfectly averse to all Measures that might retard the War. His Majesty's Integrity to be yok'd with his Grace's Fidelity, under so heavy a Charge against him by the House of Commons, is very extraordinary, as is that very wise Reflection of retarding the War; whereas the only Way to have the War prosecuted, was to have deliver'd up the Duke to national Justice, and the Subsidies wou'd soon have been rais'd to carry it on.

Tho' the Lords had been thank'd by the King, yet it was not long before a Discontent appear'd also in that august Assembly, who petition'd the King against the Precedency challeng'd by the Scots and Irish new made Peers, but had this cold Answer, I will take Order therein. They were also discontented at the Imprisonment of the Earl of Arundel in time of Parliament, for his Son's marrying the Duke of Lenox's Sister, whom his Majesty had design'd for the Lord Lorn. The Earl of Arundel had five Proxies, which were lost by his Imprisonment; and no Precedent was found of any Peer's having been committed in Session of Parliament, except the Bishop of Winchester in Edward III. Time. The Lords pass'd a Vote against it, which was follow'd by a Remonstrance and a Petition for the Releasement of the Earl; but no Answer being given to it, they petition'd again, and the King express'd his Dislike of it: But after a Petition or two more, Arundel was releas'd with so much Reluctancy, that according to the Archdeacon, the Favour was rather despis'd than acknowledg'd. Thus was there ill Blood made in the House of Lords as well as in the House of Commons; and instead of giving way in the least to the present Disposition of the People, the King's Counsellors, Villiers and Laud were the chief, put him upon Counsels which added Fuel to the Fire they were kindling in the Nation. Mr. Pym Chairman of the Committee of Religion, reported a Letter to the Lord-Mayor of York for the Reprieve of some Jesuits, Priests, and other Recusants; which Letter was compar'd with the Original in the Signet-Office, and his Majesty took Offence at their being too inquisitive after his Actions. Now Innocence defies all Inquisition, and is the better pleas'd the more it is enquir'd into, which makes one doubt whether Echard's Coronation Robe was not of his own making. The Parliament justify'd the searching the Signet-Office, as warranted by Precedents on the like Occasions.

We have mention'd the Displeasure of the Court against the Earl of Bristol, who was not permitted to come to the last Parliament; and his Writ of Summons to this being detain'd, he petition'd the King that he might have it, as what had never been deny'd to any Peer: But the Lord Conway sending him a dilatory Answer, the Earl petition'd the House of Peers, and the Peers petition'd the King, that his Writ might be issu'd, which was done; but with a Letter from the Lord-Keeper Coventry to the Earl, signifying his Majesty's Pleasure that he shou'd forbear Attendance. How impolitick and irregular are their Proceedings? His Lordship not seeming ready to comply, the Keeper Coventry, for there was at this Time no Want of Instruments to set up the Prerogative against Privilege, inform'd the Lords that the King wou'd have the Earl sent for as a Delinquent to answer Offences in Spain and since his Return. Sir Robert Heath Attorney-General exhibited eleven Articles against him, the other nine in a former Charge were left out. The Earl of Bristol had given in Answer to those Articles in King James's A.D. 1626. Time without any Replication; and the charging him again with them now, was plainly to prevent his articling against Buckingham, as it was known he intended. One of the Articles against Bristol was for intimidating King James, by magnifying the Power of Spain in writing thus to him, If you love your Quiet, take heed how you attack such a formidable Enemy; if you shou'd, there will be an End to your Pleasure and Tranquility, and your innocent Diversions, such as Hunting and Feasting will be interrupted. A fine Letter this, to be written by one of the wisest Ministers of State to the very wisest Monarch of the Age. The Earl was also accused of intriguing with Spain to introduce Popery into England, and soliciting King James to release Jesuits; of misinforming the King with relation to the Marriage-Treaty; of saying, He cou'd not what the Success of it wou'd be, he wou'd make his Fortune by it; of occasioning the Prince's perilous Journey to Spain; of persuading the Prince to change his Religion, &c. This terrible Accusation, tho' supported by the King's Name and Authority, did not surprize the Earl of Bristol, depending either on his own Innocence or the Affection of the Parliament. Being brought to the Bar of the House of Lords, he spoke thus after the Articles against him had been read, I am a Freeman, and a Peer untainted, and have somewhat to say of high Consequence. He was order'd to proceed: Then, said he, I accuse that Man, the Duke of Buckingham, of High-Treason, and will prove it: Accordingly he tender'd to the House twelve Articles against him, and the Lords receiv'd them: The chief were, That he had plotted with Gondemar to bring the Prince into Spain to change his Religion; that he frequented the Popish Service in Spain, and ador'd their Sacrament; that he had broken the Match out of his own particular Ends; that he had abus'd King James by a sinister Relation of those Affairs. Out of both these Charges, 'tis probable one may pick some Truth, for the Earl and the Duke do both agree that there were Endeavours us'd to change the Prince's Religion, and that King James was abus'd with false Informations about the Treaty of Marriage; and it is more than probable the one was as guilty as the other; but the Duke's Guilt is apparent, according to Larrey, Most of the Historians, as well Protestants as Papists, agree about the Duke of Buckingham's Popery, excepting the Earl of Clarendon, who disagrees with most Historians, and I am not the only Writer who has taken notice of it. Speaking of the Duke of Buckingham's ingratiating himself with King James's last Parliament, and his falling so soon into the Displeasure of K. Charles's two first Parliaments, he, or some body in his Name, says, The Duke's Behaviour met with wonderful Applause; the Commons came to a hasty Resolution to dissuade the King from the Match, and frankly and resolutely to enter into a War with Spain; towards the carrying on of which, they rais'd great Mountains of Promises, and prevailing in the first, never remember'd to make good the latter, which too often falls out in such Counsels; which is only in every Word untrue, tho' it is one of the Passages given us by the Author as Instances of sober History; but I will produce an historical Passage that seems to have much more Sobriety in it: It is not to be wonder'd at, that the Parliament who was so active and ready to undertake a War for the Restitution of the Palatinate under King James, were now so unactive under King Charles. They had got better Knowledge of the Favourite's Designs, and wou'd not be his Bubble to raise Armies under the Pretence of that Restitution, only to satisfy the Vanity of an offended Minister. That they gave Mountains of Money instead of Mountains of Promises, appears by the frequent Complaints in this King's two first Parliaments of its being wasted and mispent. The

A.D. 1626. The Earl of Bristol exhibited Articles also against Secretary Conway as the Duke's Creature, and unfit to be one of his Judges. The Lords would not commit the Earl, nor would they permit his Cause to be mov'd into the King's Bench, as his Majesty would have had it. They order'd that the Articles exhibited against him should not hinder his Testimony against the Duke. The Earl of Essex, the Lord Sheffield, and the Lord Say, were most zealous in the Prosecution of the Duke of Buckingham; and a few Days after the Earl of Bristol deliver'd in his Answer to the Charge against him, introducing it with a Speech to clear two Objections, his ill Affection to the Protestant Religion, and his good Affection to Spain. He produc'd several Letters of Thanks for his Care in the Business of the Palatinate, and answer'd punctually every Article touching the Match with Spain, producing the Declaration for Privilege to Roman Catholics, which was little less than a Toleration. He laid great Blame on the Adviser of the Prince's Journey to Spain, and set forth how industrious he had been to hinder the Duke's persuading the Prince to change his Religion. He owns he had in Discourse given his Opinion for marrying the Elector Palatine's Son with the Emperor's Daughter; so that the Son, if he were bred in the Emperor's Court, might have Protestant Tutors, and Freedom of Religion for himself and Family. He declar'd he intended nothing but Honour and Service to the King, and humbly submitted all to their Lordships Judgment. The House of Peers seem'd to be mov'd with his Speech, and satisfy'd of his Innocence; and the Charge brought against him with so much Heat vanish'd and appear'd no more, tho' the Attorney-General pray'd the Lords to give more Credit to the Evidence of the King in favour of the Duke than to the passionate Accusation of the Earl. The Commons proceeded against Buckingham as far as an Impeachment, which was sent up to the Lords by eight of their Members. Sir Dudley Diggs introduc'd it with an eloquent Speech, comparing England to the World, the Commons to the Earth and Sea, the King to the Sun, the Lords to the Planets, the Clergy to the Fire, the Judges and Magistrates to the Air, the Duke of Buckingham to a blazing Star. The Impeachment was founded on Dr. Turner's six Queries; to which was added a new Article, that of the Plaister apply'd to King James's Side or Belly in so suspicious a manner, which occasion'd such Symptoms, that a great many People, and the King himself, says Larrey, suspected it was Poison. We read in Lilly, "That King James was really and absolutely poison'd by a Plaister apply'd by Buckingham's Mother to that King's Stomach, as was evidently prov'd before a Committee; and even the most sober of the King's Friends held him very much overseen to deny a Parliament Justice in matter of Poison, the Party poison'd being his Father". Sir John Elliot spoke last, and recapitulated the Heads of the Charge, comparing Buckingham to Sejanus; for after the Example of that base Flatterer, he stil'd himself the Companion of his Master's Labours; while he usurp'd the sovereign Authority, and falsly'd its Glory. As his Crime was the same, so he did not fail to wish him the same Punishment. It was wonder'd by many, according to Echard, that considering the Duke's Power and Influence, greater Offences were not objected against him: By which it appears, that with such Men as the Historian, the engrossing of Offices, employing unfit Persons because related or ally'd to him, neglecting his Duty as Lord High-Admiral and Lord-Warden of the Cinque-Ports, the plundering of 20000 Pounds out of a French Ship, the extorting 10000 Pounds from the East-India Company, the delivering up seven Ships to the French for the Destruction of the reform'd Religion in France, the putting off

Offices, Honours, and even Bishopricks to Sale, the patronizing Romish Priests and Jesuits is nothing, and deserv'd not the Pains the Commons took to bring him to account for it. As soon as Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot had done speaking, they were beckon'd by two Gentlemen to come out of the House of Lords, and going to them, found them to be two Gentlemen of the King's Chamber, who had two Warrants to carry Elliot and Diggs to the Tower, contrary to the Opinion of the Judges, that their Restraint was an Arrest of the whole Body. The Archdeacon inserts a Letter written, as he pretends, by an eminent Hand to the King concerning the Duke's Impeachment; which being as compleat a Piece of Sophistry as any in the History of the Rebellion, or his own History, I shall in part repeat; No Favourite was ever call'd to Account but it was follow'd by Rebellion; witness the Earl of Somerset in the last Reign, the Earl of Essex in Queen Elizabeth's, Sec. Richard II. Henry VI. and Edward VI. were destroyed by it. Excellent History! Leicester, Hatton, and Raleigh in Queen Elizabeth's Time were worse than the Duke. This is their way of talking; they assert positively without any Proof, and if that will not pass for Argument they have no other. No Lawyer durst speak against them; if you decourt Buckingham, the Monarchy will fall with him; but Felton cut his Throat and the Monarchy remain'd as it was, till Laud and his Brethren had fill'd up the Measure of the Iniquities of these Times. If the Parliament prevail in him, they will make Privy Counsellors, Lord-Stewards, and Lord-Chamberlains, How he conjures! Ambassadors, Auditors, Sec. The Truth of these wonderful Predictions afterwards appear'd in the Event. But there was another Paper which probably the Archdeacon never heard of, left on the King's Table, and it is a much more wonderful one, tho' there is no Spirit of Prophecy in it; The principal Actors in this Scene are Papists or Puritans; the Papists hate the Duke for breaking the Match with the Infanta; the Puritans, because he, being such an admirable Divine, looks upon them as Sectaries; the rest are Bankrupts, Debauchees, Republicans, and the like; which appearing so evidently by the Names of the Duke's Prosecutors, 'tis pity the reverend Author had not honour'd his History with this Letter also.

The King went to the House of Lords, and complain'd bitterly of the Commons for their Want of Respect to him in accusing as a Delinquent a Peer of the Realm honour'd with his Trust, and for whose Innocence his own Honour and Conscience oblig'd him to give Testimony; but the Commons sent Sir Nathaniel Rich with a Message to the Lords, desiring the Duke might be committed, which the Lords did not think fit to do; and the Commons growing still more warm, turn'd themselves into a grand Committee, lock'd up their Doors, and resolv'd to proceed no further till they were righted in their Privileges. Sir Dudley Charlson in vain endeavour'd to allay this Heat, by blaming Sir Dudley Diggs and Sir John Elliot. Sir Dudley deny'd he spoke the Words that gave the Offence, and was releas'd; so also was Sir John Elliot, who instead of denying his Speech, justify'd the Passages objected against him, and the House pass'd a Vote in Justification of him, Sir Dudley Diggs, and all the other Members who manag'd the Impeachment; and to shew their strict Regard to Justice, committed Mr. Moore, another of their Members, for speaking Words reflecting on the King.

'Tis worth observing that Mr. Echard applauds Cambridge the Wisdom and Discretion of the University of Cambridge in chusing the Duke of Buckingham their Chancellor at this very Juncture, when the Parliament was prosecuting him as the greatest Enemy to the Rights and Liberties of the People. Fuller says, a grand Party there unsought, unsent, unjust, according Larrey, 78.

A.D. 1626. according to his usual Jingling, gave their Suffrages for Thomas Earl of Berkshire, second Son to their late Chancellor Thomas Earl of Suffolk, and that the Duke carry'd it by very few Voices. The Parliament intended to write to the University about it, but the King wou'd not let them; on the contrary he wrote himself to Cambridge, and applauded the new Election, because, as the Archdeacon observes, it shew'd their Dislike to the Commons. A few Days after the Duke deliver'd in his Answer to the Articles of Impeachment, which he introduc'd with a very handsome artful Speech to the Lords; That his Accuser, Common Fame, was too subtle, and the House of Commons too great for him to contest with all, but he doubted not in time it wou'd be found that Common Fame had abus'd them both. Richard assures us, the Duke's Answer was a kind of new Grievance. When these Men pretend to Wit, 'tis as awkward as the Als's setting up for a Fop. His Adversaries expected a Defence of a more disdainful Nature, but there appear'd a Water-Spout on the Thames, which making a furious Assault on the Duke's House, gave these Adversaries a Handle to have it pass for portentous among the Vulgar, especially when at the same time a great Part of the Church-yard Wall of St. Andrew's Holborn fell down, several Graves were laid open, and Coffins tumbled into the midst of the Street, in a Storm of Hail, Rain, and Thunder, which some said was rais'd by Dr. Lamb a Wizard and Quack, whom the Duke employ'd and protected. The King sent to the Parliament to quicken them in the Matter of Subsidies, and the Parliament petition'd about Recusants, naming those in Places of Trust, and praying they may be remov'd. They also presented an Address by their Speaker, professing their Affection and Loyalty, and desiring his Majesty not to permit the Duke to have any more Access to him. To which the King return'd no Answer. A very likely way to get Subsidies! and the Commons foreseeing they should not sit long unless they wou'd give Money and forgive the Duke, agreed upon a Remonstrance against him, and against taking Tonnage and Poundage, tho' not granted by Act of Parliament. This hasten'd the Dissolution, tho' the Lords drew up a Petition to the King not to dissolve them, expressing themselves very dutifully and affectionately. "We are your Majesty's Hereditary Great Council: Permit us then to represent the Evils we foresee both at home at abroad, that must be the Consequence of dissolving this Parliament. Your Glory and the Happiness of your Subjects consist in a happy Union between them and your Majesty. This is the greatest Security of your Majesty's Authority and their Love. By this way alone your Majesty will obtain what you desire, and you will possess the Riches with the Hearts of the Nation. Their Treasure will be always open in a Parliamentary Way: But every thing is to be apprehended from a Dissolution, that will break all those sacred Ties; which we most humbly beg your Majesty to reflect on seriously". The Earls of Manchester, Carlisle and Holland were deputed to deliver this Petition to the King; but he answer'd only, I am determin'd, and will hear nothing to the contrary. Richard says the Petition was never deliver'd. Villiers and Laud were his chief Counsellors; and what they deserv'd for shutting his Ears against such wholesome Counsel as the Lords gave him, let the Reader determine. This is that Opiniatreté which was the distinguishing Character of King Charles I. and which is a sure Sign of Want of good Sense and good Nature. Lilly the Astrologer tells us, "The old Scotish Lady his Nurse was us'd to affirm, that he was of a very evil Nature even in his Infancy; and the Lady, who afterwards took charge of him, cannot deny it, but that he was beyond mea"sure wilful and unthankful"; which, as well as A.D. 1626. some other Particulars I shou'd not have quoted after the Astrologer, for whose Science I have a hearty Contempt, did they not agree with the Facts in other Histories. All the Counsel Laud and Villiers gave him render'd his Government daily more and more unpopular; and what must be the winding up of such a Bottom was not hard to foresee.

On the 15th of June, this great, warm, and Parliament, as Whitlock calls them, was ment dissolv'd by Commission; and the same Day the Earl of Bristol was imprison'd, and the Earl of Arundel confin'd, that nothing might be omitted to increase the Aversion the People had to the Ministry. There is no Gloss in Clarendon for this Rashness and Obstinacy. "The Course of emptying Men from Prosecution, says my Author, by dissolving of Parliaments, made the Power of Parliaments much more formidable; as conceiv'd to be without Limit, since the Sovereign Power seem'd to be compell'd (as unable otherwise to set Bounds to their Proceedings) to that Cure, and to determine their Being, because it cou'd not determine their Jurisdiction". An Anonymous Historian tells us the Parliament had their Proofs ready against Buckingham. The Commons Remonstrance against the Duke, which they had not time to deliver, was printed and dispers'd. He was charg'd in it with being the Author of all the Misunderstandings between the King and his People, and of almost all the Grievances they complain'd of. The King publish'd a Declaration containing the Grounds and Causes for dissolving this and the former Parliament, and a Proclamation for suppressing the Parliament's Remonstrance; which must be own'd to be the shortest way of answering it. The Parliament said in their Remonstrance, "How can we suffer a Man so dangerous and ill designing in the Administration, to enjoy the chief Offices of the State? How can we grant Subsidies to your Majesty, which must pass thro' his Hands, and which he will employ to ruin our Liberties and Religion? Is it not he that has put your Majesty on levying Tonnage and Poundage, which were granted to the late King only during his Life, and which cannot be rais'd after his Death without a new Bill? We cannot look on these pernicious Counsellors but with Horror, who engage your Majesty in such Measures, as a good King, such as your Majesty, ought not to take. We repeat it, That we look on the pernicious Counsellors as Vipers, as publick Plagues, and as capital Enemies to the King and People". Bishop Laud was one of the Chiefs of the Council, fatal, say they, to both. The Remonstrance again: "The King cannot exact Contributions but in a Parliamentary Way, nor the Parliament see their Privileges violated without complaining and Murmurs. Your Majesty promised that there shou'd be no Occasion for such Complaints: How comes it that one of your Ministers has the Power to make you break so solemn an Engagement? Remove so dangerous an Enemy from your Court and Person. Free us from our just Fears, and then your Majesty shall find us ready to give such Supplies, as can be expected from a People to a King who is infinitely belov'd; and we are ready to sacrifice our Lives and Estates to make you the most powerful Prince that ever sat on the Throne of England, and are uneasy only for our Liberties and Religion". The Archdeacon has learnt of the Author of Clarendon's History to sink such Papers as he does not like, or so to curtail them that the Spirit of them is lost. Thus we have only a word or two of this Remonstrance, of which his Majesty in his Declaration after the Dissolution of the Parliament, says a thing extremely unbecoming the

A.D. 1626. Royal Dignity; The Duke is only odious to the Parliament, because he serv'd the late King and myself faithfully. The contrary to this was known to every Mortal that read this Declaration. The Lord Clarendon, if he was the Historian, says, He engag'd his old unwilling Master and the Kingdom in a War with Spain; not to mention the bold Journey thither on the Breach of the Match, in a Time when the Crown was so poor; and this only upon personal Animositities between him and the Duke of Olivarez, &c. Was this serving the late King faithfully? Clarendon again: The Duke took great Pains to lessen the King's Affection to his Wife. Was this to serve him himself faithfully? I could fill many Pages with Instances directly opposite to that Assertion; but these are, I think, sufficient to give one a just Notion of the Integrity as well as the Sense of that Declaration, where indeed it was not forgotten to extol his supreme, immediate and independent Authority of Calling, Adjourning, Proroguing and Dissolving the Parliament. What has all this to do with screening a Criminal from Justice, and with taking Tonnage and Poundage against Law? The Right of my Prerogative is inseparable from the Crown, and for which I am bound to give an Account to none but God my only superior. And was not the People's Money as much their Right? And if he took it from them illegally, as he did, tho' there was to be a severe Account given of it at the last Judgment, yet it was the People's Right inseparable from their Birth, to keep what was their own, and to hinder his taking it from them against Law if they cou'd.

Illegal Taxes.
P. 67.

His Majesty caus'd an Information to be preferr'd in the Star-Chamber against the Duke of Buckingham for the same Matters contain'd in the Articles of Impeachment. To which the Duke put in his Answer; but it came not to a Hearing; and was itself a Farce that only expos'd the Actors to Contempt and Laughter, every body seeing the vain Artifice to evade Justice.

Several other illegal Ways besides that of Tonnage and Poundage were made use of to extort Money from the People; as a free Gift. By this means, says Larrey, to give new Grounds of Complaint, and to transfer the Nation's Hatred of the Favourite to the King. Knighthood, an old, obsolete, nonsensical Project, attended with Circumstances that render'd the Grievance as monstrous as it was oppressive. The King at his Coronation fet forth a Proclamation containing, That in regard of the Infection then spreading thro' the Kingdom, he wou'd dispense with those Knights, who by an ancient Statute were to attend at that Solemnity; and they were thereby requir'd not to attend. However, within a few Months after he took Advantage of their Absence, and rais'd a vast Sum of Money out of their Estates at the Council-Table; where they pleading the said Proclamation for their Justification were answer'd, The Law of the Land is above any Proclamation. Like that Tyrant, says Coke, who when he cou'd not by Law execute a Virgin, commanded her to be deflower'd, and then put to Death. Another says of it, He set up the Project of Knighthood, and call'd to account all Gentlemen and others that attended not his Coronation, tho' he had before forbidden their Attendance by Proclamation. Those two impartial Historians Mr. Echard and the Author of the History of the Rebellion have not the least Hint of this Proclamation, but insist upon the Foundation it had in Right, a shame to the Lawyer who said it, that because 15 l. a Year made a Man liable to a Knight's Tax, when 15 l. a Year was as much as 150 at the Time when Knighthood was reviv'd; therefore every Man of 40 l. a Year shou'd pay it, when 40 l. was no more than 4 l. in Edward the Second's Time, when that romantick Tax was rated at 15 l. a Year. Loans and other lawless Ways and Means to pick the People's Pockets were thought of; Projects very grievous, unjust, ridiculous and scandalous were set on foot, as we read in Clarendon; for there is a Force in Truth which will sometimes oblige even its Enemies to confess it.

There was hardly any thing talk'd of, but the Parliament's Remonstrance and the King's Declaration. The major Vote was apparently on the Side of the Remonstrance, which sunk deeply into the Minds of the aggrieved People; but the King's Declaration shew'd only that the Court rather thought something shou'd be said, than really that they had any thing to say against it.

The Loan was regulated by the Sum the Parliament had voted for Subsidies and Fifteenths; as if the King exacted no more than the House of Commons had given him, tho' indeed they had given him nothing. His Majesty promis'd to call another Parliament as soon as his Affairs wou'd permit him, to make good the Subsidies which he anticipated by the Loan. The Peers offer'd their Contributions readily, and the Papists offer'd double; but the Court understanding on what Conditions, did not think proper to revoke the Penal Laws, and give new Umbrage to the Protestants for so poor a Consideration as 10 or 20000 l. to which their double Payment might at that time amount. Archdeacon Echard owns that Laud undertook to justify the levying of this illegal Imposition; and drew up Instructions which were sent to the two Archbishops to be dispers'd among the inferior Clergy, and to be publish'd in all Parishes. He adds, There were plausible Reasons for raising this Money without Act of Parliament; which is Nonsense. There cannot be a plausible Reason for acting contrary to Law. The Subsidies might have been levy'd regularly, if the Court wou'd have let the Parliament have proceeded regularly against Buckingham. The Wisdom of this Ministry appears farther in Echard's Account of the Loan. "The Reluctance of private Persons to pay it made the Government most severe in the Execution of the Project; and the Severity made the People more averse to it. So that the Steps taken to promote the Design caus'd it to have less Success, and to appear more odious". But then he takes upon him to insinuate, that without this illegal Tax they had hazarded the Loss of all their Estates; and proceeds, The Clergy were earnestly excited from above to promote and advance this Design, in which they labour'd very heartily.

P. 430.

The Reader is desir'd to understand always when we speak of Clergy on these Occasions, such Clergymen as Neile, Wren, Mountague, Cofins, Manwaring, Sibthorp, and all under the Influence of Laud; that the sincere Protestants of the true Church of England, such as Moreton, Carlton, Davenant, Usher, Browrig, Hall, Featly, Prideaux, Oldsworth, Skute, Udal, Ward, Gouge, Sibbs, and a great Number of pious, learned Divines, always bore their Testimony against Laud's Innovations in Church and State; and it ought to be remember'd to the Honour of the University of Oxford, that great Discontents grew there, to use Dr. Fuller's Words, for the multiplying Innovations in Divine Service; which I remark here, that the Reader may distinguish such Divines as Sibthorp and Manwaring from true Church of England Ministers, who in all times since our Church was reform'd have been the Support and Ornament of the Reformation. It is to Laud only and his Creatures that must be imputed the spiritual and temporal Grievances of this Reign; and we never mean any other Clergy, when we speak of the Mischiefs and Miseries they were the Occasion of. Sibthorp and Manwaring undertook to prove out of Scripture, that the King might impose publick Taxes without Consent of Parliament, and that the People were bound in Conscience to obey his Will and Pleasure. This Doctrine was preach'd by Sibthorp in an Assize Sermon at Northampton. He publish'd Clergy, the bad and the good.

Clergy preach up arbitrary Power.

Sibthorp's Sermon.

A.D. 1626. publish'd it under the Title of Apostolick Obedience, and dedicated it to the King, whose Royal Disposition to arbitrary despotick Power he must surely be well acquainted with, or he durst not have been so impudent as to have prefix'd his Majesty's Name to it. Manwaring preach'd two Sermons to the same purpose before the King and Court with great Applause. He also publish'd them under the Title of, Religion and Allegiance. Let us therefore see what the Allegiance and Religion of Laudian Clergy are made of. The King is not bound to observe the Laws of the Realm concerning the Subjects Rights and Liberties. His Majesty being thus absolv'd for breaking the Coronation Oath, it is said farther, His Royal Will in imposing Taxes without Consent of Parliament binds the Subjects Conscience on Pain of Damnation. As impious as this Doctrine is, 'tis every whit as false. But there would be no Terror in his impotent Threat, and his Brethren might have preach'd to Eternity without bringing a Penny into the Exchequer, if the Writs to the Sheriff and the Sheriffs Myrmidons had not plunder'd the People by that pretended Authority. Those who refuse to pay the Loan offend God. Wretched Sycophant. Those who refuse to do things contrary to Law are guilty of Sin: They offend God, there's their Religion; and the King's supreme Authority, there's their Allegiance, and become guilty of Impiety, Disloyalty, and Rebellion. For this wonderful Preachment, and being punish'd for it, Manwaring, senseless and worthless as he was, got a good Bishoprick, tho' Echard himself confesses, Manwaring's and Sibthorp's Sermons occasion'd some hard Reflections upon the Clergy in general, when in so large a Body only two were found to run into such Extremes. There needs no Authority to prove this so barefac'd a Falshood, only two who preach'd up arbitrary Power. The thing speaks itself. General Ludlow tells us, This was not the only Work of which the Clergy were judg'd capable, and therefore divers of them enter'd the Lists as Champions of the Prerogative, asserting that the Possessions and Estates of the Subjects did of Right belong to the King, and that he might dispose of them at his Pleasure; thereby vacating and annulling as much as in them lay all the Laws of England that secure a Property to the People. Not a Syllable of this in Clarendon or Echard. It was then as in our Days: Those evil Counsellors who betray'd the People's Liberties generally made use of the meanest, most ignorant, and most immoral of the Clergy to carry on their Design. They could not make Tools of the Pious, Learned, and Wise. A. Wood acknowledges Sibthorp was a Person of little Learning and few Parti; only made it his Endeavour by his Forwardness to gain Preference. Such a one was Sacheverel in our Days; and such will all those Clergy be, who turn Religion and Allegiance into Superstition and Slavery. All their Preaching did not reconcile the People to the Loan. They may sometimes be preach'd out of their Opinions, but seldom or never out of their Money, when the Law is on their Side. The Deputy Lieutenants and Justices of the Peace in Dorsetshire said the Case was without Precedent. The same said the Citizens of London. But the Privy-Council told them Precedents in former Time was Obedience, and not Direction. All false again and sophistical. There were no Precedents of Obedience contrary to Law, without Objection, which these sage Counsellors, and Laud among the rest, call Direction. Some of the Persons who refus'd the Loan were press'd for Seamen, some for Soldiers, and the Country Gentlemen were thrown into Prison in Counties distant from their Seats, particularly Sir Thomas Wentworth, Sir John. Hotham, George Ratcliffe, Esq; Sir William Constable, Yorkshire; Sir John Wray, Sir William Armyne, Sir Thomas Grantham, Sir Edward Ayscough, Lincolnshire; Sir William Wilmer, Sir Eras- mus Dryden, Richard Knightley, Esq; Northamptonshire; Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Strangways, John Tregonwell, Esq; Dorsetshire; Sir John Heveningham, Sir Samuel Barnardiston, Suffolk; Sir Harbottle Grimston, Sir Francis Barrington, Essex; Sir Robert Poyntz, Henry Fowle, Esq; Gloucestershire; John Hampden, Esq; Sir Edward Hampden, Buckinghamshire; Sir Maurice Berkley, Somersetshire; Sir John Corbet, Sherbrooke; Sir William Chauncey, Richard Anderson, Esq; Hertfordshire; Peter Dalton, Esq; Cheshire. Sir Beauchamp St. John, Bedfordshire; Sir John Elliot, William Coriton, Esq; Cornwall; Sir Thomas Darnel, Mr. Norwood, Sir Peter Hayman, Kent; and others, Knights of Shires, Citizens and Burgessees in Parliament. This is another of those popular Steps which distinguish K. Charles's Reign from all others. The Archdeacon tells us, The Gentlemen were branded as Puritans, while the Papists, who were most liberal in the Loan, were caress'd by the Courtiers, which still added to the popular Disgusts; yet he is afterwards amaz'd how Disgusts heap'd upon Disgusts should turn Discontent into Indignation, and Indignation into the worst Sort of Action Civil War.

Besides the Loan there was a Benevolence requir'd: Another Way of forcing People to give a lence. free Gift. Commissions were issu'd for Musters, martial Law was executed, and the Inhabitants of the Sea Coasts were commanded to repair to, and dwell upon their Estates. Soldiers were billeted, and great Outrages committed by them. Sir Randolph Crew, a very worthy Magistrate, was remov'd from the High Office of Lord Chief Justice; and Sir Nicholas Hyde, whose greatest Merit was his drawing the Duke's Answer, had his Place given him. To crown all these ungrateful Measures, the Bishop of Lincoln was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber for speaking against the Loan. Laud was promoted to the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, and soon after to the Deanery of the Royal Chapel, for his Services, says Echard; but has not one Piece of real Service to remember. It must be for these Services, or the sake of the good Company he was in, that the venerable Body of Doctors at Cambridge treated him with Splendor, he being then attending the Duke of Buckingham, whose Services too had made him too powerful for the Parliament. The judicious Fuller informs us, the Duke presented the Beadles with fine silver Staves having the King's Arms engrav'd upon them, not forgetting his own, for the greater Honour of the Esquire Beadles and the University.

With the Money rais'd by the Loan and Benevolence, a Squadron of Ships was sent to the Elbe to secure the Commerce of the English trading to Hamburg; but we do not hear how it came to be interrupted. A.D. 1627.

The main Fleet was fitted out at Portsmouth. The Fleet 'Twas said to be design'd against the Algerines, but against it was really intended against France, and for one France. of the most unaccountable Wars that ever a Prince enter'd into, considering that neither King Charles nor the Duke could have the least Concern for the Safety of Rockelle, a City they had lent the French King Ships to reduce a Year before; tho' now Satisfaction was demanded for employing them in that Service, and for the Capture of English Merchant Ships to the Value of 30000*l.* tho' the Duke of Buckingham was himself the Aggressor by seizing the St. Peter of New Haven, and taking 20000*l.* out of her in Jewels and other rich Commodities.

The Resentment on the French King's Part was for dismissing the Queen's French Servants, whose Insolence was become intolerable. The King told them himself he would bear it no longer, and they must be gone. Her Majesty's Priests had been so bold, as to enjoin her in Penance to walk barefoot to Tyburn to pay her Devotions, where so many Papish Priests had receiv'd Martyrdom and Saintship, for plotting against the Religion and Laws of their

The Bishop of Mende, and Madam de St. George, who were the greatest Offenders, began to make Apologies, but the King turn'd short upon them, saying, I name none, but I tell you my Resolution. The Queen fell into a furious Passion, and flew into great Indecencies in Words and Actions, upbraiding him with want of Love, which he endeavour'd to disprove by the softest and most soothing Expressions; but failing in that, he had Recourse to his Authority, saying, Be satisfied, it must be so. About one hundred and twenty of these French Domesticks were sent back to France, after they had been paid their Wages and Pensions to the full. The Lord Carlton was dispatch'd to Paris, to notify this Action, and explain the Causes of it; but it was too great a Disgrace to a Daughter of France, to be put up without some Shew of Resentment. The French Court said the Marriage Articles were violated, and Orders were given to confiscate all English Ships in the Ports of France. This Broil was the chief Pretence of the War, and truly 'tis a kind of Riddle which wants Interpretation, that Buckingham shou'd begin a War at one end of France to see his Mistress at another, as was insinuated; or that so good a Friend to Popery, shou'd be concern'd for the Safety of Protestants. It was not only talk'd in England, that Buckingham's chief Design in the French War was to mortify Richlieu his more happy Rival, at least as he imagin'd, and see his Mistress the Queen of France: It was also the Talk in France, and even in the Court, where the D. ches de Chevreuse did not stick to speak of his Fleet and Forces with Joy, and the Queen herself did the same among her Confidants. Madam de Motteville tells us, nothing was more grateful to her and the Dutchesse de Chevreuse, who was in Love with the Earl of Holland. Her Majesty took Pleasure in hearing the Wisbes of the Dutchesse for the Prosperity of the English.

Buckingham's Passion for the French Queen.

Mott.
Mem. 17.

Some Months before this the Queen of England began to be out of Conceit with her Husband, whose sullen Temper was not at all suitable to her Gaiety. Buckingham heighten'd her Disgust into an Aversion, by telling her frankly, that if he pleas'd he cou'd set them together by the Ears; and he did it to such a Degree as to make her grow melancholy, and long to return to France. In order to which she endeavour'd to gain Buckingham, knowing what a passionate Desire he had to renew his Visits to Queen Anne of Austria. He came into it with Eagerness, and did her so great Service, as to obtain Leave for her from the King her Husband, on Condition she procur'd Leave for Buckingham from the Court of France to accompany her. She wrote so to her Mother Mary de Medicis; but neither that Princess, nor the King her Brother, would consent to it. Buckingham's Pretence was to compose the Difference between the two Crowns by Treaty; and being deny'd in that Proposition, he in Revenge put the King upon this War, which seems to be pretty near the Truth. Be it as it will, he got a Fleet and Army together, and came before Rochelle with 100 Sail of Ships about the middle of July; but the Rockellers, as much in Distress as they were, had not such a good Opinion of the Duke's Friendship towards them, as to put themselves immediately into his Hands, and told Sir William Beecher, the Duke's Messenger, they were bound by Oath not to do any Thing without the Consent of the rest of the Religion. Buckingham began his Expedition with a Memorial in his own Name, not his Master's; wherein he took Notice of the French King's refusing Passage to Count Mansveldt's Army before-mention'd; which Affront had been born with two or three Years, and the Ships to reduce Rochelle were lent since that; so absurd was the Cause as well as Course of this War.

Isle of Rhe

The Duke de Sobiez Brother to the Duke de Rohan, being aboard the English Fleet, advis'd

Buckingham to land the Army in the Isle of Oléron, as an Enterprize more feasible than that of the Isle of Rhe, which was stronger and better provided. This was agreed upon, but Sobiez was no sooner gone to his Friends in Rochelle, than Buckingham alter'd his Resolution, and sail'd to the Isle of Rhe, where he landed 1200 Men about the first of August. The French encounter'd them, but were repuls'd, and the whole Army came safe ashore. Touras Governor of the Island had five Battalions of Foot, and six Squadrons of Horse to oppose Buckingham's landing; but the Fire of his Cannon drove away the French, and the English landed with little or no Loss. Larrey thinks if the Duke had attack'd the Fort and Citadell immediately, while the French were in Consternation, he might have made himself Master of both; but instead of using that Diligence, he spent his Time in making Lines about his Camp, and gave the Enemy an Opportunity to finish their Works, and put them out of Danger. Some Days after he besieg'd the Citadell in Form, and finding a greater Resistance than he expected, he endeavour'd to reduce it by starving the Garrison; but Relief arriving from the Continent, 8000 Men commanded by Marechal Schomberg, the Duke after a brave tho' unfortunate Assault on the Citadell, rais'd the Siege, and in his Retreat was pursu'd by the French now superior to him in Numbers. The Garrison of Fort le Prie attack'd the English in their Rear, and routed them in a narrow Lane or Causey. The Horse fell in upon the Foot, who tumbled into the Salt-Pits and perish'd, or in the Ditches on both Sides. Coming to a Bridge, the Crowd was so great, that many of the English were drown'd in the River; however, they made a Stand at this Bridge, and the French perceiving they were resolv'd to sell their Lives dearly, left the Pursuit, and Buckingham reach'd his Ships with the Remains of his Army. There were slain in this wretched Expedition Sir William Heydon and the martial Sir John Burroughs, with many gallant Officers; and above 2500 Soldiers, tho' Buckingham did his utmost to lessen the Loss in the Reports that were made to both King and People. I have met with another Account of this Retreat in a contemporary History: "The Night before the Retreat, the Duke call'd a Council of War, and there shew'd them the Necessity of a Retreat, and that himself in martial Discipline being wholly unexperienc'd, lest the managing of the next Day's Action to them, offering the Service of his Person to any Hazard whatever, as far as any private Soldier. The Council unanimously chose Sir William Courtney to manage the Retreat. a heavy, dull, covetous old Man, who having been twenty or thirty Years a private Captain in Holland, was by Sir John Burroughs's Means made Colonel in this Expedition; and Burroughs being dead, the Command for that Day was given to old Courtney; but he either through Want of Judgment or Forgetfulness, having not sufficiently provided for the Security of the English Rear, many of them were cut to Pieces; and had not Sir Pierre Crosby with 800 Irish, made good their Retreat, the whole Army had been lost." Courtney himself fell into a Salt Pan, and escap'd by his Man Anthony's crying out, Oh, save my Captain; but the poor Fellow lost his own Life in attempting it. A Doctor of Physick who was in this Expedition at Rhe, hearing several Officers tell his Majesty there were but three or four hundred kill'd, cou'd not forbear undeceiving him; assuring him there were two thousand slain, for which Truth he was forbidden the Court. We have not seen one good Step taken by this notable General, whose Herosim makes such a Figure in Echard's History. The English who had been accusom'd to see their Generals return with Triumph in all Enterprizes during the glorious Reign of

A.D. 1627. of Queen Elizabeth, conceiv'd the utmost Indignation against Buckingham and his Advisers, of whom Laud was the chief, as appears by the Cry at that Time, There must some be sacrific'd, and Laud as soon as any. That Prelate hearing of it, told the King, who answer'd, I desire you not to trouble yourself with any Reports, till you see me forsake my Friends. These Friends were Villiers, Laud, Neile, Weston, Conway, &c. who flatter'd him with absolute Power; and his Enemies were those generous Patriots who defended the Rights and Liberties of his Subjects in Parliament. The Archdeacon acknowledges that the King did not at all resent the Dishonour which was thrown on the English Name by his Friend Buckingham. Yet the Peoples Resentments were increas'd by it, all Tongues and Pens were sharpen'd against this inglorious Expedition; the Citizens murmur'd at a visible Decay of Trade; the Merchants were discourag'd from building of Ships; the Mariners came in Multitudes to Whitehall clamouring for their Pay; Land Soldiers were kept up and billeted, and martial Law continu'd to be executed. In sum, the Duke was universally detested, and upon his Account every Grievance and Misfortune were aggravated and represented in the most hideous Manner. Compare this Account of the Times with that in Clarendon. The Kingdom prosper'd exceedingly, and enjoy'd a longer Peace, a greater Plenty, and in fuller Security than had been in any former Age. During the whole Time that these Pressures were exercis'd, the Nation enjoy'd the greatest Calm, and the FULLEST Measure of FELICITY that any People in any Age had been bless'd with, to the Wonder and Envy of all Christendom. And in another Place he tells us what those Felicities were; "Upon every Dissolution of Parliament, such as had given any Offence were imprison'd or discharg'd. New Projects were every Day set on Foot for Money, which serv'd only to offend and incense the People. Many Persons of the best Quality and Condition under the Peerage, were committed to several Prisons with unheard of Circumstances, for refusing to pay Money requir'd by these extravagant Ways. Supplemental Acts of State were made to supply Defects of Law, and so Tonnage and Poundage, and other Duties on Merchandise, were collected by Order of the Board, which had been positively refus'd to be settled by Act of Parliament. New and greater Impositions were laid upon Trade, obsolete Laws were reviv'd and rigorously executed, the Counties were incens'd, the Endeavours to raise Men by pressing found Opposition; and the Authority was not submitted to, as being counted illegal. Many were executed by martial Law, which rais'd an Asperity in the Minds of more than the common People; and this Distemper was so universal, that all wise Men look'd upon it as a Prediction of the Destruction that wou'd follow; nor was there Serenity in the Countenance of any Man." I believe this is one of the Parts of Clarendon's History, which his Lordship wrote himself, notwithstanding how inconsistent the one Passage is with the other; for the Earl must have felt some Part of those Pressures in which he was some time passive before he became active.

The English having so ingloriously left France, the French King order'd the Siege of Rochelle in Form, which Cardinal Richlieu undertook in Person, and with the Reduction of that City, began the Destruction of the Protestant Religion in France: The Pretence was that the Rochellers had invited the English to enter France and give them Assistance; whereas in truth, till Buckingham made the Rupture to satisfy his own private Resentment, King Charles was so far from assisting the Rochellers; that he lent the French King Ships to reduce them; and when the Duke came first before the City, the Jealousy which they had conceiv'd of his Insincerity, hinder'd their joining heartily with him. Larrey says, He was accus'd of corresponding with the Enemy, and of Treason. Again; his Imprudence and Slowness were taken for Treason and Correspondence with the Enemy. He adds, Notwithstanding this ill Success, the King continu'd bewitch'd to his Favourite; he receiv'd him with great Marks of Affection, and caress'd him as much as if the Fleet had return'd victorious. Another Instance of the despicable Conduct of this Administration which ran counter to every thing that was laudable and popular. And considering where Envy and Spite were wont to inhabit in the Days of Monckery, one can't well impute these envious and spiteful Counsels to any one with more Reason and Probability than to Laud.

While Buckingham was making War in France, the Court was more successful in their War against the Liberties and Properties of the People. Sir John Elliot, one of the Gentlemen who were in Goal for not paying the Loan, petition'd the King, setting forth the Illegality of that Tax, or any Tax without Consent of Parliament, alledging his Conscience cou'd not submit to it, and praying his Liberty, but cou'd not obtain it. Sir Peter Hayman one of the Barons of the Cinque-Ports, another Gentleman who refus'd the Loan, was sent to serve in the Palatinate. Five of these Gentlemen were brought by Habeas Corpus to the King's-Bench, and by their Council took Exceptions to the Return; For that it had not the Cause of their Commitment, but of their Detainer in Prison, per speciale Mandatum Regis, which is a particular Cause; and the Law is most tender of the Liberty of the Subject. This was argued by Noy whom a Place had not yet corrupted, by the great Selden, Brampton, and Calthorpe, who pray'd that the Prisoners might be releas'd. Heath the King's Attorney, who had been corrupted by a Place, argued in Maintenance of the Return, and there was a Chief-Justice Sir Nicholas Hyde ready to do what he wou'd have him; so he declar'd as the Opinion of the Court, that the Return was positive and absolute by the King's Command, that the Matter of the Return is sufficient, &c. and that the Prisoners, Gentlemen of the best Fashion in England, ought to be remanded. This worthy Judge Hyde and his Brethren gave their righteous Opinion also for executing by martial Law; and the FELICITY of the Times must doubtless be inconceivably great, as we read in Clarendon, when the Law was in such Hands as Hyde's.

Now it was that Archbishop Abbot was sequester'd from his sacred Office and Jurisdiction; not as Echard tells us, because he was grown infirm and unactive, and many thought him useless and unfit; which is as false as every Word that is said of this most reverend Father of our Church by the Author of Clarendon's History. It was, as Welwood assures us, because he refus'd to license Sibthorpe's scandalous Sermon, which the King himself sent to him by Mr. Murray to have his Imprimatur, and the Authority of the Archbishop for that insolent Priest's erroneous Doctrines, which establish the King's Will for Law. His Grace refusing to license it, Murray came to him again, telling him his Majesty insist'd upon it; but that not prevailing, he was told in a third Message, If he did not do it, the King wou'd take another Course with him. Upon this his Grace deliver'd his Objections in Writing, some of which I will repeat to shew with what Reason Echard call'd the Archbishop useless and unfit, than which one can hardly call himself any thing worse. His Grace represented, "That the Passage in Sibthorpe quoted out of St. Matthew to recommend the Tax, plainly shew'd the hard Condition of the Jews under the Yoke of the Roman Emperors, their Masters and Conquerors, but it was no Ways proper to establish the Right of such a Tax in the

A.D. 1627. "English Nation; that the Tax laid upon the Jews was a Poll Tax; and that Richard II. by levying such a Tax, caus'd an Insurrection, which was attended with horrible Massacres; and that a good King, such as his Majesty was, ought to exact nothing from his Subjects but according to the Laws." The Archdeacon tells us this Archbishop was not fit to be a Bishop as many thought. But Dr. Fuller gives us a better Reason for his Unfitness; He was averse to comply with the Court Designs, which made him obnoxious to the King's Displeasure; but the Blame of the Prosecution did most light upon Bishop Laud, Men accounting he endeavour'd to supplant him whom he cou'd not be contented to succeed. The State Pre- tence to suspend him was his accidental shooting the Park-Keeper at the Lord Zouch's, which is already spoken of. Larrey confirms Laud's busying himself in this bad Work; he ply'd the King to ruin the Archbishop, who charg'd Laud with that Act of Injustice, and representing to his Majesty that his Objections to Sibthorp's Sermon proceeded from a Spirit of Rebellion. This is the same Laud who in Clarendon is stil'd a Man of immense Virtue; but as to Archbishop Abbot, he was ignorant, remiss, illiterate, and unmannerly. There are so many Fal- sities in that Author's Character of his Grace, that one does not know where to begin with detecting them. He affirms as positively as a Man can af- firm any thing upon Oath, he was made Bishop of London before he had been Parson, Vicar, or Curate of any Parish Church in England, or Dean or Pre- bendary of any Cathedral Church. I beg the Rea- der to mind this bold Assertion, and the Truth and Moderation of it, when he comes to other Cha- racters in that impartial History. A. Wood an Hi- storian in the same Interest, asserts on the contra- ry, In the latter End of 1599, he was made Dean of Winchester, and in February 1609 translated from Coventry and Litchfield to London. In Clarendon it is said, He was totally ignorant of the Con- stitution of the Church. In A. Wood we read the Title of one of his Books, which is directly the Reverse of such Ignorance, A Treatise of perpetual Visibility and Succession of the Church, &c. In Clarendon he is accus'd of Rashness; in A. Wood he is commended for Vigilancy. In Clarendon we are told he had Learning sufficient for a Head of a College, which is said by way of Contempt; in Wood, He was a Man of Learning, and an able Statesman. Welwood tells us, Dr. Abbot was a Man of considerable Learning and genteel Education; the latter of which is as unusual in a Headship, as Piety in a rigid Priesthood. The whole Cha- racter of Dr. Abbot in Clarendon is of a Piece with this Invective and Invention. Laud's is as much invented, but then it is all Eulogy, and consequently ridiculous. I shou'd be ashamed of asserting with- out proving; and the Proofs of what I say here, will be but too frequent in the Course of our Hi- story: Five Bishops were deputed to take the Archbishop's holy Office from him, and exercise it themselves, whose Names ought to be remem- ber'd to their Dishonour, as the good Archbishop's will ever be with Honour. Dr. George Mountaine Bishop of London, Dr. Richard Neile Bishop of Dur- ham, Dr. Walter Curl Bishop of Rochester, Dr. John Howson Bishop of Oxford, Dr. William Laud Bishop of Bath and Wells. Larrey observes Dr. Abbot was not accus'd of any Crime which made him unworthy of the Ministry, and complain'd of the Injustice done him, making it appear that he was only guilty of displeasing Buckingham and Laud, Favourers of the Papists, excepting that, he defy'd his greatest Enemies to lay any other Thing to his Charge. The Arch- bishop cou'd not help putting Buckingham in mind of his being instrumental in his Preferment at Court; but as Laud was guilty of the foulest Ingratitude to Archbishop Williams, so was this greater Favourite Buckingham alike guilty towards his Benefactor the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, whom he had ne- ver since ceased to persecute. As the ungrateful Man is the most infamous of all Creatures, let his Title and Fortune be what it will, so where- ever that Vice is found, one may be sure there is no true Virtue in its Company.

The Papists in Ireland offer'd to pay 5000 Men constantly, if they might have a Toleration for their Religion. Some advis'd the King to accept their Offer on those wicked Terms, pleading he might lawfully take what they were forward to give; but that Notion dropt at the Interposition of the Bishops in Ireland, especially that pious Pre- late Bishop Downham, who preach'd effectually a- gainst it, from this Text, That we being deliver'd from the Hands of our Enemies, might serve him without Fear.

The Peoples Jealousies were not like to be less'd by the Discovery of a Design to bring over 1000 German Horse, for which 30000 Pounds was paid to Philip Burlemarch a Dutch Merchant. These German Troops were to be sent to England under the Command of Sir William Balfour and Colonel Dalbier. Echard calls these Levies a ne- cessary Preparation for the King's foreign Engage- ments. With whom? If with any foreign Power for the Palatine Service, the Germans were near the Place of Action, and every Step towards Eng- land was out of their way. If for a War against Spain or France, With whom had the King engag'd for a Body of Horse? The People had indeed some foolish Fears that this foreign Cavalry might be made part of a standing Army.

About the same Time a Commission was granted to twenty-three Lords and others to raise Money by Excise. Laud was one of these Commission- ers. The Archdeacon owns this was a disobligh- ing Measure, a notorious Violation of the Law, and Invasion of the Peoples Properties, was a dis- obliging Thing; it is the very Pink of Civility. The Ministers being puzzled by the Difficulties they had brought their Master and themselves into, Re- course is had to a wiser Counsellor Sir Robert Cot- ton, whose great Learning and Abilities render'd him worthy the Trust that was put in him. He made a very judicious Speech to the King and Council, advising his Majesty to call a Parliament, to begin with Religion, and satisfy them about the Observation of the Laws against Papists, and about raising Money without their Consent; for whatever specious Reasons are given for it, the People cannot bear it, looking on every Tax that is not authoriz'd by Parliament as Tyranny, breaking in upon their very Laws, and imposing of Servitude. "Take away these Causes, said Sir Robert Cotton, discontinue the raising Taxes, release the Prisoners, demand of your Parliament the Subsidies you have Oc- casion for; you are certain to obtain them by this Method, and to be Master of your Subjects Purse, if you are Master of their Hearts; and shew them the Sincerity and Tenderness of your own." He clos'd all with the Means of recon- ciling the Duke to the People, and that was to give him the Credit of this good Counsel, and have it thought that he advis'd the calling a Parli- ament. The Nation, continu'd Sir Robert, look on with Horror, because the Dissolution of the two Par- liaments are imputed to him; their Sentiments will be different when they behold him as the Author of the third. Sir Robert Cotton's Advice was follow'd, the Prisoners who had exclaim'd against the ille- gal Taxes were releas'd, and it was resolv'd to call a Parliament.

About the same Time a Society of Priests and Jesuits was discover'd at Clerkenwell, and among their Papers, was found a Coppy of a Letter writ- ten to their Rector at Brussels on the Subject of the approaching Parliament, wherein 'twas said, We have planted the sovereign Drug Arminianism, and it thriv'd wonderfully under the Culture of Neile and and Laud, as the Jesuits say in their Letter. The Bishops of Winchester, Bath and Wells, Chichester, and Norwich, Neile, Laud, Mountague, and White, are at the Head of the Arminians, and my Lord Buckingham supports them with all his Credit; the King intends to establish arbitrary Government, and becomes daily more and more an Enemy to the Puritans. If the Administration during the whole Course of this Reign did not confirm what the Priests wrote, their Letter would not have been worth taking notice of: Echard has sunk it, and so he serves every thing that makes against these Arminian Prelates.

Writs being issu'd for summoning a Parliament, it boded no Good to Buckingham, that the Gentlemen who prosecuted him, and almost all those who had been imprison'd about the illegal Taxes, were elected Members. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of Lincoln, had Writs of Summons; so had the Earl of Bristol; and smoother Methods were put in Practice to prepare for the ensuing Session on the 17th of March. The Bishop of Lincoln receiv'd a Letter from the Lord-Keeper Coventry, a Month before the Parliament met, to dissuade him from appearing, but the Bishop resolv'd to stand on his Privilege, and wrote thus to the Lord-Keeper; I must crave some Time to resolve by the best Counsels which God shall give me, whether I shall obey your Lordship's Letter, tho' mentioning his Majesty's Pleasure before my own Right, which by the Law of God and Man I may in all Humility maintain; which he did accordingly, and his Writ was not deny'd.

The Court took another disobliging Measure at the very beginning of the Parliament, by picking out Laud to preach the Sermon at the opening of the Session, when his Majesty made a Speech to the Two Houses, admonishing them to expedite their Business; and acquainting them with the common Danger, he then demanded Supplies, but told them if they did not do their Duty, he must use such other Means as he may to prevent Ruin. He bad them not to take this as a Threatning; and then gives them a discreet and decent Reason for it, I scorn to threaten any but my Equals. The Language of this Reign has an Air quite different from that of all other Reigns, and the Sentiments are the same, imperious and positive. The Parliament are treated as the French say de haut en bas, very contemptuously. There does not seem to be the least Occasion for this Menace, unless the King had resolv'd to do nothing for them, which should dispose them to do something for him. Coke takes Notice of this haughty way of speaking before so august an Assembly: His Majesty is not equal to any one Member of Parliament, and superior to the whole Body; but Decency would not admit the Prince to say so much to his People. What a Monster does the King make of a Parliament; they are Mr. Coke's Words, the Head so incomprehensibly big, and the Body so scornful and little; but if it becomes any Man to glory in his own Actions, it worse becomes him to glory in that which he himself had not done; so that admit the King had been so superlatively great, as to scorn all the World besides, yet it would have better become any other to have said it than himself. A Member of the House of Commons express'd his Sense of this Sally thus, Is this the Idea the King has of these Assemblies so much esteem'd by our Fathers and his Predecessors British, Saxon, and Norman? Those Princes us'd to call them the Assembly of Sages, the supreme and general Council of the Kingdom, &c. Things were chang'd under the late King, who by putting Sights upon Parliaments, occasion'd Discontent in them. We with Sorrow see the Son tread in his Father's Steps; whether it proceeds from his being educated in that unhappy Aversion, or that it is inspir'd by his pernicious Favourite. However, his Majesty told the Two Houses, he would gladly forget and forgive what was past, and hop'd they would not follow former Courses of Distraktion. The Lord-Keeper Coventry, whose Speeches were no more popular than the King's, spoke of the general Affairs of Christendom, the Enemies and Dangers to this Kingdom: He perswaded the Parliament to be speedy and liberal in their Supplies, and assur'd them his Majesty had forgotten all former Distastes; which was very evident by his holding the Duke of Buckingham still in his Bosom. The Commons made Choice of Sir John Finch for their Speaker, which shew'd that the House was then in no ill Disposition towards the Court, if the Court had shewn the least Readiness to give them Satisfaction about Grievances.

After the Speaker was chosen, a Writing was dropp'd on the Table by one of the Members, containing the Particulars of those Grievances, and an earnest Exhortation to the Commons to remember there could be no Safety but in the lawful Power of the Prince and the Freedom of Parliament. "How long, said the Writer, are we to be treated like Children, and diverted in our Pursuit! We are bugbear'd with Enemies abroad, to prevent our seeing those that are at home. If the first are so much to be fear'd, why were they made so? The late King left us in Peace with all the World, what Necessity was there that his Successor should declare War against Spain and France? Did he consult his Parliament, and must we pay for the Follies of a Favourite who has engag'd him therein without Reason? We are apprehensive of greater Evils from the Ambition of this Man, than from that of the House of Austria; and the Arminian Bishops Neile, Laud, and Mountague, whose Protector he is, are no less formidable than the Jesuits." Now read Clarendon, and you will know what Judgment to make of his Sincerity and Impartiality. The Church flourish'd with learned and extraordinary Men; we have just named them; and which in other good Times it in some Degree wanted, was supply'd withal to feed those Lamps. There the Christchurch Men shine out most apparently. The Protestant Religion was more advanc'd by Dr. Laud than it had been from the Reformation; Trade increas'd to that Degree, that we were the Exchange of Christendom; the Royal Navy very formidable at Sea, &c. There is a great deal more of it, and all so diametrically contrary to the Truth, that my Patience cannot hold out to the End.

One of the first Petitions of this Parliament was to leave the Care of the Royal Navy before-mention'd to his Majesty's faithful Subjects the Commons, who would give such Orders that nothing should be wanting, neither as to the Number of Ships, Men, or Provisions. It was complain'd, that by the Duke of Buckingham's pernicious Counsels the King laid Taxes on the People, and kept foreign Troops in the Kingdom; and as if England had no Soldiers of her own, some were brought from Scotland, others sent for from Germany. The Behaviour of the Deputy Lieutenants in the several Counties got them the Name of Whiffles; and as bad as the Judges were, they were forc'd to give a Check to the arbitrary Proceedings of the Attorney-General. These and other Matters being debated in the House of Commons, they came to the following Resolutions, Sir Edward Littleton in the Chair;

That no Freeman ought to be imprison'd without Cause shew'd either by the King or Council. That in such Case a Habeas Corpus ought to be granted.

That if no Cause of Commitment be return'd, the Party is to be bail'd.

That no Tax ought to be impos'd without Consent of Parliament.

That no Freeman ought to be confin'd by the King's Privy-Council, or others, but by Act of Parliament, or due Course of Law.

AD. 1628.

Sir Thomas Wentworth against the King's Proceedings.

The Administration was by these Votes declar'd illegal, and the Government arbitrary, tending to the Destruction of the Constitution of England. The Commons did not incline to grant Supplies till they were satisfy'd in these things. Many warm Speeches were made by Sir Thomas Wentworth not yet corrupted, Sir Robert Phillips, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Edward Coke, Mr. Creswel, Mr. Selden, Mr. Hakewell, and others. Sir Benjamin Rudyard indeed was of Opinion to trust to the King as to the Grievances, and go upon the Supply; but both King James and King Charles had been so often trusted, and with such ill Effect, that the major Vote of the House did not fall in with Sir Benjamin's. Sir John Cook, Secretary of State, seconded that Knight, and with the same Success.

Papists favour'd.

Notwithstanding what the Author of the History of the Rebellion told us of the Advancement of the Protestant Religion, the Lords and Commons of England were truly sensible of the contrary, and join'd in a Petition against Popery and Papists: "That the Laws against Romish Priests might be executed: That Children may not be transported beyond Sea to be bred Papists: That Recusants may be confin'd according to Law: That they may not be permitted to resort to Ambassadors Houses to Mass: That they may not be in Offices: That the Judges give Account of the Proceedings against them: That their Children may be brought up in the Reform'd Religion". The Answer to this was favourable enough, as other Answers to such kind of Petitions usually were; but the Papists knew better than to be much disturb'd by them. The Commons were remind'd of the Supply; and they remind'd the Court of the things in which they were aggriev'd. Sir Nathaniel Rich, Sir John Elliot, and Sir Henry Martin reflect'd on the late Management of the War, and seem'd averse to any new foreign Expeditions, from which no body expected any good, while they were conducted by Villiers. Sir John Cook deliver'd a Message from the King to clear Buckingham from some Words suppos'd to be spoken by him in Council. He declar'd the Duke was the first who mov'd the King to this Parliament; and his Majesty had said he count'd it his Glory to be King of Freeman. This Message was well receiv'd by the Parliament; and so was another brought the next Day by the same Messenger, Sir John Cook, That his Majesty wou'd preserve all their Rights and Liberties, upon which the House debated the Supply, and unanimously gave the King five Subsidies to the great Joy of the Court; it being, as his Majesty owns, the greatest Gift that ever was given in Parliament. Secretary Cook report'd to the House the King and the Duke's great Satisfaction in the Subsidies with which they were pleas'd; but Sir John Elliot with good Reason express'd his Dislike, that the Duke's Name shou'd be intermingled with the King's, contrary to the Custom of our Fathers, and the Honour of our Time. If they had bought off this Elliot instead of Wentworth, it might have been better both for the Duke and the Publick.

A Supply.

A happy Juncture lost.

At this Juncture it wou'd have been very easy to have establish'd a good Understanding between the King and his People. Had Buckingham retir'd to a private Enjoyment of his immense Riches; had the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury been restor'd to the Exercise of his sacred Function, of which he had been unjustly depriv'd; had Mountague been punish'd, Laud decour'd; had the Papists been deliver'd over to the Law, as Echard says the pious King promis'd; had Neile, Wren, and other such Prelates, fall'n under the Weight of Parliamentary Displeasure, and the general Hatred of the People; had the Petition of Right, which was then on foot in the House of Commons, and soon after confirm'd by the King, been duly observ'd; all which was most just, reasonable and easy; there is no room to doubt but this Prince might have reign'd as happily and gloriously, as ever did any one of his Predecessors; he being as obstinate in his good Measures as in his bad, and influenc'd in both rather by the Will of his Ministers than his own. Instead of such prudent and safe Methods of Government, it was his Majesty's Unhappiness to hear no Counsel but what came from Villiers, Laud, and such like Counsellors; for whom there was no Safety, but in the absolute Power of the Prince; which they therefore endeavour'd to raise as high as he wou'd have it, and succeeded too well in their Endeavours.

AD. 1628.

The King's ill Counsellors ruin all.

After this a Conference was appointed between the two Houses about the Liberties and Properties of the Subject, which was open'd by Sir Dudley Diggs, Sir Edward Littleton, afterwards Lord-Keeper, spoke at large concerning personal Liberty. Mr. Selden shew'd, that the late Imprisonments of the Gentlemen for refusing the Loan were without Precedent. Sir Edward Coke maintain'd the Argument as to the rational Part of the Law. The Managers prov'd, that the above-cited Resolutions of the Commons were Part of Magna Charta, six Acts of Parliament, twelve Precedents in Terms, and thirty one more. Secretary Cook quicken'd the Supplies, and told the House the King desir'd them not to make any Recess in the Easter Holidays, that the Business might be dispatch'd; but this was thought to break in upon the Commons Right of Adjournment. Secretary Cook moving to have the Vote of Subsidies turn'd immediately into an Act, was seconded by Sir Dudley Diggs: But Sir Thomas Wentworth, still untainted in his Principles, propos'd a middle Way, which was resolv'd upon, That Grievances and Supply go hand in hand. Sir John Cook had been over-pressing with relation to the Subsidies, considering he knew the Inclination of the House; but he gave great Offence in his next Message about them, saying, I must with some Grief tell you, that Notice is taken of this House, as if they press'd not upon the Abuses of Power only, but upon Power itself. This touches the King, and us who are supported by that Power. He was bid to explain himself; but he answer'd, I cannot descend to Particulars, or go farther than his Majesty gave me Warrant to deliver. Two Days after he press'd the Supply again; and the Commons drew up a Representation to justify their Proceedings, as to the Subsidies and Grievances, which was deliver'd by their Speaker with a Petition against billeting of Soldiers. The King answer'd, They shou'd go on speedily with their Business without more Apologies, and he wou'd give them a more ample Answer to this Petition in convenient time.

Illegalities and Irregularities instanc'd by chief Members of Parliament.

Sir Thomas Wentworth opposes the King.

The Secretary's offensive Speech.

The Commons continuing their Debates about Grievances, and how the Subject shou'd be secur'd against them in time to come, Sir Edward Coke mov'd the House to sue the King by Petition, that his Majesty wou'd give the People Assurance of their Rights by Assent in Parliament, as he uses to pass other Acts, which produc'd the famous Petition of Right, containing several Articles of Complaints of great Hardships, Infringements of, and References to Magna Charta, and several former Acts of Parliament; in the Close of which was the petitioning Part to continue for ever as a Law, That no Man shou'd pay any Tax, or such like Charge, without Act of Parliament, or be confin'd or molest'd concerning the same; That no Freeman be imprison'd or detain'd, but in such manner as the Law directs; That all martial Law be revok'd. The King's Serjeant Ashley argu'd against this Petition before the House of Lords, saying, It tended to Anarchy, for the King must be allow'd to govern by Acts of State. The Peers resent'd his Boldness, committed him, and he made a Recantation. Another of his Majesty's Serjeants, Sir David, spoke much more like a wife Man and an Englishman;

The Petition of Right.

A.D. 1628. man; and notwithstanding the Obligations of his Post, defended the Subjects as well as the Sovereign's Rights, asserting the English Monarchy to be truly Regal, but not Tyranical; and that the Government was over free Men, and not Slaves; which probably occasion'd the same Expression in the Message from the King.

While the Petition was preparing, the King came to the House of Lords; and sending for the Commons, the Lord-Keeper made a Speech to them, urging the Dispatch of the Supply, and informing them he was commanded to let them know, his Majesty did hold Magna Charta, and the other six Statutes they insisted upon to be in Force; and that he will maintain all his Subjects in the just Freedom of their Persons and Estates; that he will govern according to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm; and they shou'd find as much Security in his Royal Word, as in any Law they cou'd make. One can form no favourable Judgment of the Abilities of the King's Counsellors from their Speeches and Actions. How gross is this eternal begging of Money without redressing one Grievance, when they knew the Commons wou'd give none till that was done? If his Majesty did really intend to keep his royal Promise, what Harm was there in a Law to oblige him and his Successors to do it. An honest Man takes it not ill that he is bound to do what he intends; and a wise Man will never expose his Honour to be question'd. Larrey observes, the King on his side gave fine Hopes; but they were said to be superficial and indefinite, and promis'd all, but perform'd nothing. It was therefore necessary to have a more precise Explanation, such as the Petition of Right. Secretary Cook, who represented the University of Cambridge, made a Speech for relying on his Majesty's Royal Promise: But Sir Benjamin Rudyard mov'd, that the Effect of the King's Promise might be put into a Bill, which was carry'd; tho' the King sent another Message to them to take his Word, and he was again refus'd. 'Tis unaccountable that Laud and the other Counsellors shou'd thus expose their kind Master's Honour. The Prerogative was not prejudic'd by this new Law; his Majesty had promis'd by the Keeper to observe the Substance of it. And why shou'd these Men again and again make him desire to have his Word taken, when it was evident the Parliament would not take it? The generous Sir Robert Philips said freely, We are now come to the End of our Journey, and an Answer to this Message will give Happiness or Misery to the Kingdom. Sir Thomas Wentworth, even yet uncorrupted, declar'd, Since there had been a publick Violation of the Law by the King's Ministers, nothing cou'd satisfy but a publick Amend; and as himself was the Precept, so was he also the Example. The Court was very uneasy at this new Law, which had nothing in it to make a Prince uneasy who resolv'd to make the Law the Measure of his Government. They wou'd fain have put a Stop to it if they cou'd, but the Subsidy Bill lay in the way. The Commons wou'd have the Petition pass'd first, and the King sent to them to dispatch the other: for they must sit no longer than ten Days. His Majesty cou'd not help it. He must always speak en maitre, and shew the Parliament their Subjection and Inferiority; which tho' very just, is disagreeable and indecorous. The hurrying of the Subsidies was easily seen through. The Commons address'd that they might proceed with their Petition of Right. Coke tells us, Sir Robert Heath, Attorney-General, pleaded eagerly, yet impertinently against the Bill, which met with some small Opposition in the House of Lords, where the Duke of Buckingham, Laud, Neile, and such like Prelates did what they cou'd to crush it: But the Representation of Grievances was so lively in the Speeches of the best Members of that illustrious Assembly, that the Court Lords and Prelates cou'd not hinder their Fellow Subjects of this Happiness, as earnestly as they endeavour'd it. Archbishop Abbot urg'd his own Case, how he was shut out of his Houses at Lambeth and Croydon by Laud and other Bishops; how he had been confin'd at Ford, a moorish Place, on purpose to kill him, as Coke says; and debarr'd from the Management of his Jurisdiction, which Laud assum'd in Defiance of Law or Conscience. Bishop Williams spoke learnedly and elegantly for the Petition, yet he made an Amendment to it, which pass'd the Lords, but the Commons threw it out: That as they desir'd to preserve their own Liberties, so they had Regard to leave entire that Power wherewith his Majesty was intrusted for the Protection of his People; which was thought needless, and to lessen the Energy of the Petition, inasmuch that his Lordship cou'd not escape the Censure of being sprinkled with Court Holy-Water. However, Coke tells us, neither the King nor Laud ever after forgot what he said in Favour of the Petition. This is that pious Laud on whom the Earl of Clarendon and Archdeacon Echard are so lavish of their Declamation and Rhetorick. The Lords having heard the King's Counsel against the Petition, how monstrous was it to hear English Men plead against the Liberties and Properties of the People of England? Heard also the Commons in Defence of it. The Courtiers puzzled the Cause as much as they cou'd, and were not asham'd to declare themselves against their own and the Commons Rights, till they enter'd into a Committee of the whole House; and the Lord Say mov'd, that those Peers who stood for the Liberty of the Nation, and might make their Protestation, should be recorded; and the other opposite Party shou'd, with the Subscription of their Names, enter their Reasons; which shou'd also be recorded, that so Posterity might not seek who they were that so ignobly betray'd the Freedom of their Country; as the Lord Keeper Conventry, Lord Treasurer Weston, Villiers Duke of Buckingham, Howard Earl of Arundel, Hay Earl of Carlisle, Rich Earl of Holland, Howard Earl of Suffolk, Cecil Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Newport, Marquis of Hamilton, Earl of Denbigh, Lord Conway, Lord Carlton, Villiers Earl of Anglesey, Earl of Carnarvon, Earl of Dover, Cecil Earl of Exeter, Laud Bishop of Bath and Wells, Neile Bishop of Winchester, White Bishop of Norwich, Buckeridge Bishop of Ely, Goodman Bishop of Gloucester, Montaigne Bishop of London, Howson Bishop of Oxford, Dove Bishop of Peterburgh, Harfnet Archbishop of York, Mountague Bishop of Chichester, Edward Cecil Viscount Wimbledon, William Lord Petre, Earl of Lindsey, Earl of Newcastle, Compton Earl of Northampton, Mordaunt Earl of Peterburgh, Savage Earl Rivers, Somerset Earl of Worcester, with others, who for the Merit of their noble Posterity shall not now be remember'd. The House of Peers were surpriz'd at the Lord Say's Speech. The Betrayers dreaded the Mark that in such Case wou'd be put upon them. For Larrey assures us, that Lord desir'd they might be distinguish'd from the other Lords by sitting by themselves on the other Side of the House. So the Petition pass'd the Peers with a Salvo to the Right of the Sovereign. The Commons in a Debate on this Amendment justify'd their legal Rights with Reasons worthy a Roman Senate. Mr. Noy said, to add a Saving is not safe. Doubtful Words may beget ill Construction. Besides, the Words are not only doubtful, but unknown to us, and never us'd in any Act or Petition before. Sir Thomas Wentworth, who had not yet sold his Birthright, spoke thus: If we admit of this Addition, we leave the Subject worse than we found him, and we shall have little Thanks for our Labour when we come home. Let us leave all Power to his Majesty to punish Malefactors, but these Laws are not acquainted with sovereign Power. We may not recede from our Petition neither in part nor in whole.

Laud against the Archbishop

Bishop Williams gives Offence to the Court.

Sir Tho. Wentworth complains of the Ministry.

Noy against the Court.

Wentworth still against the whole Court.

A.D. 1628. whole. We cannot read these two remarkable Instances of the true Spirit of Englishmen without weeping over the Frailty and Corruption of human Nature. These two Gentlemen, now so good Patriots, will in a Year or two become the Instruments not only of sovereign but arbitrary Power. Wentworth especially apostatis'd in the most shameful manner, to arbitrary adding military Power; and when his tragical End was the Effect of his Apostasy, Echard assures us, never so white a Soul flew into the Bosom of Abraham. Sir Edward Coke to several unanswerable Reasons added, Take we heed what we yield unto. Magna Charta is such a Fellow, that he will have no Sovereign. I wonder this sovereign Right was not in Magna Charta, or in the Confirmations of it. If we grant this, by Implication we give a sovereign Power above all these Laws. Power in Law is taken for a Power with Force. Let us hold our Privileges according to the Law. That Power which is above this, is not fit for the King or People to have it disputed. Further; Mr. Selden said, If the Salvo has no Reference to our Petition, what does it here? I am sure others will say it hath Reference, and so must we. How far does it exceed all Examples of former Times, no Man can shew the like. The greatest Antiquary in the World, the great Dictator of Learning in England, as Foreigners stil'd him, the great Selden declares in the House of Commons, That never was the like Attempt as this in the Reign of King Charles the First to establish a Tyranny on the Ruins of Liberty. For what else can we call the setting up the sovereign Power above the Law? The Lords had afterwards a Conference with the Commons on the Subject of the Amendment. The Lord Keeper Coventry who spoke for it was answer'd by Mr. Mason. At another Conference, Serjeant Glanville argu'd the legal, and Sir Henry Martin the rational Part of the Petition; which they perform'd so well, that their Lordships were satisfy'd, and agreed to throw out the Salvo, and pass the Petition of Right as the Commons had drawn it, after it had been in Debate ten Weeks. The King came to the House of Peers the second of June, and made this short Speech to both Houses. I am come hither to perform my Duty: I think no Man can think it long, since I have not taken so many Days in answering the Petition, as you have spent Weeks in framing it; and I am come hither to shew you, that as well in formal things as essential, I desire to give you as much Content as in me lies. Then the Bill was read, and the King deliver'd his Answer to the petitioning Clause of it before repeated in writing. The King willeth that Right be done according to the Laws and Customs of the Realm, and that the Statutes be put in due Execution, that his Subjects may have no Cause to complain of any Wrong or Oppression contrary to their just Rights and Liberties; to the Preservation whereof he held himself in Conscience as well obliged, as of his Prerogative. The Archdeacon Echard has in many Places shewn himself to be a sage Historian; yet his Sagacity no where appears more than in the following Reflection: If this had been taken as a free and full Answer, it might have caus'd a happy Union of King and Parliament. If the Parliament wou'd have taken it for what it was not: If they wou'd have taken it for an Answer, whereas it was only a Message deliver'd in his Presence, and was, as he owns himself, scant and dubious, then all wou'd have gone well. But the Commons insisted upon it, that their Petition shou'd have the same enacting Answer pronounc'd in the same manner as Acts of Parliament were pass'd. The Lords were of the same Opinion, and join'd in an Address to his Majesty to pass it accordingly.

Sir John Elliot reminded the House of the Grievances which remain'd unredress'd, and Mr. Rous complain'd of a scandalous, wicked, feditious

Sermon preach'd by one Dr. Roger Manwaring, upon which a Committee was appointed to examine it, and Mr. Pym the Chairman reported it thus to the House: His Charge having digested many Charges into it, is become a Monster of Charges. The main and great one is this: A Plot and Policy to alter and subvert the Frame and Fabrick of this State and Commonwealth. For this End he labours to infuse into the Conscience of his Majesty the Persuasion of a Power not bounding itself with Laws, which King James calls in one of his Speeches Tyranny with Perjury. He endeavours to persuade the Consciences of his Subjects, that they are bound to obey illegal Commands under Pain of Damnation. He robs the Subjects of the Property of their Goods, and brands them that will not lose this Property with scandalous and odious Titles, to make them hateful both to Prince and People. We see here by whom the fatal Division between Prince and People was begun. Such was the Doctrine that procur'd Preferment, and such the Clergy whom Laud mark'd in his Register for Orthodox. The Commons Impeachment against Manwaring being carry'd to the Lords, that seditious Priest had this moderate Censure, To be imprison'd during the Pleasure of the House; to be fined a thousand Pounds; ring cens to make his Submission at the Bar of the House of Peers, and the Bar of the House of Commons; to be suspended three Years; to be disabled from preaching at Court; to be disabled of having any Ecclesiastical Dignity, and his Book to be burnt. To shew how well the Court was dispos'd to that happy Union Echard speaks of, they immediately made him Dean of Worcester, and soon after Bishop of St. David's. But before Laud cou'd get him a Place on the Bench of Bishops, he made his Submission at the Bar of the House with Tears in his Eyes, acknowledging that the Sermon for which he was made a Member of that most honourable Assembly, was rash, scandalous, and unadvis'd, full of dangerous Passages, Inferences, and scandalous Aspersions. He own'd that the Sentence pass'd upon him for his great Offence was just. He begg'd Pardon of God, the King, and the Parliament, &c. A fit Man this, to be pick'd out for one of the first Dignities of the Church. Here were wise Counsellors and wise Prelates to make the King run himself further into the Disaffection of the People for the sake of a worthless, insolent Chaplain.

The Answer to the Petition remain'd still as it was given; and his Majesty sent a Message that he would not alter it. The more rash and unadvis'd, because he did alter it: for the Subsidy Bill having been read but twice, and the House resolving not to take that Answer, the King sent another Message to them, Not to entertain any long Business, for that he wou'd conclude the Session in a few Days. He also admonish'd them not to lay Aspersions on the Government, semper idem. There is really something pleasant in these Messages hardly consistent with the Gravity of History. It was allow'd there had been Male-Administration; but it must not be mention'd, because it wou'd asperse. To speak the Truth of any one who has done ill, is necessary towards having it righted; but if you so speak, you asperse. To scandalize, to accuse falsely, is Aspersion. It is not pretended, that what was said in Parliament of the bad Management at this time was not true; yet the Court will not have it talk'd of, because they must then be aspers'd. Sir John Finch, for such an Action as his ought never to be mention'd without his Name, rose from the Speaker's Chair, and apprehending that Elliot was about aiming at the Duke, he enjoin'd him Silence, telling him there was a Command laid upon him not to proceed. How regular, how politick, how prudent, how discreet these Gentlemen are: The Speaker stops Sir John Elliot's Mouth with a Command from some body, who had no Business in that House.

A.D. 1628. Sir Dudley Digges cry'd out in great Concern, Must we not proceed; let us sit in Silence: We are miserable, and know not what to do. The Lord Clarendon says, they were so happy as to be the Envy and Wonder of Christendom. There was for a while a profound Silence in the House; at last Sir Nathaniel Rich said, We must now speak, or for ever hold our peace. Some Members objected, that probably Sir John Elliot had given the King Offence by something spoken in a late Speech of his. In a Reign so full of ill Counsels and ill Steps, 'twas impossible to speak and not offend as often as the Ministers were mention'd. However, not only Sir John Elliot, but every Member of the House of Commons was vindicated by this Vote, "That there had been no undutiful Speech in that House from the Beginning of the Parliament to that Day." Then the Commons turn'd themselves into a Committee, to consider what is fit to be done for the Safety of the Kingdom, and no Man to go out upon Pain of being sent to "the Tower". The Speaker, like a noble public-spirited Briton, begg'd leave to be gone, when he had such a Call from his Country for his Service. Upon which Mr. Whitby was put into the Chair. Mr. Wandsford mov'd that they shou'd not fear to make a Remonstrance of their Rights. Sir Edward Coke said, Let us palliate no longer: If we do God will not prosper us. I think the Duke of Buckingham is the Cause of all our Miseries; and till the King be inform'd of that, we shall never go out or sit with Honour. That Man is the Grievance of Grievances. Let us set down the Causes of all our Disasters, and all reflect on him. Mr. Selden advis'd, that a Declaration be drawn to express the House's dutiful Carriage, and set forth the Violation of their Liberties; to shew how that great Person the Duke had rais'd Distractions, fearing to be question'd. All this time, said that illustrious Senator, we have cast a Mantle on what was done last Parliament; but now being driven again to look on that Man, let us proceed with that which was then so well begun. In Conclusion the House agreed upon several Heads, containing more of the Lord Clarendon's Felicities, as Innovations in Religion, Misgovernment, Misfortune, and the late Designs with the Causes of them. When the Question was putting that it shou'd be instanc'd that the Duke was the Cause of all those Evils, the Speaker return'd from Court, where he had been to learn his Lesson, tho' he was the Parliament's Servant, and told them the King commanded for the present that the House shou'd adjourn, and all Committees cease till to-morrow the 17th of June, when his Majesty wou'd come to the Parliament and pass their Petition.

Shout in the House of Lords.

Another happy Juncture lost.

Accordingly the King came to the House of Peers; and the Commons attending, the Bill was read by the Clerk, and at the End of it his Majesty said, Soit droit fait comme il est desire. Upon which there was a general Shout of both Lords and Commons, and an universal Joy within Doors and without. The King made a short Speech: I assure you my Maxim is, that the Peoples Liberties serve to strengthen the King's Prerogative, and the King's Prerogative to defend the Peoples Liberties; and now if this Parliament have not a happy Conclusion, the Fault is yours, and I am free from it.

This again was a happy Juncture for a lasting Reconciliation between the King and Parliament, if Buckingham's Fate had not follow'd his Majesty like an evil Genius. Had he had Capacity enough to have known the Danger he was in by defying the Legislature, he wou'd surely have sav'd himself by withdrawing from Court, and have sav'd his Master the Odium of standing out against the Cry of his People. But Laud was his most intimate Friend and Counsellor; and as there is hardly one Act of Discretion and Moderation in that baughty Prelate's whole Life, so it is no wonder he shou'd inspire the Duke with the most revengeful and resolute Sentiments. Echard tells us the Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop of Lincoln, the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Warwick, and other Protestant Lords were admitted to kiss the King's Hand. The Bishop of Lincoln had also private Talk with his Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham; wherein he represented, "That in order to gain the Affections of the People, the Puritans who were many and strong should be a little conniv'd at and indulg'd, which wou'd make them more pliant." The King answer'd, I thought of this before, and will do so; but instead of so doing, the Bishop was brought into the Star Chamber, as a Reward for his good Advice, which he pursu'd in his Diocese; and being reproach'd for it by Sir John Lamb, one of his Spiritual Court, and the infamous Sibthorp, his Lordship said it was not only his own but the royal Pleasure. Which Words Lamb and Sibthorp carry'd to Laud, and he to the King then at Bisbam. Upon which it was resolv'd, that a Bill should be exhibited in the Star Chamber against the Bishop on the Evidence of those two wretched Delators Lamb and Sibthorp for revealing the King's Secrets, being a sworn Counsellor, of which more hereafter.

but acts the

The Duke of Buckingham being still the great Spring which mov'd the Wheels of Government, the House of Commons did not think themselves secure even in the new Law, and therefore they proceeded with their Declaration at the Motion of Sir John Strangeways, Knight of the Shire for the County of Dorset: Let us perfect our great Remonstrance, said the Knight; for King James was wont to say, he knew that by Parliament which otherwise he could never have known. The Reader will observe in many Places of this History, how the Posterity of certain Names deviated from the Honour of their Ancestors. Some Members, as Sir Humphry May, Sir Henry Martin, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, were sweeten'd by the passing of the Petition of Right, and endeavour'd to moderate Matters. But the Grievances were too many and too crying to stop the Mouths of Strangeways and other Members, who in many Speeches enlarg'd upon them; and in ten Days the Remonstrance was ready to be presented to the King. We have read Clarendon and his Copier Echard's Encomiums on his Majesty's Zeal for the Protestant Religion, and on the flourishing Trade and State of the Nation; we have read what full and gracious Answer the King gave to the Addresses for prosecuting Papists, and we shall now see on what solid Foundations those Encomiums were built. The Parliaments Remonstrance complain'd of "Innovations and Alterations of Religion; the great Esteem and Favour many Papists receive at Court; their publick Resort to Mass contrary to his Majesty's Answers to the Parliament's Petitions; Letters to stop Proceedings against them; the daily Growth of the Arminian Faction, favour'd and protected by Neile Bishop of Winchester, and Laud Bishop of Bath and Wells, whilst the orthodox Party are silenc'd". Here the Reader will take notice, that those Ministers Laud mark'd in his Register with a P for Puritan were really Orthodox, and those he mark'd with an O for Orthodox were Papists, or their Abettors. Neile was inform'd against by Mr. Oliver Cromwel, according to Whitlock, tho' he was not then one of the House. The second Article of the Remonstrance was concerning the Dangers "of Innovation and Alteration of Government occasion'd by billeting Soldiers, by procuring 1000 German Horse and Horsemen, by a standing Commission on to the Duke to be General at Land in Time of Peace". The Parliament do in these two Articles directly charge the Government with favouring Popery and arbitrary Power. Let the Reader stop here and consider a little, how I have made

dishonour'd

"It complains of the Disaster at the Isle of Rhe, of the Dishonour to the Nation, never so dishonour'd in the Days of the Plantagenets and Tudors: The Loss of Trade, the Increase of which the Lord Clarendon boasts of; and all these Evils and Dangers, the House of Commons impute to the excessive Power of the Duke of Buckingham, humbly submitting it to his Majesty's Wisdom, Whether it can be safe for himself and Kingdom to have so great Power trusted in the Hands of any one Subject whatsoever, or to continue the Duke near his Person? Archdeacon Echard informs us, that the King was very much oblig'd by it, but he gives us no Hint how the Commons were oblig'd; for at that very Instant did his Majesty order the Information against the Duke fill'd by the Attorney General in the Star-Chamber, to be taken off the File, the King declaring, himself knew the Duke's Innocency of those Things mention'd in the Commons and the Earl of Bristol's Articles: And when the Parliament deliver'd their Remonstrance to him in the Banqueting-House, he told them with some Indignation, He little expected such a Remonstrance after he had pass'd the Petition of Right; and as to their Grievances, he would consider of them as they deserv'd. Dr. Lambe kill'd.

Larr. 144.

In the mean time Dr. Lambe a Quack and Creature of the Duke's, was set upon in the Streets of London by the Rabble, who call'd him Witch, Devil, and the Duke's Conjuror. This Scoundrel, who got his Living by selling Nostrums and sometimes Poison, was talk'd of as being concern'd in poisoning King James. The French Historian says Buckingham employ'd him to execute his private Intrigues and most odious Designs. The Mob fell upon him in open Day, and, continues my Author, for Proof that this was the unanimous Consent of the People, not a Man stirr'd to his Assistance, but every Body joye'd at his Death, and applauded his Murderers. The Fellow had been indicted as a Wizard, and doubtless he was as much a Witch as ever old Woman was that burnt for't. He had also been try'd for a Rape; however he was still the Duke's Favourite and Confident as well as Dr. Laud. I am far from applauding the Murderers, nor in any Case approve of Rabble Justice, there being no Rule but the Law for Executions of any kind. Lambe knew well enough he was mortally hated for his Master's sake as much as his own, and it was to dare the Mob to Vengeance, to be seen walking in London Streets in the Face of Day. Buckingham himself durst not do it at that Time; if he had, one might justly have fear'd what the Consequence wou'd have been by these bold Rhimes then in every Body's Mouth.

Let Charles and George do what they can,
The Duke shall die like Doctor Lambe.

And probably the Rage of the People might so far infect Lieutenant Felton, that he took Fire upon the Remonstrance against the Duke, and resolv'd to be his Executioner. Lambe was become a Person of Importance on Account of Buckingham's Favour, and as soon as the Court had News of his Death, a Council was call'd, who order'd the Lord-Mayor Sir Richard Dean to find out and punish the chief Actors in this Tragedy, but none were found, says Whitlocke, and the City was fin'd 6000 Pounds to make some Attonement for the Loss of so useful a Person. Echard assures us, he had special Acquaintance with the Duke; and tho' he was a Wizard and a Ravisher, Larrey says his greatest Crime was his Attachment to the Duke.

A.D. 1628.

A Prophecy of the civil Wars.

A Report was made to the House of Commons of certain Words spoken against them by the Duke of Buckingham, who deny'd them, and charg'd one Melvin a Scotsman for speaking Words against himself, That he intended to put the King upon a War against the Commonalty. It is worth observing that this was fourteen Years before that War broke out; and tho' Melvin had not the Spirit of Truth in him with respect to the Duke, yet one can't deny but he had the Spirit of Prophecy.

His Majesty being at last tir'd with the Complaints against the Commission of Excise, cancell'd it, notwithstanding Bishop Laud was Commissioner. This Commission was not of the Nature of the present, but a Power to certain Lords and Commons to levy an Excise, not stated and establish'd as that Duty is now.

Excise

The Commons order'd another Remonstrance to be drawn concerning the Peoples Rights as to the Payment of Tonnage and Poundage on Merchandize, and voted, That the taking it without Consent of Parliament was illegal, as was also the laying any Imposition on Goods without such Consent. Two Articles of Right as certain as that there are such Things as Law and Justice, tho' in these Times they were not so much consider'd as they ought to have been. The King came to the Upper-House, while this Remonstrance was reading in the Lower, and sending for the latter, spoke to them thus, It may seem strange that I come so suddenly to end this Session before I give my Assent to the Bills: I will tell you the Cause, tho' I must avow that I owe the Account of my Actions to God alone. You observe the Style. One wou'd think every Man is accountable for his Actions to Reason and Justice.

Illegal Taxes.

Again; Every body knows that a while ago the House of Commons gave me a Remonstrance, how Stile. acceptable may be easily imagin'd, and for the Merit of it I will not call that in question, for I am sure no wise Man can justify it. Selden, Coke, Glanville, and the major Part of the Parliament did justify it, and his Majesty calls them Fools for it. The Archdeacon giving himself the same Air, says, The King after this Manner shew'd his Resentment. Mr. Coke, whose Authority is at least as good as Echard's, turns it thus, Did ever King of England but this King's Father, treat a Parliament or either House at this Rate before? At the Opening of the Parliament he call'd them Fools if they wou'd not do as he wou'd have them; and now he calls them so again, or no wise Men, for telling him their Grievances. We have seen by their Counsels what wise Counsellors his Majesty had about him; Villiers, Laud, Conway, Weston, Neile. The Fools the King speaks of here, are the above-mention'd Selden, Coke, Glanville, Pym, Wandsford, Diggs, Whitby, Noy, Wentworth, Philips, Hakerwell, Seymour, Strangerways, Martin, Rich, Creswell, Littleton, Hobart, Strode, Hollis, Waller, Hampden, Hayman, Coriton, Valentine, Elliot, Corbet, Heveningham, &c. Of one of these, Wentworth, the Archdeacon affirms, he was a more able Minister than Wolfey, Cromwell, Burleigh, Walsingham, or in a word, a more able Minister than P. 441 ever was known in Britain from the Reign of Cassibelan to that of King James; yet this, the wisest of Men, justify'd the Remonstrance; which shews the Inconvenience of speaking in a Passion, or rather of hearkening to proud, malicious Counsellors, such as Villiers and Laud. I do not repeat the whole Speech, it being all in the same Style. His Majesty told the Parliament he cou'd not grant Tonnage and Poundage; and having pass'd the Subsidy and other Bills, the Lord-Keeper prorogu'd them. One of those Bills was for Restitution in Blood of Carew Raleigh Esq; Son to Sir Walter Raleigh, and another to confirm the Letters Patents made by King James to the Earl of Bristol, who upon Buckingham's Death so well reconcil'd him-

100 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1628. self to the Court, that 'twas visible he sided with the Country only because the Country sided with him. The reverend Historian affirms the King had made the greatest Concessions. Every thing is superlatively good with him that gives Credit to the Cause he espouses. These greatest Concessions are really nothing at all: For the Petition of Rights did but confirm old Statutes, it added no new Liberties; and Clarendon says 'twas no Prejudice to the Crown, which he and Echard always understand Liberties to be. The latter owns that as great as these Concessions were, the Court endeavour'd to evade them, tho' the Parliament had purchas'd them with the largest Subsidies that had ever been granted. Thus was this Parliament also dismiss'd with Anger, and by the following Reflections we may perceive what wise Men his Majesty's Counsellors were. "The Crimes for which the King inveigh'd so against the Parliament, were for representing their Grievances, and the dangerous and feeble State of himself and the Kingdom; for explaining how the Customs had been taken against Law, yet declaring their Readiness to relieve him, and reconcile him to his Subjects. For whom was it the King thus contented? But for a Favourite who against his Father's Will, and Advice of his Council, without a Declaration or Reason shew'd, the next Day after the King's Father's Death, excited him to make War against the King of Spain, and after made him dissolve the Parliament, as we read in the Bishop of Litchfield's Life of Archbishop Williams, to save himself from being impeach'd in it. So he did the second Parliament, and then engag'd the King in a War against France, wherein he himself was the Aggressor; and in the Management of those Wars brought greater Loss and Dishonour to the Nation than ever was before; a Favourite who impoverish'd the Crown to support his intolerable Ambition and Avarice."

Ill Counsellors.

England in Disgrace

Rochellers

Buckingham, when he left France, promis'd the Rochellers to send them Relief, but his own Indifference in the Quarrel of those Protestants, or his own Danger and Difficulties at home, hinder'd him from going abroad. The Rochellers sent Deputies after Deputies for nine Months together, to press him to perform his Promise. King Charles wrote a Letter to the Mayor, Sheriff, Peers, Burgers, and Inhabitants of the City of Rochelle, dated the 19th of May 1628.

Gentlemen,

The King's Letters to them.

BE not discomfited tho' my Fleet be return'd, bold out to the last, for I am resolv'd that all my Fleet shall perish rather than you shall not be reliev'd; and to this End I have countermanded it, and have sent Ships to wake them change their Design that they had taken to come back. I shall shortly send you some Number of Ships to re-inforce it, and with the Help of God the Success will be happy for your Deliverance.

Your good Friend,
CHARLES R.

A Week after his Majesty wrote them another Letter, and sent it by a Soldier, seal'd with the Arms of England.

Gentlemen,

I Have been troubled to hear that my Fleet was upon the Point of returning without answering my Commands, which were to force the Entry of your Provisions whatever came of it; and have given it new Orders to return into your Road, and not stir till it has reliev'd you with Victuals, or that I have sent them an additional Strength, for which I have caus'd Men to work with all Diligence. Be assured that I will never abandon you, and that I will employ all the Force of my Kingdom for your Deliverance, until it please God to bless me with giving you an assur'd Peace. A.D. 1628.

H. J. L. 65

Gentlemen,

Given at our Palace at Westminster, May 27.
1628. Old Stile. Your good Friend,
CHARLES R.

The Author makes these Observations upon the two Letters, "That which follow'd ill suited with these fine Promises, which at the bottom serv'd only to amuse the poor Rochellers, if we may judge by the Proceedings of Buckingham and Denbigh, and their Fleet before Rochelle, and by the tricking Delays made use of here for sending Relief, which in the End was of no Service to the Besieg'd, for it assisted them with no manner of Provisions or Victuals, only serv'd to tantalize them at a Distance, but to their sad Cost and Misery; for when the English shew'd themselves at the Head of the Bay, the Mayor and his Council caus'd more than 200 Hogheads of Pilchards, which were little corrupted, to be thrown away for fear of bringing a Contagion into the City, and believing they shou'd have no Need of them, Succours being so near the Gates. But Cardinal Richlieu, who was at the Siege in Person, was well inform'd that the Fleet wou'd not do him any great Hurt, nor the City much good; and he knew pretty well it only rode there to make a Shew and no more: For what the Deputies built in the Day-time with the King, the Queen overthrew in the Night, and kept the King her Brother from receiving any Damage, not valuing how much she thereby wounded the sacred Word of her Husband, or the Honour of the English Nation." Ludlow speaks of the fatal Consequences of the Loss of Rochelle; by this Means that strong Town of Rochelle, wherein the Security of the Protestants of France chiefly consisted, by this Treachery was deliver'd up to the Papists, and those of the Reform'd Religion in all Parts of that Kingdom expos'd to the Rage of their bloody and cruel Enemies.

P. 66.

P. 67.

Of the Fleet which thus in vain appear'd before Rochelle, the Duke of Buckingham was to have been Admiral and General of the Land Forces, as at the Expedition of the Isle of Rhe. About the latter End of August he went to Portsmouth to embark with Succours for that distress'd City. He had a Power, says Larrey, strong enough to beat the French and raise the Siege; but it had no better Success than the former; and if you believe a great many Historians, no better Designs. This was not, however, Buckingham's Fault, whose Death prevented the Execution of his Intentions, whether they were to betray or succour the Besieg'd. For tho' there is not the least Hint of Double-dealing in those impartial Historians Clarendon and Echard, Buckingham, if not his Master, was very much suspected not to be in earnest in the French Expeditions. On the 23d of August, as the Duke was coming out of his Chamber to Breakfast, just as Sir Thomas Fryer, one of his Colonels, was taking Leave of him, one Felton, a discarded Officer, stabb'd him to the Heart with a Knife, accompanying his Blow with these Words, Lord have Mercy on your Soul. The Duke fell dead to the Ground without speaking a Word, tho' some pretend he was heard to say in falling, the Villain has kill'd me. The Murderer might have escap'd, if he had not been frightened with the Noise of the Domesticks, who cry'd out the French had murder'd the Duke, laying it to the Duke de Sobiez's Charge, who often solicited the Duke of Buckingham so earnestly to hasten the Succours, that those who saw him did sometimes think he was quarrelling about it; Felton, to excuse the French, who were like to be massacred, slept forth and said, I am he who did it, let no innocent

Duke of Buckingham kill'd by Felton.

His Designs suspected.

A.D. 1628. novent Man suffer for it; so he was seiz'd without offering to escape, and sent to Prison.

Ghost. If any one has the Curiosity to read a very long Story of the Ghost of Sir George Villiers, the Duke's Father, which appear'd to warn him of his Fate, he may find many Pages upon it in the Lord Clarendon and Archdeacon Echard's sober Histories; but unless the Reader is dispos'd to give more Credit to it than I do, it will be no more worth his while to read it, than I think it worth mine to write it. Echard ran away with this old Woman's Tale, as with that of the Devil and Oliver Cromwel, and thought it a wonderful Rarity, as being in such a notable History as that of the Rebellion; but unfortunately it was told before by Lilly the Astrologer in his Observations on the Life of King Charles I. and indeed the Conjuror had much more Right to raise this Devil than the Earl of Clarendon or the Christchurch Men; who, be what they will, are not reckon'd among the Conjurors. Lilly informs us, the Ghost of Sir George Villiers appear'd to old Parker of Lambeth, who had been intimate with Sir George the Duke's Father, and bad him go tell his Son the Duke of Buckingham, to refrain such and such Company, or he would come to Destruction, and that by such a Token. The Duke slighted the Advice, and the Ghost coming to Parker a second time, pull'd out a Dagger or Knife, saying, that should end his Son if he refrain'd not that Company. Parker carries the Message, and the Duke desir'd him to trouble him no more about it. A Month after he met Parker on Lambeth-Bridge, and said, Now, Mr. Parker, what say you of your Dream? Parker reply'd, I wish it may never come to pass. But within fix Weeks, says Lilly, he was stabb'd, and soon after the Dream or Vision Parker dy'd. The Duke had doubtless himself boding Thoughts of some untimely End to a Life which his Conduct had render'd odious to the People; and what he said to Bishop Laud when he took his Leave of him, is more credible than the Apparition, I know your Lordship has good Access to the King, pray put his Majesty in mind to be good to my poor Wife and Children. The King was at Southwick, Sir Daniel Norton's Seat, four Miles from Portsmouth, when the melancholy News came to him: He receiv'd it with remarkable Concern and Sorrow; but thro' the whole Kingdom, according to Larrey, the Duke's Name was never mention'd but to be ill spoken of. However, his Majesty's Favour follow'd him to the Grave, and he had the Honour to be bury'd in Westminster-Abbey among the Tombs of the Monarchs of England. In common Prudence only, the Court shou'd have taken hold of this Opportunity to have wip'd off the Odium against the Government contracted by Buckingham's Male-administration. He was dead, and it was only to have left him where Life did to have caus'd a good Agreement between King and People. But as I have hinted elsewhere, and must again hint, this Government seem'd to study what wou'd be most unpopular, and to rule in Spite. The Memory of Buckingham was generally hated, and therefore the Lord Clarendon, with particular Applause, tells us, The King admitted very few into any Degree of Trust, whom he believ'd to have been his Grace's Enemies; which indeed is not true, for he admitted Sir Thomas Wentworth, one of the Duke's greatest Enemies, into the greatest Degree of Trust. Again, no Prince ever express'd a more tender Concern to the Family, and all that was dear to this great Man, as was Bishop Laud in an especial manner; and yet the Archdeacon acknowledges his great Misfortune was the Want of a wise Friend. Then it was no Misfortune to him that, as Larrey says, he hated Parliaments, was a bad Protestant, a barefac'd Arminian, a masqu'd Papist, a Man of no Religion or Experience. The Assassin Felton was at first far from repenting of the bloody Act, but at last he became sensible of his Sin, and begg'd

when he was condemn'd, that the Hand which did it might be cut off before he was executed. He declar'd he was provok'd to it by the Remonstrance against him, and his having been so often screen'd from Parliament. While he lay in Prison in London, he was visited by many, to whom he vindicated the Puritans, whose Enemies charg'd them with setting him on; and Felton protested they knew nothing of his wicked Intent. It is very likely that Bishop Laud wou'd have extorted such a Confession from him; for of all the Lords of the Council, that pious Prelate was the only one who, contrary to the Laws of the Land, threaten'd him with the Rack. Felton reply'd, I know not whom I may accuse, perhaps Bishop Laud or any other in that Torture. His Majesty seem'd inclin'd to the Bishop's merciful Motion, by ordering the Judges to give their Opinion upon it, and they all agreed that by Law he might not be put to the Rack. Being try'd and condemn'd at the King's-Bench, he was executed pursuant to the Sentence, and his Body sent to Portsmouth, where it hung on a Gibbet for some time, and was afterwards stolen away. Fol. 94.

As many ill Qualities as may be deduc'd from Buckingham the Duke of Buckingham's Actions, it ought to be remember'd that he was generous, easy of Access, polite in his Manners, pleasant in Conversation, and had a Genius equal to his Station, considering the Business that was to be done in it, if he had not been a Slave to his Passions, in which the Lust of Power and Women was most prevalent. Revenge and Cruelty were laid to his Charge, and such a Haughtiness towards those who had displeas'd him, that 'tis said he once told the Queen herself, I wou'd have you know there have been Queens beheaded in England. After his Death Laud, now Bishop of London, grew daily more in Favour with the King, to his Majesty's great Misfortune; there not being a Man in England who was less fit for his Service, whether we consider his Temper or his Abilities in so difficult and troublesome a Juncture.

I am very far from giving into Tales of Ghosts, Apparitions, Presages, and Omens, with which the Lord Clarendon and Echard's Histories abound, yet I can't help taking notice of an Accident which happen'd as Laud and Neile were consecrating their good Brother Mountague, for at that very Instant News came of the Duke's being stabb'd.

One of the first Things Laud did after his motion to London, was to procure a Pardon for their other good Brother Roger Manwaring, and a very rich Benefice to be holden by Dispensation, with the Rectory of St. Giles's in the Field. This Prelate, says Larrey, was extremely solicitous to keep up the King's Hatred and Diffidence of Parliaments. All that was done this Year, or the following, serves only to inflame or to incense both Parties more and more against each other. Can any thing be plainer than the Source of all the Misfortunes which beset this King and Kingdom? Was it not his Majesty's suffering himself to be govern'd by other Men's Passions, and giving Ear to the Counsels of such fiery Spirits as Laud, which Judge Whitlocke said was hot enough to set the World in a Flame?

We have mention'd the Remonstrance against Tonnage and Poundage, which was drawn up by the Parliament, and the Delivery of it prevented by a Dissolution. Wise and sober Men wou'd at least have abated of the Rigor of levying that illegal Tax, or not have permitted it to be levy'd with Circumstances to render it still more odious. But the Ministers in this Reign had infected the publick Officers with a Contempt of Law, and a tyrannical Air, which must be very provoking to a free and injur'd People. John Rolle Esq; a Merchant and Member of Parliament for Kellington in Cornwall, had his Goods seiz'd by the Custom-house Officers, for not paying such Customs as

102 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1628. the Farmers demanded. Mr. Rolle apply'd to the Commissioners for Redref, and one of them told him, Privilege of Parliament extended only to Persons and not Goods. Whatever Language these Gentlemen us'd then, Members of Parliament now never hear it at that or any other Board. If all the Parliament were in you, said another of them with more Insolence, we wou'd take your Goods. "Thus it is, according to Larrey, that these odious Ministers of arbitrary Power, by their Proceedings, make such a Power insupportable, and by their Oppressions some Times incite the People to Rebellion." About the same Time Mr. Richard Chambers a Merchant of London, had his Goods also seiz'd under the same Pretence. Mr. Chambers brought a Writ of Replevin: The Barons of the Exchequer granted an Injunction against it. The Merchant offer'd to give Bond for the Payment of such Duties as the Court shou'd direct; but the Barons refus'd his Security, and wou'd oblige him to pay what the Farmers requir'd; which Chambers refusing, the Custom-house Officers, very ready at such Work, detain'd double the Value of the Customs out of Mr. Chambers's Merchandize. Samuel Vassal Esq; a Merchant of London, and afterwards Citizen in Parliament for that Capital, was prosecuted by the Attorney-General Sir Robert Heath, for not paying 5 s. 6d. for every hundred Pounds Weight of Currants. Mr. Vassal pleaded the Statute de Tallagio non concedendo; the Attorney-General demurr'd; Mr. Vassal join'd in the Demurrer, but the Court of Exchequer wou'd not hear his Counsel, saying, The King is in Possession, and we will keep him so. Rare Judges! They committed Mr. Vassal to Prison. The Proceedings agreeing very ill with the Petition of Right, the King commanded it to be printed, with his Answer and other Additions. Norton the Printer confess'd he had wrought off 1500 Copies without those Additions; but they were suppress'd by Warrant, and the Attorney-General commanded that no more shou'd be printed, and those that were shou'd not be publish'd. Coke adds, These were the just and religious Acts of this pious King; and can any Man believe the Parliament at their Meeting shou'd, without Breach of Trust, sit still, and not represent these Things to him? Far from thinking so much like an English Man as Mr. Coke, Grandson of the great Lawyer and Judge Sir Edward Coke, Archdeacon Echard draws the Curtain, and discovers the King in secret Council with his Ministers just before the next Session of Parliament; and Directions were given, "That if the House of Commons proceeded to accuse the King's Servants, to asperse his Counsellors, to speak of them is to asperse, to handle Matters of Religion improper for them, there Laud appears as much as if he had given it under his Hand and Seal, to raise Objections against his Majesty's Speech, then the Privy-Counsellors were to intimate that those Debates tended to a Breach, and the King shou'd immediately declare he wou'd not suffer it. Thus, continues Echard, were Matters prepar'd for the second Meeting of Parliament. The Simplicity of the Historian in telling this Tale, is very singular. The secret Committee of Council advis'd the King before-hand to hear no Complaints against his Servants, and to support the Abettors of Popery in their superstitious Innovations. These were call'd Arminians: For besides the heretical Doctrine of Arminius, which King James had labour'd so much to root out in Holland, the English Arminians preach'd another Heresy, that the King's Power was absolute and arbitrary, and must be obey'd under Pain of Damnation.

There was another Preparation for the Meeting of Parliament, the Consequence of which was like the Consequences of almost every Step of this Ministry, the making more ill Blood, and preparing Matters for the future terrible Division between King and Parliament. Weston the new Treasurer had bought off Sir Thomas Wentworth from the Country Party, and he was made a Privy-Counsellor, Lord-President of the North, and Viscount Wentworth. The Archdeacon tells us with the former Simplicity, Being thus gain'd, he became a devout Friend to the Church. Exquisite Nonsense! As if Bribery and Treachery wou'd lead a Man to true Religion and Devotion. The Lord Digby, whom the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard allow to be as much for Church and King as Dr. Laud, said of this great Man, and Noy soon after alike corrupted with the Attorney-General's Place, "Sir Thomas Wentworth and Mr. Noy were most keen and active Patriots when the Petition of Right was in Agitation, and Wentworth the first Mover and Insister for this Clause, That for the Comfort and Safety of Subjects, his Majesty wou'd be pleas'd to declare his Will and Pleasure, that all his Ministers shou'd serve him according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm. And to whom now can all the Inundations upon Liberties under Pretence of Law, and the late Shipwreck of our Property be attributed more than to Noy? And all those other Mischiefs, whereby this Monarchy hath been brought almost to the Brink of Ruin, so much to any as to that GRAND APOSTATE to the Commonwealth Sir Thomas Wentworth? Who, says Echard, coming to a right Understanding with Bishop Laud, they two enter'd into an inviolable League of Friendship: What must that League be but a Confederacy against the Commonwealth, which the Lord Digby tells us the Grand Apostate Wentworth had betray'd?

Before the Parliament met, there had been a Rochelle Feint made to relieve Rochelle with the Fleet and Forces which were to have been commanded by Buckingham. The Earl of Lindsey, their Commander after the Duke's Death, sail'd to Rochelle, but return'd without doing any Service. Upon this the Rochellers, in the last Distress and Despair, were forc'd to surrender themselves, their Religion, Rights, and Liberties, and those of all the Protestants in France, into the Hands of their most cruel implacable Enemy Cardinal Richlieu, as has been already hinted. The Germans under Dalbier were dispos'd of to the King of Denmark, to whose Assistance were sent the Lord Vere and General Morrice with a good Body of Troops; but all Enterprizes in these Times, had the Success which attends rash or ungrateful Counsels: And had not Bishop Laud and his Brethren triumph'd in the Star-Chamber, High-Commission Court, and Spiritual Courts, there wou'd have been no Triumphs in this Period of our History. Coke on this Occasion speaks the Truth, tho' a little coarsely; "The War against France was not more incon siderately begun about two Years before, than the Peace made with it was secret. The first Time it was heard of, was at the Siege of Privas, where the Peace was proclaim'd between Lewis XIII. and his good Brother of England. The Reform'd were astonish'd and confounded that the King of England, who brought them into the War, shou'd leave them out of the Peace. Upon this Privas surrenders, so does Castres, and then Nimes. The Duke de Rohan is forced to submit, the Power of the Protestants is rooted out, and while the King of England is making War against the Parliament, Richlieu marches into Italy, takes Salusses and Pignerol from the Duke of Savoy, which prepar'd the Way for the exorbitant Power of Lewis XIV." But Mr. Archdeacon has a good Excuse for abandoning the Reform'd in France. The King by aiding those of Rochelle, train'd up his own Subjects in the School of Rebellion, and taught them to confederate with them. Foreigners, and at length brought down the Judgments

A.D. 1629. ments of Heaven upon his own Head. If this will bear Reflection, it must be by Persons of more Patience and Insensibility than I can boast of. We are told there were some popular Steps taken at this Time, Archbishop Abbot is sent for to Court, and receiv'd with Solemnity; Dr. Potter, a true Protestant Divine, is made Bishop of Carlisle; and Mountague's Appeal call'd in by Proclamation, after he was made a Bishop, to shew what an Abhorrence the Court had for a Doctrine which they wou'd not suffer to be condemn'd.

A.D. 1629. On the 20th of January the Parliament met, and Echar'd wonders they had not entirely bury'd their Jealousies after the Petition of Right had been so exactly observ'd by filling the Fleet and Marshalsea with Prisoners for not paying Customs levy'd without Consent of Parliament. The House of Commons took the Matter into Debate immediately. The Jealousy of the Nation, to use Larrey's Words, appear'd rous'd, the same Complaints, the same Commotions, and the same Ardor as in the foregoing Session on the Petition of Right. The Case of Mr. Rolfe, a Member, was enquir'd into; upon which another Member spoke thus, "It is

ib. "Time now, Gentlemen, to shew your Zeal for the Defence of your Laws; your Liberty is at Stake if you do not hasten to its Support. It is attack'd in its Sanctuary, in the Person of one of your Members. Nay, even all the Parliament is attack'd by the Insolence of the Officers of Custom: The Seizure of Person and Goods is put into Practice: They begin by England enslav'd. "plundering and imprisoning, and afterwards ask our Consent to our Slavery, by giving our Sanction to the Bill for the raising this Tax, &c." The King on his Side order'd the Parliament to attend him at the Banqueting-House, where "He commended the House of Lords, who having the Honour by their Dignities to be near the Majesty of Kings, were by that Means more affectionate to the Crown; but complain'd of the House of Commons, who, he said, were too restless, too jealous, too factious; and under Colour of preserving their Privileges, disputed the Rights of the Sovereign. He spoke

P. 155. The King's fine Speaking. "of the Tax in question, as of a Right he held by the Gift of the People, and never had a Thought of holding it otherwise." How then came the Goals so full of Merchants, for not yielding to pay it till 'twas so given? As to arbitrary Power, he told them he had as great an Aversion to it as they; which having particular Reference to the Imprisonment of the Subjects for refusing Payment of Customs not granted by Parliament, is very extraordinary. The Courtiers hurrying on the Bill of Tonnage and Poundage, caus'd a just Jealousy that they wanted to have it dispatch'd to rid themselves of the Parliament, and therefore the latter resolv'd not to pass it till they had provided for the Security of Religion; for notwithstanding the Lord Clarendon represents it every where as more secure than ever, others knew the contrary; and Mr. Rous a Member of the House of Commons spoke thus; "What we

ib. 156. "are now upon, Gentlemen, is of greater Concern than our Laws and Liberties, it concerns the Security of our Religion to which our Laws and Liberties are link'd, and become so inseparable, that the dis-uniting of the first certainly destroys the two other." We shou'd remember they were told not to meddle with Religion, it being a Thing improper for them. It was indeed to meddle with Laud, and that was now as bad as their meddling with Villiers before. Mr. Rous went on, "We suffer Popery to come in again into the Land, and to increase; we have open'd our Gates to it, and like another Trojan Horse, it has got within our Walls." He enlarg'd upon the Growth of Arminianism, which is the Egg of

Popery encourag'd, Popery: If you suffer it to hatch and grow up, you'll

A.D. 1629. soon bear the Arminians, Laud, Neile, Piers, Wren, Mountague, Lyndsay, Skinner, speak the Language of Papists. He concludes, Let us now, by the unanimous Consent and Resolution of us all, make a Vow and Covenant henceforth to hold fast to our God and our Religion, which are the Centre of the Publick Peace, and ought to be so of our Care and Debates. Mr. Pym said, "The Toleration of Popery, and the Liberty given to Arminianism, wou'd destroy the Kingdom if not speedily prevented; that the Doctrine was pernicious, and opposite to that of the first Reformers, and the Canons of the Church of England." He added, It is the Duty of Parliaments to establish the true Religion, and punish the false. If it was their Duty, it cou'd not be improper for them. That the Parliaments have always insisted on their Right to do it; that they have confirm'd general Councils; that Henry III. did nothing against the Pope but with Advice of Parliament. And he exhorted the House to preserve their Rights, to enquire into the false Doctors and their Books. He mention'd the Novelties introduc'd by Cosins into his Church, where Images of Saints and Angels were set up, as also Crucifixes and lighted Candles, with other Romish Customs. Secretary Cook brought a Message to hasten the Tonnage and Poundage; and again another to the same Purpose; but the House resolv'd that Religion shou'd take Place before that Bill. Sir Francis Seymour made a warm Speech in this Debate, but Means were afterwards us'd to gain him as Sir Thomas Wentworth had been gain'd. Worthy Sir Robert Philips said, Two Sects are damnablely crept in to undermine the King and Kingdom, the one Popery, the other Arminianism. Is there a Vicar or Curate, who wou'd not stare to hear it said that Archbishop Laud was a Sectary, yet so he is term'd by this noble Patriot Sir Robert Philips. Such Speeches cou'd not but be most ungrateful to the Court and their Creatures. One Lewis cry'd, The Devil take the Parliament. It seems he was a Disciple of pious Bishop Laud; and Archdeacon Echar'd does not approve of the Parliament's sending for Lewis, because the Words were not spoken in St. Stephen's Chapel. Secretary Cook brings a third Message for the Tonnage and Poundage Bill, which was thought so reasonable, says the Archdeacon, that Sir Thomas Edmunds one of his Majesty's domestick Servants, press'd earnestly for a Compliance. 'Tis a Quibble to say how simple this Historian is, he certainly shou'd have produc'd another Spokesman to have seconded Sir John Cook effectually. Mr. Coryton reply'd to Edmunds, and the House sent an Answer to his Majesty, that these Messages were inconvenient, breeding Debate and Loss of Time. Sir John Elliot spok'd with his usual Warmth, We see some among our Bishops who are not orthodox; witness the two Bishops complain'd of the last Meeting of Parliament, Neile and Laud. Let us enquire whether there are not such amongst us; let us not be afraid to exclude them from the Government both in Church and State, lest they corrupt one and the other. It is the Clergy's Business to instruct the People, but it belongs to the Parliament to restrain the Clergy when they err from sound Doctrine. The Church of England wou'd be in a piteous Case if it was otherwise; if she was abandon'd to those new Doctors who trump up to us a new Liturgy that was unknown to our Reformers. It is our Business to be watchful over these ill-meaning Pastors, and not to suffer them to infect the Church and destroy the orthodox Faith. The House of Commons being mov'd with the Speeches of these three Members, after some Debate pass'd the Vow propos'd by Mr. Rous:

AVow pass'd. We the Commons in Parliament assembled, do claim, protest, and avow for Truth the Sense of the Articles which were established by Parliament in the thirteenth Year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which by the publick

A.D. 1629. lick Act of the Church of England, and by the general and current Expositions of the Writers of our Church have been delivered unto us; and we reject the Sense of the Jeſuits and Arminian, and all others wherein they differ from us. Both Houses join'd in an Address to the King for a general Fast. The Answer was an angry one, Fighting will do you more good than fasting, tho' I do not disapprove of the latter. The House of Commons soon after presented a Declaration, that "They were resolv'd to apply themselves entirely to the securing of their Religion, which was equally in Danger from Arminians and Papists; they hop'd their Zeal wou'd meet with his Majesty's Approbation, because his Piety and Glory were concern'd in the Peace of the Kingdom; that Schism and Hereſy ſhou'd not prevail over the Reformation." How astonishing is this? They here call Bishop Laud a Schismatick; that very Bishop who had prosecuted the most religious and learned of our Divines as guilty of Schism. "They pray'd that their Care of Religion might have Precedency of the Tonnage Act;" and he requir'd the contrary, adding, I am zealous for the Defence of the Church, and well inform'd it is in no Danger. But that Information came from Laud, whom the Parliament did not look upon as a Member of the Reform'd Church of England, but as one fallen into the Schism and Sin of Arminianism. And now, according to Echard, the Spirit being rais'd, it was the Art of subtle Men to keep it up. This is the poor Sophistry, which runs thro' his History; a wretched Copy of Clarendon's. How soon wou'd the Art of these subtle Men have been render'd useſeſs and vain by the King's hearkening to the humble and earnest Petition of the Parliament for the Security of their Religion against Popery and its Abettors? Had the Laws been put in due Execution against Papists, and the Authors of popish Innovations been discountenanc'd, the Art of the subtle Men wou'd have been of no more Use to them, than the Wisdom of the wise Men proves to be in the History of the Rebellion. The House debated a Declaration of the King's prohibiting Disputes about Religion, which they judg'd to be the Advice of Laud and Mountague. They complain'd of the King's pardoning the latter; and observ'd, that tho' the Warrant to draw his Pardon was for him only, yet three other such Divines were put in, Coleſens, Sibthorp and Manwaring. Upon which a Member cry'd out, In this Laud is contracted all the Danger we fear; for he that procur'd these Pardons may be the Author of these new Opinions. In the Height of the Debate about Religion, Mr. Rolle's Warehouse was lock'd up by a Pursuivant, and himself call'd out of the House and serv'd with a Subpœna. Sir Humphry May, a Privy-Counsellor, declar'd the King and Council knew nothing of it; and the Attorney-General wrote to Mr. Rolle to excuse it as a Mistake. The Matter was referr'd to the Committee of Tonnage and Poundage, who receiv'd Petitions from several Merchants under Prosecution for refusing to pay that Custom as the Farmers demanded it. Mr. Noy, who was not yet Attorney-General, said, We cannot safely give unless we are in Possession; for it will not be a Gift but Confirmation; neither will I give without a Declaration in this Bill, that the King hath no Right but by our free Gift. If it will not be accepted as it is fit for us to give, we cannot help it: If it be the King's already, we do not give it. It was high time to take off a Man who had so much Law and Reason about him, and who consequently must do a great deal of Mischief where Reason and Law were against him. The House sent to the Barons of the Exchequer to vacate their Orders for stopping Merchants Goods. The Barons answer'd, Those Orders did not determine the Right of Tonnage and Poundage. Thus the Merchants had been all along imprison'd and plunder'd for refusing to pay a Tax, which the Judges durst not determine they ought to pay. The Answer of the Barons being unsatisfactory, the House resolv'd to enquire farther into their Proceedings. At the same time an Information was prepar'd in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Chambers, while his Petition lay before the Parliament; which the House so resent'd, that they sent Sir William Acton, Sheriff of London, to the Tower. Several Custom-House Officers being examin'd, and charged with Breach of Privilege in the Case of Mr. Rolle, the King sent a Message to the House, that what they did was by his own direct Order. 'Twas said in the Debate, that these Interruptions proceeded from some Prelates and others Abettors of the Papish Party, who fear to be discover'd, and wou'd provoke to a Breach. Here again we are told that Laud, Neile, Mountague, and the like Prelates, were using not the Art of subtle Men, but the Zeal and Fury of Bigots, to make a Breach between his Majesty and his People. It is necessary for me to remind the Reader often of the Designs of the Enemies of our happy Constitution in Church and State, for that they have endeavour'd in their Histories to turn the Tables upon us, and prove that the Lovers of the Protestant Religion and Liberty were the Authors of that fatal Breach. Enquiry was made concerning ten popish Priests arraign'd at the King's-Bench, of which one only was condemn'd, and he repriev'd, and the other nine were releas'd. Sir Robert Philips complain'd, that 500 at a time have been seen coming from Mass in Somerset-House; and that there are 940 English Scots and Irish in Religious Houses in the Netherlands maintain'd by the Papists of England. The reverend Historian confesses, that tho' the Secretary and Attorney-General gave fair Accounts of the King's Justice and Mercy in Execution of the Penal Laws, yet they could not qualify the general Outcry. What a Wonderment he makes of it? We have seen how frequently his Majesty had promis'd to have those Laws duly executed at the Parliament's Request. Here are ten Romish Priests arraign'd, one of them only condemn'd, he repriev'd, and nine releas'd by Hyde the Chief Justice. Echard is amaz'd that the House of Commons wou'd not take the Secretary and Attorney-General's Words against the Matter of Fact then before them.

Bishops for the Papists.

The Parliament adjourning for three or four Days, when they met they receiv'd a Message from his Majesty to adjourn, being weary'd with their great Delays, says Echard, and ill Success. At other times the King's chief Struggles were for Supplies, but now he strove only for Confirmation of what he had possess'd since his Accession to the Crown. He takes care not to say against Law, because without Consent of Parliament; and it is plain enough his Majesty was so willing to have his Right to Tonnage suppos'd to be hereditary, notwithstanding what he himself had said to the contrary, that he was determin'd not to satisfy the Parliament concerning Religion for a Present which lessen'd the Idea he had conceiv'd of his Prerogative, and subjected a Tax the Crown had been many Years in Possession of by the Gift of the Parliament only, to the same Gift still: A Tenure the King did not think so honourable, or so certain, as that of Inheritance. Sanderson, such another Historian as Echard, tells us the King could not in Honour suffer the Commons, that School of Dissention, to insist on a Right to dispose of their own Money; tho' in the same Page he allows that his Majesty took that Tax presuming it wou'd be given him: and so it had been without question, if the King wou'd have satisfy'd the Parliament concerning Religion.

The Message to adjourn had been comply'd with very unwillingly, the House of Commons look-

P. 130; 134.

A.D. 1629. looking upon it as a sort of Infringement of their Privileges; and when they met again it was with the same Zeal for the Defence of their Liberties. Sir John Elliot began the Debate with a Complaint against the Lord Treasurer Weston, whose Merit was an inviolable Attachment to Popery and arbitrary Power, tho' he was an occasional Conformist, and went to Church with the other Courtiers. Under Colour of that Conformity he did the Papists more Service than he could have done had he gone to Mass. The Character given of him in the Lord Clarendon's History has more visible Marks of Invention than most of the other Characters. "His Education had been very good amongst Books and Men. After some Years Study of the Law in the Middle Temple he travelled into foreign Parts, and at an Age fit to make Observations and Reflections, out of which that which is commonly call'd Experience is constituted". A very elaborate Description of the Constitution of Experience. Reflections and Observations upon Facts in antient and modern History wisely made, are more useful than what a Man can see or hear in his Travels, which surely is never call'd Experience; and tho' Weston travelled at an Age fit to make Observations and Reflections, it is not explain'd to us that he made them. But it is said, that having spent his Fortune at Court, and drawn in his Friends to be bound for him, he was at last promoted, and doubtless had too much Experience to think he could repair his broken Fortune by defending the Liberties and Properties of the Subject. The following Allegory has a Quaintness in it which is not very common: "He did swim in those troublesome and boist'rous Waters, where the Duke of Buckingham rode Admiral with a good Grace"; to swim with a Grace in a Storm is a Flower in Eloquence; "when very many who were about him were drown'd, or forc'd on Shore with shrewd Hurts and Bruises; which shew'd he knew well, how and when to use his Limbs and Strength to the best Advantage; sometime only to avoid sinking, and sometime to advance and get ground". I have made this short Digression to let the Reader a little into the Nature of the Lord Clarendon's Characters, which are sometimes too fulsome, sometimes too malicious, always too partial to give great Delight to an honest Mind. 'Tis acknowledg'd in the History of the Rebellion, that the Treasurer Weston's Wife and all his Daughters were declar'd of the Roman Religion; and tho' he himself and his Sons sometimes went to Church, he was never thought to have Zeal for it; and his domestick Conversation and Dependants with whom only he us'd entire Freedom were all known Papists. Such was the Favourite of a King, whom the same Historian represents as zealous for the Protestant Religion; but he explains it all away afterwards: Weston never had Reputation and Credit with the Popish Party; not with the Party with whom he only us'd entire Confidence, his Friends and Dependants; which is so much in Probability, that a Man must be an Infidel not to believe it. Sir John Elliot spoke against Neile Bishop of Winchester, and more especially against the great Lord Treasurer, in whose Person all Evil is contracted. I find him acting and building on those Grounds laid by his great Master the Duke, and that his Spirit is moving to these Interruptions. These Men break Parliaments for fear Parliaments should break them. I find him the Head of the great Party the Papists. Echard too says he had no Credit with them. All Jesuits and Priests derive from him their Shelter and Protection. Buckingham is dead, but he revives in the two Chiefs, Neile and Weston, who are animated with the same Spirit, and tread in the same Steps; but let not that hinder us from doing our Duty. He was going on when Sir John Finch the Speaker deliver'd a Message from his Majesty commanding them again to adjourn. Thus in five Days they had had two Messages to adjourn, both of them unparliamentary and irregular. The House saw that as often as they offer'd to make Enquiry into Male-Administration their Debates would be stopp'd by a Command to adjourn. They resent'd this Irregularity in the Speaker, whose Duty it was not to deliver any such Command: for the Adjournment did properly belong to themselves. Sir John Elliot being about to deliver a Remonstrance on the Subject of his Complaint, which bore hard on Neile and Weston; that Court Tool the Speaker Finch boldly refus'd to read it, nay, the very Clerk was so far gain'd too, that he also refus'd it. Sir Miles Hobart fearing the Speaker would have deserted the Service lock'd the Door of the House, and Mr. Strode said, Let the Remonstrance be read, that we may not be turn'd off like scatter'd Sheep, and sent home as we were last Sessions with a Scorn put upon us in Print. Then Sir John Elliot read the Remonstrance, and it was propos'd to put the Question; but Finch the Speaker cry'd, I am otherwise commanded by the King. The great Selden, a Name of more Weight than any Name in the History of the Rebellion, said, Dare you not put the Question when we command you? If you will not put it, we must sit still and do nothing. We are here by Command from the King under the great Seal, and you before both Houses are appointed our Speaker, and do you refuse to perform your Office? Sir Robert Philips urg'd Precedents for the Right of the House to adjourn itself; and that most learned Lawyer and reverend Judge Sir Edward Coke said, The King prorogues, but the House adjourns. Finch could make no other Answer to this, than that his Majesty had expressly commanded him to rise as soon as he had deliver'd the Message of Adjournment. Accordingly he rose and left the Chair. But Mr. Denzil Hollis and Mr. Benjamin Valentine drew him back, and held him down in it by Force. We must interrupt the Story to observe that his Majesty by this Message exercised the most arbitrary Act of Power, which ever was acted by King of England, and that in the most flagrant manner, in plain Violation of the Privileges of Parliament. Sir Thomas Edmunds and other Privy Counsellors, then in the House, endeavour'd to free the Speaker. Mr. Hollis cry'd, He shall sit till he pleases us to rise. Finch fell a weeping; the Betrayers of the Cause of Liberty have generally such noble Spirits; and spoke thus with an Interruption of Tears, I do not say I will not, but I dare not. He desir'd they would not command his Ruin, in regard he had been their faithful Servant; but he durst not sin against the express Command of his Sovereign. Mr. Selden reply'd, I ever lov'd your Person, but I cannot chuse but condemn you now, that you being a Servant of the House should refuse their Commands; which Obstinacy will be a Precedent to Posterity, if it should go unpunish'd. He therefore wish'd him to proceed; which he still refus'd, and fell a weeping afresh. Sir Peter Hayman, a Countryman of his, said, I am sorry you are my Kinsman, for you are the Disgrace of your Country, and a Blot of a noble Family. Posterity will remember you with Scorn and Disdain. For my part, since you will not be persuaded to do your Duty, I think it fit you should be call'd to the Bar, and a new Speaker chosen. Finch knew well enough their Power was not to last long, and there was nothing to be got by them, but much by obeying the King; so he remain'd inflexible. Echard not regarding what those very eminent Lawyers Selden and Coke had said of the Right of the Commons, and the Duty of a Speaker, applauds Finch's Fidelity to the King, which prevail'd over his Duty to his Country. The House perceiving it, and knowing this was the only Opportunity they should have to bear their Testimony against a long

" 1. Whoever shall bring in Innovations in Religion, or by Favour seek to introduce Popery or Arminianism, or Opinions disagreeing from the true and Orthodox Church, shall be reputed a capital Enemy to this Kingdom and Commonwealth. 2. Whatsoever Counsellor shall advise the taking or levying the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage not granted by Parliament, shall be reputed an Innovator in the Government, and a capital Enemy to the Kingdom and Commonwealth. 3. If any Merchant or Person whatsoever shall voluntarily yield or pay the Subsidies of Tonnage and Poundage not being granted by Parliament, he shall likewise be reputed a Betrayer of the Liberties of England, and an Enemy to the same". After we have seen how all these Enormities were committed, and shall see how the Ministers will continue to commit and increase them, is it not very merry to hear Warwick tell us they voted against Innovations in Religion, and paying Tonnage and Poundage, as if there had been such a Design? There is something extremely ridiculous in it when Effronterie and Stupidity meet together. The King hearing of these Disorders, says the Archdeacon, he means only Votes of Parliament, sent a Messenger to the Serjeant of the House of Commons to bring away his Mace; this is no Disorder with him, which being remov'd from the Table would stop all Proceedings. Whoever knows least of the Constitution knows that the Serjeant is a Servant to that House, and that no King ever pretended to take him from their Service on purpose to stop Proceedings. The Door being lock'd his Majesty was so provok'd, according to the reverend Historian, that without more ado he sent to Maxwell, Usher of the Black Rod, to call them up to a Dissolution. He too finding the Door lock'd, the next Recourse is to Arms. He in great Indignation, to use the Archdeacon's Words, sent for the Captain of his Guards to force an Entrance. But the Parliament having sat thus two Hours adjourn'd to the 10th of March, as they were commanded, and the forcible Entry into their House was not made till some Years after. Bishop Williams, who foresaw the dismal Effects of such arbitrary Counsels and Actions, endeavour'd to prevent the fatal Effects of them, and importun'd the Lord Weston to carry this Message from him to his Majesty: That the Parliament might meet again for all this, and that there might be a Conference between the Two Houses to debate about Differences; that he hop'd the Lords would check, if not censure the Commons, who were so very rude. His Advice to let the Parliament sit was good, but his Reason very unpromising, and given rather to flatter the imperious Humour of the Court, than that it was his Judgment; which was too good to imagine the Lords would take upon them to censure the Commons for asserting their Rights, which they did in the preceding Votes; and did no more than was their Right to do both as to the Speaker and Protestation, whatever is insolently and impertinently said to the contrary.

Echard mistakes in placing the Imprisonment of the Members before the Dissolution of the Parliament. His Guides Warwick and Saunderson affirm they were imprison'd after the Parliament was dissolv'd. The King came to the House of Peers on the 10th of March, and made a Speech to them without sending for the Commons, who being to be severely handled in it, 'twas certainly very decent, tho' not very regular, to let them be out of the hearing of it. It is merely the undutiful and seditious Carriage of the Lower House, said his Majesty, that has made the Dissolution of this Parliament. Then after some Praises bestow'd on the House of Lords, he said, It is so far from me to adjudge all the House alike guilty, that I know that there are many there as dutiful Subjects as any in the World. Every Englishman having a Duty to his Country as well as to his King, one knows not well what is meant by dutiful in this King's Speech, unless it be an abject, slavish Submission to arbitrary Power. What follows in the Speech, It being some few Vipers, is a Figure which in Plebeian Rhetorick is term'd calling of Names; but the Objection I make to it is, that these few Vipers were by much the Majority of this House of Commons. The Parliament being dissolv'd, the King as he was disrobing in a sort of Fury said, He would never put on those Robes again. He publish'd a Declaration of the Causes why he did it; wherein, according to Echard, is a fair Account of his taking Tonnage and Poundage contrary to Law. He complain'd of the Parliament's falling upon his Ministers, in which they were misled by some Vipers, who like Empericks and lewd Artists, more calling of Names, strove to make new Work, and to have some Disease asort to keep themselves in Request, and to be employ'd in the Cure. What Elegance, what Decorum! and at the same time how keen the Satyr, and how consistent with the Imperial Stile! There were as severe Writings publish'd against these Ministers, particularly Weston and Laud, who were accus'd of advising the Dissolution of the Parliament, and in those anonymous Writings threaten'd with a tragical Exit, if, says Larrey, they did not repent of their Wickedness, which was alledg'd to be so enormous, that neither God nor Man could let it escape unpunish'd.

Warrants were directed to Mr. Hollis, Sir Henry Hammond, Sir John Corbet, Sir John Heveningham, Sir Miles Hobart, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Hayman, Sir John Barrington, Mr. Selden, Mr. Strode, Mr. Coryton, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Long, to appear before the Council; and they appeared accordingly. Mr. Hollis was ask'd a Question becoming the Wisdom of Roman Senators, Why did you sit above some of the Privy-Council so near the Speaker's Chair? He reply'd, I seated myself there some other times before, and took it as my Due there, and in any Place whatsoever; on Account of his noble Birth, Son to the Earl of Clare. That he came into the House with as much Zeal as any other to serve his Majesty; yet finding his Majesty was offended, he humbly desir'd to be the Subject rather of his Mercy than of his Power. The Treasurer Weston answer'd, You mean rather of his Majesty's Mercy than of his Justice. Mr. Hollis reply'd, I say of his Majesty's Power. Sir John Elliot was charg'd for Words spoken; to which he answer'd, Whatsoever was said or done by me in that Place, and at that Time, was in the Capacity of a publick Man, and a Member of the House; and I am and ever will be ready to give an Account of my Sayings and Doings there, whenever I shall be called unto it by that House, where I conceive I am only to be question'd; and in the mean time I being now but a private Man, I will not now trouble myself to remember what I said or did there as a publick Person. Which seems to denote that the Parliament was not then in Being; and if the Council had question'd these Gentlemen before the House broke up, they would doubtless have been question'd themselves severely. Sir Miles Hobart's Offence was locking the Door of the House, and putting the Key in his Pocket. Saunderson tells us he was accus'd as doing it by the Command of the House: But Sir Edward Peyton informs us, he was remember'd for it on another Occasion. An ordinary Officer, one Richard Plumley, pretending a Quarrel with Sir Miles, took an Advantage of him, pull'd him out of his Coach, and beat him so that he dy'd. Plumley was so far from being punish'd, that he was made Admiral of the Irish Seas, and knighted when justly he should have been

AD. 1629. been try'd for his Life. All these Gentlemen were committed to Prison for doing their Duty; that is, for speaking freely in Parliament, and refusing to answer out of it what they said in it. Hollis, Elliot, Strode and Valentine were sent to the Tower, the rest to the Fleet and Gatehouse.

Parliament Men corrupted.

Acherley, 353.

The Declaration before-mention'd was follow'd by a Proclamation containing this frank Confession of the Designs of the Court to subvert the Constitution of the English Government: The Calling again of a Parliament is for ill Ends design'd and spread about. His Majesty did therefore declare, that the late Abuses had driven him out of the Course of frequent meeting his People in Parliament, and did command his Subjects not to prescribe him any time for Parliaments. "From these plain incontestable Facts, says Mr. Acherley, may be taken a View of the Matters controverted between this King and his Parliament; what were the Power his Majesty aspir'd to, and what were the Rights the Lords and Commons contended for". The Lord Clarendon, or some body for him, is forc'd to confess here, the People concluded no more Parliaments were to be expected, and that therefore there was really an Intention to alter the Government; of which a greater Instance cou'd not be than this publick declaring, as was interpreted, there shou'd be no more Parliaments. The French Jesuit Orleans, who was a Confident of our abdicated King James, and whose History is recommended to us by Archdeacon Echard, gives us more of this Secret than a cunning Man wou'd have done. Clarendon owns the King held the Queen in perfect Adoration; and Orleans shews us how she put him upon the fatal Design of altering the Government. I must in Justice to the Queen declare, That she being a Daughter of France was full of that Spirit which warms the Blood of absolute Monarchs; and as such looked on a limited Authority, that was not to be us'd without Art, as no better than Servitude; and therefore she made the utmost Efforts to rescue the King her Husband from under all Restrictions of Law, Oaths, &c.

The above-mention'd Gentlemen were not only imprison'd, but the Studies of some of them, as the great Selden, Mr. Hollis, Sir John Elliot, Mr. Long and Mr. Strode were seal'd up, and Prosecutions order'd against most of them in the Star-Chamber, to break the stubborn Spirit of Liberty, which gather'd Strength by Opposition; so the chief Assertors of it were tempted to make their Peace with the Court. Something has been said already of that grand Apostate Sir Thomas Wentworth, who gave himself up Body and Soul to Laud and his Measures. The good Queen just mention'd persuaded the King to make Laud his Favourite on the Death of Buckingham; and she afterwards got Laud to gain Wentworth to assist her in the wicked Project to introduce a tyrannical Government. The Bishop of Lincoln was spoke to to gain Sir John Elliot; but his Virtue was impenetrable. Sir John Saville cou'd not resist the Temptation; and he was made a Lord, and Comptroller of the Household. Sir Dudley Deggs was also found frail in the Day of Trial, and was made Master of the Rolls. Heath after a little more Court Drudgery was remov'd to the Bench of Judges to make room for Noy to be Attorney-General, and Sir Edward Littleton was made Solicitor. These Men did not give themselves up by Halves, or keep any Reserve of Conscience or Honour, Littleton only in some small Degree excepted. It may be said of all the rest what I have read of Noy, he sacrific'd all his Knowledge of the Law, and his great Learning, to the Favour of Laud, and had as deep a Hand in all the illegal Practices of this Ministry as any one. Instead of declaiming on the Characters of these odious Ministers, as Echard does after Clarendon, I will repeat what a learned Writer says of their Administration after the Dissolution of the Parliament, AD. 1629. by which will be seen what Steps were taken to change the Form of the Constitution; and if what Mr. Acherley tells us is true, Clarendon and Echard are false in every Page. "The King's Ministers by whom he administer'd gave themselves over to Licentiousness and wanton Acts of Power; for they thinking themselves freed from Parliamentary Inquisitions, and being above the Reach of ordinary Justice, and secur'd from extraordinary, imagin'd that no Fault which was like to find no Punishment. Proclamations supply'd Defects in Law. Tonnage and Poundage, and other Impositions on Merchandise, were collected by Order of the Privy-Council; and the Members came now to be punish'd, as he threaten'd at the Close of the last Parliament; by which the principal Privilege, viz. Freedom of Speech was, as the Ministers hop'd, to be quite extinguish'd. The Ministers therefore caus'd three Members of the House of Commons, Sir John Elliot, Denzil Hollis and Benjamin Valentine to be prosecuted by his Majesty's Attorney-General for Words spoken by them in their Debates in Parliament; and without any Regard to Parliamentary Privileges these Members were condemn'd and fin'd, Sir John Elliot 2000 Pounds, Mr. Hollis 1000 Marks, and Mr. Valentine 500. All of them were imprison'd till they shou'd pay their Fines, which Imprisonment was accompany'd with some arbitrary Seyerities; for these Gentlemen were deny'd not only Pen, Ink, and Paper, but their Wives were in their Sickneses deny'd Admittance, and consequently the Rigor of the Punishment comprehended an additional Sentence of Divorcement between them and their Wives, inasmuch that Sir John Elliot, after many Years Confinement, sunk and dy'd under the Oppression. But this Prosecution and Condemnation being a Wound given to the two Estates of Lords and Commons in their tenderest Privilege, and having rais'd great Discontents, was in the Reign of King Charles II. revers'd and unanimously declar'd illegal: In which Reversal, as in a Looking-Glass, the Prosecution, Imprisonment, and Death of that Patriot, and the Power of the Ministers by which he, and in him the undoubted Rights and Privileges of Parliament, and of all the Commons of England were trampled under Foot, appear to this Day in Colours, administering a Detestation of such Proceedings." I chuse to keep to this Lawyer-like Style, for the greater Authority of the Quotation, which proves how this King's Ministers executed the Project to alter the Form of Government, in the Opinion of those who can best judge of it, the Lawyers of England.

Walter Long Esq; of Wiltsbire was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber in an unprecedented Manner, says the same learned Lawyer, for suffering himself to be chosen a Burgess for Bath when he was High-Sheriff of Wilts. He was condemn'd and fin'd 1332 l. for absenting himself from that County during the Session of Parliament, and imprison'd in the Tower. "This was an Addition, continues my Author, to the Number of Violations of parliamentary Privileges, which in these Times were treated as the vilest Clogs to Government." That Question had been lately determin'd in the Case of Sir Edward Coke, who being made High-Sheriff of Buckinghamshire to prevent his being elected a Member of Parliament, was notwithstanding chosen a Burgess for a Borough in another County, and his Election was voted and resolv'd to be good by the House of Commons. Mr. Acherley again; "The King's Ministers being thus freed of Fear, quarter'd great Companies of Soldiers and Sea-men on private Houses; many People were put to death by Martial Law, who ought to have Others by the same Martial Law were exempted from the Punishments which by the Laws of the Land they deserv'd." This is confirm'd by the Lord Clarendon himself, who has given us so much Eulogy on the Blessings of this Reign: It rais'd an Asperity in the Minds of more than the common People: This Distemper was so universal, that the least Spark still meeting with combustible Matter enough to make a Flame, all wise Men look'd upon it as a Prediction of the Destruction and Dissolution which wou'd follow. But none of the wise Men about the King wou'd advise him to take one Step towards curing that Distemper, and calming the Minds of the People. Clarendon again; There was no Serenity in the Countenance of any Man who had Age and Experience to consider Things to come. Let us now observe how very consistent one Part of his History is with the other.

Miserable Times.

P. 76.

"It is no wonder if England was generally thought secure with the Advantage of its own Climate; the Court in great Plenty, or rather, which is the Discredit of Plenty, Excess and Luxury; the Country rich, and which is more, fully enjoying the Pleasure of its own Wealth, and so the easier corrupted with the Pride and Wantonness of it; the Church flourish'd, Trade increas'd, the Royal Navy in Number and Equipage much above the former, very formidable at Sea. What comes after is said more in flat Contradiction of the Truth, even than what went before. The Reputation of the Greatness and Power of the King much more with foreign Princes than any of his Progenitors. Lastly, for a Compliment of all these Blessings, they were enjoy'd by and under the Protection of a King of the most harmless Disposition, the most exemplary Mercy, &c." Foreigners generally have not the same Biass to a Side as the Historians who are Natives, and by Education or Principle are always list'd on the one or the other. Monsieur

P. 167.

Larrey writes thus of these blessed Times; "He was resolv'd to act without the Assistance of Parliaments, rather than give them any Satisfaction. He continu'd to levy Taxes that were not granted him to supply his Wants: Tonnage and Poundage were collected; and to that was added another Tax on the Inhabitants of the Sea-Port Towns and Forests, which was levy'd with as much Haughtiness and Rigor as if they had been the inseparable Rights of the Crown, incensing the Nation more by these kind of Taxes which infring'd on their Liberties, than he cou'd have done by much greater, that had only drain'd their Purfes, and not infring'd their Liberties. Popery was tolerated, and Arminianism favour'd. Neile and Laud were the Cause. Nevertheless it was long before they came to a Rupture, tho' it may be properly said, they were only without War and not in Peace. The Death of the Emperor Ferdinand gave the King new Hopes to restore the Prince Palatine his Nephew, and he ought then to have quitted these vain Disputes about Ecclesiastical Discipline, which caus'd his Subjects Hatred, and to have apply'd himself to have reliev'd a Family that nearly concern'd him, and to procure the Restoration of their Dominions: But he only sent the Earl of Arundel to congratulate the new Emperor, and solicit for the Palatinate." This Negotiation was like all the former; and the Lord Arundel being referr'd to the Duke of Bavaria, that Prince answer'd haughtily, I conquer'd the Palatinate with my Sword, and with my Sword I will maintain the Possession of it. "Thus the Earl of Arundel return'd without obtaining any Thing, and King Charles being altogether taken up with his Episcopal Disputes, neglected his Nephew's Fortune, to light up the Fires of Civil Wars in "his own Dominions." Coke informs us, his Ambassador Sir Henry Vane, who was also sent to Germany about the Palatinate, was treated in a more rough, scornful, and dishonourable Manner, than any even of King James's Ministers who had been sent on the same Errand. Such was his Majesty's Reputation abroad, such the Happiness and Tranquility at home.

A.D. 1629.

A Peace being concluded with France, Eschard Peace with tells us the Articles contain'd nothing extraordinary. France and However the King was pleas'd at the Instance of Spain, the Queen to order the Release of several Popish Priests and others, who were then confin'd in several Prisons according to the Laws. Her Majesty was about the same Time brought-to-bed of a Prince who was christen'd Charles, but dy'd an Hour after. The War with Spain, if it deserves that Name, remain'd still on the same foot. The English as well as the Spaniards committed few Acts of Hostility; but the Court of Spain thought fit to send Sir Peter Paul Rubens, the famous Painter of Antwerp, Secretary and Gentleman of the Chamber to the Archduchess Esperanza, to propose a Treaty of Peace; and as the Archdeacon discreetly expresses it, he seem'd to offer Restitution of the Palatinate, which our Court no doubt seem'd to accept of; but the Negotiation had no Effect till Don Carlos de Colonna came over next Year, and concluded the Treaty between England and Spain, which was solemnly sworn upon a Latin Bible brought for that Purpose by Bishop Laud.

Monopolies.

Among other illegal Ways of raising Money, a Corporation of Starch-Makers was settled, who were to pay a round Sum for their Monopoly, a Precedent for other Monopolies on a like Payment. One Atkinson being ow'd a great Sum of Money by a Servant of the King's, su'd him for his Debt. Immediately the Earl of Montgomery Lord-Chamberlain, sent the Creditor to Goal for suing him without his Leave. Atkinson brought his Habeas Corpus, and was discharg'd. The Earl resenting it, committed Atkinson again to Prison in Contempt of the Court, and, says Whitlocke, to the Admiration of all wise Men; for there were some Men of Wisdom on the Side of the Laws and Liberties of the English Nation. Three of the Judges, Jones, Whitlocke, and Croke, granted a new Habeas Corpus, which the faithful Hyde Chief-Justice refus'd: But before the Return of it, the Earl of Montgomery, upon wiser Thoughts, releas'd Atkinson. Heath the Attorney-General, not yet a Judge, fit, as Whitlocke says, for such Work, exhibited an Information in the Star-Chamber against Mr. Chambers the Merchant, who had been before plunder'd for not paying Tonnage and Poundage contrary to Law. His Crime was for saying, Merchants have more Encouragement, and are less screw'd up in Turkey than in England. Mr. Chambers confess'd the Words, but he spoke then of the inferior Officers of the Customs, who had much wrong'd him, without reflecting on the Government; yet the Court fin'd him 2000 Pounds, and order'd him to make a Submission, which this generous Citizen refusing as unjust and false, the Fine was estreated into the Exchequer, where he pleaded Magna Charta and other Statutes against it, as not being by legal Judgment of his Peers, nor saving his Merchandize; but the Barons wou'd not suffer his Plea to be fil'd: He was thrown into Prison, and a Habeas Corpus deny'd. Thus, says Coke, "You see the Fruits of the Petition of Right, and the King's repeated Declarations to maintain the Laws of the Land, and the Liberties and Property of the Subject." Whitlocke adds, after 12 Years Imprisonment and long waiting for Satisfaction for his Losses, Chambers at last dy'd in Want. The Judges were somewhat perplex'd about the Habeas Corpus for the Parliament-Men, and wrote a Letter to his Majesty, That by their Oaths they

Ill Judges were

A.D. 1629. were to bail the Prisoners. The Lord-Keeper Coventry, as fit a Man as Heath, wou'd not acknowledge that he had shew'd the Letter to the King as the Judges had desir'd him, but told Judge Whitlocke whom they deputed to receive his Answer, that he and his Brethren must attend the King at Greenwich, where his Majesty express'd himself to be displeas'd with their Determination, and commanded them not to deliver any Opinion in the Cafe. The Prisoners were afterwards remov'd to several Prisons, and a Letter came from the King to the Judges, that this was done because of their insolent Carriage at the Bar. At last the Judges declar'd they wou'd bail them upon Sureties for their good Behaviour. The famous Selden pray'd that his Sureties might be taken, and the Matter of the good Behaviour omitted as a distinct Thing. The rest of the Prisoners stood to what Selden mov'd, but the Court remanded him and them to the Tower. Who wou'd not gladly have suffer'd in that Cause for which the great Selden was a Sufferer? And how idle is it for the Author of the History of the Rebellion to talk of Law, Learning, Wisdom, and Reason, while Selden was a Prisoner for the Defence of them. The Shame of keeping these Patriots in Goal was so great, that it was intimated to them, if they wou'd petition the King they shou'd be releas'd, but they refus'd to do it; and some of them moving for better Usage in their Prisons, it cou'd not be obtain'd; which sufficiently proves the Design of this King and his Ministers to alter the Form of Government, or in other Words to destroy the Constitution of England, which was restor'd at the Revolution, and has since then ever flourish'd.

Tumult.

Sir Robert Dudley.

P. 58.

Earl of Pembroke's Death.

Some time this Year there happen'd a very great Tumult in the Street, occasion'd by the arresting one Billingham, an Isle of Rhe Captain, who was rescu'd by the Templars under Pretence that the Serjeants took him within their Precincts. The Lord-Mayor Sir James Cabel march'd at the Head of 500 Citizens to recover the Prisoner, and a hot Skirmish ensu'd, in which some of the Lord-Mayor's Company were kill'd, and several wound'd; but the Tumult being suppress'd, the Offenders were seiz'd, and two of the principal, Captain Alburs, and Mr. Stamford Servant to the late Duke of Buckingham, try'd, condemn'd, and executed at Tyburn. Stamford had before been pardon'd for Murder.

A Book appear'd at this Juncture written by Sir Robert Dudley, under the Name of the Duke of Northumberland then in Italy: It was entitl'd, A Proposition for his Majesty's Service, to bridle the Impertinency of Parliaments. 'Twas a Project to raise Money without them; for dispersing which, the Earl of Somerset, the Earl of Bedford, the Earl of Clare, Mr. Selden, Sir Robert Cotton, and Mr. St. John, were committed to Prison: But Sir David Fowles discovering the Author of that Pamphlet, these Lords and Gentlemen were releas'd. Sir Edward Peyton makes more of this Manuscript, and insinuates that it was written with the King's Privy; his Story is this, "Pickern Master-Falconer, found the written Project in the King's Cabinet, it being open, and seeing what it was, he brought it to Car Earl of Somerset, who shew'd it to Sir Robert Cotton, the Earl of Clare, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Selden, who had frequent Meetings; Sir Robert had a Man who in his Cups told it to a false Brother, and he betray'd them all." The Court found it necessary to prosecute these Gentlemen for spreading their Libel, in order to clear themselves; but the Prosecution was stopp'd in respect of the great Joy on the Birth of the King's Son.

We must open the next Year with the sudden Death of William Herbert Earl of Pembroke, which is said to have been foretold by the famous Fortune-Teller the Lady Davis, who was imprison'd for it. Her Prophecy was, that he shou'd not out-live his Birth-day when fifty Years old. The same was predict'd, according to A. Wood, by Mr. Thomas Allen of Gloucester-Hall in Oxford. He was very pleasant and healthful that Day; he supped at the Countess of Bedford's, and when he came home, said, He wou'd never trust a Woman Prophet for Lady Davis's sake. He seem'd very well after he was in Bed, somewhat late in the Night, and had not been there long before he fetch'd a deep Sigh and dy'd away. By his Death the Office of Chancellor of the University of Oxford became vacant, and no doubt his Successor, right or wrong, will be Dr. William Laud Bishop of London; who, notwithstanding the Opposition made by Bishop Williams's Interest, had a great Majority of Voices. Mr. Archdeacon cannot help it. Now it happens that he was not chosen duly at all; for in the History of his Tryal printed by Order of Parliament, we read, "By indirect Means" this Prelate procur'd himself to be elected Chancellor upon the Death of the right honourable William Earl of Pembroke in April 1630, whose noble Brother was then really elected by most Voices, tho' mis-calculated by Practice in the Scrutiny by this Prelate's Creatures. What Alterations were there made upon his Advancement and Chancellorship; will appear by these subsequent Depositions of Sir Nathaniel Brent, Mr. Corbet of Merton-College, Mr. Nixon Alderman of Oxford, Mr. Bendy, Dr. Wallis, &c. Echard of this Dr. Laud again; He was the greatest Patron of Religion, the greatest Promoter of Discipline and Government; as will be seen with a Vengeance in Dr. Leighton's unjust, barbarous, and bloody Treatment by him; The greatest Benefactor to the Designs of Piety, &c. It will not bear repeating. He says after this, The Parliament having omitted the proper Season for Accommodation: His stupid Meaning is of yielding up all their Rights to the Will of the Prince: The Court was necessitated to have Recourse to such Ways of raising Supplies, as upon great Exigencies had been practis'd in former Times. Here he takes upon him to form a Judgment by his own private Sense, directly opposite to the Sense of the Nation. He knew the proper Season to accommodate Matters better than the Parliament of England, but he is not so fair as to tell us that Accommodation cou'd not be made without their giving up all Redress of Grievances; and he then asserts, directly opposite to the Opinion of Selden, Coke, Glanville, Whitlocke, and even Noy and Littleton, before they apostatiz'd, that his Majesty did no more than what was usual, and his Right in raising Money without Consent of Parliament. This Writer has been sufficiently dealt withal elsewhere; but as his History apes that of the Rebellion, it must sometimes undergo Animadversion. Let us read what a learned Lawyer says on this Subject; "The deepest, most dangerous Wound that was ever given this Constitution, was the assuming a Legislative Power to impose Taxes in a new Manner." The Archdeacon avers it was formerly practis'd; it refers to Ship-Money, of which more hereafter.

Money Projects.

A Commission was granted something like that to Empson and Dudley in Henry VII's Time! It was to compound for defective Titles to Possessions, as Empson and Dudley's was to take Fines and Forfeitures on obsolete Penal Laws. The Judges oppos'd this Design, and were the Occasion of quashing it. But tho' the King receded, yet the Tendency he discover'd to it, depriv'd him of the Merit of dropping it; for it look'd according to the Archdeacon, as if the Court were pursuing Measures not justifiable by Law. Indeed almost all their Measures did so look, and this therefore was the less to be wonder'd at.

The next Project was Wentworth's, but it was only the Revival of that mention'd after the Coronation

 sition was equally illegal, whimsical, and ridiculous, as far as any thing can be ridiculous, which is illegal. The learned Barrister tells us, "His Majesty's Ministers levy'd Money by Fines and Imprisonments upon all Men of 40*l.* per Annum and upwards, who refus'd to take upon them the Order of Knighthood, tho' in Respect of their Estates and Qualities they were altogether unfit."
Larrey enlarges on it. "The King had Recourse to extraordinary Levies to supply his Necessities. The Creation of a great Number of Knights was one Project, and the Subject of Mirth and Raillery in those Times; for it seems as if Knighthood was but of little Use in a Reign wherein all was quiet and peaceable. The King had ended all War, and had no Enemies unless he look'd on his Subjects as Enemies, who oppos'd introducing Innovations in Church and State." The good Lord-Keeper Coventry was one of the Commissioners for levying of this merry Tax, which oblig'd the Yeomen of England to pass over the Heads of the Esquires and Gentlemen, and commence Knights. Thus they were thrust into Knighthood, or into a Goal upon refusing to pay this unjust romantick Imposition, which turn'd Industry into Errantry. 'Tis a poor Excuse for extorting this Payment, that but 14000 Pounds of it came into the King's Purse, tho' 100000 Pounds was taken out of the Subjects. To oppress the People, and let others have the Benefit of it, if Benefit can ever come from Oppression, adds Weakness to the Injustice; and several as unwarrantable Projects and Monopolies had the like Infirmity.

Power abroad.

Notwithstanding the King's Wants, according to the Archdeacon, the King exerted some Power in foreign Parts. How quaintly he expresses it!
Woods Rogers of Bristol exerted some Power in the South-Sea, and took a Town, which we fear is more than we shall find in this Piece of History. The King was so far from being in Want, that there was a flowing Treasury, as we read in Acherley: "By all which unpleasing and provoking Ways, the King receiv'd vast Sums of Money, not only from Persons of Quality, but from Persons of any reasonable Condition throughout the Kingdom." It wanted but a small Portion of common Sense to foresee that a severe Account must one time or other be given for Money extorted thus from the People. The victorious Gustavus Adolphus King of Sweden had penetrated into Germany, with a brave tho' small Army, to deliver the Germans from the Tyranny of the House of Austria, in which the King of England was nearly concern'd; and Echard informs us, he resolv'd to take hold of this Opportunity to recover the Palatinate for the Elector Palatine. His Ambassador at Ratisbone met with nothing but fair
 Words, and he therefore sent an Army of 6000 Men under the Marquis of Hamilton to join the King of Sweden. These Forces were rais'd in Scotland, and before the Marquis cou'd embark, the Lord Ochiltrey charg'd him with High-Treason, as raising that Army to make himself King of Scotland. Weston the Treasurer encourag'd this Charge, and urg'd it home to the King, who freely told Hamilton what he was accus'd of, but added, That the World may know what Confidence I have in you, you shall lie this Night in my Chamber. For, to use Echard's Words, it was the King's Principle never to suspect or desert his Friends. These Men never consider what they say; the King's Ministers are his Friends. Could they do no ill, and must they never be deserted? A very wise Principle truly, and like to have good Effects in a Government no better belov'd than this was, which affected rather to provoke than appease the People. We are coming to an Instance of this Disposition, which cannot be written or read without Horror and the utmost Indignation against Laud, who was the Cause of it. 'Tis a Scandal to all History, and has no Parallel in any other. I have large Memoirs relating to it, and shall therefore enter into the Detail.

Alexander Leighton Doctor of Divinity in the two Universities of St. Andrews and Leyden, one Zachary Grey a Cambridge Doctor of Laws, as impudently as falsely asserted he never took his Doctor's Degree, was Father of the seraphick Dr.
Leighton Archbishop of Glasgow, and Sir *Ellis
 Leighton* who however was a Scandal to his Name.
 When the High-Commission Court and Spiritual Courts had render'd Laud and his Brethren odious to the Nation, several Gentlemen and Citizens came to Dr. Leighton's House in Blackfriars, to desire him to draw up Articles against the Oppression of those Prelates, which after much Persuasion
 he did; and those Articles being expatiated upon, made a Book call'd Sion's Plea against Prelacy. The Gentlemen and Citizens desir'd him to go beyond Sea and print it, but he wou'd not do it till several pious, learned, and judicious Ministers and others, some of them Members of Parliament, set their Hands to it in Approbation of its Contents.
 Dr. Leighton then went abroad, and return'd with an Impression of it, to his very great Charge and Loss. Two Copies of the Book were deliver'd to the Parliament a few Days before they were dissolv'd, and it was not long after that as he came out of Blackfriars Church, Croft and Tomlins, two High-Commission Pursuivants, arrested him, and dragg'd him with great Force and Violence to the House of Laud Bishop of London, who returning from Clapham with Dr. Corbet in his Coach, Leighton demanded to be heard. Croft made as if he shou'd; but instead of it, he brought him through a subterraneous Passage to a Door not open'd since Queen Mary's bloody Reign; and having provided Bolts to put on his Hands, he was carry'd with a huge Multitude of Bills and Staves to Newgate, where in the Entry his Wife was almost kill'd, and himself was cast into a nasty Dog-hole full of Rats and Mice, no Light but from the un-cover'd Roof, no Place but the Ruins of an old Chimney for Fire; no Bedding, and no Meat nor Drink from Tuesday-Night to Thursday-Noon.
 In this doleful Place and Plight they kept him, with two Doors shut upon him, for the Space of fifteen Weeks, suffering none to come at him, not even his Wife in all that time. I copy this from a Manuscript drawn up by Dr. Leighton himself, and afterwards presented to the Parliament. Four Days after his Commitment, the High-Commission Court Pursuivant, with other Ruffians belonging to that impious Court, came to Dr. Leighton's House in Blackfriars under Pretence of searching a Presby-terian's House for Jesuits Books, laid violent Hands upon his distress'd Wife, and us'd her with such barbarous Inhumanity as is a Shame to express.
 They rifled every Soul in the House, and held a cock'd Pistol to a Boy's Breast of five Years old, threatening to kill him if he wou'd not tell where the Books were; at which the Child was so fright-ned that he never recover'd himself. They spoil'd and carry'd away all the Doctor's Books, Household-Stuff, Apparel, Arms, &c. notwithstanding Mrs.
Leighton told them there wou'd be a Day of Reckoning for it. They took away also a great Number of Books belonging to the Doctor from one Mr. Archer, with whom he had left them for Security. The Keeper of Newgate deny'd him a Copy of his Commitment, and the Sheriffs of London, Arthur Abdy and Robert Cambel, refus'd to bail him up on his Wife's Petition according to the Statute in this Behalf, one of the Sheriffs saying, He wou'd the Laws of the Land, and Principles of the Subject, had never been named in Parliament. At fifteen Weeks end he was serv'd with a Subpœna, and an Information was laid against him

The horrid Treatment of Dr.
Leighton.

A.D. 1630. him by that fit Tool Sir Robert Heath then Attorney-General, who came to him in Newgate, and told him the King was inform'd he would not be examin'd. Dr. Leighton reply'd, I have the more Wrong, and the contrary will appear; I am willing to be examin'd by the meanest of his Majesty's Subjects coming with lawful Authority, tho' I refus'd to answer before the High-Commissioners, as having no lawful Authority. He then gave his Reasons, with which Heath seem'd to be satisfy'd. Sir Henry Martyn and Dr. Reeves two Civilians, with the Clerk of the High-Commission Court, and seven or eight of the Commissioners, had before been with him in Newgate to examine him, and he refus'd it; for that they had by an unlawful Warrant violently cast him into a loathsome Prison; that by the Laws of God and Man they were forbidden to meddle with the Body or Goods of the Subject. Sir Henry Martyn and Dr. Reeves told him they were order'd by the King to take his Examination. Dr. Leighton said, 'tis more than I know; if you will lay aside your Commission, and examine me by the King's Command, I will answer. Sir Henry Martyn reply'd, Not so. Dr. Leighton to him, Not so neither as you would, will I be examin'd; which made Heath the Attorney accost him as he did. Sir Henry and he had much Discourse about the King's Supremacy, the Hierarchy, going to Religious Assemblies different from Church-Worship, Fasting and Prayer; by which it appears that if Sir Henry Martyn understood Civil Law no better than he did Divinity, Dr. Leighton would have made as good a Judge of the Admiralty. Reeves said, I believe in my Conscience you have done more Hurt than the Jesuits; but that Civilian making his Belief serve instead of Reason and Argument is not much to be regarded. Sir Henry Martin looking stedfastly upon Leighton, and seeing his Countenance thro' long fasting, beastly Lodging, and other Affliction very pale and meagre, the Tears rush'd into his Eyes. But Reeves, another Tool of Laud's, was insensible, as was also the Attorney Heath, who on Assurance that he shou'd come off as he pleas'd, got a Confession out of the Doctor that he wrote the Book he was charg'd with; and at a second Conference promis'd him not only Pardon but Favour, if he would confess who set him on; which Dr. Leighton refusing, he was immediately brought into the Star-Chamber Court, and requir'd to put in Answer to a long Invective call'd an Information; which he did very amply, and to the Satisfaction of all religious, reasonable Persons. But no Council durst plead for him; and tho' he was so ill in Prison, that four Physicians and an Attorney certify'd his Case to be desperate, suppos'd to be the Effect of Poison, yet absent, sick, and unheard, the following Sentence pass'd upon him, as it is verbatim in his Petition to the Parliament. "This horrid Sentence was to be inflicted with Knife, Fire and Whip at and upon the Pillory, with 10000*l.* Fine; which some of the Lords of the High-Commission Court conceiv'd shou'd never be inflicted, only it was impos'd as on a dying Man to terrify others. But Dr. Laud and his Combinants caus'd the said Sentence to be executed the 26th Day of November following with a witness: for the Hangman was arm'd with strong Drink all the Night before in Prison, and threatening Words to do it cruelly. Your Petitioner's Hands being ty'd to a Stake (besides all other Torments) he receiv'd thirty-six Stripes with a terrible Cord. After which he stood almost two Hours in the Pillory in cold Frost and Snow; and then suffer'd the rest, as cutting off the Ear, firing the Face, flitting of the Nose. Here the Clerk of the House of Commons, when the Petition was read, was order'd to stop; and when he was going on again, the Compassion of the House was such, that he was bid to stop again till they had recover'd themselves; but Laud and his Brethren of the High-Commission A.D. 1630. Court heard it all with Pleasure, as with Pleasure does Echard write it. The Petitioner proceeds: "He was made a Theatre of Misery to Men and Angels; and being so broken with his Sufferings that he was not able to go, the Warden of the Fleet would not suffer him to be carry'd in a Coach, but hurry'd him away by Water to the farther endangering of his Life, &c." Dr. Leighton between the passing and Execution of the Sentence found Means to make his Escape out of the Fleet; which News was immediately carry'd to Laud. It was brought to me on Thursday Night, Laud's In-says that cruel Prelate in his Diary. By this and humanity, what follows out of the same Diary, we see who it was who was most busy in this bloody Work. "He was taken again in Bedfordshire, and brought back to the Fleet. On Friday Nov. the 26th Part of the Sentence was executed upon him in this manner, much the same as we have related it. And says Bishop Laud again: "On that Day sevendnight his Sores upon his Back, Ear, Nose and Face being not cured, he was whipp'd again at the Pillory in Cheapside, and there had the Remainder of the Sentence executed by cutting off the other Ear, flitting the other Side of the Nose, and branding the other Cheek". This hellish Cruelty which the Parliament cou'd not bear the hearing of, does Bishop Laud dwell upon, not in a publick Assembly only, where he might be oblig'd to hear it, but in his Closet where he might have avoided it, and yet he meditates upon it with Delight. This is the Bishop of whom Echard says, No Man in the World was so fit to make a Chancellor of the University of Oxford, considering his Religion and Charity. Mr. Elphinston and Mr. Anderson, two Scots Gentlemen, were fin'd 500*l.* apiece for helping Dr. Leighton their Countryman to fly from this infernal Punishment, without any Crime committed, as appears by the Parliament's giving him 6000*l.* and making him Warden of that Prison where he so long liv'd in loathsome Confinement. The Laudean Prelates were the Jehus of this Court, and had the greatest Hand in all the tyrannical Proceedings there. One of them, Harpsnet of York, when Mr. Long a Member of Parliament was brought into it for attending the Service of the House, being Sheriff of Wiltshire, brow-beat Mr. Long's Council, who pleaded ancient Records touching the Privileges of Parliament to exempt Members from the Jurisdiction of that detested Court: Don't trouble us, says Harpsnet, with Moth-eaten Records: We sit here not to be guided by Precedents, but to make Precedents; and so proceeded to censure. Was it not high time to take care of such Prelates and such Practices? Not only the Star-Chamber, but Westminster-Hall was exercis'd with some irregular Cafes, as the Archdeacon says it. Sir Henry Martyn made a great Complaint to his Majesty against the Judges of the King's-Bench for granting Prohibitions against his Court. The King commanded the Judges to appear; and they justify'd their Proceedings to be according to Law, from whence they cou'd not depart by vertue of their Oaths; which proves plainly that his Majesty's Privy-Counsellors made light of the Law, when their Passions or Interests were controul'd by it.

About three Years before this there was establish'd a Society for buying in Impropriations for augmenting poor Vicarages, and maintaining a Preaching Ministry. An excellent Project! and it had the Success it deserv'd. It is incredible what large Sums were advanc'd in a short time towards so laudable an Employment, according to Dr. Fuller. This Society chose four Divines, Dr. Gouge, Dr. Sibbs, Mr. Offspring, Mr. Davenport; four Lawyers, Ralph Eyre, Esq; Simon Brown, Esq; of Lincoln's-Inn, Charles Sherland, Esq; of Gray's-Inn, John White, Esq; of the Middle-Temple; and four Mer-

A.D. 1630. Merchants, Mr. John Geering, Mr. Richard Davis, Mr. George Harwood, Mr. Francis Bridges to be their Feoffees; who succeeded so well, that Fuller thinks within 50 Years Purchases would rather have been wanting than Money to make them. These worthy Feoffees presented the most religious and sober Ministers to the Livings they purchas'd, whom Land look'd on with a jealous Eye, lest they should prove a Thorn in the Sides of Episcopacy; though when that Prelate oblig'd Noy the Attorney to prosecute the Feoffees in the Exchequer, Fuller owns it appear'd they prefer'd no Ministers, whose Sufficiency and Conformity were not first examin'd by the Bishop. Mr. White, afterwards Chairman of the Committee upon insufficient ones, offer'd Bishop Land, that if he dislike'd either the Feoffees or their Divines, they would willingly submit to any Alteration. But Land would be satisfy'd with nothing less than the dissolving a Society, who had the Impudence to set up a pious Preaching Ministry. And it had been well if he had not push'd the Matter farther. The Court of Exchequer condemn'd the Proceedings of the Feoffees as dangerous to the Church, and pronounc'd their Gifts and Feoffments illegal, broke the Society, and seiz'd the Money which had been given by religious Persons for the Subsistence of religious Ministers. Dr. Fuller charges Land with this worst Sort of Sacrilege.

P. 143.

Laud's Sacrilege.

Mr. Huntley, a Minister, persecuted.

Mr. Huntley, a Minister of Kent, having been thrown into Jail by the High-Commission Court, brought his Action against Barker the Keeper, and some of the Commissioners by Name, whom after long Debate the Judges order'd to answer. Laud, chief of that detestable Court, took the alarm, and represented to the King that the Commissioners would be ruin'd, if they were accountable for their Doings. Upon which his Majesty sent Dr. Reeves, his Advocate, to the Lord Chief Justice, requiring him to proceed no farther. The Judges in this singular Case resolv'd not to break their Oaths, but to insist upon it that the Commissioners should answer; and those petty Tyrants had behav'd so ill, and were become so obnoxious and odious, that even the Privy-Council approv'd of it, notwithstanding the Opposition of Laud Bishop of London, and Neile Bishop of Winchester, who spoke vehemently against it.

Birth of K. Charles the II.

On the 29th of May the Queen was deliver'd of a Son at the Palace of St. James's about Noon. At which time a Star appear'd in a clear Sky to the Wonder of numberless Spectators, according to Echard; as if it prognosticated what a Blessing he was to be to this blessed Nation, as will be seen in his History. The Historians who make the most of this Prognostick, are a little puzzled how to reconcile the Glory of this Appearance with that Prince's Misfortunes and Mismanagements. Sanderfon, as considerable an Author as Echard, assures us it was a Miracle wrought by God in Favour of the new-born Prince; and the latter takes notice of it in the same manner. Larrey observes upon it: These Interpreters of the heavenly Signs carry'd their Predictions higher; and they would needs have it that this wondrous Star promis'd the Prince, whose Birth it shone on, not less than the Conquest of the East, which way it pointed. But if it had been a Blazing Star it could not have been more disagreeable to the Puritans, who did not at all join in the surpassing Exultation on that Occasion. Heylin thinks he has got great Advantage against the Protestants for their Behaviour at the Birth of the Prince; and I shall shew how in his own Words: "I can tell you it was otherwise with too many of the Puritans, who had laid their Line another way, and desir'd not that the King should have any Children; inasmuch that at a great Feast in Friday-street, when some of the Company shew'd great Joy at the News of the Queen's first being with Child, a leading Puritans not pleas'd with it.

"Man of that Faction, whom I could name were it worth while, did not stick to say, 'I can see no such Cause of Joy for the Queen's being with Child; God has already provided better for us than we deserve, in giving such a hopeful Progeny to the Queen of Bohemia brought up in the Reform'd Religion; whereas it is uncertain what Religion the King's Children will follow, when brought up under a Mother so devoted to the Church of Rome.' I remember very well, that being at a Town one Day's Journey from London when the News came of the Prince's Birth, there was great Joy shew'd by all the rest of the Parish in causing Bonfires to be made, and the Bells to be rung, and sending Victuals unto those of the younger Sort, who were most busily employ'd in that publick Joy: But so that from the rest of the Houses being of the Presbyterian or Puritan Party, there came neither Man nor Child, nor Wood nor Victuals, their Doors being shut close all that Evening as in a Time of general Mourning and Disconsolation." Here is an Accusation against the Presbyterians and Puritans by their most inveterate Enemy Heylin, a Creature and Tool of Laud's, that their Souls sigh'd for the Succession of the Protestant Line, which now is in Possession of the Throne of Great Britain, even before the Birth of the two last Kings of the House of Stuart. The Queen of Bohemia, as has been intimated elsewhere, had endear'd herself and her Posterity to all true Protestants in Britain by her great Zeal for the Reform'd Religion; inasmuch that when it was propos'd to marry her Son to the Emperor's Daughter, if he was educated in the Imperial Court, the pious Queen declar'd she had rather be his Executioner, than suffer her Child to be bred up in Idolatry. Should we not hope, as we pray, for an Eternity of Blessings on the Posterity of a Princess, who in the midst of Misfortunes prefer'd Religion to Empire? And may not the Puritans and Presbyterians reasonably value themselves on their early Devotion to the Interests of that Royal House who now wear the British Crown. A Merit their Adversaries have so little Claim to, that they take Pride in nothing more than the wicked and obstinate Opposition they have constantly given it, and constantly will give it, notwithstanding they may thro' false Policy be employ'd and care'd, which will bear farther Remarks in a more proper place.

A.D. 1630.

They long for the Protestant Succession.

It was not the sober and religious inferior Clergy only, who met with Vexation, the Fathers of our Church felt the Weight of the Displeasure of Laud and his Brethren. The very learned and pious Dr. Davenant Bishop of Salisbury, one of the most eloquent Preachers of his Time, preaching in his Course a Lent-Sermon at Whitehall before the King and Court, and handling the Point of Predestination according to the 17th Article of the Church of England; the King took Offence at it, and Harfnet Archbishop of York, and Neile Bishop of Winchester, told him so after Sermon, as did also the Earl of Montgomery Lord Chamberlain. Accordingly he was two Days after summon'd to appear before the Privy-Council, where Bishop Davenant presented himself on his Knees; and Dr. Fuller tells us, he might have continu'd on his Knees for any Favour the Bishops Land, Harfnet, or Neile shew'd him; but the temporal Lords bad him rise and stand to his Defence, being as yet only accus'd not convinc'd. Harfnet spoke with great Vehemence against him, upbraiding him with King James and the present King's Favour to him, and charging him with disobeying the King's Declaration forbidding the meddling with controverted Points in Sermons. The Bishop of Salisbury said very justly, that an establish'd Article of the Church could not be deem'd a Point in Controversy, and his preaching upon it therefore was no Breach of the Royal Command: But Harfnet, to whom Laud

Bishop Davenant.

Bishop Davenant summon'd before the Council. P. 138.

A.D. 1631. left this invidious Work, continu'd to rebuke the Bishop with his wonted Fierceness; and to make the Matter up as well as he cou'd, his Lordship said, I am sorry I understood not his Majesty's Intention, if I had I shou'd have made Choice of some other Subject which might have given no Offence; and for the Time to come I shall conform myself as readily as any other to his Majesty's Command. The Earl of Arundel approv'd of Bishop Davenant's Answer, and advis'd him to say no more, the Privy-Council being satisfi'd that his Sermon was not an intended Violation of his Majesty's Declaration: So his Lordship was dismiss'd, and the Lord Chamberlain afterwards introducing him to the King, he kiss'd his Majesty Hand. Thus ended an Affair which, as Fuller observes, the good Bishop's Adversaries Harsnet, Neile, &c. hop'd wou'd make him fall totally and finally from the King's Favour.

St. Paul's Church.

It is not one of the least important Passages in Archdeacon Echard's History, where he relates at large the Activity of Bishop Laud in the Repair of the Cathedral of St. Paul. I shou'd have taken as much Pleasure as himself in viewing the masterly Strokes of that great Architect Inigo Jones; I shou'd have been as much charm'd with the Corinthian Pillars, the Cherubims, &c. but I shou'd not have been in Astonishment, as he is, that this new Structure of the principal Church in the Metropolis of the Kingdom met with Exceptions and Murmurings, occasion'd by Laud's causing Shops and Houses to be pull'd down without the Consent of the Owners, to make room for the Building. If the Owners did not consent, their having a reasonable Compensation is no Satisfaction. Common Sense teaches every one, that for a Man to be turn'd out of his House, Way of Trade and Living, is not to be compensated by paying him a reasonable Price for his House. If the Owners did not consent, the Sheriff of London was requir'd to force their Property from them, to demolish their Houses, and drive away the Tradesmen to seek out new Dwellings and Shops. Laud got Briefs for Contributions throughout the Kingdom, and Letters Monitory were sent from the Lords of the Council to quicken the Gentlemen in the Country in raising Money for so righteous and religious a Work. Sir Francis Knollys and Sir Thomas Vachel, two Justices of the Peace in Berkshire, who were not over forward in it, as not liking either Laud or his Projects, were check'd for delaying to gather in the Contribution-Money, and not giving liberally themselves. By this compulsory Method great Sums of Money were rais'd, and this one Thing, according to Archdeacon Echard, was enough to remove all other Prejudices against Laud. The Privy-Council having little else to do, and being under the Influence of that Prelate, publish'd an Order that no Body carry any Thing in the Church which may profane it; that Parents shou'd be punish'd for Childrens playing in the Church at any Time, &c. We defy all History to shew any thing so trifling in the Acts of any Council that was ever thought worth naming.

Hamilton in Germany.

We must now take some Notice of the Marquis of Hamilton's Expedition in Germany, where he commanded an Army of 6000 English and Scots, sent to the Assistance of the great Gustavus Adolphus. A Treaty had been made between the King of Sweden and the Marquis, without any mention of King Charles, for fear of offending the Emperor. Neither was any mention made of recovering the Palatinate. This Fear and Precaution of the Kings, says Larrey, appear'd in his Letter to the Queen of Bohemia, excusing his making Peace with Spain, as being done with a View of engaging that Monarch to mediate for the Restoration of the Elector Palatine's Dominions. That is to say, continues the French Historian, King Charles suffer'd himself to be amus'd by the Artifices of the Spaniards as his Father had been before, being as timorous and irresolute as he, dreading War, and loving Peace. The Lord Clarendon is so far from owning any thing of this, that he assures us King Charles was very formidable to all the Kings in Europe, and had as great a Reputation abroad as any of the Plantagenets. The 16th of July Hamilton sail'd from Yarmouth for Zealand in Denmark, where arriving safely, he went directly to that Court. From Zealand he proceeded to Pomerania, where he landed his Army, and went himself to wait upon the King of Sweden, then preparing for the Battel of Leipsick. His Majesty appointed those Forces to cover the Towns in that Province, to secure his Retreat in Case he was forc'd to make one. Gustavus was victorious in the Battel, and wrote a Letter to the King of England with his own Hand, to inform him of his Success, and exhort him to continue his Assistance; but in the main he did not much rely upon it; and cou'd not, according to Larrey, confide in a Prince who kept such Measures with one of the most dangerous Enemies of the common Cause. We shall in the next Year see to what Purpose the Marquis of Hamilton and his 6000 Men were sent to Germany.

In England there was an uncommon Trial of a Lord Audley Earl of Castlebury's Trial. Nobleman Mervin Lord Audley Earl of Castlebury, for a Rape committed on his own Wife by his Servant Broadway, himself holding her while his Man ravish'd her, and for Sodomy with Fitzpatrick another of his Servants. The Lord-Keeper Coventry was made Lord High-Steward on this Occasion, assisted by eight Judges. The Trial was in Westminster-Hall, and there were twenty-seven Peers. The horrid Crime was sufficiently prov'd, all the Peers, except Dudley Lord North, voted him guilty of the Rape, and fifteen of them declar'd him guilty of the Sodomy. So he was condemn'd to be hang'd, but the Sentence was mitigated, and he was beheaded on Tower-Hill. Broadway and Fitzpatrick were executed at Tyburn.

The next Project to raise Money was by sealing of Cards and Dice, and that of Knighthood was profecuted with Vigor. Wentworth now at the Head of all arbitrary Counsels, dipp'd deeply in the Guilt of this scandalous Project, and procur'd three of his Countrymen James Maliverer Esq; William Ingleby Esq; and Thomas Moyser Esq; all of Yorkshire, to be fin'd severely, Maliverer 2000 Pounds, as a Composition for the Order of Knighthood, whereas he might have been a Baronet for half the Money. Other Persons were fin'd grievously in other Parts of England to their utter undoing, according to Rushworth. A Charter was granted to the Soap-Makers of Westminster for 10000 Pounds down, and 8 Pounds a Year, which brought a good Revenue into the Exchequer yearly. Two Proclamations publish'd at this Time were worth remembering, one for the better Direction of those who come to Court to be cur'd of the King's Evil, the other against eating and selling of Flesh in Lent.

Bishop Laud was all this while very busy with his Prosecutions in the High-Commission Court, and in all other Courts where he had Influence. Mr. Thomas Ford of Magdalen-College Oxon, Mr. Giles Hodges of Exeter-College, were summon'd to appear before the Vice-chancellor of Oxford, Dr. Smith Warden of Wadham-College, from whom Fuller tells us they appeal'd to the Proctors, as suspecting Smith to be partial. Their Crime was for touching upon Controversy contrary to the King's Instructions, which were intended chiefly to hinder the preaching against Popery and Arminianism. The Proctors were Mr. Atherton Bruch of Brasen-Nose College, and Mr. John Doughty of Merton, who received their Appeals. Laud immediately complain'd to the King then at Woodstock, and his Majesty immediately appointed the Business to be brought before himself, who heard the Cause in August, and

114 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1631. the Issue of it was, Mr. Ford, Mr. Thorn, and Mr. Hodges were sentenc'd to be banish'd the University; and the two Proctors Mr. Bruch and Mr. Doughby were turn'd out of their Offices. At the same time the very learned and reverend Dr. Prideaux Rector of Exeter-College, and Dr. Wilkinfon Principal of Magdalen, receiv'd a sharp Admonition for giving countenance to those three Divines who were expell'd Oxford for preaching against the Heresy of Arminius, which Laud took into his Protection. Mr. Ford refus'd to make any Address to be restor'd to the University; and the Rage of Bishop Laud did not stop at his Expulsion, for being inform'd that the Town of Plymouth intended to chuse him Lecturer, Letters were sent to require them not to do it on Pain of the King's Displeasure. There is nothing but Severity and Irregularity.

Sir Giles Allington.

While the infamous Tryal of the Lord Audley was depending, Sir Giles Allington's Case was prosecuted in the High-Commission Court. The Knight had marry'd his Niece contrary to Admonition and Authority, as Echard phrases it. Sanderfon affirms he had the Opinion of Council upon it before Marriage. The Archbishop of Canterbury had indeed admonish'd him against it as incestuous, and he was afterwards question'd for it in the High-Commission Court. Allington was rich and cou'd bleed freely, so they were very loath to part with him. Sir Giles apply'd to the Court of Common-Pleas for a Prohibition. The Court order'd a Rule for it. Immediately Bishop Laud runs to the King again, who blam'd the Judges, and Laud threaten'd to excommunicate them if they granted a Prohibition; so the High-Commissioners proceed and sentence Allington to pay 12000 Pounds to the King, and give 20000 Pounds Security not to cohabit or be in private with his Wife, as also to do Penance in the Cathedral of St. Paul's London, and Great St. Mary's at Cambridge in which County he liv'd. He and his Wife pass'd thro' that Ceremony; but, says Sanderfon, no Penalty of the Purse, or Shame of the Sin, cou'd keep them long asunder.

St. Paul's.

Bishop Laud going forward with repairing and decorating his Cathedral, set up certain Images, which, according to Rushworth, were to the Discontent of many Persons. The King came himself to visit this Church in a kind of Procession. Above 80000 Pounds were gather'd by the Briefs, besides 19000 Pounds laid out by Sir Paul Pindar. Echard assures us the Prebends were afterwards turn'd out of their Stalls, and Horses put in their Places by the Puritans.

Hamilton.

We have hinted that the Marquis of Hamilton had been accused of High-Treason, and now the Lord-Keeper and Judges consider how to examine into the Truth of it. The Lord Rea a Scotch Baron impeach'd Ramsay and Meldrum, two of his Countrymen, for exciting him to go beyond Sea to join in the Conspiracy; but they positively denying it, and no Witnesses being produc'd, David Ramsay, who was a Soldier, offer'd to clear himself by solemn Combat. The Lord Rea accepted the Challenge; upon which a Court of Chivalry was erected, and Robert Earl of Lindsey made Lord-High-Constable of England on that Occasion. The Sureties for the Lord Rea were Sir Robert Gordon, Sir Piercy Crosby, Sir Walter Crosby, Sir William Forbes, and William Innys Esq; For Ramsay the Earl of Abercorn and the Earl of Roxburgh. Mr. Selden was one of the Lord Rea's Council, and Tuttle-Fields was appointed to be the Place of Combat; but before it was to be decided, his Majesty sent Richard St. George King at Arms, with a Letter to the Lord High-Constable, by which he revok'd his Letters Patents for the Tryal of this Cause.

Hamilton in Germany.

In the mean time the Marquis of Hamilton, by Command of the King of Sweden, quarter'd his little Army at Custrin, Frankfort upon Oder, Landberg, Crofar, and other neighbouring Towns in Pomerania, where a third Part of his Soldiers languish'd and dy'd of various Sickneses. The Marquis was afterwards order'd to join General Banier and besiege Magdeburgh, which was attempted without Success, and Hamilton receiv'd Orders to march to Halberstadt. Sir Henry Vane was then in the King of Sweden's Camp, Ambassador from England, but cou'd get no other Answer from that Prince about the Palatinate, than that he cou'd not undertake the War with the Bavarian, who was in Possession of it, unless King Charles wou'd enter into a War with Spain, which he knew was not to be expected when a Treaty of Peace had been just concluded between the Kings of England and Spain. The Marquis of Hamilton was soon after this recall'd, and an End put to an Enterprize which like all the foreign Enterprizes of the English since Queen Elizabeth's Death, is hardly worth our Remembrance.

The King of Sweden fell the next Year in the Field of Lutzen, where his Army was crown'd with Victory; and the King of Bohemia dying of the Infection at Mentz, the Earl of Arundel was sent to Holland to invite the belov'd Queen and her Children into England; but that Princess excus'd her not accepting the Invitation on account of her great Sorrow, which render'd her incapable of taking such a Journey.

Kings of Sweden and Bohemia.

This Year the Lord Viscount Wentworth was sent Deputy to Ireland to tyrannize there as he had done in the Court of the North, of which he was Lord-President, and of which Mr. Edward Hyde said in Parliament, It was a Mass of new exorbitant intolerable Power. He had not been long President of the North, before he procur'd Mr. Bellasis Son and Heir of the Lord Viscount Faulconberg, to be summon'd before the Council for standing with his Hat upon his Head, and looking in his Face as he pass'd by him with the Mace carry'd before him. Mr. Bellasis answer'd that his Face was turn'd another Way, he being talking with the Lord Fairfax, and the Lord Wentworth pass'd before he was aware of it. The Council commanded him to kneel, which he did seemingly only, and positively refus'd to sign a Submission that he was sorry he had given Offence to the said Lord, upon which he was sent to Prison. When he was summon'd to appear again, he said he hop'd it wou'd be understood that his Submission was to have relation to the Lord Wentworth's Place and not to his Person; but his Friends prevail'd with him to submit in the Form that was tender'd to him, thinking his Honour was sav'd by giving the Board and Wentworth especially to understand how he himself understood his Submission.

Ld Wentworth and Mr. Bellasis.

The Archdeacon telling us of several Church-Promotions, extols Bishop Laud's great Care in recommending Persons to Ecclesiastical Preferments who were of the greatest Probity; and then is so weak as to name them, Neile translated to the Archbishoprick of York, Curl translated to Winchester, Pierce promoted to Bath and Wells, Lyndsay to Peterborough. He informs us also that he got Mr. Francis Windebank his old Friend, to be made Secretary of State, tho' such an Advocate and Patron to Romish Priests and Jesuits, to use his own Words, that he was himself reckon'd a Papist. Now it was that Bishop Laud's Integrity shone out bright again in the Prosecution of Henry Sherfield Esq; Recorder of Salisbury. That worthy Gentleman was scandaliz'd at some Painting in Glas in a Window of St. Edmund's Church in that City, where the Creation of the World was represented in Emblems which suited ill with Religion, for Almighty God was painted there like an old Man. The Recorder order'd that blasphemous Picture to be taken down as a Dishonour to the Reformation,

Mr. Sherfield's Suffering.

A.D. 1632. Reformation, for which he was cited to the Star-Chamber, where he pleaded the Scripture that forbids severely the making any Pictures of the Deity, and the Act of Parliament 13 Q. Eliz. which orders such Pictures to be pull'd down as Monuments of Superstition, pursuant also to another Statute of Edward VI. Notwithstanding this Plea of Religion and Law, and the very plain Plea of Reason and Sense, the Court fin'd him 500 Pounds. Laud who sat then in Court, endeavour'd to justify the Blasphemy of painting the Creator like a Creature, and was so very weak as to quote the Antient of Days; but the Earl of Dorset reply'd, The Antient of Days is the Eternal God, who is injuriously represented in that Picture as an old Architect with a Pair of Compasses drawing the Plan of the Universe. "The People murmur'd, says Larrey, at Mr. Sherfield's Sentence, who they thought had Scripture and Law on his Side." Mr. Nathaniel Bernard Lecturer of St. Sepulchers London, in a Sermon preach'd at St. Mary's in Cambridge on this Text, The Glory is departed from Israel, because the Ark of God was taken away, was by Procurement of Laud censur'd in the High-Commission Court, for delivering some smart Passages against Possibility of Salvation in the Church of Rome according to the Decrees of the Council of Trent. Mr. Bernard was order'd to make a Recantation which was drawn up for him, but he refus'd to sign it, and was fin'd 1000 Pounds, suspended his Ministry, condemn'd in Costs of Suit, and thrown into Goal, where he dy'd, his ill Usage there shortening his Life. But Dr. Fuller observes, He that maketh Inquisition for Blood, either has been or will be the Avenger of it. Laud was the Man meant here. Dr. Comber, says Fuller, Vice-chancellor, gave speedy notice of the Sermon to Dr. Laud Bishop of London. But as quick as he was, the Bishop's University-Agents had sent him Information of it before. About the same Time the very eminent Mr. Arthur Hilderham Minister of Abby de la Zouche, who had been silenc'd before by Bishop Neile, and restor'd by Dr. Ridley Archbishop Abbot's Vicar-General, was again silenc'd by the Spiritual Court at Leicester, where Sir John Lamb and Sibthorpe did Laud's Business; but the Piety and Merit of this celebrated Divine, made even the vile Court of Leicester ashamed of keeping such a Minister out of his Pulpit, to which they restor'd him a few Months after. This Year another Proclamation was publish'd for keeping of Lent; and another, that all Gentlemen keep their Residence at their Mansions in the Country, and not inhabit in the City of London or Places adjacent, that they might not bring Infection to Town with them. Every Year is productive of Proclamations; sometimes twenty, sometimes more yearly. Not a word has been heard of a Parliament for about four Years, and Laud rules without Controul in the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, and other spiritual Courts; and how the Protestant Religion advanc'd, we may find sooner in Fuller's than in Clarendon's History. A grave Divine preaching before the University at St. Mary's Cambridge, had this Passage in his Sermon, As at the Olympian Games he was counted the Conqueror who cou'd drive his Chariot Wheels nearest the Mark, yet so as not to hinder his running or to stick thereon: Metaque Fervidis Evitata Rotis; so he who in his Sermon can preach near Popery, yet no Popery, there is your Man. "Indeed it now began to be the general Complaint of most moderate Men, that many in the University, both in the Schools and Pulpits, approach'd the Opinions of the Church of Rome nearer than ever before," as Dr. Fuller writes; who being an orthodox Divine, and of that University, and of that Time, must know these Things better than Clarendon and Echard, who both assure us on their exemplary Veracity, that great Care was taken by Bishop Laud to prefer Persons of the greatest Probity in the Church, tho' we read these Persons came nearer Popery than ever. 'Tis necessary to digress thus on Ecclesiastical Affairs, to shew how industriously those two Writers conceal the Attachment of Bishop Laud and his Brethren to the Papal Hierarchy and Superstition, in Opposition to the Sense of the most pious and most worthy of our Protestant Bishops and Clergy.

Echard begins his Account of the King's Journey to Scotland, as pompous as all other his Relations, where he intends that the King or Bishop Laud shall make a shining Figure. "The Scots Nation, says he, tho' very falsely, by King James's pacifick Deportment whilst there, and his obliging Bounty whilst in England, had with great Plenty enjoy'd a continual Peace for above forty Years, which none of their Records can give an account of for so long a Time before." The Author of the Memoirs of the Church of Scotland, writes quite contrary to this; "Nothing but a dark Prospect of Persecution, and a Cloud threatening Dissolution to the Church, now appear'd; the Prisons were fill'd with depriv'd Ministers, and the remote Parts with the Banish'd, the King's Letters coming every Post, pressing to more and more Severities, &c." Such was K. James's pacifick Deportment, and King Charles, his Son, according to the same Author, was no less zealous than his Father in the Episcopal Part of Church-Affairs, and the Church of Scotland got no Advantage by the Change. Both these two Kings were afraid of drawing their Swords against any foreign Power; and this abject Fear which render'd them contemptible to all Nations round them, is the pacifick Deportment so much declaim'd upon by such Writers as the Archdeacon. They tell you you are in profound Peace, when the Laws of both Kingdoms are violated, and the best Men in both are either thrown into Goals, or driven from their Habitations into remote Banishment. No two Kings were ever stouter in their Attacks on the British Constitution: But what says Coke of one of them? King Charles prospering, as he thought in his domestick War, having taken more Prisoners in it, I mean Members of Parliament and Hertfordshire Constables, than his Father and he had done in all their Wars against France, Spain, and the Empire, for the Recovery of the Palatinate, was very unwilling to enter into a foreign, &c.

Echard then gives us what he calls a true History of the Church of Scotland, much like the Truth of his other History. It was govern'd first by Superintendents, and afterwards by Bishops; but he does not say that those Superintendents were subjected to the General Assembly of Presbyters: And he is no more true than he is in other Places, when he tells us those Superintendents were remov'd to make way for Bishops again; Episcopacy being never suffer'd in Scotland till ten Years after King James had conform'd to the Church of England. The Church of Scotland all this while exercis'd a compleat Presbyterial Government, and no other. There were exact regular Meetings of Kirk or Parochial Sessions, Presbyteries, Synods, and General Assemblies; the Nobility upon all Occasions sign'd the Book of Polity, the Foundation of the Presbytery, and those Ministers who retain'd the Title of Bishops, did not, as the Archdeacon affirms, govern the Kirk, having nothing left them but a ministerial Authority, and were equally subjected to Presbytery, Synod, Assembly, &c. The Historian gives us a melancholy Instance of it in the Person of the titular Bishop of Orkney, who, as a private Minister, was censur'd by the Assembly for solemnizing the adulterous Marriage of the Queen, King James's Mother, with Bothwell, for which they depriv'd him, and restor'd him to his Ministry afterwards upon his Humiliation. They were allow'd to be call'd Bishops; but to use the Words

116 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1633. Words of the Scots Historian, they were really only Superintendents, and not that neither very long, for the Assembly Anno 1574. voted the Bishops to be only Pastors of one Parish, and delated several of them for not preaching: They actually depos'd the Bishop of Dunkeld, and delated the Bishop of Glasgow for the like Offence. The next Year the Assembly voted, That the Name of Bishop is common to every one that hath a particular Flock, over which he hath a peculiar Charge to preach the Word and administer the Sacraments. No Bishop was to appoint Ministers without the Consent of the Flock, nor to suspend other Ministers without the Consent of his Brethren. Such were the Bishops in the Scots Kirk, and such their Way of governing. They preach'd God's Word, administer'd the Sacraments, and were called Bishops sometimes, and sometimes Presbyters; as Tallents tells us after Binius the Bishops of Rome or Popes were for 200 Years after Christ. Tho' Echard insinuates that the Kirk Bishops had as much Power as Spotswood and Sharp usurp'd afterwards in the Archbishoprick of St. Andrew's. The Archbishop of Glasgow, the Bishops of Dunkeld, Galloway, Brechin, Dumblain and the Isles were of this very Assembly, and acknowledg'd they understood themselves to be Bishops in such a Presbyterial Sense only, for which they are censur'd by Archbishop Spotswood. Two Years after, in 1577, the Assembly ordain'd that all Bishops be call'd by their own Names; and the next Year they voted the very Name of Bishop to be a Nuisance. If Echard's true History is such, what must his false be. He proceeds: In the Year 1580. Episcopacy was condemn'd as contrary to the Word of God, and Presbytery establish'd by Tumult. There is something else besides Falshood in this Assertion, which is so common in his other Histories that I need not name it, and it breaks in too much upon Decency. The Preamble to the Act which pass'd in 1580. shews it was not the Effect of Tumult; Forasmuch as Episcopacy, &c. was brought in by the Folly and Corruption of Men's Inventions to the great Overtthrow of the true Kirk, the whole Assembly in one Voice, after Liberty given to all Men to reason the Matter, none opposing themselves in the Defence of the said pretended Office, findeth and declareth the same unlawful, as being unscriptural, and having no Warrant from the Word of God. In the Year 1592, spoken of by the Archdeacon, King James gave his Royal Assent to a Statute confirming the Privileges of the Kirk, their Assemblies, Synods and Presbyteries, by a very good Token, of which not a Syllable from the reverend Historian; That the Assembly then sitting order'd a Deputation to the King, to admonish him, in the Name of the Eternal God, to have respect in time to the Estate of true Religion, to the many Murthers and Oppressions daily multiply'd thro' Impunity, and to discharge the kingly Office in both, as he will eschew the fearful Challenge of God, and avert his Wrath from himself and the whole Land. Which Admonition, it is said, the King never forgave them. Indeed he cou'd not but be much more taken with the Compliment of Archbishop Whitgift, that he had the Holy Spirit in him, than with such homely Truth as the Scots Kirk told him, and consequently like Whitgift's Church much better than that he was educated in. The Archdeacon continues his true History thus: "King James finding the increasing Power of the Ministers and Preachers, which often overtopp'd that of the Civil Magistracy, took Occasion and Advantage from some of their Exorbitancies and Miscarriages to restore Episcopacy in the Nation by a Parliament, A. D. 1612. Had there been one word of Truth in this Passage besides the Restoration of Bishops, we wou'd have forgiven it. The first Exorbitance and Miscarriage we meet with after the Statute for establishing the Kirk, was an Act of the same Assembly, ordaining, A.D. 1633. That no Minister within this Realm utter from the Pulpit any rash or irreverent Speeches against his Majesty or his Council, or their Proceedings, under Pain of being depos'd. Which, says the Scots Historian, effectually clears them from the Charge of being mutinous, and of refusing to submit to Authority. Indeed the Synod of Fife did the next Year order a Fast, for the Reasons mention'd at large in Calderwood; and some of their Members were deputed to the King, to tell him that which his true Subjects think, the Words of the Deputation, touching his too much bearing with, favouring and countenancing Papists and Traytors, his Negligence in repressing Idolatry, &c. And to declare freely to his Majesty the Resolution of all godly and faithful Subjects, That they are ready to give their Lives rather than to suffer the same. Did Whitgift, Bancroft, Neile, Laud, Harsnet, Wren, Cosens, Montague, and their Brethren of the same Stamp, talk so to him after he came to England? How can the Presbytery hope to continue in Scotland, when at the Instigation of those Prelates he was about to extirpate it in England? Instead of the Archdeacon's Exorbitances and Miscarriages read the Scots Historian. "In the next Year following, and then after, the Ministers struggled with the Defection of the Times, the refractory Disposition of the Prince, which the reverend Historian terms his Pacifick Department, and the growing Insolencies of the Courtiers, till they were crush'd". The Miscarriages and Exorbitances are all on the Court Side; and Echard bespatters the Church of Scotland with them, to justify the Insolencies of the Courtiers. It is not deny'd but the Ministers had some Reasons for their Admonitions. The King said he wou'd not decline the Judgment of the Assembly, provided it was done privately. To which an old Presbyter, Andrew Melvin, reply'd bluntly, We cannot justify private Rebuke for open Offences. Some time after this his Majesty and the Presbyters were in a manner reconcil'd. The King in a solemn Speech thank'd God that he was bred in that Kirk, the purest Kirk in the World; and said those bitter things against the Church of England which are repeated in the Introduction. He took a soft Way to have his Ends of them for their Admonishments. He began with the poorer Ministers, whom in my Author's Words he wheedled or bought off. He then easily got an Assembly to petition the Parliament in the Name of the Church, that some Commissioners from them might sit and vote with that Representative. The Presbyters greedily enough swallow'd this Bait. After which little Opposition was made to the Appellation that was to be given them, which cou'd not well be any other than that of Bishop. But these Presbyters forming an Assembly at Dundee, it was not reckon'd legal, so many Presbyteries protesting against it, and another Assembly met at Aberdeen; however, the former gain'd their Ends, the King supporting them; and an Act pass'd three or four Years before he came to England, to admit the Kirk's Commissioners to sit in Parliament as Bishops. After which Episcopacy with the Dignities, Powers and Revenues arriv'd by several Gradations to the Pitch King James intended, to mortify the Presbytery for their Admonitions. The Scots Historian closes his true History of this Matter thus: "I have been more particular in this Part, as it relates to the Manner how Episcopacy got at first Footing in the Church of Scotland; that the Fraud, the Artifice and hypocritical Fawnings, the arbitrary and outrageous Dealings which were practis'd with the Ministers might appear, as also the Strugglings and Opposition it met with for so many Years. The Time drew near that the King was to receive an Addition of Glory, and be called to a Kingdom infinitely more opulent,

 "King from their Censure, and afterwards made
 "Archbishop of St. Andrew's". King James was so earnest in advancing absolute Power in Scotland, that he offended even his own Bishops by proposing in Parliament when he was at Edinburgh, A. D. 1617. that whatever he himself did with the Advice of the Archbishops and Bishops in the external Polity of the Church shou'd have the Force of an Ecclesiastical Law. The Ministers sign'd a Protestation against that notorious Invasion of the Rights of the Kirk. Wherefore he resolv'd to exercise that Power without the Ceremony of an Act. One of his wise Reasons for it was, that King David gave Orders concerning Church Matters, as we read in Salmonet. But the very Bishops in Scotland oppos'd this. So he got an Assembly at Perth to agree to the Articles which go by that Name. 1. Kneeling at the Sacrament. 2. Private Communion. 3. Private Baptism. 4. Confirmation. 5. Holidays. Orders were sent to all Ministers to exhort the People to conform to these Articles, and to preach upon the Lawfulness of them. But according to my Author, "This it "was never in their Power to do; nor where Mi"nisters did conform was it in their Power to "make the People comply with, or hear them:
 "But a dreadful Rent being thus made in the "Church, the People divided from their Pastors,
 "and dissenting Ministers set up private Commu"nions, and were almost universally follow'd. The "High Commission was the highest Exercise of Ty"ranny that was ever practis'd by any King in "Great Britain, since Laws and Constitutions
 "were allow'd to be the Rule of Government;
 "for it actually put the King in Possession of the "Bodies and Goods of all his Subjects, and em-"power'd him to use them as he pleas'd without "the ordinary Forms of Justice, and merely by
 "the Agency of the Clergy, making the Bishops "Instruments of arbitrary Power, not only to de"stroy the Liberties of the Church, but even of "the whole Country, Clergy and Laity. There's "scarce any Kind of Cruelty, Injustice and Op"pression to be nam'd in the World, which was "not practis'd on the Ministers of the Church;
 "the Bishop of St. Andrew's telling them at one "of his Meetings, He shou'd proceed to Sentence
 "without having Regard to Wives, Children or "Estate". When the Articles of Perth were brought into Parliament in the Year 1621. to be pass'd into an Act, they met with great Opposition.
 But the King by the Management of the Members, says the same Author, and the Assistance of the Bishops got a Majority to vote it. Many noble Lords declaring their Dissent to it with much Earnestness, as the Earl of Rothes, Earl of Monteth,

Earl of Eglington, Earl of Linlithgow, Earl of Kintail, Lord Gray, Lord Ross, Lord Testar, Lord Cathcart, Lord Couper, Lord Burlic, Lord Torpi-chen, Lord Balmerinock, Lord Elphinston, Lord Forbes. The Earl of Mortoun, the Earl of Buchan and the Lord Lauderdale staid without the Parliament-Door, because they wou'd not vote for it;
 and of the Commissioners for Shires and Burghs forty-four voted against it, besides nine Lords and twenty-six Commissioners that were Neuters, and came not to the House. So far was the Hierarchy from being the general Sense of the Scots Nation, as the Archdeacon and other Ecclesiastical Writers wou'd make us believe. Upon King
 Charles's Accession to the Throne, the Episcopal Party receiv'd all possible Encouragement. The Archbishop of St. Andrews was made Lord Chancellor of Scotland, and eight other Bishops Privy-Counsellors, to the unspeakable Discontent of the People, as well Nobility as Gentry and Populace.
 For tho' a long and cruel Persecution had in some measure suppress'd that Spirit of Liberty which animated the Scots after the Reformation, yet the Disguist rais'd by the Tyranny of the High-Commission Court lay hidden like latent Embers, and only wanted Wind to be blown into a Flame.

That Wind cou'd not be wanting when King Charles carry'd Land with him to Edinburgh, there being a Kind of Fatality in all this Prince's Councils leading to the Ruin that attended them. The Earls of Arundel, Northumberland, Holland, Pembroke, Southampton, and other Lords waited on his Majesty to Scotland, where he was crown'd the 18th of June by Spotswood Archbishop of St. Andrews, assisted by the Bishops of Ross and Murray. One must believe that Land's Activity, so much applauded by Echard, appear'd here as well as in other Places. Larrey speaks thus of him:
 "The Archbishop of Glasgow ought to have been "on the Right of the Archbishop of St. Andrews;
 "but Land, who had the Direction of the Cere"mony, seeing he was not in his Pontifical Robes
 "as the others were, being a Person who abhor'd
 "Pomp, had the Boldness to pull him forcibly
 "from his Place, and to substitute the Bishop of
 "Ross in his stead. To this outrageous Insult
 "Land added Words that were not less insulting:
 "Are you a Churchman, and dare you appear here
 "without a Habit suitable to the Episcopal Digni"ty and the Solemnity of this Day? The Scots saw
 "by this Action what was to be expected from "such a Man, who was zealous for Episcopacy
 "even to Superstition; but they knew him much "better soon after". Echard himself can't help speaking some Truths on this Occasion: "The Scots
 "look'd with an evil Eye on the Bishop of Lon"don, and with a worse when they heard him
 "preach in the Royal Chapel chiefly on the Be"nefit of Conformity, and the Reverence due to "Ceremonies. They grew more exasperated when "the King during his Stay erected and endow'd
 "an Episcopal See at Edinburgh, and committed
 "the framing and composing a Liturgy for the "Church of Scotland to a select Number of "Bishops". These several Steps were with great Indignation complain'd against. And Land's Foot was visible in every one of them, that Prelate haunting his Majesty like his evil Genius.

The Parliament which the King held at Edinburgh granted him a Subsidy, and pass'd several Acts in a few Days; but warmly oppos'd two Bills which were brought to them relating to Ecclesiastical Affairs. "They thought, says Larrey, the "King's Zeal for Episcopacy was but an ill Omen,
 "and look'd like a melancholy Prelude to their "Divisions. The first of the two Bills was for "revoking Alienations formerly made of Tithes and "other Estates of the Clergy". This Act was not contested so much as the second concerning Ecclesiastical Habits, the Direction of which was to be left to his Majesty, and so the Surplice would be impos'd on the Kirk, for which they had an Abhorrence. Larrey assures us the Presbyterians had the major Vote in this Parliament. And how wise were the Counsellors who put the King on such a Novelty at such a Juncture? His Majesty endeavour'd to intimidate the House by drawing a List of their Names out of his Bosom, and telling them he would mark down those that were well or ill affected to him, and that he would remember both. He was pleas'd to tell his Parliament in England, he scorn'd to threaten his Inferiors; but this Menace is no great Proof of it. However, many of the Members persisted strongly in their Opposition, and thirteen of the Lords spoke with as much Vehemence as the Commons. Some time after a Pamphlet appear'd, in which the Scots complain'd that there was an Infringement of their Laws and their Religion by the King's awing the Parliament with his Presence. The Pamphlet was written by one William Hagg who fled for it; but being found in the Custody of the Lord Balmerine, he was charg'd with it, try'd by his Peers for Treason in concealing it, and condemn'd to lose his Head; but, says Echard, he obtain'd a most gracious Pardon. I wonder he had not translated Salmonet: The King could not resist the Mildness of his Nature, always delighting in Mercy, which he prefer'd to all his other Virtues; as appear'd by his putting this Lord in the last Hazard of Life for a little Pamphlet which had but too much Truth in it. Neither of these impartial Historians let us know how Balmerino came by this most gracious Pardon, as Mr. Acherley does. The Scots in general associated to execute military Justice after the old Scottish Fashion by cutting to pieces the Judges, and by burning their Houses, if Balmerino was executed. Archbishop Spotswood was in so much haste to carry his Information against this Peer after the King to London, that he began his Journey on a Sunday. Indeed Salmonet the French Papist is a little fairer in this than the Archdeacon; for he gives us a Hint of the Scots Resentment at the Tryal of Lord Balmerine: The People got together at the Palace Gate, and threaten'd the Judges as they went in.

P. 385.

The Earls of Rothes, Cassils and Lothian; the Lords Lindsay, Torpichen, Sinclair, Couper, and four more enter'd their Dissent to the Habit Act. But the Majority being prepar'd to pass it, their Opposition had no other Effect than to shew the Court the good Reasons which ought to have hinder'd the bringing in the Bill. Rushworth tells us, 'twas observ'd that at the Dissolution of the Scots Parliament the King look'd on those Lords with an unfavourable Aspect. The Presbyterians presented a Petition to him complaining of the five Articles of Perth, which had occasion'd so great a Division in the Church, that the Episcopal Clergy were generally abandon'd by their Flocks. King Charles animated by Laud, they are Larrey's Words, press'd the Observance of those Articles, and the Presbyterians were obstinate in their Refusal. Salmonet informs us, that the Rumour of a Liturgy was already spread amongst the People, who were alarm'd at it, and disgusted at the making all the Bishops Privy-Counsellors. He errs in that, there were only eight of the thirteen Bishops made Lords of the Privy-Council. In this Ferment did the King leave his antient Kingdom, and every Step he took after his Return to England serv'd only to increase it.

Dr. Laud made Abp. of Canterbury.

P. 12.

No sooner was he return'd to Whitehall than he gave fresh Occasion of Disgust to both Kingdoms by advancing Dr. Laud to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, vacant by the Death of the most Reverend, Learned and Pious Dr. Abbot. Laud had been twice offer'd a Cardinal's Cap; But Echard affirms, that upon his Refusal the Tempter left him for ever. One of the most flagrant Falsties in Story; for as I have observ'd twice elsewhere, the Lord Wiquefort informs us in his Treatise of the Ambassador and his Function, that he treated with Count Rosetti, the Popish Agent in England, for a Pension of 48000 Livres a Year; which if the Pope would have settled upon him, he would not only have accepted of the Cardinal's Cap, but have gone to Rome, and have dwelt with the Pope and his Cardinals as long as he liv'd. Larrey also takes notice of this Negotiation. We have already observ'd, that the Author of Clarendon's History represents good Archbishop Abbot as unfit for that high Station. The Reader is desir'd to compare it with what follows out of the French Historian: "While Abbot was alive Laud observ'd some Measures; for tho' that Prelate was in Disgrace, he was never the less respected by the Church, by the Universities, and the whole Kingdom. Tho' he was stripp'd of Part of the Temporalities, yet the Character of so eminent a Post which he still held, and his Learning and Integrity were Barriers which Arminianism durst not attempt to force". The Archdeacon enters again into Laud's Panegyrick, and with some Tautology repeats that "his Heart was entirely set on the Advancement and Grandeur of the Church. He continu'd Archbishop in great Splendor seven Years. His Proceedings were with the utmost Vigor and Authority. He brought the Grandeur and Advancement of the Church of England to that Height, that it shew'd rather a Rivalship than a Resemblance of the Church of Rome". What an Applause is there, to rival the Idolatry of the Roman Worship, and the Tyranny of its Hierarchy. "In this and all his great and pious Designs, he had the hearty Concurrence of the King, and caus'd his Friend Dr. William Juxon to be made Bishop of London and Lord High Treasurer, and many of the inferior Clergy to be advanc'd into Civil Offices; Doctors and Ministers of Parishes were every where made Justices of the Peace. As he lov'd Pomp and Ceremony, he promoted Beauty and Regularity. He caus'd the Communion Table to be plac'd Altar-wise, and to be rail'd in. He was strict about the Surplice and Vestments. His Greatness was too big for Opposition. He was a vigorous Actor, and had a singular Influence at the Council Table, in the Star-Chamber and High-Commission Courts, so many Channels to convey the Royal Authority to Subjects for the Good of them and the Publick. But what gave the greatest and most Dislike to him, was that he would not suffer the common Vices of great Men to go unpunish'd". He design'd the Discipline of the Church should be felt, as it was with a Vengeance while 'twas subjected to his Tyranny. This is scarce a half Length of Laud's Picture, as the Archdeacon has drawn it; but it contains enough to shew the Painter might have done it winking, as well as with his Eyes open according to real Likeness. I will not copy much after Prynne, because what he says of this Prelate may be thought to be sharpen'd by the Sharpness of his Sufferings owing to Laud's Revenge and Cruelty. I will now content myself with what a foreign Author writes of him upon his Advancement to the Archiepiscopal Dignity. "Historians say this new Phaeton's Head was turn'd with Advancement, and that he did not fall from the Height which Fortune rais'd him to, till after he had set England, Scotland, and Ireland in a Flame. As Primate of England he undertook to govern the Church; nor had he less Power in Scotland, supporting the Bishop of St. Andrews and the Bishop of Dumblaine there. In Ireland the Lord Strafford did whatever this Prelate pleas'd, so that his Spirit spreading thro' the

A.D. 1633. "the three Kingdoms, was as it were the Soul that gave them Motion. All Restraint being taken off by Archbishop Abbot's Death, he apply'd himself eagerly to render himself and his Party triumphant, arrogating to himself an Authority in the three Kingdoms, which defac'd the King's Supremacy, and can be justly compar'd to nothing but the Pope's. What is most to be wonder'd at, is that the King, enchanted by this Archbishop, lent him his Power to raise him above himself, and stil'd those Persons seditious and Rebels who defended the Royal Authority against the Infringements of this ambitious Prelate. The High-Commission Court was establish'd in his Favour, and made up of Ecclesiasticks and Seculars devoted to him: The Star-Chamber was not less on his Side, and nothing that resisted him went unpunish'd, &c." I could fill a large Volume with such like History of Laud, but I am and shall be tir'd with writing so much of him, which his thrusting himself into almost all Sorts of Business, renders unavoidable.

Church of Scotland.

As soon as the King was return'd from Scotland, he sends back Articles of Orders to be observ'd by the Dean of the Chapel-Royal in the Palace of Holy-Rood at Edinburgh; for Prayers to be perform'd there twice a Day after the English Manner; that the Communion be receiv'd monthly on the Knees; and that he who officiates on Sundays and Holidays, do it in a Surplice; which Orders the Bishop of Dumblaine then Dean durst not obey for fear of exasperating the People. Bishop Laud had a Warrant from the King to correspond with that Dean, to whom he wrote several Letters to promote the Design, and to inform the King who comply'd with his Pleasure, and who did not. The Bishop of Dumblaine answer'd, He did what he cou'd, but the Times requir'd Patience. A plain Proof that Laud's Innovations in the Church of Scotland, was in direct Opposition to their Religion and the general Inclinations of the People; which if he knew it, was to sacrifice a kind Master to his own Bigotry and Obstinacy; and if he did not know it, he was very unfit to sit in the Seat of Council.

Ruslow.

On the 13th of October the Queen was brought to-bed of her second Son James, who was created Duke of York, and in time succeeded his Father in his Kingdom and his Misfortunes. The Tyranny of the Star-Chamber Court, and the slavish Submission of the Judges who sat there to the Will of Laud, is no where better seen than in the Tryal of William Prynne Esq; of Lincoln's-Inn, for writing a Book against the Stage and the lewd Practices of the Players, which Jeremy Collier, a Priest of the same Principles with Laud, expos'd so successfully some Years ago: But it is not at all strange that a Bishop such as Laud, and a Minister of State such as Cottington, &c. who are about an Edict enjoining the Profanation of the Lord's-Day, shou'd worry a learned Gentleman in a more barbarous Manner than ever was baited Bull, for writing against obscene Plays and Players. The Book entitl'd Histrionastrix, was publish'd six Weeks before the Queen acted a Pastoral at Somerset-House. The Words excepted against were only in the Index, Women Actors notorious Whores; which Place the Prelates and their Instruments, in the Words of Whitlocke, shew'd to the King, and inform'd both King and Queen, that his Book was purposely written against her and her Pastoral; which the Reader will observe to be the most brazen Falshood that harden'd Fronts cou'd be guilty of, the Book being publish'd six Weeks before the Pastoral was acted. The Lord Commissioner Whitlocke proceeds, Yet the King and Queen tho' thus exasperated, did nothing against Prynne till Laud set Dr. Heylin to work, who bore Prynne a great Malice for confuting some of his Doctrines, to peruse the Histrionastrix, and to col- *lect the scandalous Points out of them; which Heylin did, tho' as Prynne affirms, not at all warranted by the Text of his Book. The Archbishop went with these Notes to Mr. Attorney Noy on a Sabbath-day Morning, and charg'd him to prosecute Prynne, whom in the mean Time the Bishops and Lords in the Star-Chamber sent close Prisoner to the Tower. The Lord-Commissioner informs us why these Bishops order'd this inhuman Prosecution, Prynne had anger'd them by some Books of his against Arminianism and the Jurisdiction of Bishops, and by some Prohibitions which he had mov'd. Besides that the Book Histrionastrix was publish'd six Weeks before the Queen's Pastoral was acted; it contain'd a thousand Pages, and must be written many Months if not Years, and therefore cou'd not be intended against the Queen, as the Lord Commissioner tells us the Bishops and their Instruments represented, and that it was purposely written against her Pastoral, which cou'd not be in Being when Mr. Prynne wrote his Book. There is so good Authority for what we say of the Proceedings of these Bishops and their Instruments, that I hope the Reader will spare a little Attention here: For this Accusation of theirs being notoriously false, the Prosecution against Mr. Prynne, and the unjust and barbarous Usage he met with from Laud and his Brethren, ought always to be remember'd when Clarendon and Echard are declaiming on their Piety; for nothing can be plainer than that this bloody Act was founded on the greatest Injustice which cou'd be practis'd in a Court; and that Laud's Activity was never more signal than in this impious Process. Mr. Hudson a Lawyer of Gray's-Inn, who open'd Ruslow, the Information against Mr. Prynne, told the Judges 220. very frankly he was prosecuted because he wrote against Plays, and the King, Queen, and Lords of the Council delighted in them; which the Lawyer aggravated by adding, that he also wrote against Maypoles. Noy that Grand Apostate, as the Lord Digby call'd him, charg'd Mr. Prynne with writing against St. George for England. Wou'd one think such Stuff as this shou'd pass in a Court where Persons of Rank at least were Judges, whatever their other Qualifications might be? Noy added, that Prynne had call'd Stage-Players Rogues, and had fallen upon Men's Hair, Women's Hair, Bishops, and Bonfires. They are his very Words, and the Case is at large in Ruslow, to which I refer. The Reader will find the most eminent Lawyers in England, as Mr. Atkins afterwards Judge Atkins, Mr. Holburn afterwards Sir Robert Holburn, Mr. Jenkins, Mr. Hern, pleading for Mr. Prynne their Brother Lawyer with equal Reason and Sobriety; and both Lawyers and Judges against him foaming at the Mouth with Virulence in Defence of a Parcel of despicable Wretches whom the Law terms Vagabonds. For as to harmless Interludes and Pastorals represented by young People of Quality, Prynne disown'd any Intention against Actors or Spectators; and Mr. Atkins explain'd the real Meaning of the Book in opening Mr. Prynne's Answer. "That the said Prynne taking into his serious Consideration the frequent Resort of sundry sorts of People to common Stage-Plays about the City of London, and having read divers Councils, Laws, and Statutes of this and other Realms against the frequenting common Stage-Plays, and the Judgment and Opinion of several Divines, and other antient Authors and divers Writers, allow'd by publick Authority, and his own Judgment, running with those, not intending to have relation to the King, Queen, State, or Government, or your Lordships, did about seven Yeats ago compile this Book entitl'd Histrionastrix." When those righteous Judges the Star-Chamber Lords came to pass their Censure, they all made Speeches, there being no more Shame to speak than to judge in such a Cause. The Lord Cottington spoke first as well as he cou'd, and*

and among other such Passages said, Prynne in writing it was assisted immediately by the Devil, or rather he assisted the Devil; so he condemn'd him to pay the King 5000 Pounds, to stand twice in the Pillory, to have both his Ears cut off, one in each Place, and to be perpetually imprison'd. He did not forget to have him degraded at Oxford; upon which the pious, meek, and charitable Archbishop of Canterbury Dr. Laud, who sat with remarkable Pleasure among Mr. Prynne's never to be forgotten Judges, cry'd out, I am sorry Oxford ever bred such an evil Member. Thus according to the Custom of the Star-Chamber, the Chief-Justice Richardson spoke before Sentence, and said he thought the Devil deserv'd to be punish'd for the Book as well as Prynne. What Mouths they had? His own Words are, I wou'd to God in Heaven the Devil, and all else that had their Heads and Hands in the Book were, &c. For I think they are all ill Willers to the State, and deserve severe Punishments as well as Mr. Prynne doth. The Nonsense shocks one as well as the Injustice; and when by his Sentence he had shut up Prynne in Goal for Life, without Pen, Ink, and Paper, he added, yet let him have some pretty Prayer-Book, that was all they knew of Religion, to pray to God to forgive him his Sins. Richardson and other such Judges, had no Notion of praying without Book. The Earl of Dorset said, The Devil had put Spectacles on Prynne's Nose. Did not Tully, Hortensius, and the Senators of old Rome talk thus? The Earl concluded with an Encomium on his Popish bigotted Queen; Were all such Saints as she, I think the Roman Church were not to be condemn'd. For this Saintship I refer the Reader to Sir Edward Peyton, whose Words I do not make use of. It is not that I do not believe them, but to keep my History as clean as possible. The End of the Earl's Speech was, I declare you to be a Schism-Maker, a Sedition Sower, a Wolf in Sheep's Clothing; and then for a Name in Latin, Omnium malorum nequissimum. I fine you 10000 Pounds; then his Lordship gives his Reason for it, which is more than you are worth; I will not set you at Liberty no more than a mad Dog; I condemn you to perpetual Imprisonment, as those Monsters that are no longer fit to live among Men. His Lordship's odoriferous Breath holds out still longer; Now for corporal Punishment, my Lords, whether I shou'd burn him in the Forehead and slit him in the Nose? The Reader will remember that all this courtly Language and human Sentiments, are address'd to a Gentleman of greater Endowments both of Learning and Parts than his Judges, especially his Lordship, who goes on sweetly, I shou'd be loath he shou'd escape with his Ears, for he may get a Peruke and so hide them, or force his Conscience to make use of his unlovely Love-locks on both Sides; therefore I wou'd have him branded on the Forehead, slit in the Nose, and his Ears cropt too. Nay, after the Execution of the execrable Sentence, which wou'd hardly bear reading, but that we shall see these unrighteous Judges severely accounting for it even in this World, in their Persons and Estates, Noy in a Speech to this hated Court said, He is mercifully dealt withal, he has been in Prison, he has been degraded, he has had his Ears cut off, and undergone all Shame. Such were the Judgments of the Star-Chamber, which, according to Echard, was the Bulwark for the Liberty of the Subject; and he regrets the Loss of it afterwards, when for this and other the like sanguinary, unjust, and unheard of Proceedings it was abolish'd. "The Star-Chamber, says Larrey, did not contribute less than the High-Commission Court to carry on Laud's Designs, who, as it is said of Wolfey, had a Desire to be stil'd the Transalpine Pope." Father Orleans owns he was suspected to have had such an Ambition; yet the Author of the History of the Rebellion is positive that he was nothing ally'd to Popery. How he was ally'd

to Injustice and Cruelty, we have seen in Mr. A.D. 1633: Prynne's infamous Prosecution; and how to Profaneness, we shall see by his procuring a new Book of Sports to profane the Lord's-Day.

A French Popish Author speaking of Charles I. M.M. 195: says, That like his Father he lov'd to retire from Error, witness his Endeavours to compromise the two Religions, ours and his own: He had the Archbishop of Canterbury Laud always with him, who being in his Heart a good Catholick, inspir'd the King his Master with a strong Desire to re-establish the Liturgy in Scotland, believing that if he cou'd but once gain that Point, there wou'd then be so little Difference between the orthodox Religion Popery and theirs, that it wou'd be easy to lead the King into it by Degrees. The Archbishop advis'd him to begin with Scotland, as the farthest from the Heart of his Kingdom, telling him that a Commotion there wou'd not be so much to be fear'd. Of this more hereafter; but what we have taken out of the French Papist's Book, proves the Falsity of the Assertion in Clarendon's History, that Laud was nothing ally'd to Popery. It proves that he was a very good Papist in his Heart, and that he excited the King to impose the Common-Prayer Book on the Scots, which was the beginning of the Civil Wars. Thus the Light at Noon-day is not more apparent, than that this domineering Prelate was the Cause of those ruinous and sanguinary Wars that ensu'd between this Prince and his People.

A Proclamation for Sports and Pastimes on the Sabbath-day, had been publish'd in King James's Book of Sports. Reign, and there was no better Reason for publishing it again now, than that it was generally detested by the People, who every where trembled to see Sabbath-breaking enjoind by an Edict. Larrey writes of it thus, Neither King James's Authority, nor the Charms which Pleasure always carries along with it, cou'd prevail with the People, who look'd upon the Day of Rest to be profan'd. Thus his Edict had more Persons against it than for it, and consequently was but indifferently put in Execution; but nevertheless his Successor had a mind to revive it; and he was worse obey'd than King James. He added a new Decree to his Proclamation, which was more odious than the former. And it is observable that Laud refin'd upon all the extraordinary illegal Acts of Government in the former Administration. Dr. Fuller informs us, the Archbishop was charg'd with not only reviving but enlarging the Book of Sports. He adds, in the Language of a true Protestant Doctor of the Church of England, "Many moderate Men are of Opinion, that this Abuse of the Lord's-Day was a principal Procurer of God's Anger since poured out on this Land in a long and bloody Civil War." One of the best Reasons given by King James for commanding his Subjects to commit this Sin was, that for want of Wrestling, Cudgeling, and the like, on Sabbath-Days, they were render'd unfit for his Wars. 'Tis Heylin who says it, tho' his Brother Echard does not think there was any thing military in it, but that Drinking, Gaming, and Dancing on the Sabbath-Day, was commanded with a pious Intention.

The Custom of Revels, Wakes, and other Parish Festivals, was at that Time grown to a great Enormity. Drunkenness, Lewdness, and Riot, were but the least Part of it; Fighting and Blood generally accompany'd it; no County in England was then, and is now more debauch'd and disturb'd by Revels and Clerks-Ales than that of Somerset; and it was so scandalous even in Queen Elizabeth's Reign, that there was this Order made against it at the Sessions held at Bridgwater the 10th of September 1593.

That no Church-Ale, Clerks-Ale, Bid-Ale, or Tipling be suffer'd; and that such only be suffer'd to ripple, as be or shall be lawfully licens'd according to the Order now made by us: John Popham, Alexander

A.D. 1633. and Popham, John Court, Henry Walrond, Edward Hext, George Sydenham, Thomas Horner, John Colles, John May, John Rodney.

At that time twelve-month there was a second Order made, That no Church-Ales be admitted in any Part of this Shire. It was sign'd by the Justices at Bridgwater the 28th of September 1595. John Popham who was also Lord-Chief-Justice of England, Sir George Sydenham, George Speke Esq; Alexander Colles Esq; Alexander Popham Esq; Sir Edward Hext, Sir Henry Berkley, Henry Walrond Esq; John Fraunces Esq; John Lancaster Esq; Thomas Phillips Esq;

In March 1627, Sir John Denham one of the Barons of the Exchequer, being then in Somersetshire on the Western Circuit, had a Petition deliver'd him against Revels and Church-Ales by the following Ministers, Mr. Adam Abraham, Mr. William Gyllet, Mr. Ralph Turner, Mr. John Ford, Mr. John Fathers, Mr. George Drake; and the Baron issu'd an Order accordingly. These Orders were this Year reviv'd by Judge Richardson who went the Western Circuit for Lent-Assize, at the Request of the Justices, without the Consent of Dr. Pierce Bishop of Bath and Wells, who immediately gave his Patron Laud notice of it, and he immediately complain'd to the King. He also wrote to Pierce to know whether those riotous Meetings might not be kept with Decency and Sobriety. Bishop Pierce's Answer was, that if the Order of the Judges against Revels was revok'd, it wou'd be acceptable to the Gentry; which is so directly contrary to the Truth, that one cou'd not believe a Clergyman was guilty of it, if the Truth was not before us. It was at the earnest Request of the Gentlemen of Somersetshire, that the Judges Richardson and Denham, issu'd their Orders to Lawrence Musgrave and all the Constables in that large County, to hinder such unlawful Riots and Revels, those Gentlemen giving for Reason at the Assizes, "That many Persons had been indicted for murdering Bastards begotten at Revels, and for other grand Disorders occasion'd by those intemperate Meetings;" of which Dr. Pierce says not a Syllable in his Letter to his Patron the Archbishop; and what he said of the Gentry, is so far from being true, that when Judge Richardson came their Circuit again the next Year, they desir'd him to repeat that Order, and he punish'd some Persons for the Breach of it; which, and his requiring the Order to be read in Churches, irritated Archbishop Laud beyond Measure; and he complain'd of him again to the King, who now was oblig'd to concern himself in this unworthy Business, and Richardson was summon'd to appear before the Council, where his Majesty commanded him to reverse the Order at the next Assizes, as he wou'd answer the contrary at his Peril; which he did, but in the following Terms of his Charge; I at your Request, together with my Brother Denham, have made a very good Order for suppressing unruly Wakes and Revels, wherein I thought I had done God, the King, and the Country good Service; but some ill-affected Persons, Bishop Laud and Bishop Pierce, have misinform'd his Majesty concerning this Order, who has given me an expresse Command to reverse it, which I conceive is hardly in my Power to do, because it was no Order made by myself, but by the joint Consent of the whole Bench, and a mere Confirmation and Enlargement of divers Orders made by the Judges and Justices in this Circuit, in Queen Elizabeth's, King James's, and King Charles's Reigns, before ever I came into these Parts. He then produc'd the Precedents as we have inserted them, and added, But being commanded to reverse the Order, I do as much as in me lies revoke it; yet I doubt not if the Justices of the Peace will truly inform his Majesty of the Grounds of the former Order, and of the great Disorders occasion'd by Wakes and Church-Ales, his Majesty will give Order to revive it: Upon which all the Justices there present, and it was a numerous Bench, drew up such a Petition, that they might have Favour and Allowance to suppress all unlawful Assemblies of Church-Ales, Clerk-Ales, Bid-Ales, and to punish all Disorders then usually committed; and giving their Reason, For that since the Rumour of the revoking former Orders, The Profanation of the Lord's-Day, riotous Tippling, Contempt of Authority, Quarrels, Murders, have increased, &c. This Petition was sign'd by John Lord Pawlet, Sir William Portman, Sir John Stawel, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Francis Popham, Sir Edward Rodney, Sir Francis Dodington, Sir John Horner, John Harrington Esq; George Speke Esq; William Capell Esq; Edward Pawlet Esq; John Windham Esq; William Bassett Esq; Robert Hopton Esq; Thomas Lutterel Esq; William Fraunces Esq; Robert Cuffe Esq; Richard Cole Esq; William Walrond Esq; Gerrard Wood Esq; Anthony Stocker Esq; William Every Esq; George Pawlest Esq; John Symes Esq; Men, says Fuller, who in Birth, Brains, Spirit, and Estate, were inferior to no County in England. John Harrington Esq; Custos Rotulorum of the County, was directed to carry this Petition to their Lord-Lieutenant the Earl of Pembroke, and desire him to deliver it to the King. Bishop Pierce gives the Archbishop quick Information of what was coming, and the Earl of Pembroke happening to be out of Town, Laud hastens the Publication of the second Book of Sports, for which he wrote this Warrant with his own Hand, to be sign'd by his Majesty, to justify himself if he shou'd be question'd.

CHARLES R.

Canterbury, "See that our Declaration concerning Recreations on the Lord's-Day after Evening-Prayer be printed."

After the publishing of this Declaration, the Lord Chief-Justice Richardson returning from his last Western Circuit, was again summon'd before the King and Council for not revoking his Order about Revels as far as in him lay; where he was so reprimanded by the Archbishop, that when he came from the Board, the Earl of Dorset meeting him with Tears in his Eyes, ask'd how he did? Judge Richardson reply'd, Very ill, my Lord, for I am like to be choak'd with the Archbishop's Lawn Sleeves. And for this Cause alone he was by Laud's Means, to his great Grief and Loss, put from riding the Western, and forc'd to go the Essex Circuit, reputed the meanest of all others, and which no Justice but the puny Judge or Serjeant us'd to ride. I hope none will after this deny that the whole Sabbath-Guilt of the Sin of profaning the Sabbath by an breaking Ediſt, lies at Laud's Door. What a Tool Pierce was to him, appears sufficiently in the above-mentioned Letter written in answer to Laud, wherein he further tells him, that by Information of seventy-two Priests of his Diocese, he found that the Churches had been better frequented since the People were commanded to play upon Sundays: That they had not heard of any Disorders at Revels; that they are of Opinion to keep Revels for a Memorial of the Dedications of their several Churches, for the civilizing of the People, for composing of Differences, and for many other Reasons; which I myself who write this History in this very County, and have known the wicked Customs of these Revels above forty Years, do know to be every Word false in Fact at least: Yet Bishop Pierce says he examin'd his seventy-two Priests apart, and they agreeing all in their Representation of the Purity and Convenience of Revels, he cannot help liking his seventy-two to the Septuagint, or seventy-two Interpreters who agreed so soon in the Translation of the Old Testament, such Heads had they, and such Hearts in these felicitous Times. But we that believe no more of his seventy-two Interpreters, than we do of his seventy-two Parsons, cannot be out of Humour at meeting

122 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1633. meeting with a Composition of so much Simplicity and Insincerity.

One of the worst Effects of the Edict for Sabbath-breaking, was the suspending a great Number of religious and worthy Divines by the Prosecutions of Laud and his Brethren in the Spiritual Courts, for not reading that profane Edict in sacred Places. Wren Bishop of Norwich, and Pierce just mention'd, were the most active in promoting this Sabbath-breaking. William Lilly, who was the Top-Astrologer of his Time, contemporary with these Things, writes thus of them, of this Wren in particular: "There was also one Wren Bishop of Norwich, born in London, a Fellow, whose Father sold Babies and such Pedlary Ware in Cheapside. The Conjuror goes on in the same blunt Manner. This Fellow very peremptorily one Day, as he sat in Judicature in the High-Commission Court, said openly, He hop'd to live to see the Time when a Master of Arts, or a Minister, shall be as good a Man as any Jack Gentlemen in England. And verily the Pride of this saucy Citizen's Son, hath been one main Cause of the Ruin of the Clergy. Concerning this Wren, I know Canterbury said of him, The rash and unwarrantable Proceedings of Wren will undo the Clergy. Upon his plaguing and punishing many godly Clothiers in the Counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, they were enforc'd to leave their Native Country, and betake themselves and Families into the United-Provinces, where they have taught the Dutch the Art and Manufacture of Cloathing, even to the utter Impoverishment of this whole Nation; yet this wretched Wren lives, &c." The great Body of the Protestant Clergy of the Church of England, Bishops and their Inferiors, abhor'd the Impiety of Sabbath-breaking; many of them bore their Testimony against it. A Western Bishop, probably pious Bishop Hall of Exeter, being press'd to return the Names of such Clergymen as refus'd to read the Declaration; deny'd it utterly, saying, I will never turn Accuser of my Brethren, there be enough in the World to do that Office. Besides the Impiety of this Declaration, there was something so monstrous in it, that 'tis taken notice of by Foreigners: There is something very whimsical and extraordinary to be observed in this Affair, to see the Court and the Church of England govern'd by her Prelates, to be for Dances and Festivals, and the People for whom those Feasts were instituted to be against them, as contrary to the Purity of the Reformation.

It was not in Somersetshire only that Laud busy'd himself in promoting the Profanation of the Lord's-Day, he quarrell'd with Sir Nicholas Rainton Lord-Mayor of London, for prohibiting an Apple-Woman to sell Apples on the Sabbath near St. Paul's-Church, and with the Lord-Mayor Dean for shutting up Taverns, Alehouses, Brandy-Shops, &c.

A Masque. The Gentlemen of the Inns of Court paid at this Time a very costly and splendid Compliment to the King and Queen, in the most famous Masque that ever was seen; which is the more worthy Remembrance, for that Mr. Selden and Mr. Whitlocke were two of the Managers of it. The Shew, the Musick, the Dancing, were all incomparable; the Queen danc'd in Person, and it is hinted by some Historians, that these Societies of Lawyers put themselves to 21000 Pounds Charge, purely to take off the Prejudice which the Writings of their Brother Prynne might have given the Court against their Profession.

Sir David Fowles of Yorkshire having offended the Lord Wentworth by obstructing his raising Money in that County on the Pretence of Knight-hood, was prosecuted in the Star-Chamber, fin'd 5000 Pounds to the King, and 3000 Pounds to the Lord Wentworth. Sir Thomas Layton High-Sheriff of Yorkshire gave Evidence that Wentworth said at their Assizes, The King's Little-Finger shall be heavier than the Loins of the Law; but it was not regarded. On the contrary, the Court of Star-Chamber flatter'd him in their Decree against Sir David Fowles as a modern Dedicator does his Patron in the Epistle.

During the Imprisonment of Mr. Prynne, Dr. Bastwick was brought into the High-Commission Court for a Book entitl'd Elenchus Papismi & Flagellum Episcoporum Latialium, in Answer to one Short a Papist, who maintain'd the Pope's Supremacy, the Mass, and Popery. Dr. Bastwick in his Epistle dedicatory, declar'd he intended nothing against our Bishops but against those of Rome, yet he was sentenc'd in 1000 Pounds Fine, to be excommunicated, to be debarr'd his Practice, and imprison'd: These Men will never be satisfy'd with Excommunication, without some Lay Severities, as Money, Goal, Pillory, &c. Whitlocke informs us the Doctor was so barbarously us'd for maintaining the King's Prerogative against Papacy; On the other Part, continues he, one who was a fierce Papist, named Chowney, wrote a Book of the Popish Religion and the Church of Rome, averring it to be the true Church. The Book was dedicated to, and patroniz'd by the Archbishop of Canterbury, so far was Chowney from being punish'd and question'd. In the Censure of Dr. Bastwick, all the Bishops deny'd openly that they held their Jurisdiction as Bishops from the King, for which perhaps they might have been censur'd themselves in Henry the 11th or Edward the 11th's Time. They affirm'd they had their Jurisdiction from God only; which Denial of the Supremacy of the King under God, Henry VIII. wou'd have taken ill, and it may be have confuted them by his kingly Arguments and Regia Maest. The Archbishop countenanc'd this Book of Chowney, That the Romish Church err'd not in Fundamentals." Whitlocke adds, Somewhat was noted to pass from him and other Bishops in defaming the Holy Scriptures. The Reader may well be tir'd with such History as this is, where the Facts are so poor, and at the same time so disagreeable. Nothing of greater Importance can be expected from a Government under the Influence of so furious and so imperious a Prelate as Laud, who has nothing in his Head or Heart but his own Grandeur and the Dominion of the Church. He eagerly apply'd himself, says Larrey, to render his Party and himself at their Head triumphant. He had taken Care to be invested with the King's Authority, and wou'd scarce suffer his Majesty to interfere with him in his Visitations. As presumptuous as Wolfsey, and using the same Authority in England as Richlieu did in France; nevertheless there was a vast Difference between them, Richlieu and Laud. The Cardinal, as much a Cardinal as he was, endeavour'd all he cou'd to lessen the unlawful Power of the Pope. On the contrary Laud procur'd at least indirectly, the restoring it in the Church of England. The Cardinal made his Master triumphant both at Land and Sea, but Laud made his to lose his Empire over the one, and the Glory which his Predecessors had gain'd on the other." As directly opposite to this as Falshood is to Truth, is the Lord Clarendon's telling us, The Reputation of the Greatness and Power of the King, was much more with foreign Princes than any one of his Progenitors. After which I think there is no need of bringing Proofs of the Falsties and Misrepresentations in that History or the Archdeacon's, which is a vile Copy of it, and that too of the worst Parts of it.

Archbishop Laud began the next Year with increasing the Odium against him, as well on account of his Pride and Haughtiness, as of the Innovations he introduc'd in the Churches and Schools. In his Visitation of the Churches he

A.D. 1634. signaliz'd his Zeal by erecting and adorning Altars for the Communion, in ordering the Sacrament to be receiv'd kneeling, the sacerdotal Habits to be always worn in Divine Service, and the Episcopal Liturgy to be in use every where, "That, says Larrey, all Puritans, as he injuriously stil'd the Presbyterians, and all Nonconformists, shou'd be disposse'd of their Livings, from whom with the Honour of their Ministry, he likewise took away their Means of subsisting; there was no Way left for them but to submit, being reduc'd to the Extremity either of starving or renouncing Presbytery. The greatest Part refus'd to obey, alledging the Ceremonies were superstitious and idolatrous."

Dutch and French Churches, However, this did not satisfy Archbishop Laud, but contrary to Justice, Reason, Compact, and the Rights of the Commercial World, he resolv'd the Dutch and French Churches shou'd feel the Severity of his Discipline as well as the Puritan. In his Metropolitan Visitation he summon'd the Ministers of the French and Dutch Churches which were settled here in the Reign of Edward VI. and Queen Elizabeth, to appear before his Vicar-General, by whom all Dutch and French Protestants, who were born in England, were enjoin'd to conform to Laud's Church-Service and Ceremonies. The Fathers of these French and Dutch Protestants, had been driven from the Netherlands and France by terrible Persecutions, and the Liberties King Edward and Q. Elizabeth granted them, had been confirm'd by K. James and by this King's Royal Word. Wren Bishop of Norwich before-mention'd, one of Laud's Instruments, rejected the Petition of the Dutch and French Congregations at Norwich, where they settled at first, and set up the Woolen Manufactures, which have been and is of inconceivable Advantage to the Nation. Laud values not that a Rush, if his Ecclesiastical Dominion is in the least lessen'd. He threaten'd, in case they did not submit, he wou'd proceed against them according to the Laws and Canons of his Church. There were Congregations of these Protestants at Ipswich also, then one of the most trading and flourishing Towns in England; but Laud's Threats so terrify'd those industrious People, that thousands of Families were frighted out of Norfolk and Suffolk. A hundred and forty of the principal Manufacturers who supply'd Hamburg and all the Countries within the Sound, fled to the United Provinces from the Cruelties of the Spiritual Courts, and set up the same Manufactures there, which the Dutch knew not before, and have ever since carry'd on that Trade to our unspeakable Loss. Echard tells us that this Persecution of the French and Dutch Churches, was one of Laud's great Designs: And now it was, says the Author of the History of the Rebellion, that Trade increas'd to such a Degree, that we were the Exchange of the World. And "Now it was, according to Larrey, that the Kingdom lay expos'd to the Insults of Pyrates, the Corsairs of Algiers and Tunis came with Impunity into the Channel which lay unguarded, plundered the English Ships, and pursu'd them to their Ports. King Charles compleated the making himself despis'd by the little Care he took of his Fleets, being wholly bent on arbitrary Power and Episcopacy, which was, said he, its Right-Hand." The States of the United-Provinces having recover'd the Cautionary Towns, and observing what a wild careless sort of Government there was in England, had too little Regard for the Rights of that Crown to the Sovereignty of the Sea, and probably took Advantage of that Carelessness to extend their Fishery farther on our Coasts than they had presum'd to do in former Reigns. They were not Strangers to the whole Business of the Court, which was to support Laud in his Ecclesiastical Tyranny, little mindful of the Commerce or Honour of a Nation whom they had so many Ways disgusted. The English were alarm'd when they found that the Dutch asserted a Right to their Fishery, a Book being written by the famous Hugo Grotius to that Purpose, entituled Mare Liberum, which was fully answer'd by the as famous Selden, in his Mare Clausum, tho' he had been so ill treated by this King and his Ministers for asserting the Privileges of Parliament. His Majesty was willing enough to fit out a Fleet if he had had Money, but very loth to call a Parliament to give it, there being such a Mass of Grievances heap'd together since the last Session, to be remov'd before Subsidies cou'd be expected; wherefore, says Echard, with equal Sagacity and Truth, "A Project was form'd out of many antient Records by the deep-sighted Attorney Mr. Noy, to impose upon every Sea-Port and Place of Merchandize, the Obligation of finding such a Number of Ships and Men in Proportion to their Wealth;" which the Historian follows with a Reflection as idle as 'tis sophistical; The legal Rights of this Aid was never yet disputed in any Court of Judicature. It had never yet been collected in so illegal a Manner, and therefore cou'd not have been disputed; but it came afterwards into such a Dispute, that the Judges had like to have follow'd their Brother Trefilian to the Gallows for it. In order to force this Tax upon the Kingdom, Sir Robert Heath was remov'd from the Chief-Justiceship of the Common-Pleas, and Sir John Finch put in his Place. Great were the Discourses, says Rushworth, what the Occasion should be of that sudden Advancement; but four Days after the Writ of Ship-Money coming forth, it was conceiv'd he was to be instrumental in that Business. "Nor shall he stay here, they are Coke's Words, but be the prime Agent in breaking thro' the Bounds of Charta de Foresta, by enlarging the Limits of the Forest, so as no Man, if the Parliament in 1641 had not prevented it, cou'd tell where it wou'd have stopp'd." The first Writ for levying it, was directed to Sir Robert Parkhurst Lord-Mayor of London, and the first Name in signing of it, is William Canterbury. It was read in Common-Council, upon which a Petition was drawn up against it by the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, Sheriffs, and Common-Council, wherein they set forth, That they conceive themselves exempted from such a Charge by antient Privileges, Grants, and Acts of Parliament. Echard told us Noy had found out Records quite contrary to those Acts of Parliament, and that the charging the City with this Tax was never disputed. Larrey writes with Reason and Sobriety, "It wou'd seem as if all that Noy had spoken against Tonnage and Poundage Anno 1628, might be naturally apply'd against this Tax Ship-Money. Absolute Power appear'd equally in both, and since there was not the Concurrence of Parliament, this was violating the Peoples Rights." Noy dy'd before the Writs he had contriv'd were put in Execution. The Infamy he acquir'd by his Apostacy from his first good Principles, does not hinder Archbishop Laud's Lamentation for his Death; I have lost a dear Friend, and the Church the greatest she had of his Condition. The Archdeacon owns he was accounted a Papist if not an Atheist. There was something very remarkable in his Will; The rest of all my Lands, Goods, &c. I leave to my Son Edward Noy, whom I make my Executor, to be consumed and scatter'd about. A. Wood speaks more than he will be thank'd for; As his Majesty was King and somewhat troubled at the Loss of Noy, and the Clergy separated from the People, so the Generality of the Commons rejoic'd, by which we have a clear Idea of the State of the Nation at that Time. When the King and the Clergy were in Grief, the People were generally in Joy; and what treacherous Counsellors must they be, who separated their Interests which are inseparable? This Summer the King and Queen went a Progress Northward, and were

A.D. 1634. entertain'd by the Earl of Newcastle so magnificently, that it cost him 10000 Pounds.

Sir Edw. Coke's Death. In September the great Lawyer Sir Edward Coke departed this Life, on which Occasion his Grandson writes as follows: "While he lay on his Death-bed, Laud's old Friend Sir Francis Windebank

Coke 509. "came by Order of Council to search for seditious and dangerous Papers, by Vertue of which Order he took Sir Edward Coke's Comment upon Littleton, and the History of his Life before it, written with his own Hand; his Comment upon Magna Charta, and his 11 and 12 Reports in Manuscript; 51 other Manuscripts, with Sir Edward's Last Will, wherein he had for several Years been making Provision for his younger Children. The Books and Papers were kept till seven Years after, when one of Sir Edward's Sons in 1641 mov'd the House of Commons, that they might be deliver'd to Sir Robert Coke, Heir to Sir Edward; which the King was pleas'd to grant, and such as cou'd be found were deliver'd; but Sir Edward's Will was never heard more of to this Day". Invasions of Property were so common in this Administration, that so small an Irregularity will not be wonder'd at.

Convocation in Ireland by Laud and Wentworth's Directions. One sees what a League there was between Laud and Wentworth to destroy the Protestant Interest by the latter's Conduct in Ireland, where he procur'd an Act of Convocation to repeal the excellent Articles of that Church establish'd in 1615, more conformable to the Reform'd Religion in all other Parts of Christendom, than the 39 Articles which were made the new Establishment. The Doctrine of Predestination according to Calvin's Explanation was settled by the Articles of the Year 1615, as were also other Calvinian Tenets. By those Articles the Observation of the Lord's Day was resolv'd Jure Divino, and Arminianism was condemn'd. But all was repeal'd by Wentworth's Convocation under his vigorous Management. The most reverend Father Archbishop Ussher gave his negative Vote to this Alteration; and Sanderson is so simple as to own, that the Reason for making it might be in relation to the Papists.

P. 200. Whitlock tells us great Care was taken to favour the Clergy in levying Ship-Money. All the rest of the People, except Courtiers and Officers, generally murmur'd at it. The Lord Keeper Coventry approv'd and assisted the Project as far as his Learning in these Matters did extend, and that was not far. Whereas in Clarendon, he understood the whole Science and Mystery of the Law; he was most sharp-sighted in the Consequence of things, as that of Ship-Money in particular. This again gives us a just Conception of the Characters in that History, which wou'd have been more true had they been made at a venture; but the Partiality and Falshood are invented and labour'd.

Laud's Superstition. Laud's Ecclesiastical Injunctions about the Altar and Ceremonies were every where vigorously executed. Complaint was made to the Mayor and Recorder of Abingdon against some wicked People, who refus'd to bow at the Altar, or stand at the Creed, for which they ought to be severely punish'd. The Recorder answer'd, These Offences

Recorder of Abingdon gives great Offence. more properly belong to the Ecclesiastical Judges than to Justices of the Peace; and advis'd the Complainants to inform the Chancellor of the Diocese. The Matter being of so great Importance, the Informers apply'd to the Council Table against the Recorder for putting off the Punishment of such Delinquents; where he was gravely charg'd with refusing to punish those who refus'd to bow down to the Altar, and stand up at the Creed. The Recorder alledg'd in his own Vindication, That he knew no common Law nor Statute for their Punishment, especially by Justices of the Peace; that the Complainants did not prefer any Indictment against those wicked People; and that the Matters whereof they were accus'd were merely spiritual, proper for

A.D. 1634. spiritual Judges, as they were call'd; and he might have been censur'd for encroaching on their Jurisdiction, if he shou'd have taken cognizance of them. Upon which the Council, notwithstanding Archbishop Laud was one of them, were satisfy'd, and the Recorder was dismiss'd.

Ship-Money, which in the last Year was confin'd to Maritime Towns only, was now extended to all Counties in the Kingdom, as being Partakers of the general Benefit, according to the sagacious Echard, who argues with uncommon Sagacity thus: "Indeed the mighty Increase of the French Navy, and the Invasions of the Algerines, were a great Proof of the Necessity of setting out a Fleet, which under the present Exigencies cou'd not be done without extraordinary Aid". Which is as foolish as 'tis false. Was the King of England afraid of his dear Brother of France? Had the Turks invaded the Kingdom, or if their Rovers were in the Channel, was it necessary to raise 300000*l.* to drive them out of it, when Tonnage and Poundage were more than sufficient for that Service? Or suppose it was necessary, Did not the King and his Counsellors know that it must be done with Consent of Parliament? and cou'd not the Parliament have met, and have rais'd the Money before a Fleet cou'd be equipp'd? The Sophistry and Weakness of such Arguments render them unworthy Remark; but the best of them have no better. The Lord Keeper Coventry was order'd to direct the Judges to promote this illegal Imposition in their Circuits, and to persuade the People to a ready obeying the Writs for Payment of the Tax, which he did with the Ability the Lord Clarendon speaks of; and Whitlocke tells us the Judges put on the Work in their Charges at the Assizes with great Zeal and Gravity, but did not convince many of the Legality of it; and tho' this illegal Pill was gilt, it wou'd not go down; but many People, especially of the knowing Gentry, express'd great Discontent at this Burthen, as an Imposition against Law and the Rights of the Subjects. While the Judges were thus labouring to deprive them of their Property, and every Man's Door was beset with Tax-gatherers against Law, see what Warwick says, Every Man sat quiet under his own Vine. The Fountains of Justice were clear, for the Judges were upright Men. This Writer is below Reflection. His Matter, his Manner, his Style and Integrity are all of a piece, and so mean that 'tis ridiculous to be serious with him. Yet Echard copies him with great Pleasure, tho' it is no better than robbing the Spittle: I can easily make good what I say, but the Digression wou'd be too long.

The reverend Historian copying still from Warwick, excuses this lawless Imposition, because the Weight was not heavy, but 236000*l.* More Sagacity! The smallest Sum is as illegal as the greatest, when taken without Consent of Parliament. Whatever a Man pays by Violence, he is robb'd of so much; and if the Sum forc'd from him against Law and Right be small, 'tis a heavy Burthen still, being a Precedent for other illegal Taxes. Besides, as the Tax was continu'd four Years, and a Million of Money rais'd by it, it made the Burthen very heavy to those who bore it so long. Is it worth while to mention another Excuse of Warwick's for it? That the King kept all the Ship-Money in a Bag by itself, that it might be carefully and solely apply'd to those necessary Uses, as the assisting the Spaniards against the Dutch, and driving the Mediterranean Pyrates out of the British Channel, &c.

This Imposition not being sufficient to answer the Exigences, an Office was erected for Licensing Subjects to travel; another Office for Letters; another for compounding defective Titles; another for Forfeitures for such as spoil the Highways, and for Swearers and Cursers. Of the latter Sir Edward

A.D. 1635. ward Peyton speaks bluntly: King Charles granted Twelve-pence an Oath to Robin Lashley, which was observ'd more to get Money than suppress Swearing, in much Esteem from the Example of King James. All these things were enacted without a Statute. Proclamations serv'd instead of Laws, and some of them were of the following Importance: A Proclamation for the Time to cure the King's Evil; another about Butter Casks; a third about Farthings; a fourth about Soap; another about the King's Evil again: All in the Compass of a few Months. How happy and glorious was the English Nation!

A Fleet. By the Help of Ship-Money a Fleet of 40 Ships was set out. The Earl of Lindsey was Admiral, and the Earl of Essex Vice-Admiral. The latter was order'd to scour the Channel with 20 Ships: But the Pirates were gone long enough before his coming. Now according to the Archdeacon, the English Name was glorious and terrible. Inform much that the Dutch durst not attempt Dunkirk, then in the Hands of the Spaniards, for fear of the Earl of Lindsey. The French King and the States of the United Provinces were in League against the King of Spain. The French were to attack Dunkirk by Land, and the Dutch by Sea; but the latter drew off in Dread of the English Navy. Thus all the Service that was done by Ship-Money was the clearing the Channel of a few Turkish Rovers, and the frightening our Protestant Allies the Hollanders from a Conquest, which wou'd have been a good Barrier against Spain. Echard affirms the Dangers were really imminent, and might well justify the taking of Money against Law. The judicious Warwick: Ship-Money was rais'd with all due Caution, the Necessity was apparent, and the Sovereign Power hath an Authority independent of any other Consent. They are not worth answering. But let the Lord Clarendon do it: The Damage and Mischief cannot be express'd, which the Crown and State sustain'd by the deserv'd Reproach and Infamy that attended the Judges. Warwick vouches for them, that they were as learned and upright as ever fill'd their Benches, there being but one illiterate Man amongst them, Thomas Trevor; but then he too was an honest Gentleman. You see what History they give us.

Prince Elector and Prince Rupert in England. This Year arriv'd the Prince Elector in England, to solicit King Charles his Uncle to assist him towards recovering his Electoral Dignity and Patrimony. A very hopeless Journey! Laud was at the Head of the State as well as the Church; the Palatines were Presbyterians, and was it likely he wou'd do any Thing for their Deliverance? Prince Rupert the Electors Brother arriv'd also at the Court of England. They were both receiv'd with great Ceremony, Courtesy, and Magnificence, which were all they obtain'd by this Visit.

About the same Time the Queen was brought to-bed of a second Daughter the Princess Elizabeth. The States General of the United Provinces sent a solemn Embassy to congratulate her Majesty's safe Delivery. The Ambassadors brought a noble Present: "A large Piece of Ambergrease, "two fair China Basons almost transparent, a curious Clock, four fine Pieces of Painting by "those two famous Painters Tintoret and Titian". Echard assures us the Clock was made by Rodolphus the Emperor; but Whitlocke had not heard of the Imperial Clockmaker. The reverend Historian mentions a Proclamation to restrain the Increase of Hackney-Coaches; and another to hinder the Resort of Gentlemen and Ladies to London. If it was not for the War that was all this while carrying on against the Puritans by Laud's General Sir John Lamb, and an Army of Advocates, Proctors, Informers, Parators, Serjeants, Bailiffs, &c. what Business wou'd have been done in this Kingdom, the Events are below Remembrance; for surely the following Proclamations hardly deserve Proclamations.

A Place in History. As that for the Use of a Net call'd a Trawl, that for sealing of Purl, that for sealing of Bonelace, another about Farthing Tokens, and another about the King's Evil, with many others equally important, as may be seen in Rushworth.

Mr. Samuel Ward, Minister in Ipswich, having said something against bowing at the Name of Jesus, and preach'd against Sabbath-breaking, was prosecuted in the High-Commission Court, confin'd, suspended, and enjoin'd a publick Recantation; which he refusing was thrown into Jail, where he lay a long time. Pierce Bishop of Bath and Wells did not come behind Wren Bishop of Norwich to ingratiate himself with Laud. Pierce excommunicated the Church-Wardens of Beckington in Somersetshire for not erecting an Altar in that Church. They appeal'd to the Archbishop, and he reject'd their Appeal. They petition'd the King, and he reject'd their Petition. So the Excommunication standing against them a whole Year, they were committed to the same Prison with Thieves and Felons, where they lay till they submitted to do Penance in three Parish Churches.

There was this Year an Information against several Persons of Quality for residing in Town contrary to the Proclamation, as the Earl of Clare, Lord Viscount Newark, Lord Viscount Monson, Lord Mobun, Lord Fitz-Williams, Lord Tunbridge, Lord Stafford, Sir Edward Peyton, Author of the Divine Catastrophe, which we have sometimes made use of; Sir Robert Harley, Sir Thomas Thynne, Sir Edmund Lenthall, Sir George Windham, Sir Francis Godolphin, Sir Thomas Pope, Sir Theobald Gorge, and about 30 Knights more; John Brownlow, Esq; Thomas Pitts, Esq; Richard Moyle, Esq; Edmund Pye, Esq; and about 100 Esquires more; the Countesses of Oxford, Lady Tyrwhit, Lady Bertie, Lady Lucy, Lady Kingsmill, Lady Egerton, Lady Offley, Lady Montague, Lady Winter, and about 20 Ladies more, who were all forc'd to make their Peace as well as they cou'd by Fines and Compositions. One Sir James Bagg was also prosecuted in the Star-Chamber for saying of Weston Lord Bagg, Treasurer, I have laid many a thousand Pounds under his Pillow. The Words were liable to a better Construction than the Court put upon them. The Queen was present at the Trial. Finch spoke of the Sentence first, and fin'd Sir James 5000 l. to the King. Then Archbishop Laud made a long Speech, calling the Knight a base Fellow, and ending it thus: I fine him 5000 l. and Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure. Here's a holy Primitive Bishop, who at the same time also was one of the Lords of the Treasury, declaiming against a Gentleman in a temporal Court, and giving Authority to Injustice by his Presence and Preaching. The Lord Cottingham was of Opinion the Knight ought to be acquitted; so was the Earl of Dorset; but Laud seldom sat in Court with Intention to have any one acquitted. The Votes of the Judges being equal, the Lord Keeper's casting Vote gave it against Bagg; but by the King's Command the Sentence was not register'd.

The Reverend Mr. Charles Chancey, Minister of Ware in Hertfordshire, a pious and learned Divine of an antient Family in that County, was prosecuted in the High-Commission Court for preaching against the Disorders us'd by many on Christmas Holidays, the Increase of Popery and Arminianism; that Idolatry was admitted into the Church; and that not only the Prophets of Baal, but Baal himself is receiv'd, and the Preaching of the Gospel will be suppress'd. The next Passage in his Sermon must doubtless touch Laud to the Quick, and bring that worthy Divine into the Troubles which ended in Banishment. There want Men of Courage to tell Superiors in the Church of their Neglect; for that there is Increase of much Atheism, Popery, Arminianism and Heresy in our Church; Heresy

A.D. 1636. not only broach'd but maintain'd. Laud was the main Instigation of this Prosecution, and threaten'd Mr. Chancey's Advocate. The Court refer'd the Case to himself then Bishop of London, who suspended Mr. Chancey till he shou'd give it under his Hand, that he was persuaded in his Conscience Rush. 316. that kneeling at the Sacrament was commendable; that the Rail round the Communion Table was a decent convenient Ornament, &c. Which tho' he did very unwillingly, Laud had him condemn'd in great Costs of Suit, and committed to Prison till it was paid. His Sufferings oblig'd him afterwards to remove to New England; and they were continu'd in his Family by the same persecuting Spirit. His Son Dr. Ichabod Chancey was Chaplain to Sir Edward Harley's Regiment, when Sir Edward was Governor of Dunkirk. He was outed of all Church Preferment by the Bartholomew Act, and driven with his Family into Holland. From whence in a Time of Toleration he return'd, and practis'd Physick at Bristol with good Success. This Digression shews that the Malignity is hereditary in a certain Profession, and that Persecution is the very Essence of it.

Archbishop Laud was now in the Height of his Glory, says Echard, being a Commissioner of the Treasury. It is monstrous to write of the Episcopal Function after these People. "He met with much Opposition from the Lord Cottington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, who often impos'd upon him, taking Advantage of the Vehemency of his Temper; which indeed was downright Rage, and disgusted even his own Friends. He found the Treasurer's Place was honestly worth 7000*l.* a Year, and observ'd that divers Treasurers of late rais'd themselves from private Fortunes to the Titles and Estates of Earls, which he believ'd cou'd not be done without Wrong; therefore he resolv'd to recommend a fit Person, a Doctor of Divinity, to this High Office, and this was Dr. Fuxon, whom he brought in with-

Dr. Juxon made Lord High-Treasurer. out Opposition". It was by his Recommendation also that he was made Bishop of London. He met with no Opposition, because, as the Archdeacon owns, it was done by Surprise. It is said in Clarendon, On a sudden the Staff was put into the Bishop's Hand. Dr. Fuxon was so far from being a fit Person, that he knew no more of the Revenue than any other Sportsman. Whitlocke writes of him, He was Parson of Somerton in Oxfordshire, where he had a convenient Livelihood. He was much delighted with hunting, and kept a Pack of good Hounds. Is not this extremely Apostolical?

P. 23. Lord Clarendon tells us he was a Man so unknown, that his Name was scarce heard of, who had been two Years before but a Chaplain. L'Estrange says he was none of the greatest Scholars; and Clarendon, that the making him Lord High-Treasurer inflam'd those that were angry before. But Laud was under no Concern at pleasing or displeasing any one. His Business was to subject every thing to the Church, or rather to himself, and particularly the Treasury by means of the Treasurer. His own Words prove it in his Diary: "William Fuxon, Lord Bishop of London, made Lord High-Treasurer. No Churchman had it since Henry VIIIth's Time. I pray God blefs him, that the Church may have Honour. And now if the Church will not hold up themselves under God, I can do no more". The Church, the Archbishop I mean, and not the Reform'd Church of England, were willing enough to hold themselves up, as the Lord Clarendon acknowledges. It was look'd upon as the Gulph ready to swallow all the great Offices, there being others in View of that Robe, who were ambitious enough to expect the rest. The reverend Historian proceeds: The Archbishop was infinitely pleas'd with what he had done, and believ'd he had provided a stronger Support for the Church. Then comes a long Character of Dr. Fuxon copy'd from

A.D. 1636. Sir Philip Warwick, who, as he tells us, knew him better than the Earl of Clarendon, who knew all Men else better than they knew themselves. He does this after he had told us that a much greater Man than Warwick, Monsieur Le Clerc, took Fuxon for one by no means fit for the Place. He continues: The Treasury being thus hopefully establish'd more Ship-Money was rais'd, and a huge Man of War built, called the Royal Sovereign. The Fame of which drew Multitudes from all Parts to see it, that Sight being all they were like to have for their Money. A Fleet was fitted out under the Command of the Earl of Northumberland, who seiz'd and sunk several Dutch Herring-Busses in the North Seas. Upon which the States came to a Composition, and agreed to pay 30000*l.* a Year for that Fishery, according to Echard; but only 20000*l.* according to Larrey, which Whitlocke tells us the King readily took; and Coke, that it ill agreed with the King's Reason for levying Ship-Money, which was that Pirates infested our Coasts to the endangering the Safety of the Nation, who were by no means so much afraid of Pirates, as of the Star-Chamber and High Commission Courts. The Dutch at this very Juncture took a large East India Ship called the Bona Esperanza, and confiscated both Ship and Goods to the Value of 150000*l.* as also the Dragon and Katherine, two East India Ships belonging to Sir William Curteen and Company, valu'd at 300000*l.* Which three Ships and Cargo's amount to as much as the Payment for the Fishery wou'd come to in fifteen Years, tho' the 30000 Pounds yearly was not paid half so long. The reverend Historian again: This honourable Disposal of Ship-Money, and the apparent good Effects of it, did not reconcile the People to it. They knew nothing of what he calls honourable Disposal, but every Day felt the Weight of the Burthen which was illegally laid upon them.

Mr. Chambers of London, Merchant, the same M. Chambers. who suffer'd so much about Tonnage and Poundage, was again prosecuted about Ship-Money. Sir Edward Bromfield, Lord Mayor of London, imprison'd him for refusing to pay it; and Mr. Chambers commenced a Suit of Trespass and false Imprisonment against Sir Edward Bromfield. The Case came to a Hearing in the Court of King's Bench, where Sir Robert Berkley, one of the upright Judges of this Reign, declar'd openly, There is a Rule of Law, and a Rule of Government; and many things which ought not to be done by the Rule of Law, might be done by the Rule of Government. We must not forget that Warwick told us these Judges were the most righteous that ever sat in Westminster-Hall. Berkley refus'd to let the Legality of Ship-Money be argu'd by Mr. Chambers's Council, for which he was afterwards call'd to a severe Account. The whole City boggled at the Payment of it, and the Privy-Council were forc'd to write them a threatening Letter; which was answer'd by a Petition from the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Commonalty of London, presented to the Board by the Recorder Sir William Cockaine, and several Aldermen and Common-Council-Men, desiring at least an Abatement of 20 Ships rated upon them. Secretary Cook told them by their Lordships Order, That Petitions were not to be receiv'd, as tending to the Danger of the Commonwealth. If the Parliament complains, 'tis to asperse. If the People petition, 'tis dangerous. Cook went on: The Command is given to all in general, and to every Particular of the City. The State will require an Account both of the City in general, and of every Particular of the Performance of the Command: And whereas you speak of Precedents, you shall know that the Precedents of former Times were Obedience, and not Direction; and that there are also Precedents of the Punishment of those who disobey. Such Language as this to a Deputation from the greatest City in the World was like to sow rare Seed, which

Judges for Ship-Money. The Clamour against this Tax was so loud and general, that the Courtiers were oblig'd to do something new towards stopping the People's Mouths, and opening their Purfes. Echard's Words are as smooth as if the King had been about to restore the Rights and Liberties of his Subjects, and give due Course to the Laws. "His Majesty, who in his Nature lov'd not harsh Proceedings, took a more soft and plausible Method, and order'd the Legality of this Tax to be formally decided by his twelve Judges, putting the grand Question to them in Writing. After a Consideration of ev'ry Judge by himself, and a Consultation of all the Judges together, they declar'd Ship-Money to be legal." Which is so false, that I am asham'd to bring the Proofs of it against an Author of his Function. Every Judge was so far from thinking it legal by Consideration of the Case with himself, that Whitlocke tells us Judge Croke and Judge Hutton thought it illegal, and sign'd for Conformity only, because the Majority of the Judges had done it. Mr. Coke says, The King having previously extorted the Opinion of the Judges. And Milton, "The rare Invention of Ship-Money was found by Finch, whose Sollicitations and Importunities, not their Considerations, prevail'd with the major Part of the Judges." Whitlocke again; After much Sollicitation by the Chief-Justice Finch, promising Preferment to some, and highly threatening others, he got that Answer from them. He adds, This Opinion and Subscription of the Judges was inroll'd in all the Courts of Westminster-Hall, and much distast'd many Gentlemen of the Country, and of their own Profession, as a Thing extrajudicial, unusual, and of very ill Consequence in this great Business or any other. Lord Clarendon owns Finch had too much Influence on his Brethren to induce them to concur in a Judgment they had all Cause to repent. Warwick who knew as much of Law as of Reason, affirms, All the Judges distinctly, to every particular Head of the Case, answer'd affirmatively, and nothing cou'd have led them hereunto but their Books. As silly and as false as this is, Echard steals it word for word. The Earl of Clarendon, as we have observ'd, declares the Judges Opinion was deservedly attended with Reproach and Infamy. Larrey writes of it thus, The Judges in their Circuits had less Regard for the Laws, than Complaisance for the Court. Clarendon, King Charles's Historian, says, The Council, the Star-Chamber, the Judges slighting of the Laws, gave Ground to the Resentment of the House of Commons, and nothing cou'd prevent the fatal Catastrophe of the three Kingdoms. Judge Berkley declar'd at Tork Assizes, Ship-Money is a lawful and inseparable Flower of the Crown, and the King may command Inland as well as Maritime Counties, to send Ships, which, he added, is not my Judgment alone, but the Judgment of all my Brethren. False to Astonishment! He knew it was not the Judgment of Hutton and Croke. Nay, tho' Warwick positively affirms that every one of the Judges answer'd distinctly and affirmatively, yet Judge Hutton was always in the Negative, and never wou'd subscribe, as the Lord-Keeper Finch witness'd for him, tho' Warwick has printed his Name with the rest of the Judges. Mr. Acherley speaks of this Judgment thus, "One wou'd have thought a small Share of Penetration might have seen thro' the Fallacy and Flattery of such an Oblation of England's Liberties; and therefore from the Proceedings upon the Foundation of this wild Opinion, the Propensity of the Managers in those Times to an arbitrary and unlimited Power was unhappily expos'd."

Laud.

Every Incident which relates to Laud, is a fresh Instance of his Pride and Tyranny: He now claim'd a Right of Royal Visitation in both Universities

Oxford and Cambridge, who pleaded that the Right of visiting was in the King alone, as King and their Founder. The Cause came to a Hearing before his Majesty sitting in Council. Sir John Bankes the King's Attorney-General pleading for the Archbishop, Mr. Gardiner Recorder of London for Cambridge, and Serjeant Thyn for Oxford. While Gardiner was pleading, Laud interrupted him, saying, I may visit as oft as I will. His Majesty spoke against the Puritans tho' they were out of the Question. The Archbishop urg'd the Necessity of visiting Cambridge, because they come into Chapel without Surplices, and there were Chapels not consecrated. Dr. Chadderton answer'd with a true Evangelical Spirit, I hope they are consecrated by Faith and a good Conscience. Here, as in a Mirror, one may see the Difference between Laud's Church and the true Church of England. The Earl of Holland was for compromising the Matter; If you will visit, you may do it by Commission. The Archbishop cry'd, No, I desire to have my own Power. What a strong Lust of Dominion was in him? The Lord Holland urg'd the same when the Case of the University of Oxford was heard, and the Archbishop again cry'd out, No, I desire to have my own Power. So, according to Rushworth, the King adjudg'd it against himself, as he had all along argu'd. The Archbishop invited the King, Queen, and Court to Oxford, where he entertain'd them with the Magnificence which he always affected. The Prince Elector Palatine was then at Court with Prince Rupert, who was actually created Master of Arts, as were the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Hertford, the Duke of Lenox, the Earl of Berkshire, the Earl of Elgin, the Earl of Sunderland, the Lord Digby, the Lord Craven, and several other Persons of Quality. Many glorious Speeches were made, says Echard, and three Comedies, which were represented with as much Variety of Scenes as cou'd be invented by the fine Head of Inigo Jones. The Archbishop was so taken with the Comedies, that he order'd them to be acted again; and as he writes in his Diary, All Things then going well and happily. Mr. Coke represents Matters otherwise, speaking of this Prelate; "Plum'd thus in his own Feathers all Black and White, without one borrow'd from Cæsar, whereby the more he assumes to himself, the less he leaves the King, he now soars higher. The Bishops of the Province of Canterbury, in their own Names, enjoin the Removal of the Communion-Table in the Parish Churches from the Body of the Church to the East-End of the Chancel, and cause it to be rail'd in, refusing to administer the Sacrament to such as will not come up to the Rails and kneel down; that the Book of Sports be read in Churches." The cruel unheard-of Persecution rais'd by Laud and his Brethren in the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, and Spiritual Courts, so terrify'd the Puritans, that incredible Numbers of them left the Kingdom. All Things went well and happily, says the Archbishop and the Archdeacon. About this Time there was a Prosecution carry'd on by Laud's main Instrument Wren Bishop of Bishop Norwiche, against the chief Inhabitants of the Town Wren of Yarmouth, as Miles Corbet Esq; Recorder, Mr. gains Harris, Mr. Green, Mr. Day, Aldermen, who had imprison'd the Parson of that Town Mr. Brooks for his insolent Behaviour towards their Lecturer Mr. Brinsley, who preach'd in the Chapel which had been us'd by the Dutch Congregation, till those industrious Protestants were driven out of the Kingdom by the Bishops of Norwich, Harsnet and Wren. Sanderson confesses the Inhabitants crowded to hear Mr. Brinsley, and neglected Brooks; of which Laud having Information, he sends an Inhibition to Brinsley, requiring him not to preach in the Chapel, where Mr. Brooks serv'd the Inhibition upon him, and the Magistrates sent the Parson to Prison; for which the Archbishop procur'd

Would one have thought that so holy a Man as Dr. Laud could have been guilty of Sacrilege? And there would be no Excuse for him, had the Dutch Presbyterian Chapel been episcopally consecrated.

Foreign Affairs were little minded in England, where the Archbishop was wholly taken up with making Conquests over the Puritans. The chief Business abroad was the Pope's appointing Cardinal Barberino, his Predecessor's Nephew, to be Protector of the English and Scottish Nations, as Cardinal Ludovico was of the Irish. And these two Cardinals erected a special Society of four Orders of Jesuits in England, of whom the Pope's Legate residing in England for the time being was to be Rector, and Cardinal Barberino the Principal Superintendent. At the latter End of the Year Signior Panzani the Pope's Nuntio at London, and Major Brett the English Agent at Rome, being discharged from their Negotiations, Signior Gregorio Con, or Mr. Gregory Con a Scots Papist, was appointed by the Pope to succeed Panzani as his Nuntio, and Sir William Hamilton was sent hence Envoy to Rome: So great was the Advancement of the Protestant Religion by Laud and his Brethren, according to the Author of the History of the Rebellion. At this Time, says an anonymous Writer, there was a great Harmony between Rome and England; the Roman Agents at London were so zealous for the Promotion of Popery, that it is taken notice of by the Lord Wicquefort, who informs us that the Hatred the Court of England express'd towards Cardinal Richlieu, was one main Cause of the Troubles they met with. Why they should hate so good a Catholick as Cardinal Richlieu, one can't conceive, unless it was because he hated the Jesuits. I may say for certain, says Wicquefort, that the Contempt the English had for that Minister, was one of the chief Causes of the King's Misfortune, and of the Disorders of the Kingdom. This Year the Lord Scudamore was Ambassador in France, and being about to make his publick Entry into Paris, the Master of the Ceremonies ask'd the Cardinal whether he would send his Coach to meet him. Richlieu reply'd, If the Ambassador will visit me, I will send my Coach, but not otherwise. The Lord Scudamore being told it, said, I will do as my Predecessors did: That is, he would not visit him. The Lord Fielding and the Earl of Leicester, had set him that Example; and we do not learn from Wicquefort, why there was this Coldness between the Court of England and the Prime Minister of France; but 'tis probable 'twas on account of the Queen-Mother Mary de Medicis, whom that Cardinal mortally hated, and whom the Court of England always sided with.

The Earl of Arundel was sent Ambassador to the new Emperor Ferdinand III. he staid some Months in Germany, and treated about the Restitution of the Palatinate, with the same Success the English Ambassadors had had ever since the Electorate was lost. Indeed what Success could be expected from Embassies that carry'd nothing with them but Words, and that were not likely to be follow'd by Fleets and Armies. The Duke of Bavaria, who was in Possession of the Elector's Territories, look'd on the Ambassador with Disdain, and other Princes interested in the Affair did not treat him much better; so he left Germany in Dislike and Choler, without taking any Leave.

The Plague which broke out in the last Year, increas'd in the following, which caus'd many to pass into the Country: But Sicknes or Health, Peace or War, 'tis all one; the Archbishop is alike busy with his sanguinary Prosecutions. Three Gentlemen whom he prosecuted at this Time, were of the most reputable Professions, William Prynne

Esq; Utter Barrister of Lincoln's-Inn, whom he had caus'd to be mutilated and mangled some Years before. Dr. John Bastwick a Physician, and Mr. Henry Burton Bachelor of Divinity. Echard begins their Case with a direct Falshood; Their Answers were so libellous no Counsellor would put his Hand to them; for Mr. Tomlins, Council for Prynne, did actually sign his Answer, which was refus'd both at the Star-Chamber Office, and in open Court. Mr. Holt, another Counsellor, a Bencher of Gray's-Inn, assign'd Mr. Prynne, after he had drawn his Answer, was privately commanded not to sign it. And when his Promise to do it was urg'd, he said I have Orders to the contrary, and dare not do it for a hundred Pieces. Mr. Burton's Answer was drawn, engros'd, and subscrib'd by Mr. Holt by Order of the Court; yet nine Days after, when it had been perus'd by the Archbishop, 'twas pretended to be scandalous, and refer'd to Sir John Brampton and Sir John Finch, the two chief Justices, to be purg'd. Accordingly they expung'd 64 whole Sheets, and would not suffer Mr. Burton's Council to defend the Answer; Sir John Finch threatening to pull his Gown over his Ears for offering it. The two righteous Judges left only three Lines in the Beginning and two in the End, amounting to a general not guilty; whereas in what they had struck out, Mr. Burton had confess'd and justify'd what he was charg'd with. And because he would not acknowledge this purg'd Answer directly contrary to that he put in upon Oath, he was taken pro Confesso, as was Mr. Prynne for a suppos'd contemptuous Answer, which the Court of Star-Chamber would not accept, tho' sign'd by Council, and twice tender'd. This is Mr. Prynne's own Account of it printed by Order of Parliament: And tho' Echard affirms and repeats it again, it was only sign'd by himself, yet we prove upon him that it was sign'd by Mr. Tomlins his Council and himself too, and that Mr. Holt who drew the Answer, order'd it to be engros'd, and promis'd to sign, was commanded not to sign it. I do not so often bring Proofs of such Falshoods against the Author of the History of the Rebellion and Echard, as being under any manner of Surprize at finding them in their Histories. If I had found Truth there, I should indeed have been surpriz'd as much as if I had seen Tyranny prov'd to be the Constitution, Superstition and Persecution to be Religion, Law to be Sedition, and Liberty Rebellion. Dr. Bastwick's Council were so threaten'd and terrify'd, that they refus'd to sign his Answer which he drew up himself. It was left at the Star-Chamber Office, and another Copy of it tender'd in open Court, where 'twas rejected, and the Doctor taken pro Confesso. This is the most daring and impious Act of Injustice that ever was attempted in any Court; and the Offences of these three Gentlemen were for the most Part personal against Laud, who sat imperiously on the Bench with the Lord High-Treasurer Juxon by his Side, and was the Man who set Sir John Banks the Attorney-General to work; and as Banks's Clerk Mr. Cockbute testify'd upon Oath, order'd him to let him know from time to time how the wicked Work went on. Laud was charg'd by Burton with several Innovations and Alterations in Church-Service, I shall only take notice of one of them, because it shews how well-dispos'd he and his Disciples have been from the beginning to the Protestant Succession; 'tis the sixth Innovation: That the Lady Elizabeth, our present most gracious Sovereign's Royal Great Grandmother, and her princely Children, be dash'd out of the new Collect, whereas they were in the Collect of the former Book. Dr. Bastwick's Crime was for saying, That Prelates were Invaders of the King's Prerogative, witness Laud's usurping the Royal Visitation in the two Universities, witness their solemn denying to hold their Jurisdiction of the King, and even his Supremacy, as in Whitlocke. That they

Eternal Falshood! Laud, incapable of Moderation, justify'd his superstitious Innovations in a Speech of two Hours long, and then left the Prisoners to this dreadful Sentence; "That Mr. Prynne having once lost his Ears before, should stand in the Pillory, have the Remainder of his Ears cut off, and be stigmatiz'd on both Cheeks with S. L. as a seditious Libeller." This Part of the Sentence was mov'd by Finch, who had not yet run his Country; "That Dr. Bastwick the Physician, and Mr. Burton Batchelor of Divinity, should stand in the Pillory and have both their Ears cut off, and all three pay 5000 Pounds apiece to the King." If this Blood was remember'd when the Archbishop was on the Scaffold for Execution, it must needs moderate the Peoples Compassion. Rusworth tells us, the Hangman rather saw'd off the Remainder of Prynne's Ears than cut them. These three Gentlemen were afterwards committed Prisoners, one to the Castle of Launceston in Cornwall, another to the Castle of Lancaster, and a third to Carnarvon Castle in Wales. They were afterwards remov'd to remote Islands, Guernsey, Fersey, and Scilly, where they were kept close Prisoners, the Wives of Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Burton not being allow'd after many Petitions to have Access to them, nor to set footing in the Island, neither was any Friend permitted to have any Access to Mr. Prynne. The People of England had in general an Abhorrence of this Cruelty, which one cannot write nor read without trembling. The Parliament afterwards voted the Prosecution and Sentence illegal, and their unrighteous Judges to make Reparation. Had the Offence been legally prov'd on the Offenders, the Punishment was by no Means adequate to it. Christians, Protestants, and Englishmen, to be mangled and branded like Slaves at Morocco. A noted Divine of the Church of England writes of it thus, Most moderate Men thought the Censure too sharp, too base, and ignominious for Gentlemen of their ingenious Vocation. Laud after this Sentence was pronounc'd, gave the Judges his hearty Thanks for it in a formal Speech, and was the leading Counsellor when the three much-injur'd Gentlemen were illegally banish'd. The Behaviour of these Sufferers argu'd alike their Innocence and their Courage. Tho' the Executioner par'd Mr. Burton's Ears so close, that he cut the Temporal Artery, and the Blood stream'd down on the Scaffold, yet he never shrunk in the least. Dr. Bastwick was much admir'd, says Fuller, and highly commended for the Erection of his Mind, triumphing over Pain and Shame. He made a Speech on the Pillory, in which he said, Indeed I wrote a Book against Antichrist, the Pope; and the Pope of Canterbury said it was written against him. Mr. Prynne told the Spectators, among other Things, Rather than I would have my Cause a leading Cause, to the depriving the Subjects of their Liberties, I suffer my Body to become an Example of this Punishment. As he was carrying back to Prison, he made this Distich on his own stigmatizing.

More Tynny. The learned Mr. Acherley observes on this Occasion, That the Cruelty of these corporal Punishments, which were arbitrary and impos'd for no Offence against the Laws for which such Punishments cou'd be inflicted, bound down all Gentlemen under a servile Fear of the like Treatment, in the midst of the Lord Clarendon's Felicities, which he tells us were the Wonder of the World. Echard aping that impartial History, affirms also, That all this Time England had a mighty Shew of Glory and Felicity, the Church was shining in Grandeur. Shining in Piety and Innocence, in Purity and Virtue, wou'd have been a Glory indeed; but to have told St. Paul and St. Peter their Church wou'd shine in Grandeur, wou'd doubtless to them have been a Prophecy of Antichrist and his Equipage. He adds, the Happiness was too great to remain unalterable. The Truth is, the dismal Effects of arbitrary Power were felt in all Parts of the Kingdom, to which it was not confin'd, but extended to Scotland so much, that it became intolerable. Indeed after the bloody Outrage committed on the Bodies of these three Gentlemen, the Plot thickens apace, and draws daily nearer to the Catastrophe, which was precipitated by Laud's Rage and Rashness.

We read in Rusworth, that "The Report of Troubles in the Sentence against Mr. Prynne, &c. and the Scotland, smart Execution, flew quickly into Scotland, and the Discourse among the Scots, was that the Bishops of England were the Cause thereof, that they must expect to have a Star-Chamber erected in their Kingdom to strengthen their Bishops Power there, besides the High-Commission Court." And while they were in these Fears, and under this Provocation, Archbishop Laud attempted to force the Common-Prayer-Book upon them, which occasion'd the Tumult at Edinburgh. That Tumult led gradually to the Scots War, and that War as gradually to the Civil War in England; wherefore it is of Importance to remark how and by whom the first Troubles were rais'd in Scotland, which in a few Years infected England. I must here declare, that the reverend Historian's History is of no Use to me. The whole Story on this Head is one continu'd Misrepresentation. Father Orleans speaks some Truth here; "The Resolution taken at this Time to put in Execution what had been projected by King James for establishing the English Liturgy in Scotland, occasion'd an Insurrection which afterwards involved both Kingdoms, and was properly the immediate Cause of the Revolution." Bishop Burnet names the Prime Mover in that Cause; The Scots Bishops were so encourag'd by Archbishop Laud, that they lost all Temper; of which one of the most zealous of them, Sydserfe, made great Acknowledgments in his old Age. Madam Motterville before-mention'd, who wrote Memoirs of Anne of Austria, and probably had her Memoirs relating to England from Queen Henrietta Maria, having told us that Laud put the King upon imposing the Common-Prayer-Book on the Kirk in Scotland, adds, "King Charles carry'd the Book one Night into the Queen's Chamber, and desir'd her to read it, telling her he wanted her to peruse it, that she might see how near they came to the Faith, He calls Popery the Faith. But it was not that Faith of which his Subjects stil'd him the Defender. Thus we see that the Popish Queen as well as Archbishop Laud, was one of the Cabinet-Council for imposing a Liturgy on the Scots Presbyterians. The fairest Account of these Matters are in my Scots History: "King Charles I. falling in with the pernicious Counsels of Archbishop Laud, renews his Father's Project, and directs him and several of the English Clergy to revise the Liturgy for the Use of the Kirk. These Revisers made several Alterations, which render'd it even more distasteful than the English Liturgy itself. This was sent down to Scotland, where the People were greatly alarm'd at an Innovation so much abhorr'd by them; inasmuch

Scotland were enjoin'd to submit to the Episcopal Censure. Their Consistories, Classes, and Pres-byteries, were held in the Nature of Conventicles, and there remain'd no Shadow of their former Ecclesiastical Policy. There were several Alterations in Laud's Liturgy approaching near the Romish Missal, and one in the Delivery of the Sacrament, which the Scots apprehended was Rushw.

396.

The 23d of July was the Day appointed for the Opening of this dreaded and dangerous Scene.
 The Dean of Edinburgh being to preach that Day in the Great Church, resolv'd before Sermon to read the Service-Book in his Habit and Surplice.
 There was a great Concourse of People expecting what wou'd be the Issue of the Matter. At the usual Hour the Dean in his Surplice comes out of the Vestry, the People gazing as at a Raree-Show, and making Gestures of Contempt. He pass'd thro' the Crowd to the Reading-Desk, and began to read, the Auditory continuing quiet, till on a sudden an old Woman disgusted at some Words, starts up in a Fury, and crys, Villain, Dost thou say the Mass at my Lugg; then taking up her little Stool, she flung it at the Dean's Head, making an hideous Noise. Some who sat next to her follow'd her Example, and by Degrees the whole Church was in an Uproar. The Dean quitted the Desk, and pull'd off his Surplice for fear of being torn to Pieces. The Bishop of Edinburgh went up into the Pulpit, and beckening for Silence, offer'd to speak, but it was all to no Purpose: The People flung at him Sticks, Stools, and any Thing that came to hand from all Quarters, and both Bishop and Dean made their Retreat to the Vestry. The Lord Chancellor call'd to the Magistrates to appease the Multitude, who were now become as tumultuous without the Church as within, and broke the Windows. They stroll'd about the City, and visited every Church where the Curates intended to read Common-Prayer, which set all in Confusion. The Clergy with the Magistrates and Courtiers, who still staid in the Great Church, taking hold of the Multitudes employing themselves elsewhere, lock'd themselves in, and boldly return'd to their Devotions. The Liturgy was again read, but the Rabble returning before they had done, waited for their coming out, assaulted the Bishop in the Street, and it was not without Difficulty that he got safe to his Palace, notwithstanding the Earl of Rothes a popular Nobleman had taken him into his Coach to protect him from Violence, which the Populace push'd no farther at that Time. The Care of the Magistrates, and the Power of the Court, aw'd them for the present, but when Harvest was over, and they had more Leisure, they began to stir a little in Opposition to the Service-Book.

It was soon found that the Generality of the Nation, as well Gentry as Commonalty, were dis-gustted at it, and about two Months after great Numbers of Gentlemen well attended came to Edinburgh, where a Petition was drawn up and handed about to be sign'd, requesting the Council

Mem. Hist. in their own Names, and the Names of all the No-Ch. Scot. blemen, Gentlemen, and others who shou'd agree to
 p. 181.

A.D. 1637. the same, that the Service-Book might be no further press'd till his Majesty's Pleasure be farther known. My Author affirms, that an infinite Number set their Hands to this Petition, and amongst them several Gentlemen of good Rank. Echard falls again; Not a Person of note countenanc'd it. He and his fellow Labourers have a prodigious Advantage in the use of Terms: He calls it a Sedition.
 Thus Conscience is with them Schism, Petitioning
Sedition, Publick-Spirit Faction, Passive-Obedience
Loyalty, Superstition and Persecution, the Church; it serves them instead of Fact and Argument; and then the Latitude and Liberty they take as to Truth, make them carry away their Cause with them in every Paragraph. The Council, according to my Author, pretended to resent the Petition, and threatened the Gentlemen who presented it, to send their Names to the King as disorderly and disaffected Persons. Echard says, Wise Men, I wonder whom he means, for I have not yet met with one wife Action in all the History, were of Opinion, that if three or four of them had been hang'd, it might have sav'd the succeeding Torrent of Blood. Instead of giving a gentle Answer to the Petition, which wou'd have been some Sign of Wisdom, the Council publish'd a Proclamation to remove the Session, which is the Scots Term, to Linlithgow, in hopes of preventing the Peoples flocking to Edinburgh. They also dissolv'd all Meetings on Church Affairs; which only exasperated the Citizens who gather'd together the next Day, and the Gentlemen who had petition'd appear'd among them. They surrounded the Council House, the Lords sitting in Council, and demanded a more favourable Answer to their Petition. The Bishop of Galloway coming thither at the Instant, was insulted, as were the Earl of Traquair and the Lord-Treasurer, from whom they took his White-Staff. A Party of them beset the Town-House, and oblig'd the Magistrates, to sign a Paper not to permit the idolatrous Service-Book as they call'd it. The Lords of the Council were their Prisoners, and there was no Way of freeing themselves but by the Mediation of several Lords and Gentlemen of Quality who oppos'd the Liturgy. They prevail'd with the Populace to let the Lords of the Council go quietly to their Homes, some of the Citizens being their Guard. The next Day another Petition was presented to the Privy-Council, sign'd by nineteen Noblemen and three hundred Gentlemen of note, and the principal Inhabitants of the City of Edinburgh. This Petition was transmitted to the King, who instead of moderate Counsels, sent down a Proclamation to remove the Session to Stirling, and another forbidding all tumultuous Meetings on Pain of Rebellion. But these Proclamations now signify'd no more in Scotland than his Embassies did in Germany about the Palatinate. They were so many Words only, the People united in Defence of the Cause they had undertaken, the Petitioners took no Notice of the Council, but resolv'd to proceed in their own Way for the Preservation of their Religion and Liberties. The Earl of Hume, the Lord
Lindsay and several other Lords, with a great Number of Gentlemen, enter'd a Protestation against these Proclamations, which they sent to the Council; and from that time some of these Lords and Gentlemen met daily to consider the State of the Nation. Here the famous TABLES were form'd, by whose Order every Degree sate by themselves.
 1. The Nobility. 2. The Gentlemen. 3. The Burroughs. 4. The Ministers; who all communicated their Resolves to each other, and acted in Concert with perfect Unanimity. They minded not the Orders of Council, nor even the King's Menaces; which being inspir'd by Laud, wanted not Severity and Irritation; but so far took the Administration into their Hands, as to proceed to the redressing of those Grievances, which tho' often complain'd of, the Court wou'd not redress: They began

P. 465.

TABLES

A.D. 1637. began with the Church, and all Episcopal Pomp and Ceremony vanish'd at once. The Bishops fled, and the General TABLES renew'd the ancient Confession of Faith and Presbyterian Government, entering into a solemn Covenant one with another to defend and preserve the true Protestant Reform'd Religion and the Person of the King. They understood his Majesty highly resent'd their Proceedings; but imputing his Resentment to Laud's prepossessing him against them, it only animated them in the Prosecution of their new Undertaking. The imprison'd Ministers were every where set free, the banish'd call'd home, and all restor'd to their Livings, to the inexpressible Joy of the Scots Nation, who forbore not upon all Occasions to express their Detestation of the Innovations impos'd upon them by Laud and his Brethren. Some of their Bishops renounc'd Episcopacy, as Ramsay Bishop of Dunkeld, Graham Bishop of Orkney, Fairly Bishop of Argyle, and almost all the rest of the Clergy submitted to the TABLES, and took the Covenant. Is the Sun at Noon more visible than that the Perplexity which the King had brought himself into, was the Effect of Archbishop Laud's desperate Counsels; so insensible of the apparent Consequences, and so incapable of Moderation, that he day by day hurries his Master into new Difficulties and Dangers? The Astrologer we have often quoted had a very mean Opinion of this Prelate's Capacity. "Strafford advises with Cantebury about composing these emergent Differences all to little purpose, for the Bishop was a very Ass in every thing but Church Matters". Lilly means the Grandeur and Power of his own Hierarchy.

Persecution in England. The Persecution against scrupulous Consciences was all this while as hot as ever in England, that both Nations might not be without Provocations. To avoid the High-Commission and Spiritual Courts, many hundred Families, sober and industrious People, remov'd to the English Plantations in America. It cou'd not but be a horrid Scandal to a Government to see its best Subjects chuse to leave their dear Country, their Dwellings and Trades, and wander with their Wives and Children in those distant Wildernesses, rather than continue expos'd to the Tyranny of those merciless mercenary Courts. One cannot think it was out of Care of the publick Good, that a Proclamation was publish'd to prohibit their transporting themselves, and block up the Passage of those voluntary Exiles, who were willing to go to another Part of the World, where, as they said, they might not meet with such Disturbance as they had met with here in England from Ecclesiastical Courts. What Echard quotes out of the Proclamation is not the less absurd and ridiculous for the Place from whence he took it. Because of the many idle and refractory Humours, whose only or principal End is to live without the Reach of Government. False as the rest. They were the most quiet, industrious People in the Kingdom, which every one knew they left with bleeding Hearts purely for Conscience sake to enjoy the Purity and Freedom of their Religion, which the reverend Historian terms a Humour. Thus with him Dr. Reynolds, Dr. Wallis, Dr. Wilkins, Dr. Bates, Dr. Wincup, Dr. Gilpin, Dr. Collings, Dr. Jacomb, Dr. Annesley, Dr. Arthur, and thousands more, who were profess'dly of the same Religion with these Refugees, were humorous Fellows. As Wit is not one of the Ingredients in the Composition of History, so neither is Stupidity; and one can make nothing else of both the Proclamation and his Paraphrase. 'Tis not deny'd but that Laud, Wren, Pierce, and such Prelates, made these conscientious Christians so uneasy at home, that they ran the greatest Risks of Life, Health, and Living to avoid them. Had Care of the State been in Question, a Check upon that Tyranny, which is called Authority in the

A.D. 1637. Proclamation, wou'd have given them immediate Ease, and the Loss of so many useful Families have been prevented. But such Christian Compliance, so agreeable to charitable and benevolent Minds, was not to be expected from the Ministry at that time, nor from their Master. Larrey tells us, The persecuted Protestants crowded the Sea-Ports to get over to America. There was a Tribe of them, says Echard with more Contempt than becomes him. This Tribe is now the populous and opulent Colony of New England. He adds, They cast off all Subjection to the English Church; by which he means they conform'd to the Profession and Practice of all the Reform'd Churches in Christendom both in Faith, Worship and Discipline.

He owns the Proceedings in the Spiritual Courts were now so severe, that it gave Occasion to strike at their Jurisdiction; but the same Judges who had given it as their Opinion, That the raising Money without Act of Parliament was according to Law, declar'd that the Spiritual Courts were also according to Law, tho' the King's Name was not us'd in them. Immediately out comes a Proclamation to give a Sanction to the Opinion of the Judges, according to the Archdeacon. And as if these Proclamations were really any farther minded than the People were forc'd to it, 'twas also to give Satisfaction to the Subjects. He proceeds: Thus was a great Point gain'd, and the Severities were never the less relax'd; for the Archbishop was inspir'd with Virtue and Fervor, which his subordinate Instruments borrow'd from him. This is follow'd by some small Truths, too good for the Company they keep. "Some of the Archbishop's Instruments, the Clergy, endeavour'd to introduce many things, which had too near a Resemblance to Popery; nor were they blameless in their Lives, several being vicious to a Scandal; nor so humble and meek as they ought to have appear'd; but so very high, that one was complain'd of for saying, I hope to see the Day when a Minister shall be as good a Man as any upstart Jack Gentleman in England." The Lord Clarendon assures us, and so does Warwick, the Church flourish'd with learned and extraordinary Men. And to shew how finely we are taught by Clarendon and Echard, mark the Agreement: There was not one Churchman in any degree of Acceptance, nor those Instruments accepted and prefer'd by Laud, of a scandalous Insufficiency in Learning, or a more scandalous Condition of Life. Nor one! I think there's no need of saying any thing more of these Historians; but the Provocation is beyond measure. General Ludlow, every way equal to the Lord Clarendon tho' he had written that History, tells us, The most profitable Pre-ferments in the English Church were given to those of the Clergy who were most forward to promote Superstition, and profane the Lord's Day. Not one!

The next Truth is extorted from Mr. Echard: Puritans. The Puritans were generally free from outward Scandal, which is follow'd by a Reflection to vulgar and so puerile that it is a Shame to repeat it, except some Particulars in Commerce. At Billingsgate the Saying among the Fishery is, the Presbyterians will not swear, but they'll cheat. Billingsgate is not the worst Place from whence he fetches his Wit and his Raillery. The Puritans would not whore, but they wou'd cozen; and sure those who wou'd whore, drink, swear and profane the Sabbath, us'd a great deal of Conscience as to cheating, when it lay in their way; which it did not do so often as in that of the Puritans, who had above nine Parts in ten of the Trade of the Nation.

The next Man Laud took to task in this very Year was John Lilburn, a younger Son of Richard Lilburn, Esq; of Thickley Punchardon in the County Palatine of Durham, one of the best Families in the Bishoprick. Echard insults him as a Trade-

A.D. 1637. man, whereas in truth he never set up as a Tradesman; and if he had, the Difference in their Descents shou'd have given a Check to that Insult. Lilburn was put to a Packer; but disliking a Trade he left him, and was taken to be Clerk to William Pryune, Esq; his Inclination bending to the Law. Mr. Pryune soon after suffering for his Histriomatrix, Lilburn took his Master's Part, and wrote against his Persecutors, for which he was brought into the Star-Chamber, Laud sitting there again in Triumph. He was condemn'd to be whipp'd from the Fleet Prison to Westminster-Hall, where he was afterwards to stand in the Pillory. Tho' he was whipp'd so bloodily that every Heart bled for him, yet he bore it with a Courage which was amazing, and while he was in the Hands of the Tormentor express'd his Indignation at the Injustice that was done him. He continu'd doing so when he was in the Pillory; of which the precious Judges of the Star-Chamber being inform'd, they sent an Order to have him gagg'd. Mr. Lilburn had 500 Stripes with a treble Cord having Knots upon it; and it was said by a Member of the House of Commons in 1640. "To sum up his Sufferings; "By Imprisonment he was made a dead Trunk, by "Whipping a Rogue, by Pillory a Cheat, by Gagging a Beast. They had better have hang'd him "outright". We read in Ruslbworth, "When "once the Star-Chamber Court began to swell big, "and was delighted with Blood; which was not "till Laud's Time, springing out of the Ears, Noses "and Shoulders of the punish'd; and nothing wou'd "satisfy the Revenge of some Clergymen but cropt "Ears, slit Noses, whipp'd Backs, gagg'd Mouths, "and withal to be thrown into Dungeons, and "some to be banish'd not only from their native "Country to remote Islands, but by Order of this "Court to be separated from their Wives and "Children; then began the English Nation to lay "to heart the slavish Condition they were like to "come into if this Court continu'd". These were felicitous Times, when, as the Lord Clarendon wou'd have us believe, the Happiness of the golden Age was restor'd.

While the Court of Star-Chamber was intent upon these good Works, Laud took hold of this seasonable Opportunity to bring his Patron and Benefactor Bishop Williams before them. That able Statesman had liv'd splendidly for some Years at his Palace of Bugden in Huntingtonshire, whereby his Hospitality and pleasant manner of receiving all Persons he grew very popular, and the neglecting so useful a Minister for the sake of so odious a one as Laud occasion'd still more murmuring. The King and the Archbishop had entertain'd insuperable Prejudices against him, and look'd upon him as a dangerous Affecter of Popularity. To gain the good Will of the People by Acts of Humanity and Bounty is to endanger the State, which in truth had a very small Share of that good Will. Again; He was a Favourer of the Puritans, and his subtle and serpentine Ways, which they never found out, gave too just an Occasion to many to believe him not strictly honest. It is the whole Drift of the learned and reverend Bishop Hacket in his Life of Bishop Williams to prove that he was strictly honest. The first Informers against the Bishop of Lincoln were Sir John Lambe, whom he prefer'd and got to be knighted, and Dr. Sibthorpe. Lambe was a Spiritual-Court Officer, and what Sibthorpe was, has been shewn already. Their Information was of terrible Importance; "That the Bishop "had discourag'd them in prosecuting of Puritans; "that he ask'd Lambe whether they paid the Loan-Money;" who saying they did, but were not good Churchmen, the Bishop reply'd, If they pay the King they are the best Subjects, and I am sure they will carry all at last. Laud had not Foresight enough to think after that manner. The Bishop also told Lambe and Sibthorpe, as those Informers swore, that the King had communicated to him his A.D. 1637. Intentions to have the Puritans more mildly dealt with, which his Majesty had said several Years before in a Conversation with the Bishop not at the Council-Board; and his Lordship having intimated as much to these two Persecutors to induce them to stop their Hands a little, Lambe upon being refus'd an Official's Place by the Bishop, and Sibthorpe to please Bishop Laud, deliver'd their Information to Noy, then Attorney-General, who was order'd to draw it up in Form, and file it in the Star-Chamber. Bishop Williams demurr'd to it as no fit Matter for the Cognizance of that Court, the Words being spoken of Matters done in Parliament. The Lord-Keeper and the other Judges were startled at this Demurrer, and to clear themselves refer'd it to Judge Richardson, who having lain long under the Archbishop's Displeasure about the Business of the Somersetshire Revels, to set all things right again over-ru'd the Demurrer in a private Chamber. Bishop Williams then apply'd himself to the Lord Treasurer Weston for a Composition; but the King wou'd hear nothing till the Bishop had confess'd his Fault. Upon which Bishop Williams resolv'd to defend himself; and by the Advice of the most learned Council in England put in a strong Plea, which being argu'd in open Court was refer'd to the same Judge Richardson, who in the same manner smother'd it in a Chamber. This Plea thus over-ru'd, the Bishop put in a special Answer, setting forth the Conspiracy of Lambe, Sibthorpe, &c. to ruin him, and advance themselves; that their Hatred to him was for not permitting them to plunder and rob the King's Subjects in the Ecclesiastical Courts, by haling them into their Nets ex Officio mero, without any previous Complaint, under an imaginary Colour of Puritanism. Noy join'd Issue to this Answer, and Witnesses were examin'd to prove it. But as much as Noy was in the arbitrary Proceedings of the Ministry after his Apostasy, he grew weary of this Business, and Laud procur'd another Prosecutor, one Richard Kilvert, so profligate a Villain that the Archdeacon is asham'd to name him; and Dr. Fuller writes, He wou'd do what an Full. 155. honest Man wou'd be asham'd of, and like a Mastiff & seq. Dog fiercely fly upon any Person for Profit. He was seconded in this Suit and abetted by the Court, who supported him with Money. Kilvert brib'd one Warren, an Examiner in the Star-Chamber, contrary to Warren's Oath, to reveal that the Bishop's Cause depended on the Testimony of John Pregon, Register of Lincoln and Leicestershire. To invalidate his Evidence, Kilvert suborn'd Witnesses to swear Bastardy against Pregon. The Bishop to support the Credit of his Witness, us'd his utmost Endeavours to find out the Subornation, and the Bastardy was so ill prov'd, that the Bastard was at Lincoln Sessions father'd upon another. Another Bench of Justices, of whom Sir John Munson was most active, father'd it upon Pregon. The last Order was dissolv'd as illegal by the Court of King's Bench, and Pregon clear'd from the Child. In this Dispute something must necessarily pass, which look'd like Concern in the Bishop for the Character of his Evidence, who deny'd that his Lordship had spoken the Words sworn against him by Lambe and Dr. Sibthorpe. Kilvert call'd this Subornation, and dropping the first Information proceeded against his Lordship upon the last. This Band-Dog, says Dr. Fuller, let go his first Hold too hard for his Teeth to enter, and fasten'd his Fangs on a softer Place. Some Days before the Hearing a Privy-Counsellor, suppos'd to be the Earl of Dorset, Friend to the Bishop, interpos'd so far as to get the Suit compounded for 2000*l.* but the Sum being offer'd, the Price was soon risen in the Market, and to the 2000*l.* was added the Surrender of his Deanery of Westminster, Parsonage of Walgrave in Northamptonshire, a Place he much delight-

A.D. 1637. delighted in, and Prebend of Lincoln, all which the Bishop held in Commendam. But his Lordship reply'd, he would in no Case forego those few Remains of his dead Master King James's Favour. The same Lord continuing still his Interposition, prevail'd to have the Suit superded'd for 4000*l*. Bishop Williams saying, I take no Delight in fencing at Law with my Sovereign, agreed to it; when a great Adversary stepping in, suppos'd to be the great Laud, set his Majesty so violently upon a Trial that all was frustrated; and what was yet worse, the friendly Offices of the Lord of the Council was urg'd against the Bishop as a Proof of his Guilt by his Forwardness to compound. The Court of Star-Chamber coming to the Censure, Sir John Finch, Lord Chief Justice, fin'd the Bishop of Lincoln 10000*l*. Sir Francis Windebank, Secretary of State, and a Creature of Laud's, to the 10000*l*. Fine, added degrading. Both of these two Star-Chamber Judges fled for their Lives three or four Years after, or they would doubtless have been Examples of national Justice. The other Judges brought the Fine down to 8000*l*. to the King, and 1000*l*. to Sir John Monson, a Lincolnshire Justice, with Imprisonment during the King's Pleasure. The Archbishop of Canterbury heartily agreed to all but the degrading, which his Friend and Tool had propos'd probably on purpose that Laud might shew his Clemency in only ruining and jailing the Bishop without that Ceremony. He preach'd near an Hour before he pass'd Sentence, alledging that Jezebel was the first in Scripture who was branded with the Infamy which the Bishop is charged with. Some of the Star-Chamber Lords, as Weston the Treasurer, the Earl of Dorset, and the Earl of Manchester concurr'd in the Fine, hoping the King would have taken to himself the sole Honour of mitigating it. But the utmost Penny was exacted. The Bishop was suspended by the High-Commission Court, which Echard on this very Occasion calls the Glory of the Nation. He remain'd four Years a Prisoner in the Tower, and was pursu'd thither by Laud, who four Months after the Bishop of Lincoln was releas'd was sent thither himself, and never got out but to his Trial and Execution. He sent two Bishops and three Doctors to him in Prison to take his Answer to certain ensnaring Interrogatories; which Bishop Williams answer'd so warily, that the Bishops and Doctors cou'd take no Advantage of it. But, as Dr. Fuller assures us, They painted his Lordship out in an ugly Shape to the King. This Trial lasted nine Days, and the Star-Chamber Court was every Day crowded, the People generally pitying the Bishop of Lincoln, who, 'twas visible, was to be sacrific'd to the Envy, Jealousy, Malice and Ingratitude of Laud, who in Defiance of the publick Hatred continu'd daily to increase and provoke it.

Star-Chamber Court.

Warw. 57.

Is it not astonishing that the Archdeacon shou'd take hold of this Opportunity to write an Encomium on the Court of Star-Chamber? And let him not say he praises what it had been, and not what it was; for it wou'd be false, as I am about to prove. His Commendations of it are: It had for many Ages been the Glory of England. He sets out with a Falstity; it was erected by Henry VIII. about 140 Years before; for the Defence of Honour and Honesty. It generally consisted of 30 or 40 of the greatest, wisest, and most learned of all Professions in the Kingdom, and oftentimes with the King at the Head of them, so that no Court came so near the venerable Senate of Rome. I am not astonish'd that it is the Reverse of the Truth, but that the reverend Historian shou'd declaim thus in Praise of it, when it had just been guilty of so vile an Act of Injustice against one of the Fathers of our Church. Osborn, a Gentleman of good Observation and Judgment, who liv'd in the best Days of that Court, when other Sort of Men than Weston, Cottington, Windebank, Conway, Jermin, Finch, &c. sat there, writes thus of it: The Earl A.D. 1637. of Northumberland was cast into the Sea of the Star-Chamber, that Den of arbitrary Justice, where the Keeper for the time being, two Bishops, two Judges, and as many wise Lords and honest great Officers sat as were pleas'd to come. The most of whom, tho' unable to render a Reason, every Wednesday and Friday in Term Time concur, &c. to tear such as refuse to worship the Minion, and to yield to the Prerogative Royal. As much as the Historian praises this rare Court at this extraordinary Juncture, he owns the Bishop's Sufferings were a chief Cause of its Suppression.

Philips's Life of Bp. Williams,

Mr. Ambrose Philips sinks the whole Prosecution in the Star-Chamber, perhaps because of the Subornation; which he had no Reason to do, Bishop Williams being evidently clear of any more Concern about Pregon than to have his Credit legally supported, as being his principal Witness; or perhaps it was to avoid speaking of Laud's Invetracy in this unjust Prosecution; for tho' he confesses the Bishop of Lincoln was a Man of more Temper than Laud, yet to gain him the Esteem of staunch Churchmen, he tells us these Bishops were his Pattern, Whitgift, Bancroft, Overal, Harpsnet; and that he dissuaded the King from letting the Bohemian Brasmen come to settle in England, because they were Presbyterians, notwithstanding they offer'd to bring over 200000*l*. with them, urging the ill Examples of the Dutch and French Churches with respect to Discipline. If that is true, I don't think Mr. Echard has wrong'd him much in saying he had more of the Serpent than the Dove in him. The Truth is, Mr. Philips has taken some Pains to set the Bishop's Character right with his Brethren Fellows of Colleges; but he has by so doing left it Mongrel with very little Merit on either Side. The Lord Wentworth, Deputy of Ireland, was so zealous in the Prosecution of this Bishop, that he put off his going to his Government a Term or two, of purpose, says Heylin, to have a Fling at him.

The Events of this Year come out of the Star-Chamber Court, High-Commission Court, Spiritual Courts, every one of them arbitrary and tyrannical; Council Board, or Bench of Ship-Money Judges. The Expression is bald, but fit for the Subject. The whole Administration are so many illegal Acts of Government one after another. William Pargiter, Esq; and Samuel Danvers, Esq; were committed Prisoners to the Gatehouse and the Fleet, for refusing to pay Array Money to the Earl of Exeter, Lord Lieutenant of Northamptonshire. The Reason given for levying this Money and Militia, was the Apprehension of an Invasion from Scotland. Sir Robert Berkley, that upright Judge, deny'd the Writ of Habeas Corpus to Mr. Pargiter and Mr. Danvers, contrary, as in Rushworth, to the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, to former Resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right, and contrary to the Knowledge of the said Sir Robert Berkley, who was the King's Serjeant at Law. Warwick affirms, He was as learned and as upright a Judge as ever sat on the Bench. P. 416. P. 51.

Kilvert, Prosecutor of Bishop Williams, had another Jobb cut out for him, and that was to threaten to prosecute Vintners for selling Wine above Price, and Breach of the Decree for dressing Meat. Alderman Abell, Master of the Company, communicated Kilvert's Message to them, and for fear of the Fellow they submitted to the Payment of 40*s*. a Ton. Kilvert demanded 4*l*. and it was farm'd at 3000*l*. a Year. We see what Sort of Tools were at this Time employ'd, and about what dirty Work.

Rushw. 452.

Mr. Laurence Snelling, Minister of Paul's Cray Mr. Snel in Kent, was articled against in the High-Commission Court for not reading the Book of Sports on the Lord's Day. He pleaded in his Defence the Law of God, the Laws of the Realm, the Authorities

134 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1637. of Councils, Fathers, and late Writers of all Sorts. The Archbishop sat on the Bench in Person, as was usual with him. Mr. Snelling's Answer was rejected, and that reverend Divine excommunicated, and turn'd out of his Living. I remember only an Instance or two of this Prelate's arbitrary and illegal Prosecutions: I cou'd fill a Volume with them were it necessary, and will do it when it is thought to be so.

Alp. Laud and Archy the King's Fool.

Among so many disagreeable and terrible Incidents, wherein we find Archbishop Laud the principal Agent, let us relate one merry one, and that is the Case between the Archbishop and Archy the King's Fool, as it is told by Rushworth. Archy meeting the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury his Grace, soon after News had come from Scotland of a Tumult at Stirling on account of the Common-Prayer, his Majesty's Fool, who it seems had counsell'd the not sending the Service-Book thither, cry'd, Whea's Feule now? Doth not your Grace hear the News from Striveling? The Lord Archbishop was just going into the Council Chamber, where he made a formal Complaint against the Fool. The Matter was taken into serious Consideration, and that produc'd the following Order in Favour of his Grace.

At Whitehall, March 11. 1637.

The King's most Excellent Majesty;

The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, his Grace; the Lord Keeper Coventry, Weston Lord Treasurer, Manchester Lord Privy-Seal, Duke of Lennox, Marquis of Hamilton, Earl Marshall, Lord Chamberlain, Earl of Northumberland, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Holland, Lord Newburgh, Mr. Treasurer, Mr. Comptroller, Mr. Vice-Chamberlain, Mr. Secretary Cooke, Mr. Secretary Windebank.

"It is this Day order'd by his Majesty with the Advice of the Board, That Archibald Armstrong, the King's Fool, for certain Words spoken against the Lord Archbishop of Canterbury his Grace, and prov'd to be utter'd by him by two Witnesses, shall have his Coat pull'd over his Head, and he discharg'd of the King's Service, and banish'd the Court; for which the Lord Chamberlain of the King's Household is pray'd and requir'd to give Order to be executed; and immediately the same was put in Execution".

No sooner was one Sentence pass'd against the Lord Bishop of Lincoln, than Preparations were made for another. The infamous Wretch Kilvert had corrupted Walker the Bishop's Secretary, Powell his Steward, and one Lund, who had all been find in the Star-Chamber, and order'd to be imprison'd: But, says Echard, they escap'd both Fine and Imprisonment, which were in a short time commuted into such other Offices as they were to do for Kilvert against their Master. That Villain had been put in Possession of the Bishop's Palace at Bugden; where "glad of the Office, says Mr. Philips, he makes sure of all that cou'd be found, Goods of all Sorts, Plate, Books, and such like, to the Value of 10000*l.* of which he never gave Account but of 800*l.* He sell'd the Timber, kill'd the Deer in the Park, sold an Organ that cost 120*l.* for 10*l.* and Pictures which cost 400*l.* for 5*l.* He continu'd there revelling for three Summers, and gave no Account at all for four Cellars of Ale and Beer, with Wood, Hay, Corn, and the like. Thus a brave personal Estate was squander'd away, and not the least of the King's Fine paid all this while, &c." Powell in rifling his Lordship's Papers found a Letter from Mr. Osbaldeston, Head Schoolmaster at West-minster, to the Lord Bishop, wherein were some mysterious Expressions, which by Interpretation and stretching were made to reflect on Archbishop Laud. Kilvert presently prefers a new Bill against my Lord of Lincoln for divulging a scandalous Libel against a Privy-Counsellor; which shews sufficiently that Laud and Kilvert were in League against Bishop Williams. The latter deny'd he ever receiv'd the Letter; but it being found in his Box, he was again condemn'd and sentenc'd by that barbarous Court which had before sentenc'd him. The Words in the Letter give us the Opinion the very learned Mr. Osbaldeston had of the Merit, as well as Virtue of Archbishop Laud: The little Vermin, the Urchin, and Hocus Pocus is this stormy Christmas at true and real Variance with the Leviathan. The Vermin was interpreted to be the Archbishop, the Leviathan to be the Lord Treasurer Weston. Mr. Osbaldeston was try'd for writing the Letter. He deny'd the Words to be so meant by him, and depos'd that he intended one Dr. Spicer, a Civilian, by Hocus Pocus, and the Lord Chief Justice by the Leviathan. But such Men as the Bishop of Lincoln and Mr. Osbaldeston were never once brought into that Court to be clear'd; so tho' it was impossible to prove any other Construction in the Words than what he who wrote them swore; yet, as the most impudent Act of Injustice which that detestable Court cou'd be guilty of, they proceeded to sentence that honest and wise Magistrate. Sir John Finch fin'd the Bishop 10000*l.* so did the wise and honest Secretary Windebank. The rest cut off 2000*l.* and one Lord was for no Fine, saying out of Ovid, Qui jacet in terra, non habet unde cadet. The reverend and eminent Mr. Osbaldeston was sentenc'd 5000*l.* Loss of his good Living of Whetbamstead in Hertfordshire worth 300*l.* a Year, and to have his Ears tack'd to the Pillory in the Presence of his Scholars; whom, says Dr. Fuller, his Industry had improv'd to as great Eminency of Learning as any of his Predecessors; insomuch that he had above fourscore Doctors in the two Universities, who gratefully acknowledg'd their Education under him. Among others of Mr. Osbaldeston's grateful Scholars was the famous Poet Mr. Abraham Cowley, who has express'd his Gratitude in a fine Epistle in Verse. Nothing wou'd serve the Revenge of Laud but the Ears of this excellent Scholar, who being sensible of his implacable Spirit, and perceiving how he and his Fellow Judges wou'd determine the Matter, left the Court before he was to be apprehended, went home; and having settled his Affairs as well as he cou'd, conceal'd himself at a Friend's House in London, leaving a Paper behind him with this written upon it, Gone beyond Canterbury, which was understood to be beyond Sea; but it rather meant beyond the Power of Laud; so safe the Place where he was hidden.

The Archbishop was not yet contented with what he had done against the Bishop of Lincoln. Nothing but his Degradation wou'd satisfy the Envy and Malice of that lordly Prelate. In order to which, a new Information with ten Articles was drawn up against him, tending all to blacken him for tampering with Witnesses about Prejon, for which he had already been so severely censur'd. The Bishop put in a Plea and Demurrer, that Deus not judicat bis in id ipsum, God punishes not the same Fault twice; and that he cou'd prove it was a Conspiracy of Kilvert with other Persons, if he might have Freedom to produce his Witnesses against them; which was deny'd him. His Lordship then put in a Rejoinder, and an Appeal to the next Parliament whenever it shou'd be assembled, pleading his Privilege of Peerage, his Freehold, and that he cou'd not be degraded of his Orders and Dignities. The very word Parliament frighten'd the Star-Chamber Court, who had a long Reckoning

Bp. Williams again.

AD. 1637. ing to make up with them, and the Proceedings were quash'd so far as not to come to a final Censure. Tho' the Rage of his Persecutors abated not against him, their dull Libellers made him the Subject of their Raillery and Ribaldry: Their Historians have not been more sparing of their foul Language. Sanderfon speaking of his severe Censures, says, His Punishments fitted his Villanies: For the Character of a Bishop is no Defence against Defamation with these pretended Zealots for the Church, if the Man has made himself unacceptable to them by Temper and Charity. Clarendon and Echard have not indeed made use of Sanderfon's sawcy Expressions, but their Meaning has as much Bitterness.

Mr Hampden and Ship-Money.

The Case of Ship-Money was this Year brought upon the Stage by Mr. Hampden of Buckinghamshire, an Inland County, which he thought had no Reason to pay a Maritime Tax. 'Twas argu'd in the Exchequer-Chamber by Oliver St. John Esq; and Robert Holburn Esq; the latter yet untainted in Principle, both of Lincoln's-Inn, of Council for Mr. Hampden; and by Sir John Banks Attorney, and Sir Edward Littleton Solicitor-General for the King. I know not whether the Reader will think what the reverend Historian says of this Tryal, to be more absurd or more ridiculous. Mr. Hampden had demanded Justice in the Courts of Westminster-Hall, and he tells us, he was most graciously allow'd to be heard. He adds, the Account of the Tryal is imperfect in Whitlocke, one of the greatest Lawyers of his Time, who was present at it; but extremely perfect in Frankland, whom I know no more of than what he tells me. The Pleadings take up 120 Pages Folio in Rushworth, who was a Lawyer also, and it appears beyond Doubt by Mr. St. John's Argument, that all the Law-Books in the Studies of the Lawyers, led them to declare that Imposition to be illegal. Echard proceeds from his profound Skill in such Matters, This Cause was attended with such Niceties and Intricacies in the Law, as made it very difficult. There never was any thing more plain in both Law and Reason, than that no Man's Money shou'd be taken from him without his own Consent by his Representatives in Parliament; and there was not the least Difficulty in it, but what was occasion'd by the Opposition of Authority and Power to Reason and Law. Mr. St. John in the Close of his first Day's Argument, sets the Matter in a fair Light. "In a Time of Peace his Majesty's Vigilancy foresees the Danger likely to ensue; the Supplies for Prevention of this Danger, will serve if brought in seven Months after. The Case is, whether without their Consent in Parliament, his Majesty may alter the Property of the Subjects Goods." Which fully answers the pretended Necessity of raising Money without the tedious Form of a Statute, since with all those Forms it cou'd come in time enough to prevent Danger. All the Judges except Judge Hutton and Judge Croke, gave Judgment against Mr. Hampden. Croke, according to Whitlocke, was resolv'd to deliver his Opinion for the King as the other Judges did, against his Knowledge and Conscience; but a few Days before the Time, he chang'd his Resolution by the Persuasions of his virtuous and prudent Lady, who observing the Perturbation of his Mind by his Looks, and guessing at the Cause, said to him, I will be content to suffer any Want or Misery with you, rather than occasion you to do any Thing against your Judgment and Conscience. She must certainly know what was his Conscience and Judgment, and that his first Resolution was against both. As for the rest of the Judges, Hutton excepted, their Infamy will live as long as their Names.

One wou'd think that this odious Tax had exasperated the People enough already, and that Mischief enough had been done without so solemn a Decision to make an illegal Imposition legal; but as I have frequently observ'd this Ministry with AD. 1637. Land at their Head, seem'd to study how they cou'd act most in Despite of the Nation.

It was the same Management in Scotland, where AD. 1638. in direct Opposition to the Principles and Bent of the People, the same Land obstinately persisted in the Design to impose his own Episcopacy, with all its Superstitions and Ceremonies upon a Protestant and pure Church; the purest in the World, if you will take King James the First's Word for it. "The King by the Advice of Bishop Land," says Mr. Acherley, order'd the new Bishops there "to prepare a Liturgy, which was remitted to England, revis'd and approv'd by three English Bishops, Land, Juxon, and Wren. We have seen what Success they had when they attempted to use it; and the same Author reasons upon it thus; "In this Place it may be proper to enquire what Profit the King's Ministers had in View either to themselves or to the Crown, in forming and carrying on these Undertakings, which they knew to be in Scotland an Abomination; for it may be demanded of what Signification was it to the Crown, whether the national Church of Scotland was a Presbytery or Episcopacy. The Problem is difficult to resolve any other Way, than it was the Exercise of a Power which depriv'd all Limitation and all Imaginations of a Disappointment." This Affair is related by the reverend Historian, as wisely and sincerely as the rest, Whether this Torrent was the unnatural Overflowings of the Waters of Popularity, how florid is his Expression? or the Artifice of great Men, which destroy'd the Sluices and Flood-gates which kept the Populacy and Presbytery in due Bounds, it is hard to determine with Exactness. Whether the Fustian or Nonsense of this Passage is most prevalent, is much harder to determine; for we are told the Service-Book was an Abomination in Scotland, and the Torrent, the unnatural Overflowings of the Waters of Popularity, was the very natural Effects of an old Woman's Fury who flung her Stool at the Dean of Edinburgh's Head. The Earls of Traquair, Roxburgh, and the Lord Lorn, were sent for to Court to inform his Majesty of the State of the Scots Nation. After the setting up of the TABLES, and after some Consultations, the Marquis of Hamilton was order'd to go to Scotland as Lord High-Commissioner. Mr. Echard tells us he was met there by Multitudes of both Sexes, whose Applauses consisted of Execrations and Exclamations against Popery and Bishops; for notwithstanding the Scots by Land's Council were threatened to be treated as Rebels, far from being dismay'd at these Threats, they are the Words of my Author, they stood boldly to what they had done; and when the Marquis of Hamilton propos'd two Things to them, their Answer will sufficiently acquaint us that they acted like Men who were under no Apprehension of the Power of their Enemies. His Proposals were, 1. What they expected from the King in Satisfaction of their Grievances. 2. Whether they wou'd after Satisfaction return to their Obedience, and renounce the Covenant. The first they answer'd, We expect a free Parliament and a legal General Assembly, to whom we are willing to refer all our Demands. To the second their Reply was, We have not forsaken our Obedience, and therefore need no Terms of Return. But as to our Covenant, we will as soon renounce our Baptism; nor will we enter into any Treaty, if it is mention'd to us a second Time. Many long and tedious Debates were held, and many Expedients offer'd in the King's Name, to keep if possible the Bishops in their Seats. The Marquis not being able to gain any one Point, return'd to Court to acquaint the King with the Demands and Resolutions of the Covenanters, so they now begin to be call'd; upon which he was sent back with a Declaration consisting of eleven Heads, granting them Things which

A.D. 1638. which they wou'd have rejoyc'd at before, but now rejected. 1. To annul the Service-Book. 2. The Book of Canons. 3. The High-Commission. 4. The five Articles of Perth. 5. All Persons whether Ecclesiastical or Civil, to be liable to the Censure of Parliament and General Assembly. 6. No Oath to be impos'd upon the Ministers at their Entry, but what was contain'd in the Act of Parliament. 7. The antient Confession of Faith to be receiv'd and subscrib'd as it was in the King's Father's Reign, with the Band thereto annex'd. 8. A Parliament at Edinburgh the 14th of May after. 9. A General Assembly at Glasgow the 21st of May. 10. A general Pardon. 11. A general Fast. These were great Things; but as the main Thing Episcopacy was left behind, the Covenanters protested against these Concessions, and claim'd a Right to call a General Assembly, and it was call'd accordingly, the Marquis of Hamilton consenting to it. They met at Glasgow the 25th of November to the Number of 260 Commissioners, the Marquis of Hamilton presid'd in it; but they took so little Notice of him, that after eight Days he dissolv'd them as far as it lay in his Power. The Earl of Rothes made Answer, We are sorry you will leave us, but our Conscience bears us Witness we have done nothing amiss, and therefore will not desert the Work we are come about. The Lord Ereskin, the Earl of Argyle, and others, came to the Assembly, and desir'd to be admitted into the Covenant, which the Nation in general fell in with. This Echard terms an increasing of the Tumults. The Marquis return'd to London, leaving the Assembly sitting: He bestows as much Wit as he has to spare upon them; They were doing the Work of the Lord: God approv'd and seal'd their Proceedings; their sitting was the Prerogative of Jesus. He adds, Rolloch, one of them, said, God spake thro' Doll Michelson a Wench, who declar'd the Covenant was approv'd in Heaven; and another of them, We help the Angel of the Lord against the Mighty. But he is not to be trusted the more because he takes his Cant and his History from Bishop Guthrie. This Assembly abolish'd Episcopacy, restor'd the Church of Scotland to her Rights, and disannull'd whatever had been acted against them since King James impos'd Bishops upon them. "Such Zeal and such Faithfulness, says my Scots Author, to the Principles they profess'd, cou'd not fail to prompt to all proper Means to support what they had undertaken; and the Marquis of Hamilton being gone back in Disgust, and having us'd some threatening Speeches at his parting, they resolv'd not to be surpriz'd, but immediately to put themselves into a Posture of Defence, that they might be able to go thro' with their Undertaking. Their arming was not without very good Intelligence from England of the Resolution taken there to reduce them by Force." The Marquis threatening them to their Faces when he went from Scotland, You must not think to use your Kings now as you did formerly, when they were only Kings of Rebels; the King now has another loyal and warlike Nation at his Command, you shall soon feel it to your Cost; wherefore the English Historians are manifestly partial, who say, the King arm'd only in his own Defence, and in charging the Scots with a Design to begin the War; it being manifest they were capable of no other Design than of securing themselves against being trampled on by a bigotted Court and incens'd Clergy, whose tyrannical Government had rais'd equal Disgust and Dread in the Minds of the People of England, which was well known to those in Scotland; and the latter were assur'd from good Hands, they shou'd not want Assistance; and without hope of such Assistance, it had been Madness for the Scots to have taken Arms.

Mem. Ch.
Scot. 188.

But that Hope was as yet founded on the general Discontent of the English Nation, which the Scots imagin'd wou'd dispose them to meet Deliverance half way. The pretended Invitation was not till after the first Pacification was made, as I shall shew at large. Mr. Acherley is out in placing it at the first Entrance of the Scots, and Echard's Account is all false.

When News came to London of the Proceedings in Scotland, the King desir'd his Council to consider, Whether the Disobedience of the Scots was a just Cause for him to use the Power of England to make War upon his People of Scotland, considering that the Numbers adhering to the Presbytery, were the general Body of the Nation? The Episcopalians, whom they oppos'd, being but a handful of Men, bearing no Proportion with the others. But his Majesty's imperious Ministers, says my Author, soon resolv'd in the Affirmative; not considering what might ensue upon the provoking a People so warlike and tenacious. The Scots laid Taxes on themselves for raising and maintaining 18000 Men, and sent into Sweden and the Low-Countries to invite home the old experienc'd Generals and Officers of their Nation, in whom they cou'd put Confidence, to serve their Country on this so necessary an Occasion. There is not one of all the Encouragements which Echard tells us the Scots had to undertake the War, that has any Foundation in Fact or Reason. The only real Encouragement they had, was the Disposition they believ'd the English were in to engage in the same Cause, the Defence of the true Protestant Religion, and the Rights, Liberties, and Properties of the two Nations.

Acherley's
p. 391.

I wou'd not have the Reader think that I set a Value on all the Authors I make use of; I perhaps have a meaner Opinion of some of them than himself can have; but if there's an Appearance of Truth in what they say, I do not much matter their manner of saying it; and besides, 'tis the Misfortune of all Historians who write to this Age, that their Word will not pass without Evidence. Now the more homely the Witness, and the more plain his Testimony, it is likely to be the more true. For which Reason only I make use sometimes of William Lilly, Roger Coke of Peyton, and Welden. I have intimated in many Places, that Laud's false Zeal, his Pride, Obstinacy, Superstition and Cruelty led the King into those fatal Measures which brought him to a Scaffold; that the Clergy who were Laud's Disciples, were the main Instruments in the Miseries of those miserable Times, and that the Scots Troubles were the Beginning of those in England. Let us therefore produce a Witness to prove it, and there cannot be a plainer Proof than this given by the Conjuror Lilly.

Scots Troubles begin those in England.

P. 33.

"In July 1637, viz. 23d Day, there was great Disturbance in Edinburgh about a new Service-Book endeavour'd to be obruted on the Scots by the King and Canterbury. I have heard an old Woman began the Quarrel by casting her Stool at the Priest when he read the Service-Book. Many very modest Divines exceedingly blame both the King and Canterbury for that Book. It admitted unto the People, as I remember, the Communion but in one Kind. However, by the Prudence of some grave Men, being then Privy-Counsellors in Scotland, Matters were slubber'd over all that Winter in Scotland, but in May or April new Tumults arose; and truly I may almost say, that that corrupt Common-Prayer Book was the sole and whole Occasion of all the Miseries and Wars that since that time have happen'd in both Nations. Had his Majesty first endeavour'd the Imposition of that lame Book upon the English, most Men did believe we had swallow'd it, and then the Scots must have done it afterwards; for the Clergy at that time generally were such idle and lazy Lubbers, and so pamper'd with Court Preferment, and Places
"temporal

A.D.1638. "temporal in every Shire of England, and such flattering Sycophants, that doubtless the great Hand of God was in it; that those rude Scots first broke the Ice, and taught us the Way to expel an insulting Priesthood, and to resist the King, he endeavouring by unwarrantable Means to intrude things contrary to the divine Law of Almighty God upon our Consciences". The Phrase is indeed very uncourtly, but the Fact is notorious, and nothing therefore can have a better Claim to History. Lilly in another place says, "All Men knew the Scots Troubles were promoted by the Clergy, whom the Nobility began to disdain and scorn, and the Gentry and Yeomanry of England extremely to hate; for at this present time the High-Commission Court, and other bawdy Courts, did most horrible Injustice against the Persons and Estates of any Gentlemen who by Misfortune came thither".

Commissions were this Year issu'd to certain Lords and Gentlemen, with a Power to impose new and unheard-of Impositions on various Commodities. The Earl of Arundel had also a Commission to take into his Hands the military Charge of the Northern Parts; and the Earl of Worcester a Papist, was empower'd to raise an Army of Papists in Wales. This, says my anonymous Author, was well known, that he was to master the West Marches, and assist the Irish Army's landing at Milford, as Need shou'd require; and to further it, the Earl of Bridgewater Lord-President of those Marches, was commanded to resign his Place.

By the Advice of Archbishop Laud, according to Whitlocke, the King hasten'd his Levies of Men and Money without Consent of Parliament; and because this was the BISHOPS WAR, it was held fit that they shou'd contribute largely towards the Preservation of their own Hierarchy; accordingly Orders were issu'd from the Council to the Archbishops of Canterbury and York, to send Directions to the other Bishops to give largely, which they did, and about 1000 Pounds was rais'd in each Diocese by a Medium. The Doctors of the Commons gave 700 Pounds to the Bishops War; in raising which Sir John Lamb the Informer shew'd his Activity. The Queen wrote a Letter to the Papists to contribute, which they also did very largely; and by these and other such extraordinary Means, Bishop Juxon had heap'd up 600000*l.* in the Exchequer for this agreeable Service. The Papists were so over-liberal, that the Pope was forc'd to write to them suddenly to desist from making such Offers. In the mean time the Remonstrances, Declarations, and Pamphlets publish'd by the Covenanters, were dispers'd in England, and their Emisseries and Agents insinuated into the Company of all who were any way discontented at the Proceedings of the State. Those who had been imprison'd for the Loan, or restrain'd for Ship-Money, or were otherwise disoblig'd, had Applications made to them from the Scots, whose Designs were secretly favour'd and assisted, especially by such as inclin'd to the Presbyterian Government, or whom the publick Administration had in any wise disgusted; which must needs be nine Parts in ten of the People of England, who by themselves or their Friends had been persecuted in Person or Purse during the Male-Administration of this Reign.

The King sent a Letter to most of the Nobility, certifying his Resolution of going in Person into the North with an Army against the Scots, for the Defence of the Realm of England, and the Glory of God, and requiring them to attend his Royal Standard at York. The Towns of Hull and Newcastle were order'd to be fortified at the Charge of the Inhabitants. At this Time the Church of Rome had Agents in Scotland as well as England; one of them was Chamberlain a Priest, whom Richlieu sent thither to help blow up the Coals that were kindling. A Letter of his was intercepted, wherein he said, Scotland is in a very ill Posture, and in evident Danger to sever it self from the Crown. And in another Letter, The King hath taken a Resolution to tame the Scots by Force, and to this Purpose goeth about to raise an Army in Ireland, not daring to trust himself with the English, who are already much irritated against him, by raising of the Shipmoney, which he pretends to raise to maintain his Fleet, and which they refuse downright to pay. This Counsel of raising an Army, has been suggested to him by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the President of Ireland: Strafford is meant: who are they alone that govern him, for he hath never yet opened his Mouth, or spoken one sole Word of it to his Council: The which highly disobligeeth all these Lords; and Men hold this Counsel of the Army from Ireland, a most pernicious Counsel: But I know not what better Method he cou'd take, for it is most dangerous to raise it in England, where all the World is in Discontent. For to raise an Army here, were to give them the Sword in their Hands: And they have such a Correspondence with the Scots, that they begin already to break the Altars which the Bishops had erected, and to accuse the Bishops of Crimes. There was another Letter written by a Romish Priest, to one Monsieur And---, wherein he wrote thus; "Our Scots Business troubles us shrewdly, and grows worse and worse. They will have a Parliament, and the King (for the Consequence of it in this Kingdom) will never permit it; and so they have taken a Resolution to levy an Army in Ireland, which is held here by wise Men to be a very desperate Counsel." The Lord Clarendon assures us, the wise Men thought it very wholesome Counsel. Again, "The King consults with none but the Archbishop, and the Deputy of Ireland, which disgusts all, and makes Men see more Weakness in him than ever was imagin'd." The Archdeacon assures us, he was wiser than the wisest of his Counsellors. Among the many Proclamations of Importance which were publish'd this Year, we find these; 1. One forbidding the sending Food to the Presbyterians at New England. 2. Another to forbid the Transportation of English Horns. 3. Forbidding the wearing of Demicasters 4. About Cards and Dice. 5. The Cure of the King's Evil, which generally cost two or three Proclamations in a Year or two. 6. The Cure of the King's Evil again. 7. Concerning Starch. Thus we see, that besides the levying War against the Scots at the Instigation of Laud, the Ministers of State had not a great deal to do.

The King had got together an Army of 16000 Foot, and 5000 Horse, of which the Earl of Arundel was made General, the Earl of Essex Lieutenant-General, and the Earl of Holland General of the Horse. A Fleet was also equipp'd, consisting of 16 Men of War. Sir John Pennington was Admiral of it; and Captain Popham, afterwards Admiral, commanded the City Ship; and though he was a Presbyterian, did not refuse the Service; which gives one Reason to surmise there was no thought of Blows. Five thousand Men were put aboard the Fleet, under the Command of the Marquis of Hamilton, who was to land near Edinburgh, and make a Diversion, while the Army of the Covenanters march'd towards England.

The Reverend Historian opens this Piece of History with some flat Contradictions to Truth. As, King Charles was too yielding, Laud's real Advice was for Peace. The Flower of the English Gentry cheerfully put themselves upon Action. As to the yielding, Larrey says, he seem'd to grant them all they ask'd, in order to reduce them afterwards by force of Arms. As to Laud's advising to Peace, see what the Scots Commissioners alledge, among a hundred Things against him in their Charge. Canterbury procur'd us to be declar'd Rebels and Traytors in all the Parish Kirks of England. Canterbury kindled the War against us. Canterbury said at the

A.D. 1639. Council-Table, that the Pacification with us ought to be broken. Canterbury ordered Prayers against us as Rebels and Traytors, to be read in all Churches. Canterbury was the prime Incendiary. General Ludlow tells us, how the Flower of the English Gentry cheerfully put themselves upon Action. " Though divers of the Nobility and Gentry did " appear, yet was it rather out of Compliment than " Affection to the Design, being sensible of the " Oppressions they themselves lay under, and how " dangerous to the People of England, a thorough " Success against the Scots might prove." Eckard then informs us of some Omens, a Commodity he deals in as well as Ghosts and Apparitions, which being now the Entertainment of old Women, Children, and Fools only, are happily plac'd in his History, to be forgotten. A Swallow dung'd three drops of Dung, being immediately converted into Blood, cou'd never be got out by Cleansing. Such Weight as this wou'd sink any History in the World. Archbishop Spotswood advis'd the King to have no Mercy on the Scots, but to cut them off all by the Sword and the Gallows; for they were gain'd by Punishments, and lost by Favours.

The Earl of Essex, with a Detachment of Horse and Foot, possess'd himself of Berwick, which the Covenanters intended to Garrison. Eckard affirms, the Scots had not then any considerable Body of Men nearer than Edinburgh: But a Scots Historian writes the quite contrary. " When the King ad- " vanc'd towards the Borders, they were ready in " the Field, and that with such a resolute Counte- " nance, as that the English Army cared not to at- " tack them. The Archdeacon: The Scots were " but 3000 Men, ill arm'd, and ordinary Fellows." The reverse of this is our Scots History. " When " the Earl of Holland, General of the Horse to " the King, advanc'd in a Bravade with a strong " Brigade of Horse, and a Detachment of Foot, " he was driven back faster than he came, by " half the Number of the Scots Cavalry, with " Musketeers in their Intervals; a manner of Fight- " ing which the English had not seen, and which " some Scotch Officers had learnt under the great " Gustavus Adolphus. It would make too much " Sport with the English Courage and Bravery, " which is so well confirm'd in the World, to " give an Account how like Scoundrels this Army " behav'd. An English Historian of Note says, " they were rais'd by the Clergy, and imitated their " Masters; for as the Clergy, who prompted this " War, accompanied the King to York when he " came to take the Field, so the raw and undisci- " plin'd Army accompany'd him to the Field, but " left him when they shou'd have engag'd. In a " word, none of the Troops, after the first Skir- " mish, car'd to engage, or to look the Scots in the " Face; who, on the other hand, though they " wou'd not attack the King, yet stood ready, and " shew'd all Forwardness to give Battel." The Re- verend Historian's Account of them makes these Scoundrels, being the Clergy's Troop, according to the Scots Author, to be such Heroes, that one of them offer'd, with 2000 Horse only, to make the Scots creep upon their Bellies to beg his Majesty's Mercy. It is worth Observation, that these Hero- ick Persons preserv'd this Air through the whole Course of the Civil War, in the midst of Defeats and Disgraces. They flatter'd their Masters with hopes of their being as invincible in the Field as themselves were in the Spiritual Courts. The Truth is, the King encamp'd on the English Side of the Tweed, and the Covenanters at Kells in Scotland, being about 12000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, much inferior to the King's Forces in Number. So that those English Lords and Gentlemen who were near his Majesty, and by no means willing to have the Scots Army destroy'd, for fear of the ill Consequences in England, found that it was not convenient for them to hazard a Battel at that Time, by laying too great Stress on the Good-will of the English Officers and Soldiers. They therefore en- deavour'd to bring on a Treaty, by representing to his Majesty that it was an unnatural Thing for him to make War upon his own People of Scotland, merely for endeavouring to be deliver'd from the Innovation of the Common Prayer; the same being in Reality a matter of Difference in Religious Forms, not material enough to be pursu'd with Bloodshed. The Scots at the same time sent an humble Repre- sentation to the King, professing great Deference to his Royal Person, and requesting no more than a Redress of their Grievances. This was thought so reasonable, that his Majesty cou'd not well deny it; and the Marquis of Hamilton having only appear'd before Leith, where the Covenanters were prepar'd to receive him in another manner than he expected, and writing to the King they were so powerful he cou'd attempt nothing on that Side, his Majesty was prevail'd upon to consent to a Treaty. His Commissioners were the Earls of Arundel, Pembroke, Holland, Salisbury, and Berk- shire, Sir Henry Vane, and Secretary Cook. The Scots Commissioners were the Earls of Rothes and Dumferling, the Lord Lowdon, Douglass, Sheriff of Twedale, Mr. Henderson, and Mr. Johnson. After four or five Days Debate, the Commis- sioners on both Sides came to a Conclusion for a Pa- cification to continue twenty Years. Both Armies to be Disbanded, An Act of Oblivion. The King's Forts and Castles to be restor'd. An Assembly and Parliament to be call'd, to make a full Settlement. My Scots Author writes, " Notice was given the " Scots Army, that they might send some to treat " with his Majesty upon their Demands; which " was done, and in which all Artifice was us'd to " make a superficial Agreement, that the Scots might " be oblig'd to Disband, and so might be surpriz'd " again unarm'd." This agrees exactly with what I quoted out of Larrey. " However, they made " a Pacification, and according to the Terms, broke " their Army; but having certain Intelligence from " England of the treacherous Design, they kept the " Generals and Officers in half Pay. As they had " been inform'd, so it prov'd; for the King, forc'd " by the Clergy, sought Occasions of new Quar- " rel." Several of the King's Commissioners were well-wishers to the Scots; and it is suppos'd, that in their Conferences with the Scotch Commissioners they made no Scruple of discovering their Thoughts to them, and assuring them, that though this was not an Opportunity for them to insist on other Terms, yet if they wou'd keep up the Spirit, and as well as they cou'd with good Policy, the Force they had, their Friends in England wou'd let them know when it wou'd be a fit Time for them to appear again, and in the joint Names of both King- doms demand a Parliament in both to redress Grievances. There was no formal Invitation, but such general Discourses of the Discontents of the English, their Desires to be reliev'd, and their Readiness to assist in it. The King disbanded his Army with very disagreeable Circumstances, as if he had not approv'd of their Behaviour. The Gentry were suddenly dismiss'd, without any Acknow- ledgment of their Love and Loyalty, to use the Arch- deacon's Words. The Earl of Essex was discharg'd without Ceremony, and shortly after refus'd the Com- mand of Needwood Forest. The Earl of Newcastle was so affronted by the Earl of Holland, that he sent him a Challenge, but the King interpos'd. Sir John Cook was remov'd from the Secretary's Place, and Sir Henry Vane put into it, contrary to the Endeavours of the Earl of Strafford, and pure- ly by the powerful Influence of the Queen.

The grand Point aim'd at by the Party in Eng- land who wish'd well to the Scots, was to procure a free Parliament, as has been observ'd, which they knew wou'd remove those imperious Ministers and Measures that aggrieved both Nations. A Paper

A.D. 1639. was publish'd highly reflecting on the fraudulent Pacification, which was order'd to be burnt by the common Hangman, as was the Pacification it self, under Colour that many false Copies of that Agreement had been dispers'd by the Scots. Lilly tells this Story thus, " That Day which was assign'd for

The King buries on the Scots first Pacification, P. 37.

" certain of the English Nobility and Scottish Nobility were to produce, the Nobles of each Nation being set, the Earl of Arundel began with much Gravity to rebuke the Scots for their Unadvisedness and Rebellion, in raising their Army against their lawful King, and disturbing the Peace of both Nations; and yet he commended the good Nature of the King, who was notwithstanding their high Provocation and Misdemeanors, very inclinable to hear their just Grievances; and to that Purpose had appointed himself, and some other Lords of his Council, to meet them that Day to treat with them, and to hear their Grievances. This gallant Man was proceeding farther in his Speech, and aggravating the Scots Offences, when, lo, unexpectedly, his Majesty enter'd the Room, and call'd for the Articles the Scots desir'd to be ratify'd, read them scarce over, but took Pen and Ink immediately and sign'd them, without ever advising with any of his Council; which so displeas'd the Nobility of the English Nation, that the very next Day after signing the Scots Articles, they all halted home to their own Habitations, the King staying behind, and for his daily Exercise playing at a scurvy Game, call'd Pigeon-Holes or Nine-Pins; his Fellow-Gamesters also were equal to the Game, viz. Lackeys, Pages, and such others, ejusdem Generis. He again no sooner came to London, but, as I remember, caus'd those Articles to be burn'd by the common Hangman, making himself as ridiculous in doing the one, as he was reputed weak and simple of Judgment in doing the other. The burning of the Scots Articles was imputed to the Importunity of the proud Clergy and Bishops." The Covenanters were by this confirm'd in their Jealousies that there was Hypocrisy in the Treaty. They kept up their Fortifications at Leith, their Councils and Meetings. They inforc'd Subscriptions to the Acts of the Assembly at Glasgow, contrary to the King's Declaration. They declar'd those that had taken up Arms for his Majesty, Incendiaries and Traytors. They annull'd all the Acts of the College of Justice. And the King, who had given them Hopes of his Presence in the ensuing Parliament, resolv'd not to expose himself to new Affronts, which he was sure to meet with at Edinburgh after this new Disgust, occasion'd by burning the Pacification, which his Friends in England thought dishonourable, but the Puritans and Peesbyterians were pleas'd with it, as it gave the Scots Time to increase their Strength.

According to the King's Direction, the General Assembly sat at Edinburgh, and abolish'd Episcopacy, the five Articles of Perth, the High Commission and Liturgy: All which was assented to by the Earl of Traquair, his Majesty's High-Commissioner, who also sign'd the Covenant, not as High-Commissioner, but as Earl of Traquair. The Bishops of Dunkeld and Orkney abjur'd Episcopacy, as being not founded on the Word of God: So Larry words it, but was attended with terrible and pernicious Consequences in several Parts of Christendom, particularly in the Church of Scotland. After the Assembly; sat the Parliament, who highly debated the Choice of the Lords of the Articles, in regard the Bishops were abolish'd, of whom eight us'd to be nam'd by the King to be of that Number, but now it was voted that his Majesty should nominate eight Noblemen instead of them for this Sessions only, and afterwards there should be no Nomination for them. The Parliament fram'd an Act Recissory, touching the Exchequer, Judicatory Proxies, and Ward Lands; which encroaching on the King's Prerogative, his Majesty order'd his Commissioners to Prorogue them: But the Parliament declar'd the Prorogation illegal, as without their Consent; and sent four Deputies to London; the Earl of Dumferling, the Lord Loudon, Sir William Douglas, and Mr. Robert Barclay, to justify their Proceedings. Thither also came the Earl of Traquair, and both Parties were order'd to be heard by a Committee of Council. But the Scotch Deputies, pursuant to Instructions from their Principals, refus'd to address themselves to the Council, and his Majesty condescended to hear them himself. Many passionate Expressions and Recriminations pass'd between the Deputies and Traquair; but the latter was most favour'd, and the King refus'd to ratify the Acts of the Assembly and Parliament.

During these Scottish Broils, an Engagement happen'd on the English Coast, near Dover, between the Dutch and Spanish Fleets: The latter, about seventy Sail, were bound to Dunkirk with Recruits of Men and Money for that Garrison. The Dutch Fleet intercepted them, and attack'd them near Dover and Calais. The Dutch, though but twenty-five Sail, took two Spanish Galeons, sunk another, and shatter'd the rest. The Spaniards made towards the Coast of England, and the Dutch follow'd them, but would not attack them within our King's Dominions. The Spanish Resident at London, importun'd his Majesty to keep off the Dutch for two Tides. The Dutch Ambassador made Application to him against the Spaniards. The King in Amity with both, resolv'd to stand Neuter; and indeed had no Maritime Strength ready at that Time, nor Disposition at any Time to do otherwise. The Spanish Admiral by Night convey'd away fourteen Ships, and 4000 Men in them. His Majesty sent the Earl of Arundel on board the Spanish Admiral, Don Antonio d'Oquendo, to desire him to retreat as soon as the Wind was fair, because he would not have an Engagement upon his Seas; but the Wind continuing long contrary, and the Dutch Fleet being reinforc'd, encompass'd their Enemies within Pistol-Shot for some Days: At last Van Tromp, the Dutch Admiral, engag'd them, and by his Men of War and Fireships, forc'd them to cut their Cables. Twenty-three of the Spanish Ships ran ashore and stranded in the Downs. Don Oquendo with the rest put to Sea, and was pursu'd by Van Tromp, who burnt the Admiral of Portugal, took eleven more of the Spanish Fleet, sunk five, and drove three more on the French Coast: So that only ten escap'd, and got into Dunkirk. Whitlocke informs us many believ'd this Armado was design'd for an Invasion of England, by Encouragement of the Pope's Agents and Emissaries; and it does not disagree with the Pope's Orders to the Papists to desist from contributing to the Bishops War, in Supposition that their Money might be wanted for some better Service even than that.

Dutch and Spanish Fleets fight in the Downs.

The young Prince Elector, pursuant to the Advice given him by the young Prince of Orange, came again into England at this Time, to solicit the King of England, his Uncle, to procure him the Command of the Swedish Army in Germany, upon the Death of Duke Bernard. His Majesty desir'd the French Ambassador to move it to his Master, who willingly undertook it, and Cardinal Richlieu promis'd to further it. In the mean Time his Electoral Highness precipitated his Journey into Germany, and without staying for the French King's procuring him that Command, he attempted to pass through France in Disguise, to reach the Swedish Army; but the English Ships in the Downs saluting him, and his own Ship discharging a Volley at his landing at Bologne, the French suspected there was a Person of high Rank aboard, and apprehended him. The Prince deny'd himself upon Examination, which increasing their Suspicion, he was secur'd

Jun 10 for Scotland.

The same Night that the Scots Deputies, the Lords Dunferling and Lowdon return'd to Edinburgh, a great part of the Castle-Wall fell down, with the Cannon mounted. The Covenanters suppos'd it to be done by Treachery, and wou'd not suffer it to be re-edify'd as his Majesty commanded, which highly offended him, and he concluded to force them to Obedience. In order to this, he appointed a select Council for Scottish Affairs; and at the Head of it was always Laud. Larrey writes, there were many Courtiers who condemn'd the Scots War; the end of which, as they said, was only to establish Arbitrary Power and Episcopacy; and the King was only the Archbishop of Canterbury's Knight. Laud, Strafford and Hamilton were this select Council, term'd a Junto; and they resolv'd, that at any Rate the King's Authority must be vindicated, and rescu'd from Contempt. Sanderson tells us, they vot- ed to force the Scotch to submit.

The Earl of Traquair brought with him to London, a Letter to the French King, which he had intercepted. 'Twas advis'd and compos'd by Montrofs, and transcrib'd by Lowdon. It was sign'd by Roths, Montrofs, Lesley, Mar, Montgomery, Lowdon, Forrester; directed Au Roy. They address'd to the French King, as a Sanctuary for afflicted States, praying the wonted Assistance which that Crown had always afforded to their Nation. This Letter was no doubt drawn up by Advice of Richien's Emissaries in Scotland, who were order'd to promise the Scots Malecontents his Master's Assistance. His Majesty was mightily concern'd at Sight of it, and objected it to the Scots as an insufferable Indignity: But the Covenanters boldly avow'd the Letter as a National Act, in which all Men, without Exception, were involv'd; arguing, that when a People are distress'd by Sea and Land, it is allow'd by the Laws of God and Man, to call for Help from God and Man. They also recriminated, That a Letter lately sent to the Pope, containing Matters utterly unjustifiable was not bid from the World. There was something merry in this Story of the Letter, which Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard never heard of; though they had heard of a silly Tale about the Address Au Roy. In the first Draft of this Letter, instead of Rayons de Soleil, Rays of the Sun, 'twas said, Rays de Soleil. Now Ray in French is a Thornback; and when Lord Lauderdale's Father read it, he refus'd to sign it; not because it was Treason, but because it was Nonsense; saying, the French King's Glory shin'd like a Thornback.

The Earl of Dunferling and the Lord Lowdon were come back to London with fresh Demands, to have the Prorogation taken off, the Castles of Edinburgh and Dumbarton evacuated; and an Oath which the Scots in England and Ireland were oblig'd to take contrary to the Covenant, vacated. Instead of a favourable Answer, the Lord Lowdon was sent to the Tower, for transcribing the above-mention'd Letter, where he was very likely to have been dispatch'd, as by the following Story, which has to vouch it an Authority too Noble to be call'd in Question.

MS. M. F.

Lord Lowdon's Danger in the Tower.

Sir William Balfour, Governor of the Tower, when Lord Lowdon was committed, some Days after receiv'd a Warrant from the King for the beheading that Lord the next Day within the Tower, for fear of any Disturbance if it had been done openly on the Hill. The Lieutenant, who was at Cards with Lowdon, chang'd Countenance, and holding up his Hands in Amazement, shew'd his Lordship the Warrant; who said to him, Well, Sir, you must do your Duty: I only desire Time to make a Settlement on some younger Children, and that you will let my Lawyer come to me for that End; to which Balfour consented; and the Lawyer carry'd away with him a Letter to the Marquis of Hamilton, informing him of the Matter, and telling him, He was a Scotchman, and must answer it to his Country. Balfour follows the Lawyer to the Marquis, whom they cou'd not presently find, it being Night, at last they found him at Lady Clayton's; and having deliver'd him the Lord Lowdon's Letter, which Balfour further explain'd, the Marquis took Sir William with him to Court, not staying for his Coach, and desired Admittance about a Business of very great Importance to his Majesty. He was told the King and Queen were in Bed, and had given positive Orders not to admit any one. The Marquis in vain insist'd on his own Right as one of the Lords of the Bedchamber, and the Right of the Lieutenant of the Tower, especially when he had any State Prisoner: Upon which Sir William knock'd at the King's Bedchamber Door, which being open'd to him, he fell upon his Knees, and having just mention'd the Warrant, his Majesty stopp'd him, saying, it shall be executed. Upon which the Marquis enters, and falling on his Knees, humbly expostulated with the King concerning it. The Queen express'd great Displeasure at his Intrusion: But the Marquis taking her up short, let her know she was a Subject as well as himself; and that the Business he came about was of the highest Concernment to his Majesty, to herself, to the whole Nation, and to himself in particular. He then spoke with great Earnestness to the King, and us'd all the Arguments he cou'd think of to dissuade him from the Execution. But all to no purpose. Sir, says he, if you persist in this Resolution, no Scotsman will ever draw a Sword for you; or if they would who should command them? The King reply'd, Yourself. No, Sir, said Hamilton; I dare never appear in Scotland afterwards. The King nevertheless swore twice, By God Lowdon shall dye. Then the Marquis craving Leave to speak one word more said, Sir, I desire your Majesty to look out for another House, for within four and twenty Hours there will not be one Stone of Whitehall left upon another. This touch'd the King more than all the Arguments of Pity, Justice, or distant Danger. He call'd for the Warrant, tore it, and dismiss'd the Marquis and Lieutenant somewhat sullenly. This Incident being not in Bishop Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, he was ask'd why he did not insert it, and reply'd, I knew it, but durst not tell it. He owns there the King was advis'd to proceed capitally against Lowdon, but Lord Hamilton oppos'd it. The late Duke Hamilton own'd it to be true in the late Queen's Time, adding, I'll print it if I outlive her. And this Story is so well known to all the People of the first Quality in North Britain, that I am not afraid to conclude from thence, there was no Passion so strong in King Charles the First as the Desire of arbitrary Power and Revenge on those whom he took to be his Enemies.

About this Time it was resolv'd to call a Parliament to obtain Supplies for the Scots War. The Junto agreed to it, as the only Way to raise the Money they wanted; and as Buckingham formerly had the Merit of advising the calling a Parliament, so Strafford has it now to ingratiate him with the People. Whitlocke writes, "In the mean time, and it was a strange time for such a Business so near the Sitting of a Parliament, the King tells "his Lords, It will be long ere the Parliament meets, and Subsidies granted by them will be long in le- vyng: In the Interim my Affairs suffer without some speedy Course of Supply". Upon which the Lords told him they wou'd engage their own Credit. Strafford subscrib'd 20000 l. Richmond as much. Hamilton excus'd himself on account of Inability. Most of the rest subscrib'd, and some few refus'd. The Judges and Officers of Courts of Justice Ecclesiastical and Temporal were affect'd by the Council according to the Quality and Profit of their

The Queen appointed Sir Kenelm Digby, whose Father was hang'd for the Gunpowder Plot, and Mr. Walter Mountague, afterwards an Abbot in France, to negotiate with the Papists, who now contributed beyond their Abilities. And Sanderson confesses their large Contributions gave Occasion throughout the War to call the King's Forces the Papish Army.

The Scots on their Side send for their Commanders home, who had serv'd in Sweden, Denmark, Germany, and the Netherlands; and one Historian, as great an Admirer of this Government as Mr. Echard, and as great a Politician, assures us, they solicited the Turk to fall upon the Emperor, and prevent his assisting King Charles against them. If the Jesuits had any Hand in the ensuing Commotions, as is pretended by a Letter of Andreas de Habernfield, a noble Bohemian, Servant to the Queen of Bohemia, it must be from an Opinion of the Weakness of the Covenanters, whose Designs they hop'd would end in their Destruction. Great Resort was made to the Scots Commissioners in London, and many secret Councils were held with them by the discontented English. Whitlock names some of their Correspondents: The Earls of Essex, Bedford, Holland, the Lord Say, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Pym, and divers other Lords and Gentlemen of great Quality, who, he says, were deep in with them. And Welwood shews us what was the Substance of their Correspondence: "Informations of the Backwardness of England to assist the King in this War; and that they were well assur'd of Friends all over the Kingdom, and some of nearest Access to the King's Person". But he thinks it was not these Informations which encourag'd the Scots not only to march again to the Borders of England, but to invade and possess themselves of the Northern Counties. He is of Opinion they took that bold Step by means of a forg'd Letter they receiv'd just when they were ready to march, sign'd by several of the principal Noblemen of England; which is the Invitation so much talk'd of by Mr. Acherley, Dr. Welwood, Bishop Burnet, and even by Archdeacon Echard, tho' very confusedly and obscurely. This very Letter I have read several times, and the Copy of it will now be communicated to the Publick with the exact History of that whole Secret.

Lord Saville's Intrigue to bring in the Scots.

Mention has been made of the general Encouragement given the Scots by the English to proceed in their Undertakings after the Pacification was burnt, and a new Rupture seem'd to be drawing on. But as the Scots had only Words, and no Engagement, nor any thing under hand, Sir Archibald Johnston Lord of Wariston, a Man of great Zeal and Abilities, who kept a constant Correspondence with Lord Lowdon, one of the Scots Commissioners in England, wrote to his Lordship to get some solid Assurance of Assistance from their Friends in England. The last Letter to the Lord Lowdon on that Subject was dated the 23d of June 1640, and sign'd Nathaniel Black. The Contents as follows in the genuine Scottish Stile.

My L.

MIND these ar by Warrant of the best and prymeest to desire you most seriously to deal with our Friends in all Earnestness, as they desire the great Business to prosper for their and our Deliverance, that they would now at last find out the Ways of giving us full Assurance of their concurring with us in their Persons, Means and Credit; for seing our Army, as we trust, about 25000 Men, Horse and Foot (if not more, as we have appointed and expects, but counts the least) has now their Rendezvous at Leith this Week and the Beginning of the next; whereof

A.D. 1640. some Regiments in Fife are come this Day, and the West Regiments will be here on Thursday, and that before the 10th of July we will be all lying at the Borders ready to march in on 6 Hours Advertisment; and seing the best national Leads amongst us in natural Parts and Wisdom will be questioning both the Warrant and Call of our Voyage and Danger, and Sequels thereof, except first by one solid Way or other we be clear'd of our Friends Approbation of that our Course, and Concurrence with us in it: Therefore ye must above all deal with them, as they love their and our common Safety and Deliverance, now when it is so near and easy by their Assurance before and Concurrence after our Entry, that they wou'd against that time of our lying down on the Borders (besides the Relations made by bare Words, unknown Papers, and common Carriers of Servants, whereupon we are come so far, but dare not hazard the Flower of our Nation thereupon) further assure us of their Approbation and Concurrence, either by Subscriptions of some principal Persons sent to us, or by some eminent Person or Persons (whom we might trust for the rest) that joining with us (allbeit it were but one) their single Persons immediately before our Entry, or by their rising in one or sundry Bodies amongst themselves, or by sending to us near the Borders some present Supply of Money, or clear Evidence where we shall find it ready near hand, that we might pay for our Entertainment in the passage, or by any other solid and certain way of Engagement and Assurance, whilke we do not presume to prescribe in the particular, but above all recommend it in general, that their Grant of it (in any way that would satisfy themselves, if they were in our Case, and we in theirs) may farther confirm our Conscience of our Calls, and strengthen our Hand against the Apprehensions of Danger from the invironing Forces of a whole forraine, potent Nation, if they concurred unanimously against us, as Invaders of them in a hostile way; whereas the Lord knows our Intentions and Actions shall be for them as for our own Souls. Besides this, there seems to be a Necessity of our meeting on the Borders before our Entry with some eminent and judicious Persons, that having advis'd how they may resolve there (if they think it necessary, as we apprehend, but conclude nothing) that as in 1585. (besides that at the Reformation) there was a League intended between Queen Elizabeth and King James the VIth, and the two Dominions against the Council of Trent; so there may be some League and Band drawn up, wherein as we may profess our sincere Resolutions for them as for ourselves, so as we go peaceably without wronging any through the Countries, all Favourers of the Protestant Religion and Liberties of the Kingdom may subscribe as a Mark of Distinction from our common Foes the Papists, Prelates, and their Adherents, some Band of this Kind for maintaining the Protestant Religion, and the several Churches and Liberties of the Kingdom; for having the same Friends and Foes in this Cause; for making no Peace without settling both Churches and Kingdoms, and for mutual Concurrence with others against our common Adversaries Papists and Prelates in that Cause; and to that End we take not on us to prescribe the Way to be taken after our Entry, nor the particular Way of their assuring us before our Entry. But as an Assurance of us before our Entry, and Band of Conjunction after our Entry, is necessary for the Safety and Surety of both Nations in one another; so we leave to their Wisdom to consider this or any other Mean God shall direct them to think of most conducible to this great Work on Earth in hand. For besides that, we shall have ready by the Grace of God our Declaration of our innocent Intention and Carriage so fully, clearly and brotherly (upon the Grounds ye sent down) as shall give great Satisfaction to them all.

But it's time to return to our Assurance before hand, whereunto we suspect the greatest Impediment to be the Hazard of their revealing it. By God's Assistance we are resolv'd on a solid way of Secrecy in the Particulars, whilke will be intrusted to a very few most sure Persons, (albeit by Generals we would be the more enabled to encourage the Army that will relye much on their Confidence in some few) as knowing our own and the Cause's Prejudice in the Discovery and Danger of our Friends; and on the other Part, seeing we will then be lying on the Borders ready to march in on that Assurance before it can be discover'd, and to concur with them and they with us before they can be indanger'd, they will be in no more Hazard by assuring us immediately before our Entry, nor they will be by declaring themselves for us after our Entry, according to their Resolutions and Promises: for by the Lord's Assistance we shall follow hard, and hinder the King's Forces from harming them. And as this Fore-Assurance is no Prejudice to them, (whom no doubt when all is done the King and their Adversaries suspect, and know well enough already, but for fear of Tumults abstain from meddling with them) so it will be a great Incouragement to us of God's Call for their Deliverance as well as for our own. We cannot think that they who resolve to wear their Lives, Liberties and Estates with us in this common Cause of Religion and Liberty, will be slack to give us the Fore-Assurances thereof by all possible and probable Means; as it wou'd be a Token of our Inconsiderateness in so weighty and so little a Passage, so their shifting or refusing would be apprehended by some as a Ground of Jealousy, lest they fail'd us in our greatest encompassing Straits. God is our Witness, we desire and intend their Deliverance as our own.

It were a pitiful Case, that both should fail for Want of Assurance and Correspondence, when Matters are brought to so great a Height, and our Army's lying on the Borders, the sole and principal Means in any Probability, either of God's Way or Man's Way, to effectuate both; but we trust they will find out the Ways in their Wisdom to give us Satisfaction herein, as by God's Assistance we intend, and shall endeavour in all our Ways to give full Content as in the Sight of God, to whose great Time and Work we are all subservient in this Business for his Son and against the Man of Sin, by whatever Way, either by Writ or trusty Messengers, they resolve to assure us before the 10th of July on the Borders before our Entry, they wou'd condescend as far as is possible, what Force will be against us, and both what Forces and with what Assistance of Horse and Foot, and with what Money or Munition, in what Places severally or together, in what Times and by what Ways, what Guides they would send us; what Marks to distinguish Papiſts and Protestants, Friends and Foes; to whom we shall give Sureties for our Entertainment when we want Money (as we shall often, and give every where but to Prelates and Papiſts) and all such other Particulars they know we stand in need to be inform'd of clearly. I resum'd all your former Letters, and has written this by Warrant of our surest and secretest Heads, whilke above all I recommend to your special Care and Trust, as the very Hinge and Merſh of our Business. Ye know my Hand, and the Subscription of your own.

Nathaniel Black.

P. S. Whilke ye may take for more wore his own.

A.D. 1640

They receiv'd no direct Answer to this Letter; but what follows was sent them instead of one, sign'd by several English Lords, and address'd to a Gentleman to be communicated to them.

Sir,

According to our Promise unto you, we have seriously perused and well-weighed the Contents of the Letter which you did deliver unto us, and have thought fit to return unto you our Apprehensions of it, and our Answer unto it, and that in so few Words as the Greatness of the Occasion will permit us to do.

First, We find the Desires of the Authors of that Letter to be, that their English Friends wou'd give them some solid Assurance before their coming into England, that they came by their Invitations and Approbations; which in our Opinion would much wrong both our Cases; for it is publish'd throughout all England, that their coming into England is necessitated by those crafty wicked Counsellors near the King, who on purpose to divert this Quarrel of Religion, and to make it a national Quarrel, have made the King to besiege them by Land and Sea, taken their Ships, destroy'd their Trade, undone their Fortunes, and all to draw a War upon our Kingdom; upon which Ground we meant to make it a Part of our Remonstrance to the King as an unsupportable Grievance to our whole Nation; which Part is absolutely taken away from us, if they come in by the Persuasion of a discontented Faction here, as they will be call'd, and not by any Necessity the King laid upon them to occasion their coming.

Secondly, They desire not only our Invitation, but our personal Conjunction with Horse and Foot, and Men, and Money, and Credit, and the particular Names, and Times, and Places, and all by Covenant, before they enter. We know they understand it very well, that if Necessity brings them, their Entry must be just; for that cannot break any Law which is subject to no Law, as Necessity is not. But if we call them in without absolute Necessity compelling us thereunto, of a just Entry we shall make it an unjustifiable one on our Parts, as being absolute Treason by our Law of England, to be of Council for the bringing in of any foreign Forces, to adhere unto them, to supply them with Money, in the very Words of the Act of Parliament to resolve what shall be Treason, in King Edward the III'd's Days, as it is printed in our Books.

Now we durst let our Friends in the North judge if we can justify it to our God for the Hope of never so good Success, for most of the greatest Persons of the Kingdom of England, to begin with undeniable Treason by their own Laws guilty, and well known by them all to be so. It hath been the Happiness of the Scottish Nation, that in all their Turmoils, though in Appearance foul, yet they have never done any Act but what they will justify by the fundamental Laws of their own Nation, unto which only they are subject. This we assure you hath procur'd them many Friends, and much Honour and Glory abroad; and we are confident that they wou'd not have us in our Case less sensible of our Honour and Piety than they themselves, who have so often avow'd this in their publick Writs and publick Speeches to the King: It is not Security only that we expect from the King, but from our Consciences and good God, who otherwise will be justly offended with us, and give us up into our Enemies Hands. But if the Scots come in their own just Right, as necessitated unto it without any such Contract and Assu-

A.D. 1640. rance from us, we are resolv'd to do more, and more effectually for obtaining their and our honest Ends in a fair, just, and noble Way, than either they can expect or desire in this that is propounded; but it consists of so many Particulars, as it cannot well all be now recited; nor is it yet safe nor fit for them to know, for it is impossible to keep such Secrets long conceal'd in any Army. Here is not much Trust requir'd neither, that they put in us; for Policy of State will tell them, it is better to make the Seat of War in another's Country, rather than to seat it in their own. Besides, What Cause has this Nation given them since this Difference, to doubt of their Fidelity unto them? First, The greatest Band, the Enemies are all one, the common Interest one, the End is all one; a free Parliament to try all Offenders, and to settle Religion and Liberty, and to make our abus'd King more great in Goodness than they have made him unhappy in Ill. In the Parliament, what might we not have obtain'd for ourselves, if we would have join'd to ruin them? But we foresaw our own must follow presently; and since the Parliament, What Kingdom hath ever shew'd more Strictness against the Importunity of the King, than this hath done, in all his Demands, Men, Money, Ships, Loans, Soldiers, or any Thing that might enable him to bring an Army against them; which appears by the great Violence which hath been us'd to gather Forces, and the poor Companies which are yet rais'd? How many of the greatest Houses of England have gotten his Majesty's irreconcilable Displeasure against them, for their suspected Affections to them, who should find it, were they under the just Censure of the Law? To what End was all this, I pray you, if when our Deliverances drew nigh, we should forsake them in their greatest encompassing Streights? Is not that Deliverance more precious that is begun and continu'd without the Breach of one fundamental Law, rather than that which is compass'd by the Subversion of the greatest of all? Or may not a Prince be as easily won to do his Subjects Right, by a just Expostulation of his Nobility and Subjects in an opportune Season, as well as in an unlawful Convention, if they receive the same Fruit and Assistance by it? In Conclusion, we shall certainly appear (if they will believe so) just to them, just to God, just to the King, just to ourselves, to our Religion and Liberties; and according to that irrefragable Position of their noble Example, without the transgressing either of the Laws of God or Man. This we thought fit to acquaint you with, and leave it to your Discretion and Fidelity to dispose of as you shall see Cause; and shall ever rest

Your respective Friends,

Bedford, Essex, Brooke, Warwick, Say and Seal, Mandeville, Savile.

This is the important Letter which most Authors make mention of, but none ever saw, and all are mistaken in. Welwood says twelve Noblemen sign'd it; Mr. Acherley puts the Earl of Mulgrave, Earl of Clare, and Earl of Bolingbroke's Hands to it, as also the Hands of several Leading Commoners; whereas in Fact there were no Hands to it but those of the seven Lords above-mention'd; and it is uncertain whether those Hands were counterfeited by Lord Savile himself, or Mr. Henry Darley. They were afterwards cut out by Sir Archibald Johnstoun who had the Original, and restor'd to every one of those Lords his Name. Darley carry'd Sir Archibald's Letter sign'd Nathaniel Black to Lord Savile from the Lord Lowdon; and this Letter pretended to be from the seven Lords, is doubtless address'd to Mr. Darley, who had been with those Lords, as well as with Savile. It is evidently written to an Englishman and no Peer, to shun the Danger of Correspondence with the Scots. There is no Inscription to it; Darnley it seems shun'd that; however, he went post with it, inclos'd in Savile's Letter, to the Scots on the Borders. The Lord Lowdon went for Scotland about the 28th of June, before Savile's pretended Letter cou'd be procur'd; and it is probable both the Letters, the pretended one, and his own long Letter, which was very particular, were written in Yorkshire the 8th of July: The latter having the Authority of the other Letter, with the Lords Names to it, was without doubt a much greater Assurance to them, and the Hinge upon which that great Affair turn'd.

The Lords whom Mr. Darley had been with, refus'd to give any Thing under their Hands in answer to Sir Archibald Johnstoun's Letter. They agreed in promising the Scots all good Offices and Services upon Occasion, in general Terms, but never came to Particulars, nor to a formal Invitation, much less to any Compact sign'd by them. However, the Lord Savile who knew their good Intentions, resolv'd to make the most of it, and he and Darley concerted the two Letters which Savile worded. His Design was to bring the Scots in, to prosecute and destroy the Earl of Strafford as an Incendiary, and then to betray those Lords to the King, which he did afterwards, when Strafford was beheaded, and instigated his Majesty to try them for High-Treason upon the very Letter he himself had counterfeited; and it was to procure that Letter, that King Charles went to Scotland in August 1641; which tho' he fail'd in, yet he discover'd so much of the pretended Correspondence, as to form a Charge of High-Treason upon it against the Lord Mandeville, call'd also Kimbolton, and five Members of the House of Commons, and enter'd their House with an arm'd Force to seize them; and that his so doing brought on the Civil War, is agreed on all Hands. Savile wrote Letters to all the Lords on purpose to get Answers to them, and by their Names to those Answers, he so well counterfeited the Names of the several Lords, that when those Lords afterwards saw their pretended Hand-writing, they declar'd, ev'ry one of them, they cou'd not swear they did not write their Names, tho' they cou'd swear they had sign'd no such Letter. What follows is the Letter of positive Assurance and Particulars, written by Lord Savile to Lord Lowdon.

To the Right Honourable John, &c.

The rest is cut out.

Right Honourable,

HOW much more safe it were for me to have attended you in Person with Assurance of Liberty, than to be here in perpetual Danger of Constraint upon the least Colour of Suspicion; your Lordship, who have lately tasted the Fruits of our English Justice, will easily imagine. Yet consulting with some Friends of yours here, who know the many Dependancies upon me, and Opportunities of doing Service; whereas it is conceiv'd my Prefence wou'd be very necessary, and that by my Person I can contribute nothing more than what is compris'd in this Paper, it was concluded by an unanimous Consent, that it was very requisite for me to defer my coming till some other Time; and thus in Submission to this Resolution, I shall faithfully and fully give Answer to such Particulars of the Letter as I conceive are of most Consequence for your Knowledge and my Discharge.

Your Lordship may remember that it was the 27th of June e're you did communicate the Letter unto me; the next Day was to be set apart for hearing of the Word and Prayer; two Days more were spent in London, to let your Friends know

A.D. 1640. know the State of your Affairs, and to settle a Way of giving them certain and speedy Intelligence of your Proceedings; five Days more were spent on my Journey into my own Country, so as I have neglected but three Days, and I presume you will not say they were altogether neglected, when you have perus'd this together with the inclos'd. I conceive the main Scope of your Letter, Lord Wariston's, may be compris'd under these two Heads, A fair Call before your Entry, and a Concurrence after. In answer to the first of these, I shall refer you to the inclos'd, which doth fully explain their own Sense, and is the best Index of their Hearts, rather than to cloath their Expressions with any Language of my own. And thus much, my Lord, let me tell you, that altho' it be not the Way which your Letter doth desire, yet upon a due Consideration of the State of our Government, it was thought by wise Men, and I am persuaded your Lordship will approve of it as more safe, more just, more honourable for them, and no less effectual and powerful for both our Ends, than your own. And good, my Lord, let not petty Jealousies, or improbable Fears, retard so good a Business for the Church of God and our Common Liberties, as by his Providence is so near at this Time, if it please God that you speed your Entry at or near the Time prefix'd in your Letter. And I beseech you not to imagine that it is for fear of their Persons being known, that they refuse to be the Callers of you in, or Contractors before-hand for either Men or Money, or any other Supply, but only to keep their Consciences and Honour clear; for their Persons are mutually engag'd one to another, upon the first Assurance of your Entry into this Kingdom, to unite themselves into a considerable Body, and to draw up a Remonstrance to be presented to the King, wherein they will comprize yours and their own just Grievances, and require a mutual Redress. And now, my Lord, for your Satisfaction in Point of Concurrence, give me Leave to tell you that all my Intelligence is calculated only for the Meridian of Yorkshire, and the more Southern Parts; for till your Entry there, you must expect great Difficulties, because there are many Papists in those Parts, whom none can make Friends to the Cause. But, alas! my Lord, What can that Number do against your Army, if it be so great as it is mention'd in the Letter, and that you make a speedy Entry before they can be in a Readiness? Grumble and mutter they may peradventure, fight they dare not; but I shall proceed briefly to relate Things as they appear to me upon my best Enquiry.

These are certain.

1. In the Judgments of all that I have met with, it is approv'd that your Army and Entry are the sole and principal Means in any Probability to effectuate both our Desires.
2. That if we clash one against another, or be divided one from another, we are in extreme Peril to be both lost.
3. That some Covenant of mutual Defence of the Religion and Liberties already establish'd in both Kingdoms, is also absolutely necessary to be drawn up and subscrib'd by both of us. And it is desir'd that you will be pleas'd (as better vers'd in Businesses of this Nature) to do it, and to tender it to all English as you march along; and it is presum'd many are very ready to join with you in it.

Before your Entry these things are done.

Biron's Troops in Carlisle have no Saddles, nor shall have any; 800 of the best have no Pistols, nor shall have any.

A.D. 1640. There's already of the King's Money about 2000 l. which before you can come, in an ordinary March, will be perhaps double or treble that Sum. 'Tis intended for you, which you shall have notice of at your first coming into the Country, where it will be in a Readiness; which will be a good leading Cafe to the whole Kingdom.

These Things are intended, and probable after your Entry.

That the Sheriff and Gentry will for the Security of their Wives and Children and Evidences seize upon York or Hull, or both, whereby the King will be disappointed of a great Part of his Strength, which he depends upon there, and your Way made open: That the Lords, as I formerly mention'd, will upon the first Certainty of your Entry join together, as is touch'd in their Letter.

That some Troops of Horse, the Number whereof is not yet certain, and a Regiment of Foot, besides particular Persons out of every Regiment, will turn to you.

That the Gentry will be willing to afford you Victuals in a plentiful manner, and the meaner Sort upon very easy Conditions.

I am likewise to recommend unto you from your Friends in the South these ensuing Considerations, which they conceive will be of good Advantage to you for the perfecting your Design.

1. That upon your Entry you should march with all possible Speed to London, where the Lords and City will be ready to receive and join with you.

2. That in the Way, especially at first, you should forbear to take any thing from any, whether Prelate or Papist, without their Consent and Payment for it; for these Reasons, because your Friends do make account to send you back when the Work is done, with a liberal Recompense for your Charges; and they conceive it will be more for your Honour to have less with Love and Justice, than more with Violence and Oppression; as also to take away the Scandal Abroad and here at Home, by those who yet stand well-affected to you. The first Impressions last long, and make a great Noise; therefore good, my Lord, let your first Approaches be fair and sweet according to your Declaration.

3. That where you hear there are any considerable Bodies of Men, that you would send to them, and let them know your Unwillingness to fight with any in this Quarrel, coming in for our Good as well as your own, and send them your Declaration to that Purpose. But if any be so mad as to assault you, spare them not; and be assur'd it will not make it a national Quarrel, because the Army is patch'd up of Strangers, Papists, and the SCUM of the Country, which if your Swords prevent not, will undoubtedly die in a Halter; so as in my poor Skill I cannot see any Danger, nor any Doubt of good Success, but a happy Deliverance of the poor imprison'd and fetter'd Gospel in both Kingdoms, and a just Judgment upon the Authors of these desperate Counsels. My Lord, I shall humbly beg for myself, that the Bearer hereof may be return'd with all possible Speed and Secrecy, and an undoubted Assurance of your Resolutions, because I am to transmit it into the South with all Speed. Thus presuming of your Favour herein, I rest your Lordship's Servant, MU M.

P. S. Let us hear the certain Day of your beginning to march.

This encouraging Letter from the Lord Savile to the Lord Lowdon, animated the Scots to march far

A.D. 1640. far into England; most of the Substance of it is his own Invention, especially about the Money and the King's Horse at Carlisle. His Advice, probably then real, is good, but when it had had the Success he desir'd, the Scots and their Friends were to be sacrific'd to his Ambition; and, as has been observ'd, he was so treacherous as to advise the King to prosecute the Lords on the Letter himself had forg'd. The Scots not hastening their March as was expected, one of their Chiefs receiv'd this Letter:

Worthy Sir,

SUCH is our Affection to your Cause, and Care of your Affair, that nothing hath been omitted which might conduce to the Furtherance of your Design, nor the Discharge of our own Promises. But your often failing in Point of Entrance after solemn Engagements by Word and Writ, hath possess'd the most of us with a just Jealousy that you are hatching your own Peace, which hath deaden'd the Hearts of all your Friends, disabled the most active to do you any farther Service, and disappointed yourselves of near 10000 Pounds, which was provided and kept for you till you had twice fail'd, and that there was little or no Hope of your coming. The Lord hath given you Favour in the Eyes of the People, so as I know not whether they are more incens'd against our own Soldiers, or desirous of yours. If you really intend to come, strike while the Iron is hot; if you be uncertain what to resolve, let us know it, that we may secure our Lives, tho' we hazard our Estates by retiring. Here is no Body of an Army to interrupt you, no Ordnance to dismay you; no Money to pay our own; the City hath once more refus'd to lend, the Train'd-Bands to be press'd; the Country storms at the billeting of Soldiers; Quarrels arise every Day about it. If you have a good Cause, why do you stand still? If a bad, why have you come so far? Either die or do, and so you shall be Sons of Valour. P. S. If there be any Thing of Consequence, you shall have speedy Intelligence of it.

Your Friend,

J. H. R.

This Letter was dated the 9th, and they enter'd England the 21st of August. It is not known who sent it, but it seem'd to quicken the Scots Motions, falling into the Hands of Lord Wariston*. We must leave the Scots making Preparations for this March, and return to the Affairs of England, where we find

Edward Bagshaw Esq; Reader of the Middle-Temple, fallen into the Displeasure of Archbishop Laud for reading on the Statute of 25 Edward III. and saying, An Act of Parliament wou'd be good without Assent of the Bishops, and that no benefit'd Clerk was by the Law capable of temporal Jurisdiction. Thus the making Dr. Fuxon Lord High-Treasurer was against Law; and indeed it is amazing how Fuxon cou'd be so impos'd upon by Laud, as to accept of such a troublesome temporal Office, when he had upon him so many Calls of the Holy Ghost to Spiritual Functions; for whatever my Judgment is of such Calls, otherwise than establish'd by Custom and Law, these Men assert they are purely Divine, as is indeed the due Discharge of their Vocation; so weighty, that in the Language of the Fathers, it shou'd make Angels tremble. Doit faire trembler les Anges, said a French Papist. But instead of trembling under the Burden of a Minister of the Gospel, and a Governor of seven or eight hundred other Ministers, Dr. Fuxon claps the whole Load of the Treasury upon his Shoulders; and instead of trembling, is in much Ease and Joy. The Archbishop procur'd an Order for silencing Mr. Bagshaw; but the Gentlemen of the Temple were so far from thinking the worse of him, that when he went out of Town some time after, he was accompany'd with forty or fifty Horse of that honourable Society.

Lord Lowdon staid not long in London after the Marquis of Hamilton got his Discharge, as is seen by Lord Savile's Letter. Echard thinks the Favour shewn Lowdon in not cutting off his Head after he was sent to the Tower, was very impolitick. The Treason was for transcribing a Letter which was never sent, address'd AU ROY; a Stile only us'd from Subjects to their natural King, according to his wise Observation; whereas the Stile is always us'd by ev'ry one who has Occasion to write to the King of France, whether Frenchman or Foreigner. His Observation is as wise which refers to Cardinal Richlieu's fomenting the Scottish Troubles to revenge the Duke of Buckingham's Expedition at Rbe, which had been sufficiently reveng'd by the Infamy of it; whereas nothing is plainer than that Richlieu gave the King what Trouble he cou'd, in Resentment of the Queen's supporting her Mother Mary de Medicis to the utmost of her Ability; and every good Office done that Princess, grated the very Soul of the implacable Cardinal, who persecuted her to Death. The reverend Author proceeds in the same Degree of Wisdom, The threatening Insults from the North, caus'd the King to resolve upon new Measures, the very same as he took last Year, to raise an Army, march them to the North, and return again to London, tho' not with so much saving to his Honour as the last Campaign: And as if the Oracle of Delphos was to be consulted, the great Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland was sent for over. It is wonderfully pleasant; Great was the Expectation of all the English, what might be the Effect of his Arrival, and great was the Opinion which Men had generally conceiv'd of his Parts; which he explains well enough a Line or two after: some said freely, He was sent for only to compleat that bad Work which others of less Brains than he had begun. Larrey tells us; The Vol. II. Applause that was given him, came only from the p. 14. Mouths of his Creatures; and that in Ireland he employ'd his Time in making secret Levies of Men and Money to assist the King against the Scots Presbyterians; that he oblig'd all the Scots who had Habitations or Estates in Ireland, to take an Oath quite contrary to the Covenant; and that he turn'd the Lord-Chancellor Loftus out of his Office, for not assisting in raising Troops, &c. It was prov'd against Strafford, that he gave the King this dangerous and treasonable Advice as soon as he came over. Rushw. Sir, you have tried your People, and are denied by Whitelocke, them; therefore you are clear before God and Man, if you make use of other Means for your Supply; you have an Army in Ireland. This is the Counsel of the Archdeacon's Oracle of Delphos; he might as well have call'd him the Colossus of Rhodes. The Scots were well acquainted with the Advice he had given his Majesty to treat them as Rebels; upon which they join'd heartily in that Prosecution which ended in cutting off the Head of this Delphian Oracle, who by his Conduct in Ireland had so rais'd the Spirits of the Papists, that they soon after made

Mr. Bagshaw persecuted by Laud.

Salm. 169.

* These Original Papers relating to the Affairs of Scotland, carry with them sufficient Evidence of their Truth: But if that shou'd ever be call'd in question, they will be so well touch'd, as will leave no room for Suspicion, and be much to the Confusion of those who suspected it. 'Twill by this appear how hard it is to come at the Truth even in Things of the greatest Importance; for neither Welwood nor even Bishop Burnet, who wou'd not have sunk what they had known, nor Clarendon nor Echard, who probably wou'd have told us no more than made for their Purpose, had Knowledge of these Matters just as they pass. The latest Account, Mr. Acherley's, is the best, yet it is not perfect nor full.

146 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1640. a bold and bloody Attempt to extirpate the whole Generation of Protestants in that Kingdom by a general Massacre. He advis'd the King, says the French Historian, to keep an equal Balance between the Papists and the Protestants; but the former who already were too powerful, abus'd the Favour, and the Event shew'd that Strafford cou'd not have given more pernicious Counsel. One wou'd think Echard had taken his Panegyrick on Wentworth, from Gregorio Leti, who writes, that in the Opinion of the English, Strafford was the greatest Politician in the World; and a few Pages after gives us an Account of Oliver Cromwel's Discourse with Cardinal Richlieu at Paris, of his Entertainment at that Court, and of his quitting it after he had got a Bastard on a Wench upon Promise of Marriage. It is great pity those excellent Memoirs of his had not fallen into the Archdeacon's Hands, he might have outdone himself in copying after so catholick and so sincere an Historian.

Parliament.

To carry on this second War with the Scots, a Parliament was call'd after a very disorderly manner; according to Echard, Many Pulpits were employ'd by the Scots Faction to obtain their Ends, and no Pains spar'd in packing of Voices, which were often so violent, that these Meetings for Elections appear'd more like riotous Tumults. False beyond Conception! What need all this Stir when the Nation had so long lain under Oppression, and were generally averse to the Ministers, who had been the Occasion of it? It therefore did not require much Pains to get such a Representative as wou'd insist on the Redress of Grievances, which were continu'd notwithstanding the Parliament was so soon to meet. The Court, says he, still proceeded in the same unpopular Ways, Ship-Money was levy'd with the same Severity, and the same Rigor us'd in the Ecclesiastical Courts, without complying with the Humour of any Man; which happy Temper appear'd at the Opening of the Session the 13th of April, when his Majesty rode in State to Westminster, to hear a Sermon preach'd by Wren Bishop of Ely, one of the most obnoxious Prelates in the Kingdom. The Two Houses being met, he made a short Speech to them, and refer'd them to another obnoxious Person the Lord-Keeper Finch, who succeeded Coventry. This Keeper began his Oration with a Piece of Eloquence which the Archdeacon is extremely taken with: "His Majesty's kingly Resolutions are seated in the Ark of his sacred Breast, and it were too high a Presumption for any Un-
"call'd to touch it. Therefore you are to "remember, that tho' the King sometimes lays by
"the Beams and Rays of Majesty, yet he never
"lays by Majesty itself." He then laid before them the transcendent Happiness of the Nation, which will be presently set forth in the House of Commons. He represented the Scots as so many REBELS, whom the King was resolv'd to reduce, and demanded immediate Aid before they enter'd upon Grievances. They had the prettiest dictating Way with them. When he had ended his Speech, the King re-assum'd his, to give them an Account of the Letter he had intercepted, directed to the French King, which the Lord-Keeper wou'd read to them. He told them he had secur'd one of the Parties concern'd in the Tower. The Lord-Keeper holding the Letter folded, read the Superscription, AU ROY; and then raising his Voice very theatrically, said, None but the French can write such a Superscription to the French King; and whoever writes so, acknowledges the King they address to for their Sovereign. Here's Logick as well as Rhetorick! Does every Foreigner who addresses to the King of England thus AU ROY, to THE KING, acknowledge him to be his Sovereign? Does not Monsieur Voltaire in his Epistle Dedicatory to the Henriade, say To the Queen? Yet as boyish as this Reasoning is, 'tis gravely continu'd by Finch before the most illustrious Assembly in the World, Therefore these Words are sufficient to convict the Scots of Felony, and hang them all. This Acting is not yet over. Then the Lord-Keeper read the Letter itself, and expatiated upon it, to prove the Treason of the Lords who subscribed it; concluding with the Necessity the King lay under to prevent the Conspirators, and consequently how necessary it was for the Parliament to assist him with Money. The wise Ministers did not once think the Artifice of the Letter star'd both Houses in the Face. That the News was stale to them, and the Majority of both Houses were by no Means in any Disposition to look on their Scots Neighbours as Rebels and Traytors. Larrey writes, All these Springs were play'd to no Purpose. The Commons were determin'd, and nothing cou'd make them alter their Resolution to have Grievances precede Supply. I can't write this Incident no more than I cou'd have seen it without laughing, to see the Lord-Keeper gravely folding up the Letter, then turning AU ROY to the Lords and Commons; then the King speaking to it; then the Keeper speaking again to it; when all the while it was a Farce in the Opinion of that august Assembly.

The Commons chose Serjeant Glanville their Speaker, who has much Laud from the Archdeacon; but he omits that he had all along been a great Opposer of the Illegalities and Irregularities of this Administration, and was gain'd by the Court the same Way as had before been try'd upon Wentworth and Noy with Success, and upon Elliot and Pym with none; but succeeded afterwards on the Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepepyr, the Lord Digby, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir John Strangeways, Sir Robert Holburn, and especially Mr. Edward Hyde. Whitlocke informs us, "Glanville had engag'd to be a "better Servant to the King than formerly; he "was very active to promote his Majesty's De-
"fires, whereof he gave sufficient Testimony, and
"of the Change of his former Opinion." Secretary Windebank acquainted the House with the Examination of the Lord Lowdon; more of it still; saying, He own'd the Letter, but with Prevarication. We have seen the contrary, and that instead of denying the Letter, the Scots justify'd it as a national Act and recriminated. Acherley says, the Turn which the Scots gave to it, took off all Im"pression, so it fell to the Ground, and was never more "spoken of. The Happiness which Finch the Lord-
"Keeper had just been declaiming upon, and which the Lord Clarendon and Echard declaim upon eternally, shin'd out most gloriously in a Heap of Petitions deliver'd to the House of Commons by several Knights of the Shires, complaining of Ship-money, Projects, Monopolies, Star-Chamber, High-Tyrannical "Commission, Spiritual Courts, &c. Mr. Harbottle Proceed"ings.
"Grimston, Speaker of the House of Commons that call'd home the King, said, The Dangers at home are greater than those from abroad, and the Diseases and Distempers in the Body politick are grown to the Height, that for a Cure Examples ought to be made. Sir Benjamin Rudyard spoke against the Discontinuance of Parliaments, for want of which the Commonwealth was in its gasping Extremities. Mr. Pym, who, according to Mr. Echard, was a Man of publick Reputation and long Experience in Parliaments, made an elaborate Speech against Grievances, the long Intervals of Parliaments, Innovations in Religion, and Invasions on Property. Mr. Grimston, afterwards Master of the Rolls, insisted upon the irregular and preposterous engaging the Judges to deliver their Opinion for the Lawfulness of Ship-Money. Read what Warwick says of the Learning and Integrity of those Judges on this Occasion, and then make a Judgment of that ingenious Writer both as to Capacity and Sincerity. Mr. Peard called Ship-Money an Abomination, and therefore Clarendon and Echard call him a bold Lawyer of small Note. One Sign of it was, that his Borough sent him up to Westminster again the very

P. 50, 51;

A.D. 1640. very next Parliament. The Attorney-General answer'd all Arguments as fast as he could have the hearing of them, if you will believe the Archdeacon, especially as to Ship-Money; and IF Peard had been reprimanded, it would have been very severely. We shall see how easy it was to answer Law and Reason, when this hated Tax is brought upon the Stage again. The House enquir'd into the Proceedings against Sir John Elliot, Mr. Hollis, and the imprison'd Members; nay, they were so presumptuous, as to bring Sir John Finch their late Speaker into question for leaving the Chair; and, says the reverend Historian, voted it a particular Breach of Privilege, tho' he did it by the King's special Command. If he had learn'd any thing of the Constitution by having turn'd over so much History, he would have known that Thought of his to have been the most absurd that ever an Historian was guilty of. The King had no Commands to lay on the Speaker of the House of Commons as their Speaker, and consequently Finch's leaving the Chair contrary to the Command of the House, whose Servant he was, must be a particular Breach of Privilege.

Finch question'd.

Bishops charg'd with subverting the Constitution.

The Lords drawn into an Error by the King

Six or seven Days after the Lords and Commons were summon'd to attend the King at the Banqueting-House, where he order'd the Lord-Keeper to acquaint them, that his Army intended against the Scots stood him in 100000 l. a Month; that he had expended his own Money as well as the Ship-Money for that End; that the Parliament in Ireland had given him 500000 l. and after a Supply was granted, he would give a gracious Ear to Grievances if they were just; a Word which in itself is affirmative, and as good and significant as any in Language; but in this King's and his Ministers Style, it is a Negative, and signifies I will not do it unless I think fit; for who was to judge whether those Grievances were just or not? the very Persons Laud, Strafford, &c. who were the Occasion of them. On the Report of the Keeper's Speech made next Day, Edmund Waller Esq; one of the finest Wits of the Age, spoke boldly and elegantly, charging the Bishops and Ministers with a Design to set up a new Species of absolute Monarchy; and concluding with a Motion that there might be an Order immediately made, That the first Thing the House should consider of, should be the restoring the Nation in general to their fundamental and vital Liberties, and then consider of a Supply. The Court could not bear to hear talk of Liberties instead of Supplies; and the King coming to the House of Lords, desir'd them to advise the House of Commons to give Precedence to Supply; which was so irregular, that a Novice in the Constitution could not but be surpris'd at it. The Commons immediately declar'd, that by their undoubted fundamental Right, all Supplies ought to have their Rise, Progress, and whole modelling in their House; which Right had never been infring'd or so much as question'd by the Lords. Echard tells us, that instead of complying, the Commons rais'd an unreasonable Dispute, which ended in an Acknowledgment of their Privileges by the House of Peers, who were sensible of the Error into which the King had drawn them. His Majesty was still impatient for the Money, and the Parliament could not but suspect that as soon as they had given it, they would be dismiss'd as their Predecessors had been. To quicken the Supply, he took a Method which the Archdeacon says was believ'd would not fail of Success. The Wise Men who contriv'd this and the like Messages, might believe so, but no other Mortal who understood any thing of Affairs. Sir Henry Vane was order'd to shew the Necessity of a Supply. Had there been a Necessity for the War, a Supply would have been necessary: But other Sort of wise Men argu'd thus; "If the Scots were

" did was no Wrong, then a War made upon A.D. 1640.
" them with English Forces, was to subdue them,
" and compel them to submit as Slaves to what " was illegal, and as such unjust, and could end in
" nothing but supporting that illegal, unlimited " Power which equally press'd England. Again;
" Such a War is in Effect to impose a Law that " a Man shall not defend his Person against Wounds
" and Imprisonment, nor his Property against Depredations, or the Laws or Constitutions of his " Country against such as would illegally subvert " them, all which would in any Man's own Case " appear monstrous. Again; It was urg'd the " King had no more Right to use the Forces of " England to make War upon his Scots Subjects, The King's " than he had to call French Armies to make War War with
" upon the English People to enslave them, by the Scots
" supporting with those Forces his Prerogative unjust.
" Imposition of Taxes, Ship-Money, Tonnage,
" Poundage, &c. And upon the Premises, the " Conclusion was evident, that a War upon the " Scots to support such a Prerogative was unjust;
" and if so, the Necessity of Supplies to raise an Army
" my vanish'd." The other Message brought them, was a Demand of twelve Subsidies at once. Echard tells us it was but 800000 l. and considering his Majesty offer'd to forbear the levying of Ship-Money, which he had no Right to levy, he thinks it a very reasonable and healing Proposal. The learned Acherley writes, Now the Vizor was pull'd off, and the Mystery reveal'd: It appear'd that the Necessity so much insist'd upon, was a mere Fiction, removeable at Pleasure; for here was a Price of twelve Subsidies set upon it, and for that Sum the King would part with the Pretence, and the Nation should never suffer again under Necessity. The Consequence whereof was, that a Parliament of Judges could give the King a present Necessity, which the Parliament of England must buy off at the Rate of twelve Subsidies. The same judicious Lawyer shews how this pretended Necessity stood with respect to the Scots; "The King needed no Force, for he had all the Power to obviate the War in himself, if he would please to revoke his own Edicts, and declare them illegal, and would disclaim the pretended Prerogative by which they were made, and make the Punishment of the Advisers exemplary; it would remove the Cause, and then the War, which was the Effect, would, for want of Fuel, dye and be extinguish'd." This sober Reasoning cuts off a great Part of the fine Reflections in the History of the Rebellion. It is own'd there, that the Grievances complain'd of were real, that Resistance in case of tyrannical Oppression was lawful; but when Complaint is made, it is aspersing; it is seditious; when any Thing is done to put a Stop to them, it is Rebellion; when Money is wanted to support Profusion and Luxury, and enrich Favourites, it is Necessity; when the Power of impetuous Prelates is in Exercise, it is the Church; and so in other Instances, equally vain and impertinent. The Offer to give up Ship-Money, was mightily cry'd up by Sir John Wray and other Members; but the unreasonable Demand of twelve Subsidies, gave great Distaste to the major Part of the House. Sir Henry Vane was censur'd for demanding twelve when his Commission was but for six; and it was said he did it on purpose to raise Animosities in the House, with Intention to cause a Division between the King and them; for he inform'd his Majesty at the same time they would give nothing. The Story of Mr. Hyde's endeavouring to soften Matters, Serjeant Glanville's wheedling Speech to forward the Supply, Mr. Waller's Discourse with Sir Thomas Fennin, to persuade him to disown Vane's Demand as a Privy-Counsellor, the Solicitor Herbert's seconding Sir Henry Vane, and Sir Henry and Herbert's causing the King to dissolve the Parliament, is told as largely in the History of the Rebellion, as are

Ach. 396. " not Slaves, what they did for Recovery of their Liberties was not illegal; and if what they fo

148 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1640. are all Stories which the Author of it had a hand in. But the true Representation of the Matter is as follows: Upon Sir Henry Vane's telling the King he must expect no Money from the Parliament to carry on the War against the Scots, the Ministers were much perplex'd and uneasy; but that which ripen'd their Resolutions to dissolve them, was an Information given the King, that the Commons intended to enquire into, and as my Author terms it, anathematize the Causes of the War against Scotland, for which the Supplies were demanded. In this Enquiry his Majesty's assum'd Power to impose the Taxes of Ship-Money, &c. wou'd doubtless have pass'd under Examination, and therefore it was obvious, the Commons, to blast the Design, wou'd vote, That a War upon the Scots was unjust. The King for that Reason, early the next Morning, May the 5th, sent for the Speaker to attend him, and took Care he shou'd go with his Majesty to the House of Peers, upon an Apprehension that if the Speaker had gone to the House of Commons, that House wou'd have enter'd on the Debate, and shut their Doors; and before they cou'd be fetch'd to the Upper-House, wou'd pass that Vote, besides entering on some ungrateful Discourses which the Ministers were unwilling to hear. The King following close after the Speaker, sent immediately the Usher of the Black-Rod to bring up the Commons to attend him in the House of Lords, where he treated them with an abrupt hasty Dissolution after a Sitting of twenty-two Days, without doing one publick Act. The learned Author adds, Tho' by this fourth Repetition of his Power, in which he took infinite Delight, all the Rights and Privileges imparted to the two Estates of Lords and Commons, were frustrated and render'd useless. The King had no sooner dissolv'd the Parliament than he repented of it, but with a Penitence which was as weak as the Offence: For to repent of a Thing without Attonement to the utmost of one's Power, is as useless in Politicks as in Divinity. It was whimsical enough to think of recalling the same Parliament by Proclamation; or that a Body of Gentlemen so ill us'd, wou'd have met again in better Humour, had it been practicable to recal them: But a mild Declaration to excuse that hasty Dissolution; a sincere Pacification with the Scots; a stop put to illegal Taxes, and to the Tyranny of the Star-Chamber Court, High-Commission Court, Spiritual Court, with an Intimation of another Parliament to redress Grievances, and punish Delinquents, wou'd have shewn in the best manner, that his Majesty did sincerely repent of this Rashness, wou'd have reconcil'd him to his People, have open'd their Hearts, and their Purses, and have made him a powerful and glorious King; instead of which, several leading Members of both Houses were insulted and imprison'd. The Earl of Warwick and the Lord Brooks Studies, nay, their very Pockets, were search'd for Papers, the Court having violent Suspicions that those Lords and others held Correspondence with the Scots, as indeed they did, and had frequent secret Conferences with their Commissioners, under Pretext of hearing their Ministers preach. Henry Bellasis, Esq; whom the Earl of Strafford had prosecuted for not pulling off his Hat to him; Sir John Hotham, and John Crew, Esq; afterwards Lord Crew, were thrown into Prison. Whitlocke informs us who it was that advis'd the King to dissolve this Parliament, which might easily have been brought into what Temper the King pleas'd. The chief Blame and Odium of all was laid upon Archbishop Laud, and those Differences between the King and his People, which were late too much increas'd, and were hop'd might have been cemented by this Parliament, were aggravated; the Scotch Troubles, which many sober Men expected this Parliament wou'd have appeas'd, were by the breach of it, fear'd to grow wider. By Archbishop Laud's Counsels also, the King was persuaded to let the Convocation sit after the Parliament was dissolv'd, by a new Commission; a Thing which was monstrous in the Eyes of all those who had ever look'd upon the Law: Can it be deny'd but that all the desperate Counsels which gradually terminated in the Civil War, came from that prime Counsellor, the Archbishop of Canterbury, no more fit to be a Prime Minister in such turbulent Times, than a Madman is to look after a sick Person in a Delirium? Can it be deny'd but that the King's Obstinacy in pursuing his Counsels at all Ventures, was the real Cause of his Misfortunes and Death? The sitting of the Convocation after the Dissolution, must be the Effect of that Prelate's Wisdom and Moderation. The Clergy, who at that Time paid him blind Obedience, were in Terms ill enough with the Laity, and their irregular Session in Synod, was a sure Method to add to the Offence which they had before plentifully given, by preaching up the King's Will for Law, and persecuting Men of Conscience and Piety for opposing Sabbath-breaking, and superstitious Innovations: Yet fit they will, and make Canons, and raise Money, in Defiance of all Laws and Customs to the contrary. Echard assures us, and after that he may assure any Thing, the Archbishop boggled at the Convocation's sitting, the Parliament being dissolv'd, and that the King was the Mover in it; for he spares not his Majesty, when he hopes to clear the Archbishop. Whitlocke following Truth, and the Reason of the Thing asserts it was done chiefly by Laud's Counsel and Persuasion. The Reverend Historian gives us the Opinion of the Lord Keeper Finch, and some other Lawyers, who were deep in Ship-Money, that the Convocation might legally sit; as if after the twelve Judges, some of 'em, if not all, against Conscience and Knowledge, had solemnly given their Opinion, that the King might raise Money without Consent of Parliament, the Judgment of the Court-Lawyers had the least Weight in it. Echard proceeds: The Convocation went on and finish'd their seventeen Canons with as little Opposition as cou'd be imagin'd: He wou'd not tell you Dr. Brownrig, Dr. Hacket, Dr. Holdsworth, Mr. Warmister, excellent Divines, and two of them afterwards Fathers and Bishops of our Protestant Church, and thirty-six Ministers of that Synod, earnestly protested against the very sitting of it. And here we must not omit so fair an Opportunity to do Homage to the Merit of those pious and learned Doctors of our National Church, who at this Time preserv'd its Purity, amidst Laud's Innovations and Superstitions, who bore their Testimony against his Severity, and were zealous for a thorough Reformation: For whereever we mention Archbishop Laud, and such Ecclesiasticks as the Majority of his Convocation consisted of, we do never intend the Church of England, as it was reform'd in King Edward the VIth's Reign, and as it is now in his present Majesty King GEORGE's; but Laud's Church, as it was corrupted in the Reign we are writing.

In one of the Canons, the Convocation oblig'd the Clergy, and their Dependants, to take a sort of Anti-Covenanting Oath; the Sense of which was, that Archbishop Laud's Church contain'd all Things necessary to Salvation; and that the Swearer wou'd never give his Consent to alter its Government by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. Some of these Canons were for asserting the Prerogative Royal; for the better keeping the King's Inauguration Day; for Rites and Ceremonies; for preaching up Conformity; for setting the Communion-Table, now turn'd into an Altar, to the East, and for railing of it in; for Excommunication; for Absolution; for Commutation; for Marriage-Licenses; the latter Ready-Money Articles: And Archdeacon Echard affirms all these Canons were for the Honour and Advantage of the Church and State. Dr. Fuller writes, Most took Exception against that Clause

A.D. 1639. in the Oath. We will never give our Consent to alter this Church-Government; as if the same were intended to abridge the Liberty of King and State in future Parliaments and Convocations, if hereafter they see Cause to change any Thing therein. And this Obligation seem'd the more unreasonable, because some of those Orders specify'd in the Oath, as Archbishops, Archdeacons, &c. stand only establish'd Jure Humano; so that Echard has no divine Right to the Archdeaconry of Stow: in which I suppose he disagrees with Dr. Fuller. No wise Man, continues the Doctor, ever deny'd but that by the same Power and Authority they were alterable. Archdeacon Echard does not only deny, but argue against it with as much Argument as he has, and yet it would be taken ill, if we shou'd not take him for a wise Man. As a Proof of it he adds, it was hop'd these Proceedings would have added Strength as well as Ornament to the Church: Whereas the People were at that very Instant so exasperated at the Insolence of this Synod, in sitting thus after the Parliament was dissolv'd, that the King thought it necessary to appoint a Guard to defend them. Whitlock, who has more Truth in one Page, than there is in a hundred of Clarendon's, speaks of the Convocation differently from Mr. Echard, Their Seats were not very easy, they were in danger of the King's Displeasure if they rose, and of the Peoples Fury if they sat; to be beaten up by Tumults while they were at their Work, and to be beaten down next Parliament for doing of that Work. The Resentment of the People was such against the Archbishop, whom they look'd upon as the Author of this and other evil Counsels, that 500 of them beset his House at Lambeth, where, according to Echard, he made a resolute Defence, but according to Ludlow, he made his Escape by Water. A Cocker being taken up for this Rebellion, part of the Earl of Clarendon's History, he was try'd, condemn'd, hang'd, drawn and quarter'd: But Purchase the Bumbailiff, who rais'd a Rebellion for Laud's Church in Queen Anne's Time, was try'd, condemn'd and pardon'd. Whitlock, one of the greatest Lawyers of the Age says, there was nothing in it but the breach of the Peace, and a few Glass of Windows: But as merry as he makes the Business, Laud let the Man be murder'd, as he must be, if it was breach of the Peace only; though the Lord Chancellor Hide in his History, if it is his, declares, that the attacking Archbishop Laud's Glass-Windows was High-Treason.

Ibid. It is not easy to guess why Dr. Goodman, Bishop of Gloucester, who was afterwards known to be a Papist, should be the only Member of the Convocation who refus'd to subscribe the Canons. The Archbishop, who was then with the Bishops and Clergy in Henry the VIIth's Chappel at Westminster Abbey, presently cry'd out, My Lord of Gloucester, I admonish you to Subscribe; he delighted wonderfully in all acts of Superiority: And again, My Lord of Gloucester, I admonish, &c. And a third Time, as they do at Auctions, My Lord of Gloucester, I admonish you, &c. The Bishop of Gloucester as often pleaded Conscience, and the furious Archbishop was for suspending him immediately: But moderate Bishop Davenant thought it more prudent to consult Lawyers upon the Power of a Synod in that Case. However the Archbishop, who could not bear the least Opposition to his Power or Will, hasten'd thence to the King, and as usual, got him to command a Warrant to be issu'd for committing the Bishop of Gloucester to Prison. This Convocation tax'd the Clergy Four Shillings in the Pound for Six Years, towards his War against the Scots Presbyterians. And it was but fair, that as he did every Thing for them, so they shou'd do something for him. Whitlock tells us, this raising of Money added more Fuel to the Flames already burning, and was the Subject of great Debate and Censure. There is Witchery or Infatuation in their Doings. All the Actions of these Men were so daring, so desperate, and tended so directly to Destruction, that the Danger, like Cimmerian Darkness, might have been felt, if they had no Eyes to see it.

His Majesty was very active in the Prosecution of the Scots War. He increas'd his Junto of Counsellors, that if Men and Money were wanting, there might be no want of good Council; and therefore Dr. Fuxon, Lord High-Treasurer, the Lord Cottington, and Secretary Windebank, are added to the Junto, as was also Sir Henry Vane, who however was no better than a Spy upon them, and at one of their Meetings took short Notes of their Debates; which coming afterwards to his Son's Hands, were made use of against the Earl of Strafford, as will appear at his Tryal. Whitlock, whose Memorials are our Guide here, proceeds; "And now the Parliament having yielded no Supplies to the King's Occasions, all the Wheels of the Prerogative are set on Motion to provide Money: Knighthood is reviv'd, all Knights and Gentlemen who hold Lands in Capite of the King, are summon'd to send Men, Horse and Arms, agreeable to their Tenures and Qualities. Ludlow writes, all imaginable ways were us'd to raise Supplies; Privy-Seals sent throughout the Nation for Loan-Money again. Ship-Money, Coat and Conduct Money were pressed to the Height: Commodities taken upon Credit, and sold for Ready-Money, a Practice among Bankrupts before they break." Warrants were also delivered out to press Men for Soldiers, in downright Contradiction to the PETITION OF RIGHT. Brass-Money, &c. The City of London refusing to pay some of the before-mention'd Taxes, divers of their chief Officers were imprison'd, and an Order issu'd to take away the Sword from the Lord-Mayor, Sir Edmund Wright.

Before we proceed further in the Second BISHOPS WAR, we must remember that the Earl of Strafford had held a Parliament in Ireland, where he got Supplies for an Army of 8000 Horse and Foot, rais'd and maintain'd by several Subsidies of 40000 Pounds each; so intolerable a Burthen, that in about a Years Time, the King gave way to the Parliament in Ireland to abate them to 12000 Pounds each. Orleans the Jesuit says, the Earl of Strafford did the Roman Catholics the Honour to account them better affected to the King than Protestants; of whom, two Years after, they butcher'd 200000 Men, Women and Children, in cold Blood. It is of this Irish Popish Army that Strafford spoke in the Debate about raising Money at the Junto Table, which he would have brought into England for that Purpose. He caus'd a Proclamation to be issu'd in Ireland, denouncing the Scots Rebels and Traytors; and being call'd home to England, when he deliver'd the Sword at Parting to Mr. Wandesford, Master of the Rolls, his Deputy, and the Council, he utter'd these Words, If ever I return to this honourable Sword, I will not leave of the Scots in Ireland Root or Branch. Neither did he spare any Pains in the Junto to press on the War vigorously against Scotland; and after the Dissolution of the last Parliament to break all Counsels tending to the calling another, for which the Reverend Historian styles him the Delphian Oracle. One may see what Thoughts the People had of the near Relation between Archbishop Laud and Popery, by their attacking a Popish Agent, Count Rosetti. Rosetti, then at London, the 11th of May, at the same Time that they beset Lambeth House, and demolish'd some Windows. The Lord Wicquefort, in his admirable Treatise of the Ambassador and his Functions, lets us into the Secret of Rosetti's Negotiations in England, for which he was afterwards made a Cardinal: "He was not contented, says that great Statesman, to use his Endeavours to obtain Liberty of Conscience, and the Exer-

A.D. 1640. "cise of their Religion for the Roman Catholics, but attempted also to change the predominant Religion in the Person of the King. He who writ the History of those Times upon very good Memoirs, reports, that the Archbishop of Canterbury himself was much inclin'd thereto, and resolv'd to follow Rosetti to Rome, if Cardinal Barberino would have insur'd him a Pension of eight and forty thousand Livres. The People of London coming to understand Rosetti's Intrigues, attack'd him in his House, from whence he sav'd himself at the Queen Mother's, Mary de Medicis, who was then in England. The Parliament caus'd him to be sought for, this was the next Parliament, and oblig'd him to leave England, and retire to Flanders. He was no publick Minister, since he had no Character from the Pope; so that he was at most but the Agent of a Cardinal, for which Reason he could not enjoy the Protection of the Law of Nations. But neither the Parliament nor the Londoners violated that Law in the Person of a Man, who having no Character, nor being acknowledg'd as a publick Minister, disturb'd the Tranquillity of the State by endeavouring to introduce a new Religion contrary to the Laws of the Kingdom." Larrey tells us King Charles protect'd this Romish Agent as much as if he had been Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary. He sent his Guards to disperse the Rabble, and committed some of them to Prison; but their Fellows broke open the Prison-Doors and releas'd them.

Tho' the City of London was disgust'd for the Loss of their Plantation, Londonderry in Ireland, which was taken from them by an unjust Sentence of the Star-Chamber; and tho' many Citizens had been imprison'd for refusing to pay the illegal Impositions, yet others of them were so infatuated by the Laudean Clergy, that they parted with their Money for so good a Cause as the Extirpation of Presbyterians; by which, with the Money the Convocation had given, the large Contributions of the Papists, the Subscriptions of the Courtiers, and others who were drawn in to subscribe, no less than 300000*l.* was scrap'd together, and his Majesty rais'd an Army of above 20000 Men in Defence of Prelacy, or rather of certain Prelates, Laud, Neile, Wren, &c. He made the Earl of Northumberland General, the Earl of Strafford Lieutenant-General, this Vein of Wisdom runs thro' the whole Mine of their Politicks, the Lord Conway General of the Horse. I do not object against the Promotion of these Staff-Officers, tho' the Archdeacon does, and would have had the Command given to the Earls of Holland and Essex; for there being no likelihood of fighting, I think 'tis no great matter to whom the Battalions are given. Nothing, says Whitlock, could alter the Opinion and Humour of divers of the Officers and private Soldiers of the Army, who in their March to the Rendezvous spared not to declare their Judgments against this WAR, and that they would not fight to maintain the Pride and Power of the Bishops. This their Resolution seem'd not to be feign'd by the ill Success afterwards.

Army against the Bishops War.

Birth of Duke of Gloucester

The Army marches.

Some Weeks before the King began his March Northward, the Queen was brought to-bed on the 8th of July of another Son, Henry Duke of Gloucester, who of all the King and Queen's Children liv'd most in the Love of the People from his Birth to his untimely Death 20 Years after.

The Royal Army began their March in the Beginning of August, and his Majesty follow'd them the 20th. On the 22d, a Proclamation was publish'd, declaring all the Scots that shou'd invade England, REBELS and Traytors. A Prayer was also publish'd in all Churches against the Rebels of Scotland. I have not in any History met with the like Rashness and Obstinacy as in this Northern Expedition. The King and his Ministers knew that almost every Heart in the Kingdom bled for the Perils it was in from Popery and Slavery; under the Names of the Church and Prerogative. They could not but know that the Scots would sooner have run into the Frith, than have march'd into England, if they had not been encourag'd from thence. They were sensible that the Army which the King was leading against them, were almost as willing to fight with one another as with the Scots. And yet nothing could serve the Turn of Archbishop Laud and the Earl of Strafford but a War with the Scots Rebels, whom the Generality of the English Nation stil'd their Brethren of Scotland. The Scots in their Declaration charg'd these two evil Counsellors by Name, as the Authors of their Grievances, and the WAR which was rais'd to hinder the Redress of them. They declar'd to the English, That their Coming was not in Enmity, but to petition the King to call a Parliament, and bring Laud and Strafford to Punishment. Our wise Historian adds, That the English might see whom they chiefly aim'd at, a Book was publish'd by the Name of The Canterburian's Self-conviction. As if they had not before sufficiently shewn it, by naming him in their Declaration as the great Incendiary. He proceeds: In which the Author by a strange Inversion would prove out of the Works of the Archbishop himself, that there was a peculiar Design on Foot for introducing Popery. A very strange thing truly! What were his Popish Alterations, his introducing Altars, Transubstantiation, Sacrifice of the Mass, Prayers to Saints, and other Popish Rites, written with his own Hand, and taken out of the Roman Missal and Pontifical, to be insert'd in the Scotch Service-Book?

Hidden Works, p. 156 to 164.

Two Days after the King left London the Scots Army enter'd England, commanded by General Lesley, the Earl of Montrose, and other Scots Noblemen. The Earl of Montrose led the Van, for his Understanding and Conscience had not yet been illuminated by any Court Reasons. When he arriv'd at the River Tweed, he alighted off his Horse, and forded the River a-foot. The Scots Army advanced to Newcastle before any Enemy appear'd. But as they approach'd the Tyne, they were fac'd by the Royal Army, a Body of which consisting of 3000 Foot and 1500 Horse was advantageously posted at Newburne under the Command of the Lord Conway. The Scots on the 28th of August, as their Historian tells us, resolving to put it to the Issue of a Battel, pass'd the River at Newburne in of Scot. the Face of a strong Body of the English Army, 191. beat them fairly by plain fighting from their Post, and kill'd 300 of their Men; which Action so King's Forces frightened the King and his whole Army, that they would not strike a Stroke more, but shamefully retreated to York, leaving Newcastle and Durham in Possession of the Scots. Whitlock owns there were 800 English kill'd and taken; among the latter were Digby, Wilmot, and Oneale, chief Commanders. But the Earl of Clarendon affirms there were eleven or twelve only kill'd and taken, his Lordship being never willing to let the Presbyterians have the better of it in any Dispute, whether Argument or Action, wherein his Zeal is more laudable than his Sincerity. Ludlow's Observation is very just: The English, contrary to their wonted Custom, retir'd in Disorder, not without Shame and some Loss. Of such Force and Consequence is a Belief and full Persuasion of the Justice of an Undertaking, tho' manag'd by an Enemy in other Respects not considerable. In the mean while the King's Garison at Berwick made an Incurfion into Scotland, intending to surprize the Scots Magazine at Duns; but the Earl of Haddington, who was left with a Party to guard it, oblig'd them to retire. That Lord with his two Brothers having his Quarters at Douglas Castle was kill'd by the firing of Powder in a Vault, either thro' the Neglect or Treache-

A.D. 1640. Treachery of a Page. Whitlock adds, there were about 20 more Knights and Gentlemen kill'd at the same time by the Stones which flew from the Vault. Echard, to increase the Judgment upon these Presbyterians, affirms there were 60 Gentlemen more suddenly blown up, and in a moment bury'd, so that they were never seen more; which tragical Event being reported at Court, the Royalists were not so moderate in their Censures as the King himself, who only said, Tho' he has been very ungrateful to me, yet I am sorry he had not some time to repent. Of what? Of profaning the Sabbath, taking away Mens Money and Goods by Violence, of worshipping Images, of Oppression and Superstition. What is the Earl of Haddington to repent of? Swearing, Cursing, Wantonness, Riot, or any of the Vices of King James's Court. Or is he to repent of the Reform'd Religion, Liberty and Property, and of taking Arms to defend them?

Tho' there is very little Business done, Civil or Military, the two Armies remaining very quiet, the Scots expecting the Effects of Lord Saville's pretended Invitation, and the English being discourag'd as well by the Cause as the Disgrace at Newburne; yet the Archdeacon will have the Earl of Strafford to be the great Spring which moves this very little Machine. He arriv'd at Durham labouring under the Dregs of Sickness, and inflam'd and exasperated at the late Dis honour. My Lord Conway was highly blam'd by him, and the Soldiers having been rude to the Churches, he retir'd to the Skirts of Yorkshire. Which in common Language is, he had heard of the Rout at Newburne, that the Scots were coming to Durham, and he got into Yorkshire as fast as he cou'd, carrying with him the great Spring that mov'd the military and civil Machine.

Scots in England.

The Scots lik'd their new Quarters at Newcastle and Durham extremely well. They had good Fires, Store of Provisions, and good Lodging; for which the County of Northumberland and Bishoprick of Durham were cess'd 850*l.* a Day. From Newcastle they sent a Petition to the King, "in the Name of the Lords of the last Parliament, and others his Majesty's loyal Subjects of Scotland, complaining of their Grievances in general; for Relief whereof they were constrain'd to come without Prejudice to the People of England, till they were by Arms oppos'd Passage at Newburne; and now present themselves to his Majesty's Goodness for Satisfaction of their full Demands, and Repair of their Losses and Wrongs with the Advice of the Parliament to be conven'd". The King by the Earl of Lanerick his Secretary return'd Answer, that he expected their particular Demands, and commanded them to advance no farther. The old Air again: They were likely to obey his Command, when they wou'd not obey his Army. Whitlock, who was too wise to have mention'd such a Command had there really been any such given, tells us, he answer'd, he had summon'd the Peers of England to meet at York, where their Demands shou'd be taken into Consideration. Three Days after the Scots sent their particular Demands. 1. The publishing their late Acts of Parliament. 2. The repairing Edinburgh Castle and Forts of Scotland for their Defence. 3. The Scots to be no where press'd with Oaths contrary to the Covenant. 4. Incendiaries to be punish'd. 5. Ships and Goods to be restor'd, and Damages made good. 6. Wrongs, Losses and Charges repair'd. 7. Proclamations as Traitors to be recall'd. 8. Garrisons to be remov'd from the Borders. 9. The Parliament of England to meet as soon as possible. The Court Politicians must not be very politic, if they did not see plainly that the Scots insisting on the convening a Parliament in England was the Effect of some Agreement with their English Friends; and indeed the latter shew'd something like it by a Petition which was deliver'd to the King about the same time, complaining, 1. "Of the wasting of the Revenue and illegal Taxes. 2. Innovations in Religion. 3. Increase of Popery. 4. The Design to bring in Irish Forces. 5. Prosecutions about Ship-Money. 6. Monopolies. 7. The great Grief of the Subjects by long Intermiſſions of Parliament, and the late and former Dissolutions. To remedy which, they pray that a Parliament may be summon'd, and the War compos'd without Blood." This Petition was sign'd by the Earls of Bedford, Essex, Mulgrave, Hertford, Warwick, Bolingbroke, Bristol, the Lords Say and Sale, Howard, Mandeville, Brooke, Page. The King's Answer was, he had summon'd a Meeting of the Peers at York the 24th of September, where they with the rest might offer any thing. Two of these Petitioners, the Earls of Essex and Hertford, being about to take their Journey to York, waited on her Majesty, and took occasion to represent to her the sad Condition to which the King and Kingdom were reduc'd, and that they saw no possible Means other than a Parliament whereby to repair the State. On their Expostulations they prevail'd with her to write to the King, and move him to summon a Parliament. They carry'd this Letter with them to York, and presenting it to his Majesty privately, it is suppos'd to have had more Influence upon him than the Advice of the Peers who met by his Summons. The Citizens of London sent him a Petition much to the same Effect as the Lords Petition before-mention'd, and it had much the same Answer.

Restold.

Queen writes to the King for a Parliament.

The Scots in the mean time made their Quarters good, and were justly complain'd of for overdoing it, contrary to the wise Counsel in Lord Saville's Letter. They seiz'd four great Ships laden with Corn, and levy'd the Assessment on Pain of plundering. The War, says Whitlock, being begun with the Scots, it put many Men to think on a Posture of Defence for themselves, and to a Provision of Arms. The Discourses of the Scottish War were very various. Those who favour'd the Popish and Prelatical Ways did sufficiently inveigh against the Covenanters, but generally the rest of the People favour'd and approv'd their Proceedings, &c. Echard learnt of the Lord Clarendon to represent the Scots as Enemies to England; whereas in truth they were only Enemies to Laud, Strafford, and the Instruments of their Tyranny; and whatever the Court and Priesthood said to the contrary, the Generality of the Kingdom were Well-wishers to them and their Cause.

Scots favour'd by the English.

The Earl of Clarendon wonders that the Courtiers shou'd pretend Necessity for levying Ship-Money without Consent of Parliament when there was no War; and now when their Enemy had invaded them, and the Necessity was apparent, they shou'd proceed in the dilatory way of raising Money by Parliament. This Argument has no more Weight in it than most of the rest in the History of the Rebellion. See what a learned Lawyer says upon Ach. 411: it, "This Argument of the noble Historian had been very reasonable, if the Premises on which 'tis built had been probable. For if the Scots had as Enemies invaded England, and had come to destroy and enslave this Nation, the People wou'd have chas'd them home as Invaders. But the REVERSE was the Case. I have frequently observ'd, that the History of the Rebellion and the Archdeacon's History are the REVERSE of the Case. "The Scots came as Friends to save and rescue England, as well as Scotland, from under the bitter Pressures and Sufferings which griev'd both, by the means only of a free Parliament; and therefore they knew that England wou'd by its Parliament do the Business of the Scots, and of those who had corresponded with them for that Purpose; wherefore 'tis probable, that

"that if the King had declar'd he wou'd have no Parliament till the Scots were retir'd, a general REVOLT had ensu'd." This is to write and think soberly. But let the Reader judge what sober thinking and writing there are in the History of the Rebellion, and its excellent Copy. If the King had march'd directly against the Scots, after some exemplary Justice and Disgrace on the chief Officers, to raise more Discontent among the Soldiers, he wou'd speedily have dispossest them of their new Conquests, and forc'd them to run back distract-ed into their own Country. Can any thing be more puerile? They wou'd not only have run away, they wou'd also have run mad. The Truth is, those evil Counsellors, who had been the Authors of all the Evils complain'd of, and cou'd expect nothing but condign Punishment from the Parliament, were in the right to chuse rather to fall by the Hands of the Scots, than by the Hands of the Hangman. Echard informs us, "Strafford was the only Man whose Advice was of any Credit with the King, and thought there was but one Way, and that not proper to be heard in Council, which was to drive the Scots out of the Kingdom by the English Army." And then comes the only heroick Action which we read of this Hero: He sent Major Smith with a Party of Horse, who defeated two or three Troops of Scots Horse in the Bishoprick, and made it appear that the Kingdom might be freed from the rest, if it were vigorously pursu'd. The Treaty was then a-foot at Rippon, and General Lesley complain'd he had forborn any such Attempt out of respect to it. Major Smith was a Papist, and glad enough to fall on the Scots, when, as they thought, their Hands were ty'd by the Treaty; however the King cou'd not decently approve of this Breach of it, and therefore was prevail'd with, says the Archdeacon, to restrain his General from giving any more such Orders. These Men have the pleasantest Way of writing that can be imagin'd. One wou'd think the Earl of Strafford and Major Smith wou'd have driven the Scots Army over the Grampian Mountains, if the King wou'd but have said the Word; whereas it is the quite contrary in true Histories: "The King and his Laudean Army being retreated after the Action of Newburn, it is impossible to express the Consternation they were in. The Scots Army being advanced to Durham, were now entire Masters of England: If they had pleas'd to advance, nothing cou'd have stood before them. They were entirely possess'd of all the Counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, and Durham, and began to extend themselves towards the West; and as they receiv'd daily Supplies of Men from Scotland, they wou'd in six Days more have been possess'd of Westmorland and Lancashire, there being no Forces to oppose them but at York, and these under the terrible Apprehension of being attack'd by our whole Army, which God and a just Quarrel being on the Scots Side, they were in no Condition to oppose." This Author understands the State of England to be then divided and broken, and the much greater Part of the People to be ready to receive the Scots with open Arms; or he wou'd talk wildly in saying they were Masters of England.

We have been told of the King's hearkening to the Earl of Strafford more than to any other Counsellor; and of the Earl's Counsel to drive the Scots out of England Sword in hand; we have hinted that his Courage was probably animated by his Hatred and Fear of that Nation: For, as Larrey writes, "He had been six Years preparing to reduce Scotland under the arbitrary Power of the King and the Archbishop; at least his Enemies had that Opinion of him; and these were a great Part of England, and all Scotland entire. He had rais'd the Jealousy of some, the Fear of others, and the Hatred of all except Dr. Laud." At the same

Time they accus'd him of being the Incendiary, &c. A.D. 1640

On the 24th of September the Peers assembled at York; and his Majesty made a Speech to them, in which he ask'd their Advice how he might chastise the Scots; the high Tone still, how he shou'd answer the Petition of the REBELS; and which was the chief Thing of all, how he might maintain the Army till the Parliament, which he had summon'd to meet the 3d of November, cou'd assemble. The Duke of Buckingham had the Credit of calling one Parliament, the Earl of Strafford of calling another; and now his Majesty tells them the Queen had advis'd him to call this. Tho' such Politicks are not deep, yet they are well-design'd to take off the Odium of the People from the Person that is intended by it. The Lord Lowdon attended at York to support the Petition of the Scots with his Arguments and Interest, and perhaps also to confer with the Lords whose Names were to the forg'd Letter, and who were all there. The Earl of Traquair said, the Scots petition'd for Things which subverted the King's Prerogative and Dignity, and were detrimental to his Profit. Whitlock tells us that "after several Meetings and Debates, a Messenger was sent from the King and Lords to the Scots Army, to give Notice to them that on Tuesday next sixteen of the English Lords shou'd meet as many Scotch Lords at York to treat of the Differences." The Scots refus'd to treat at York so long as the Earl of Strafford commanded there, as a Place where their Commissioners wou'd not be safe, Strafford having threaten'd to destroy them; and they having high Matters of Complaint against him; which shew'd plainly enough that Wentworth had every Thing to fear from the Resentment of that injur'd Nation: Yet he knew so well the Obstinacy of his Master in protecting his Minions, that he did not fly for it, which he might easily have done and have escap'd. Commissioners for the Treaty were appointed on both Sides, and the Town of Rippon to be the Place, the Day the first of October. The English Commissioners were, the Earl of Hertford, Earl of Bedford, Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Essex, Earl of Holland, Earl of Bristol, Earl of Berkshire, Lord Viscount Mandeville, Lord Dunsmore, Lord Wharton, Lord Paget, Lord Brook, Lord Saville, Lord Powlet, Lord Howard of Esrick. The Scots Commissioners were, Charles Earl of Dumferlin, John Lord Lowdon, Sir Patrick Hepburn, Sir William Douglass, Mr. Smith Bailiff of Edinburgh, Mr. Wedderburn, Mr. Henderson and Mr. Johnston, Ministers. To these were added afterwards John Earl of Rothes, Hugh Kennedy Burgess of Aird, William Drummond of Riccarton.

The reverend Historian intimates, that the Scots Commissioners were of inferior Quality to the English; and Larrey gives the Scots some other Advantage in the room of it: They were Persons of greater Capacity and Eloquence. They knew how to speak with that Energy, that they made themselves Masters of the Heart; and when they had done that, they soon became Masters of the Mind. During the Treaty a great Complaint was made to the English Commissioners, that Meldrum, General Lesley's Secretary, had said that the Scots were invited into England by the great English Lords. We have shewn what Sort of an Invitation it was; but the Scots Noblemen had all the Reason in the world to think it genuine. Meldrum however found he had babbled to much, and deny'd the Words which two Witnesses offer'd to swear he said. But his Denial was taken for Satisfaction, and the Matter hush'd up. Almost all the Lords Commissioners on the English Side were either those whose Names were to the forg'd Letter, or those who had otherwise encourag'd the Scots to undertake this Expedition; and those of them whose Names were to the Letter coming to no Eclaircissement with the Lord Lowdon upon the Subject of it, nor taking

The Lord Wariston some time after, at the Request of the Lords whose Names was to the forg'd Letter, cut them out all, and gave them each to the Lord to whom it belong'd. Thus they are now wanting to the original Letter, but some Words of it that were forc'd to be cut out with the Names, were first carefully preserv'd.

The Earl of Strafford did what he cou'd to have the Treaty at Rippon broken off; but how he wou'd have carry'd on the War, does not any where appear, nor can one conceive what shou'd inspire him with such Counsel but Despair. The English Commissioners were the first who propos'd a Cessation of Arms, to which the Scots reply'd, As they wou'd obey the King's Command not to advance, so they cou'd not return till they had effected their Business. At length the Commissioners on both Sides agreed to that Cessation, to the Contribution of 850*l.* a-day, the River Tees to be the Bounds of both Armies, private Insolencies to be no Breach of Treaty; and the rest of their Demands to be debated at London when the Parliament sat, which was now to be in two or three Weeks. The Earl of Pembroke was sent to London to borrow 200000 Pounds of the City, and the Citizens were so well pleas'd with this Accommodation, that they readily lent it, to be repaid out of the first Money given by Parliament. The Earl of Rothes and two or three more were added to the Scots Commissioners, who were to reside at London, where, says Mr. Echard, they were feasted, presented, and even idoliz'd by all Sorts of People, who were sensible that the approaching Parliament was owing to their Demand of it. "Many wonder'd, and some inveigh'd against this Treaty, wishing the King wou'd have put it rather to the Issue of a Battel, than to have given such Terms to his Subjects in Rebellion; and of this Judgement was Strafford and the Episcopal Party. But the other Party cry'd up this Treaty as just, honourable, and pious, to prevent Effusion of Blood, and to settle Peace. The King saw plainly that both divers Officers of the Army, and even the private Soldiers generally, which was a remarkable Inclination, had no mind to fight with the Scots." Achery goes farther, It was found that the Army and Country were more inclin'd against the Lord Strafford than against the Scots, therefore the Lord Saville concluded Strafford cou'd not last long. Upon this he heartily deserted his Party, and discover'd to the King the grand Invitation, as he represented it, producing a Copy of the Engagement; it shou'd be the Letter; but this Copy being written in Saville's own Hand, cou'd be no Evidence. The King seem'd greatly oblig'd, and privately committed to the Lord Strafford the CARE of improving the Intelligence in order to impeach the INVITERS. His Majesty for this Service promis'd to make Saville President of the North in case Strafford was remov'd; and he did afterwards make him Earl of Suffex, tho' had it not been for his Quality, the Forgery he was guilty of, wou'd have deserv'd another sort of Advancement.

It was about this Time that the Earl of Montross, being grown weary of the Covenanters, or they weary of him, wrote privately to the King to offer his Service. Whitlocke says, Hamilton found Means to have this Letter stolen out of the King's Pocket, a Copy of which was sent to the covenanting Lords, who made the proper Use of it. Thus we see Saville makes his Court by a double Treachery, by deceiving first the Scots, and then the King; and Montross makes his by Perjury, by renouncing the Covenant he had most solemnly sworn. It cannot be said the latter proceeded from Conviction of the Justice of the Prelatical Cause; for the Spirit of the Laudean Prelates are still the same, and the Government has not taken one Measure to shew it will be better for the future. We have now a very doleful Account of the Consequence of removing the Treaty to London; The Scots Commissioners went to Meeting-Houses, and the Presbyterian Ministers flock'd from all Quarters of the Kingdom unto the City, as if they were to convert an unsanctify'd Heathen Nation. The Commissioners Lodgings were visited as Repositories of Divine Truths, and they were look'd upon as Angels of Light. Tho' this tasteless insipid Raillery is too good to be the Author's own, and is stolen from Heylin, Warwick, or some such witty Historian, yet it has too much Buffoonry in it to become the Gravity of History. When one has to do with Folly and Knavery, Simplicity and Impudence, 'tis impossible to avoid being merry or angry; and I confess I have sometimes prefer'd Mirth to Indignation, which I doubt will incur Censure, tho' one wou'd think the Reader shou'd be as willing to be kept in good Humour as the Writer. But I hope I shall be allow'd to be as merry with Knavery and Folly, as these Historians are with Angels of Light, Divine Truths, the Conversion of Heathens and Men of unsanctify'd Lives. For these are the Jest's with which they divert themselves and those Readers who are capable of being diverted with Dulness and Grimace. Then he tells us what these Angels of Light said, Episcopacy was run down as tyrannical, the Rules of the Church as Superstition, and bowing at the Name of Jesus, had a Book written against it, with no less a Title than Jesus-Worship confuted. 'Tis a very common Thing with these Gentlemen when they are wittily dispos'd, to make foolish Titles for Books, and father them on those they wou'd blacken, but they always over-do it; and the Folly is so extravagant, that it appears presently to be their own. We wou'd have done with Archbishop Laud if Mr. Echard wou'd let us, but he is so often flourishing with him, that we are tempted to follow his Example: He was the most vigorous Supporter of the Protestant Religion, and the Papists were in a Plot against both the King and him; upon which it will not be expected we shou'd make any Remarks.

 All wise and sober Men in England thought a Parliament was the only Remedy for the Evils the People groan'd under, but the same reverend Author affirms, That the meeting of the Parliament was the Occasion of all the Calamities which made the Times dark and dismal; that they were chosen by the Management of Mr. Pym and five or six other Gentlemen; that Mr. Hampden went once a Year to Scotland to confirm the Brethren there; and that Mr. Pym rode up and down in England to promote the good Cause; that the Conspirators met at the Houses of the Lord Say in Oxfordshire, Mr. Knightley in Northamptonshire, and other Gentlemen's Houses, where they form'd a Scheme, the Foundation of which was, that all Empire is founded in Property. All which, and a great deal more, relating as much to the History of the Moon as to that of England, is to be put among other Dreams of that Historian and his admirable Originals. Our learned Lawyer opens the Scene otherwise; "And now the memorable Parliament, whose Acts and Proceedings in restoring the Nation to its Rights and Liberties, and hereditary Privileges, that was the only Scheme those worthy Patriots form'd, will appear surprizing as long as the Monuments of History remain." He does not mean the Earl of Clarendon's or Mr. Echard's Monuments: "For this Parliament did in some Sort resemble the Proceedings of that Parliament which one hundred Years before had by dissolving the Monasteries, restor'd to the Nation its antient Freedom, Riches, and Power." The next good Thing the reverend Historian tells us, is how this Parliament was chosen, and what Character the Members of it had. By which it is hoped we may be excus'd taking Notice of any other Characters of his, tho' slavish Copies of the Earl of Clarendon's, whose Pictures are all as much Originals as any Pictures can be when the Persons never sat for them. The Party exclaim'd against the Nomination of any belonging to his Majesty's Service. A very hard Case indeed, that those who were to be punish'd for their High-Crimes and Misdemeanours, were not nominated for Members of that Parliament whose chief Business was to punish them: They gave Votes for Men of the new Religion. The Lord Wicquefort, to whom they have no Name nor Character to oppose, has told us, that Rosetti's and Laud's was the new Religion which they were then about to introduce: But the Archdeacon means the Reformed Religion. Notorious Opposers of the King or the Clergy were elected; he means arbitrary Power and the High-Commission-Court. Thus divers Citizens and Lawyers were chosen Members for those Corporations that never so much as heard of them. He probably means Mr. Rolle a Merchant of London, who was chosen for Kellington in Cornwall, where his Family was in the first Distinction; and shou'd have meant Mr. Edward Hyde of the Middle-Temple, who was chosen for Saltsb in the same County, where he had not a Foot of Land nor a Penny Property. These and many other uncommon Practices were us'd to defeat the King's Friends, who for twelve Years had been industriously employ'd in destroying those Rights and Liberties which the Parliament was to vindicate, recover, and re-establish. It is common with the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard, to charge those whom they write against, with the very Crimes and Offences which those they write for were only guilty of. We have seen what they say of those great and excellent Men Mr. Pym and Mr. Hampden's riding about at this Time; and the real Truth is, what we are told by others, the Courtiers got the King and Queen's Letters to Counties, and Earls, Lords, and Gentlemen to ride up and down to all Parts of the Kingdom to make Parties for them, but to no Purpose. Mr. Echard again; "The Puritans for Number cou'd not make above a third Part of the House

 fore me, which proves this to be an egregious Falsity, what Whitlocke writes wou'd be more than sufficient to do it, and confirm what is above cited. "The Court labour'd to bring in their Friends; but those who were most favour'd at Court, had least Respect in the Country; and it was not a little strange to see what a Spirit of Opposition to Court-Proceedings was in the Hearts and Actions of most People; so that very few of that Party had the Favour to be chosen Members of Parliament." Mr. Archdeacon assures us they were above two Thirds. 'Tis great Pity so large and so florid a History as that of Clarendon, shou'd be of no more Use to an Historian, who can scarce look upon it with Safety. The Misrepresentation and Glosses are sometimes so handsomely set out, that they are apt to mislead Readers, as Travellers are misled by wand'ring Lights and glittering Vapours. The Author of the History of the Rebellion complains there were not many Lawyers fit to be Speakers; tho' we find Serjeant Glanville, Serjeant Creswel, Serjeant Fountain, Serjeant Maynard, Serjeant Wild afterwards Lord Chief Baron, John Vaughan Esq; afterword Lord Chief-Justice of England, Bulstrode Whitlocke Esq; afterwards Lord-Commissioner of the Great-Seal, Sir Robert Holburn, John Selden Esq; John Glyn Esq; Edmund Prideaux Esq; Oliver St. John Esq; Edward Bagshaw Esq; John White Esq; Sir Thomas Widdrington afterwards Speaker of the House of Commons, Francis Rouse Esq; afterwards Speaker of the House of Commons, and several others, Men of the greatest Eminence in the Law: But the Way of Lord Clarendon is to render those whom he opposes Objects of Contempt, and then by the Comparison he heightens the Characters of those whom he extols. The Gentlemen who are not in his good Graces, continu'd their Artifices after the House met, but most at the Committee of Elections, to turn out Laud's and Strafford's Friends, and bring in more sanctify'd Members: Their Wit is never to be exhausted. It overflows again, and so it will do as often as true Religion comes in their Way.

The Parliament which dissolv'd the Monasteries, having met on the 3d of November an hundred Years before, the Archbishop was advis'd to put off the meeting of this Parliament to another Day lest it shou'd be ominous; and after the Example of those who were so wicked as to unsrock the Friars, this Assembly shou'd unsurprize the Vicars and Curates. I wonder it was not done, for a very little Thing turns their Heads; but the Archbishop was too well assur'd of his Majesty's Zeal to fear any Omen: And besides it does not appear in his Diary, that among so many Dreams he dream'd once against the third of November; so the Lords and Commons then met, and the King made a Speech to them, which the reverend Historian does not approve of, because it had not that Spirit in it which was in his former Speeches; by which we see how much this meek Divine was enamour'd with that imperious Manner so disagreeable to the Condition of Freemen. Mr. Achterley speaks of it reasonably, His Majesty, as if he had been the only Stranger to the general Sense of the Nation, arraign'd the Scots as REBELS, and with Warmth represented to the Lords and Commons, that their primary and principal Consideration ought to be to raise Money and Force to chase these REBELS out of England. I am really in the greatest Astonishment, when I consider that at a Juncture when there were as many wise and able Men in the Nation as ever were call'd to Council, such Heads as were about the King cou'd be cull'd out to have the Administration: There is not only an uncommon Deficiency of Understanding, but of Modesty: For these Counsellors knew that the Generality of the People

Long Parliament.

III Counsels.

A.D. 1640. ple were so far from looking on the Scots as Traytors, that they thought them their Deliverers, and lov'd them as their Brethren, and so stil'd them in their most solemn Discourses; yet did they suffer the King to call them Rebels, and to demand them to drive them away before their Deliverance was accomplish'd. If the Courtiers knew any Thing, they cou'd not but know this Parliament had never met if the Scots had never enter'd England;
and the Parliament knew as well that they shou'd be sent home again as soon as the Scots left the Kingdom; yet nothing less wou'd content the Rage of Laud and his Accomplices, than the Term
REBELS, so madly they drove to Destruction;
which is observ'd by Mr. Acherley and other grave Writers. "This Speech alarm'd the Lords and Commons, who had given Encouragement to the Scots; for they very well understood that that Invasion was the very Cause of their being now assembled, and the Continuance of the Scots Army in England, was the only Means to secure and continue them sitting, that they might without abrupt Dissolution, have Time to redress their Grievances, and punish the State Malefactors. I think Mr. Acherley gives them their right Name, and that they deserve it much more than those who have their Punishment at Tyburn.
They were sensible enough that if they shou'd chase out the Scots, they shou'd themselves soon after be chas'd out of Doors, and sent home to grieve and suffer as they had done many Years; and therefore did the People mourn at the King's calling the Scots REBELS: Yet his Majesty disdaining to mitigate or recede, went two or three Days after to the House of Peers, and in a Speech to them, avow'd the calling the Scots REBELS, and repeated and press'd his former Commands to chase them as such out of England, tho' this Speech was a direct Breach of the Treaty of Rippon, now adjourn'd to London."
The Lord-Keeper Finch's Harangue after the King's Speech; is the grossest Piece of Flattery which ever Monarch stood the hearing of in Presence of a whole Nation. Mr. Echard avers, He gave a full and satisfactory Account of the Scots Invasion, with all the threatening Dangers that attended so formidable an Appearance. 'Tis evident enough that these impartial Historians do not know what they are about. The People of England in general had not the least Apprehension of Danger from the Encampment of the Scots in Northumberland; nor was that Army formidable to any one Englishman but to Finch himself, Laud, Strafford, and the other Malefactors spoken of by Mr. Acherley.

Malefactors.

The Commons chose William Lenthall Esq; a Bencher and Reader of Lincoln's Inn, to be their Speaker; the King had intended Sir Thomas Gardiner Recorder of London for that Post, but he cou'd get no Place to chuse him a Member of Parliament. The Lord Clarendon intimates that he stood for London and lost it. I can hardly think he did stand, for there was not the least likelihood that a Court Lawyer, who had been a Favourer of Tonnage and Poundage, &c, shou'd be chosen at the same Time that Mr. Samuel Vassal was elected for London, who had been cruelly persecuted and plun-der'd for refusing to pay that Tax till the King had any Right to demand it, which he had not till it was given him by Parliament.

In two Days time the House of Commons settled their Committees of all Kinds, and spent the following two or three Days in receiving Petitions from all the Counties of England, and from particular Persons who had been oppress'd at the Council-Board, in the Star-Chamber, High-Commission Court, or otherwise. Arthur Capel Esq; presented the Petition for Hertfordshire, Sir John Packington that for Worcestershire, Sir John Colepeper that for Kent, Sir Philip Musgrave that for Westmorland; that for Wilts was presented by Sir Francis Seymour.

whom I mention on Account of their deserting this Cause afterwards, as it had been deserted before by Saville, Wentworth, and most of these did it for the same Reason as Capel, Colepeper, Seymour, tho' Mr. Capel was forc'd to give Money too into the Bargain. Turner, one of the Farmers of the Customs; having for some secret Service obtain'd the Nomination of a Baron, he dispos'd of it to Mr. Capel for 10000 Pounds, for which he was created Lord Capel of Hadham; but when the Money came to be paid, the King took it himself, and gave it to the Queen-Mother Mary de Medici, to pay for her Transportation when the Parliament began to murmur at her Stay in England. The Lord Fairfax presented the Torkshire Petition, Sir John Wray that of Lincolnshire, Sir
Thomas Barrington that for Essex, Sir Edmund Mont-fort that for Norfolk, William Pierrepont Esq; that for Shropshire, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Anthony Irby, and divers other Knights and Burgesses did the like for other Shires and Boroughs. But those Gentlemen were constant to their Principles, and almost all of them asserted to the last the Rights and Liberties of the People. Sir John Clotworthy a Member of Parliament in Ireland, was chosen for this in England, and in a long Speech set forth the Grievances which the Irish Protestants complain'd of under the Administration of the Earl of Straf-ford, who carry'd Tyranny with him wherever he went; for we are not in the least to heed what is said of his mild Government in Clarendon and Echard. Sir John Temple Master of the Rolls in Ireland, a wife and virtuous Man, complains of the sharp Humours rais'd by Wentworth's rigid Government, and of the Exorbitancies, so bitterly decry'd in Parliament, at the Council-Table there when he was Deputy; accordingly several Petitions were now deliver'd in against him preparatory to his Punishment.

Strafford's Tyranny.

On the 14th of November Petitions were presented in behalf of Dr. Leighton, William Prynne Esq; Dr. Bastwick, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Lilburne; and the House order'd Mr. Prynne, Dr. Bastwick, and Mr. Burton, to be sent for from their Goals in Guernsey and Fersey. They conceiv'd so great Horror at the Barbarities Dr. Leighton had suffer'd by Laud's Procurement, that as has been observ'd, their Clerk was bid to stop before the Petition was read thro'; that Christian and Protestant Assembly cou'd not bear the Sentence repeated which Archbishop Laud pronounced. The Complaints and Petitions touching Grievances, were so numerous, that the whole House was divided and subdivided into above forty Committees, to hear and examine them; but the main were reducible to these four general Heads.

1. "Committees concerning Religion, Innovations in the Church, and Grievances by Ecclesiastical Courts.
2. "Committees concerning Publick Affairs in general, and particularly concerning Ireland and Scotland.
3. "Other Committees were relating to Ship-Money, Judges, and Courts of Justice.
4. "Committees concerning Popery, the Popish Hierarchy, the Pope's Nuncio, &c.

These Committees were pursuant to the Speeches and Motions of Mr. Pym, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Mr. Bagshaw, Sir John Holland, all on the 7th of November. Sir Benjamin Rudyard enlarg'd upon Laud's superstitious Innovations, Mr. Pym upon the illegal and violent Ways of extorting Money from the People, on the Breach of parliamentary Privileges, the abrupt Dissolutions and Interruption of Parliaments, the Star-Chamber, High-Commission Court, and the ambitious and corrupt Clergy preaching divine Authority and absolute Power in Kings.

got to be silenc'd when he was Reader of the

156 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1640. sure I have observ'd in the High-Commission, and other Ecclesiastical Courts, especially for the monstrous Abuse of the Oath Ex Officio, which as it is now used, I can call no other than Carnificina Conscientie. He instanc'd in a Knight of a Shire, who was prosecuted five Years in a Spiritual Court, for putting on his Hat in Sermon-Time. Do such Things want Aggravation?

Spiritual Courts.

That there are a sort of Priesthood who still wou'd set these infamous Courts at work to vex oppress and ruin their honest conscientious Neighbours, one may conclude by a late Instance of a certain Curate, who having taken Offence against a Member of a Corporation for his Loyalty to his late Majesty, lodg'd a Prosecution against him in one of those vile Courts, in the Name of the Church-Wardens of the Parish, who knew nothing of the Matter. The Offender's Crime was laying down an aking Head on his Arm, in Time of a very dull Sermon. But what was still worse than the Malice of this Prosecution, he made the two Church-wardens afterwards swear to the Fact, and that they put in the Information to which their Names had been put; one of them, an ignorant Fellow, did it very readily, and has yet no Sense of his Sin, but the other has a deep Impression of it in an honest Mind, the Peace of which is like to be disturb'd by it as long as he lives.

This Digression cannot be unseasonable on a Subject which was so well handled in this Parliament; and it is in order to have it remember'd, if ever it shou'd be handled there again.

Sir John Holland.

Sir John Holland spoke for removing the Scottish Army with a soft and gentle Hand of Mediation and Reconciliation. The only way to reconcile them to the Government, was to restore their Religion, and Rights; and if they wou'd not have remov'd then, they wou'd soon have been chas'd away, as his Majesty so earnestly desir'd: But there was no fear of that.

Lord Digby.

The Lord Digby, who had not yet made a Bargain with the Court, strenuously vindicated those Liberties for which he traffick'd with them afterwards. He said warmly and eloquently, "It is true, Mr. Speaker, the County of Dorset has not digested its Complaints into the formal way of Petition, which others I see have done, but have entrusted them to my Partners and my Delivery of them by word of Mouth. There was given in to us in the County-Court, the Day of our Election, a short Memorial of the Heads of them, which we read in the Hearing of the Freeholders present, who all unanimously with one Voice, signify'd upon each Particular, that it was their Desire we should represent them to the Parliament, which with your Leave I shall do; and these are, 1. The great and intolerable Burthen of Ship-Money: 2. The many Abuses in pressing of Soldiers, and raising Monies: 3. The multitude of Monopolies: 4. The new Canons and Oath: 5. The Oath requir'd to be taken by Church Officers, &c. And to shew that the pious Orthodox Clergy were not much better us'd by Laud, than those he call'd Schismatical, the Lord Digby told the Parliament, he had a Note deliver'd him by the Clergy of that Diocese, complaining of the Imposition of a new Oath, which they conceive to be illegal, and of a pretended Benevolence, but in Effect a Subsidy to be paid by them, under Penalty of Suspension, Excommunication, and Deprivation: He said farther, The Oath is a Covenant against the King, for Bishops and the Hierarchy, and so much the worse than the Scottish Covenant, as they admit not of the Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs, and we are sworn to it. I cannot omit a handsome Turn of his upon the Lord Keeper's Rhetorical Harangue, "It hath been a Metaphor frequent in Parliament, "and if my Memory fail me not, was made use of in the Lord Keeper's Speech, That what

Against Laud's Clergy.

Monies Kings rais'd from their Subjects, they were A.D. 1640. "but as Vapours drawn from the Earth by the Sun, "to be distill'd upon it again in fructifying Showers: "The Comparison, Mr. Speaker, hath held of late "Years in this Kingdom too unluckily, what hath "been rais'd from the Subject by those violent "Attractions, hath been formed, it is true, into "Clouds: But how? To darken the Sun's own "Lustre, and hath fallen again upon the Land "only in Hailstones and Mildews, to batter and "prostrate still more and more our Liberties, to Remon- "blast and wither our Affections." He clos'd with strance mov'd by a Motion for a Remonstrance against the late pernicious Counsels, and the Authors of them, that it Lord Dig- shou'd be speedily drawn, and carry'd to the Lords by. for their Concurrence.

Sir John Colepepyr compar'd the Monopolizers to Sir John swarms of Vermin, which like the Frogs of Egypt, Colepe- had overspread the Land. Mr. Harbottle Grimston PYR. had this Expression, "They begin to fay in Town, Mr. Har- "the Judges have overthrown the Laws, and the bottle Grimston. "Bishops the Gospel.

Sir Edward Deering spoke much against the Sir Ed- Archbishop of Canterbury, concluding thus, I hope ward before the Year run round, his Grace will either have Deering. more Grace, or no Grace at all; for our manifold Laud the Griefs do fill a mighty and vast Circumference; yet Center of so, that from every Part our Lines of Sorrow do all Evils. lead to him, and point to him the Center, from whence our Miseries in this Church, and many of them in the Common-Wealth do flow.

Sir John Wray said, "No Man truly says, I Sir John am in Will and Heart resolv'd, unless according Wray. "to his Ability, he endeavours to perform his Resolution; which to speak the Hearts of us all in "this renown'd Senate, I am confident is fully "fix'd for the true Reformation of all Disorders in "Church or Religion, and upon the well uniting "and close rejoining of the now dislocated Great "Britain. The Lords and Commons petition'd for a general Fast, the Archbishop of Canterbury being one of the Lords who were order'd by the House of Peers to signify to his Majesty the Request of both Houses. A Committee was appointed to draw up the Remonstrance which the Lord Digby had mov'd, himself was Chairman; Sir John Strangeway, Sir John Colepepyr, Mr. Capel, Sir Francis Seymour, were of this Committee, as well as Mr. Selden, Mr. St. John, Sir Robert Harley, Sir John Clotworthy, &c. Thus we see that at the beginning of this Parliament, the most zealous Royalists were as loud against Grievances, as the most zealous Parliamentarians; and it is strange beyond Conception, that their Judgment should be convinc'd by a Civil War, in which they engag'd as soon as they left their first Party, to vindicate the Authors of those very Grievances. Sir William Widdrington, Knight of the Shire for Northumberland, speaking of the Scots, call'd them invading Rebels; The House taking Dislike at it, Captain Charles Price mov'd, that they wou'd give the Lascars Leave to speak, for Sir William's whole Estate was under the Scots Power; and the Knight, to explain himself, saying, he knew the Scots to be the King's Subjects, and wou'd no more call them Rebels, the House was satisfy'd.

Another wise Act of his Majesty's Counsellors, was the making one of them, the Lord Cottington, Governor of the Tower, just when the Ears of the Parliament were dinn'd with Complaints of the Encouragement given to Papists: If that Lord was not then a profess'd Papist himself, he was a profess'd favourer of Popery. But King Charles's Court was ever full of the worst sort of Occasional Conformists, such as went to Church not so much for Places, as to make her a Sacrifice to Rome, as Weston, Windebank, Cornway, Digby, Cottington, &c. Cottington presently added 400 Men to the Garrison in the Tower, which giving Umbrage to the Parliament as well as City, his Majesty took off the

A.D. 1640. the Garison, and displac'd the Governor. The House of Commons expell'd all their Members who had been concern'd in Monopolies, and other unlawful Projects for raising Money, for which Echard reproaches them, as having no Precedent for such Expulsions: We are assur'd, his own Words, "they had no Power to exclude any Members from their Places, upon the account of false Elections, or any other Pretence whatsoever. Who could assure him this, which is so contrary to all Journals of Parliament before the present? It were to be wish'd he had not been so often misled by the like Information and Authority. Sir William Beecher, one of the Clerks of the Council, who had been very busy in searching the Studies and Pockets of the Earl of Warwick, Lord Brook, and other Lords and Commoners, was summon'd before the House of Peers, and by them committed to the Fleet, though, says Echard, he had a Warrant from Secretary Windebank, who is about to fly the Kingdom for that and other illegal Practices.

Strafford
impeach'd.

Upon the 12th of November, a sudden Motion was made by Mr. Pym, for Leave to acquaint the House with something of the greatest Importance; wherefore he desir'd the Doors may be lock'd up; which being done, he told them several Persons had given Information, which gave Ground for the accusing Thomas Earl of Strafford of High-Treason. The House appointed a Committee, the Lord Digby, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Pym, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Stroud, Mr. St. John, to consider the Information, who reported that they found just Cause for it. While they were examining this Matter, Sir John Bramstone, Lord Chief-Justice, and Judge Forster, brought a Message from the Lords concerning the Scots Treaty; which being understood to be done with Design to stop the other Business, the Commons answer'd, that the Affair of the Treaty must be deferr'd, while the weighty and important Business then in Agitation, was under Consideration. The Earl of Strafford was but just arriv'd from the Army when the Information against him was brought into the House. Some thought it strange that he ventur'd to come to Parliament, knowing that the Scots were resolv'd to accuse him as an Incendiary, and that the most leading Members of both Houses were ready to join with them. But we are told the King was positive for his coming, being in want of so able a Head, which the Earl cou'd not long keep upon his Shoulders. He had prepar'd Matters for an Impeachment against those Lords and Gentlemen who had encourag'd the Scots to march into England; but Mr. Pym was before-hand with him, and not many Hours after he arriv'd in Town, carry'd up to the House of Lords an Accusation of High-Treason against Thomas Earl of Strafford, and desir'd in the Name of the Commons of England, that he be immediately put in safe Custody; which, according to the Archdeacon, the Lords agreed to with Clamour, and committed him to the Custody of Mr. Maxwell, Usher of the Black-Rod. He tells us further, that the Commons resolv'd to make Sir George Ratcliff, his Friend and Confident, a Party in the Treason, to disable him to be a Witness for the Earl. He also accuses them of a breach of Privilege, in sending for Sir George out of Ireland, where he was a Member of Parliament; but he does not tell us he was impeach'd there of High-Treason, which Audley Mervin, Esq; said, in his Speech to the House of Lords there, transcended all former Treasons so much, as that the rest seem'd to be but petty Larcenies, in respect of Ratcliff's, the Lord Strafford's Friend and Confident. Mr. Echard adds, upon the Earl's being sent to the Tower, The Parliament hunted and pursu'd him with all the Marks of an insatiable Desire of his Blood; which is in Truth of Sentiment and Expression, they prosecuted him strenuously, with a resolute Design to have Justice.

The House of Lords having had a Conference with the House of Commons about the Treaty of Rippon, the Commissioners for that Treaty now adjourn'd to London, were approv'd of by both Houses. Money being wanted to pay the King's Army, and relieve the Northern Counties, 100000 Pounds was voted to be borrow'd on the Security of some Members, who offer'd it; of which Mr. Harrison, a young Gentleman, a Member of the House, Son to Sir John Harrison of the Custom-House, voluntarily offer'd to advance 50000 Pounds upon that Security; which 50000 Pounds was sent to the Scots Army, who lay very heavy on Northumberland, and the Bishoprick. The Archdeacon copying after Bishop Guthry, his Originals are incomparable, calls it a Present, and adds, 'twas to be altogether without Prejudice to the 850 Pounds a Day formerly appointed them; whereas the Counties of Cumberland, Northumberland, and Durham, which paid that Contribution, were voted to be exempt from their Proportion of the 100000 Pounds when the Tax was levy'd.

Kilvert the Informer, who prosecuted the Bishop of Lincoln at the Instigation of Laud, was question'd in Parliament, as the main Manager of the wicked Wine Project, and a Bill was brought into the House, to make that vile Wretch a remarkable Example to all Projectors and Monopolists.

The Bishop of Lincoln was releas'd out of the Bishop Tower, at the Request of the House of Lords, Williams, and being restor'd to his Seat there, had not been many Hours in it, according to Echard, before he found out the dangerous Designs of the Country Party, and abandon'd them: He might have told us, that the House of Commons having sent to him, as Dean of Westminster, that the Communion-Table in Westminster Abbey, where the Members were wont to receive the Holy Sacrament, might be plac'd in the middle of the Church, he reply'd, He would do it, and would do the like for any Parishioner in his Diocese.

About this Time one James, a Papist, Son of James and Sir Henry James of Fewersham, made a bold Attempt on Mr. Haywood, a Justice of Peace in Westminster, who had carefully prepar'd a List of Recusants to be presented to the Committee: James was so provok'd at this Protestant Justice's Zeal, that meeting him in Westminster-Hall, he publicly stabb'd him: The Wound was thought Mortal at first, and the imagin'd Murther caus'd more Clamour against Papists, who were grown so insolent, that one of them assaulted a Magistrate in the supreme Court of Justice. The King was so sensible of the dangerous Consequence of such Insolence, that he sent a Message to the House of Commons to enquire into so foul and horrible a Fact. The Citizens of London presented a Petition against Recusants, in which they took Notice of James's Assault upon Haywood, and offer'd to guard the Parliament. Religion, says our modest Historian, began now to be more and more the Outcry of the House of Commons: They bellow'd when they spoke against Papists and Popery, against Laud's Superstition and Tyranny. He then gives us the Beginning and End of Sir Edward Deering's Speech on that Subject; to which I will add something between his two Paragraphs; "With the Papists there is a severe Inquisition, and with us there is a bitter High-Commission: Both these are Judges in their own Cases; yet herein their Inquisitors are better than our High-Commissioners; they do not punish for Delinquents such as profess the establish'd Religion; but with us, how many scores of poor distressed Ministers have in a few Years been suspended, degraded, depriv'd, excommunicated, not guilty of the Breach of any of our establish'd Laws?" He then mentions the

158 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1640. audacious libelling Pamphlets, written by Heylin, Cofins, Sparrow, Pocklington, Dow, Swan, Reeves, Tyranny of Tates, Hausted, Studly, Browne, Shelford, and many more; I name no Bishops, but I add, &c. the Parliament order'd a Committee to find out the Numbers of oppress'd Ministers under the Tyranny of the Bishops for these ten Years last past.

Wicked Judges.

A Debate arose concerning the Judges, for refusing Bail to Mr. Selden, and his Fellow-Prisoners, upon their Writs of Habeas Corpus. A Motion was made, that they might have Reparation out of the Estates of the Judges; of whom Judge Croke was excus'd, as differing in Opinion from the rest; and Judge Whitlocke was clear'd by the Defence his Son, Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; and Mr. Hampden made for him: When Ship-Money comes into Debate, we shall hear more of these, Sir Philip Warwick's, learned and upright Judges.

Lord Falkland. Ship-Money.

The Lord Falkland, speaking of that illegal Tax, inveigh'd against them, Who as Wolves worry'd those Sheep, whom as Dogs they shou'd have defended. He upbraided them with giving the King bad Counsel, telling him, he might do what he pleas'd by Policy: He mark'd out the Lord Keeper Finch, as the principal Adviser and Abettor in this Matter. Among all the false Representations against the Parliament of England, I think there is none more notorious than where Echard affirms, That the Commons voted Ship-Money to be against the Laws of the Realm, the Right of Property, the Liberty of the Subject, contrary to former Resolutions of Parliament, and to the Petition of Right, without Examination of the Reasons of the Judges; which had been more fully examin'd than such wretched Reasons deserv'd, as we see in the same Speech of the Lord Falkland's. "These Judges, Mr. Speaker, have deliver'd an Opinion and Judgment in an extrajudicial Manner; that is, such as came not within their Cognisance, they being Judges, and neither Philosophers nor Politicians; in which, when that which they wou'd have so evident and absolute taketh Place, the Law of the Land ceases, and that of general Reason and Equity, by which particular Laws at first were fram'd, returns to his Throne and Government. They have contradicted apparent Evidences, supposing mighty and evident Dangers in the most serene, quiet, and halcion Days that could possibly be imagin'd, a few contemptible Pyrates being our most formidable Enemies; they contradict the Writ it self, by supposing that supposed Danger to be so sudden, that it wou'd not stay for a Parliament: It seem'd generally strange, that they saw not the Law, which all Men else saw but themselves." Pray remember, Mr. Echard, copying after the most ingenious Warwick, told us, Nothing could have led them into that Opinion but their Books. Lord Falkland again; "The first of all the Reasons for this Judgment was such, that there needed not any from the adverse Party to help them to convert those few who before had not the least Suspicion of the Legality of that most illegal Tax; there being fewer that approv'd of the Judgment than there were that judg'd it legal, for I am confident they did not that themselves." The Lord Falkland speaks of the Indignation which the Opinion of the Judges against their Books and their Consciences rais'd in Peoples Minds; yet Echard vilifies the Parliament for questioning them about it; and yet it is expected I should treat him with Decency, who has so unworthily and scandalously treated the whole Nation in their Representatives. We must not forget, that in this Speech Lord Falkland charg'd Heylin with representing the People of England as Slaves; and Mr. Philips charges him for abusing the Bishop of Lincoln; and I cou'd charge him with a Book full of insolent Sophistry and Falshood, if the Digression wou'd not disgrace the History: He abus'd Bishop Williams to please Archbishop Laud, and he abus'd the whole English Nation to please those who unhappily had then the Government of it. A.D. 1640.

About the latter end of November, William Prynne, Esq; Dr. Bastwick, and Mr. Burton the Minister, return'd from their several remote Prisons by order of Parliament, to whom they severally presented their Petitions: Mr. Prynne and Mr. Burton landed first at Southampton from Guernsey and Jersey, and Dr. Bastwick afterwards at Dover from Scilly; all three continued their Journey by Land; and all three, as they travelled the Country, were receiv'd with the Acclamations of the People. Larrey writes, "It was a continual Procession all along the Road, and People beholding their Scars with Veneration, stil'd them Martyrs, and their Judges Hangmen, too tender a Name for them." All Places where they pass'd were strew'd with Flowers, and Joy echo'd from every Part for their Deliverance; a hundred Coaches accompany'd the Coaches they rode in, and they made their Entry into London in a triumphant Manner, the Acclamation being as hearty as it was loud and general. If it was heard at Lambeth, it must be as doleful as a Knell; and now must the Archbishop be in the bitterness of Terror and of Woe, while those whom he had so barbarously prosecuted and mutilated, were in Exultation with an innumerable Multitude of Friends through the whole City; which for this Reason, and a steady Adherence to the reform'd Religion and Liberty, is by Echard call'd, the Sink of all the ill Humours in the Kingdom. If I shou'd call the Earl of Clarendon's History, and his own, the Sink of all the Tyranny and Superstition of the Reign I write of, how wou'd it be taken? This joyful Multitude did not fail to express their Repentment against Land and his Brother Persecutors in very intelligible Terms, such as doubtless made their Hearts ache, though Mr. Echard, with his wonted Wit, rallies the Rabble for being angry with those Prelates for persecuting such godly Men. These Sufferers a few Days afterwards had some Compensation for their Sufferings, as also had Dr. Leighton, and Mr. Lilburne, in Defiance, says Echard, with equal Modesty and Judgment, of that Court of Justice that had censur'd them, the abominable Star-Chamber. In all the Resolutions to which the Parliament came in reference to these much injur'd Gentlemen, they voted their Prosecutions and Sentences to be illegal, and that their Judges shou'd make them Reparation, naming Archbishop Laud, Bishop Juxon Lord High-Treasurer, the Lord Keeper Coventry, the Lord Newburgh, Sir Thomas Fermyn, Duke of Lenox, Lord Cottington, Marquess of Hamilton, Earl of Arundel, Secretary Windbank, who are now coming to a Reckoning for their Cruelties and Extortions in that execrable Court. The House order'd a Charge to be drawn up against Heylin, for promoting the Suit there against Mr. Prynne. The Earl of Rothes, the Lord Lowdon, and the other Scotch Commissioners, remain'd at London about the Affairs of that Nation and their Army. The Archdeacon informs us, they heard their Chaplains preach in St. Antholin's Church, which was crowded every Day with Auditors, out of Zeal, Fashion, or Curiosity. The Earl of Clarendon supports him in this Drollery, by saying their Sermons were flat and insipid: Qualities which will better admit of Sentiments of Piety and Devotion, than the Flattery and Fustian Rage and Nonsense of Sibthorp, Pocklington, and the Preachers mention'd by Sir Edward Deering. The Reverend Historian goes on, "The Interest and Influence of the Scots Commissioners increas'd the Boldness and Hatred of the inferior Sort against the establish'd Church; another false Representation, for neither the higher nor lower Order of People hated the Protestant Church of England, as establish'd in King Edward the VIth's Reign, and Scots Commissioners.

A.D. 1640. and as understood by Bishop Moreton, Bishop Davenant, Bishop Hall, Bishop Brownrig, Archbishop Usher, and other pious and learned Fathers of our Church: But they did hate heartily the prophane and superstitious Innovations establish'd by Laud; and to remove them, Alderman Pennington, one of the Members for the City of London, presented a Petition to the House of Commons the 11th of December, sign'd by 15000 Hands, which Mr. Archdeacon calls the Refuse of the People, as if they had been all such Wretches as ran about after Sacheverel, the condemn'd Doctor, in our Days, and pull'd down Houses to shew their Zeal for the Church. He tells a Story upon it, which appears prima facie, to be false, tho' probably, his Invention was not fruitful enough to produce it: "The Petitioners usually prepar'd a Petition very modest and dutiful for the Form, and not very unreasonable in the Substance, which they carefully communicated at some publick Meetings to get it receiv'd with Approbation. The Subscriptions of a few Hands fill'd the Paper itself, which contain'd the Petition, and therefore more Sheets were annex'd for the Reception of the Number which was to countenance the Undertaking. When many Hands were procur'd, the Petition itself was cut off, and a new one answerable to the Design on foot annex'd to the List of Names. Of this sort was Pennington's Petition which struck at Episcopacy." I am not afraid of repeating the most malignant Parcels of their Histories, which are so many Felo de se's, and murder themselves. This is filly to a degree; for what Need of so much Art to procure 15000 Hands, when the nine in ten of the Inhabitants of London were then in the Puritan Interest? And Mr. Echard had just call'd it not only the Sink of its own Ill-Humours, but the Sink of all the Ill-Humours in the Nation. Alderman Pennington's Petition being read in the House, it was resolv'd upon the Question, That there shall be a Day certain set for the debating of it; that the Roll of Names brought in with this Petition, shall be seal'd with Mr. Speaker's Seal till the House shall farther order it. But there happen'd a Debate three or four Days after, which of Course introduc'd the Substance of this Petition, and that was about the extravagant Proceedings of the Bishops and Convocation. The Canons, new Oath, the Benevolence, the irregular and tyrannical Government of Laud and other Prelates, was explain'd and exclaim'd against, as well as the Canons and Convocation Acts. Sir Edward Deering in his Speech, call'd this Laudean Synod, A Monster to our Law, a Cerberus to our Religion; they have charg'd their Canons at us to the full, and never fearing that ever they wou'd recoil back into a Parliament, they have ramn'd a prodigious ungodly Oath into them. Mr. Fiennes the Lord Say's Son, said, I conceive these Canons do contain sundry Matters, which are not only contrary to the Lawes of the Land, but also destructive of the very principal and fundamental Lawes of the Kingdom. He then enumerated the various Articles which were of such ill Tendency. Sir Benjamin Rudyard spoke thus, "A Man may easily see to what tend all these Innovations and Alterations in Doctrine and Discipline, and without a Perspective, discover afar off the Toilsomeness of these spiritual Engineers to undermine the old and true Foundations of Religion, and to establish their tottering Hierarchy in the room thereof." The Lord Digby, uncorrupted as yet, call'd it a new Synod patch'd out of an old Convocation. At last it was resolv'd, nemine contradicente, That the Clergy of England conven'd in Convocation, have no Power to make any Constitution, Canons, or Act whatsoever, in Matters of Doctrine, Discipline, or otherwise, to bind the Clergy or Laity of the Land, without Consent of Parliament; that the Canons pass'd by the late Synod, contain Matters contrary to the fundamental Lawes and Statutes of the Kingdom; to the Rights of Parliament, and Liberty of the Subjects, and Matters tending to Sedition, and of dangerous Consequence. Resolv'd, nemine Contradicente, "That the Benevolence granted by the Convocation is contrary to the Laws, and ought not to bind the Clergy." All which Resolutions Mr. Archdeacon declares, on his undoubted Authority, to be entirely wrong; and that the Convocation knowing their Business better than the Parliament, only exerted their antient Rights. A Committee was order'd to consider and examine who were the Promoters of the new Canons, and who the principal Actors; and to consider how far in particular the Archbishop of Canterbury hath been an Actor in the great Design of the Subversion of the Laws of the Realm and of the Religion, and to prepare and draw up a Charge against him: Which Committee was compos'd of the following Gentlemen, who were to meet in the Star-Chamber, where most of the Tragedies he was now to be accountable for, had been acted.

Sir John Strangeways, Sir Robert Howard, Sir Francis Seymour, Sir Oliver Luke, Sir Henry Anderson, Sir Guy Palmer, Sir Miles Fleetwood, Sir Robert Harley, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir William Litton, Sir Walter Earl, Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir Thomas Widdrington, Sir Hugh Chomley, Sir John Hotham, Sir Edward Deering, Sir Thomas Barrington, Mr. Strangeways, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Pym, Mr. Bagshaw, Mr. Glyn, Mr. Grimston, Mr. Hampden, Mr. Fiennes, Mr. Young, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Peard, Mr. Coke, Mr. White, Mr. Rigby, Mr. Palmer, Mr. Weston, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Whistler, Mr. Felham, Mr. St. John, Mr. Rogers, Mr. Whitlocke.

They were most of them as great Men as any of that or any other Age, and most of them not prejudic'd against Episcopacy; I do not mean Archbishop Laud's but Archbishop Usher's. The Scots Commissioners deliver'd a long Charge in Writing against the former, wherein he is charg'd with all the Innovations and Alterations made in the Church and State of Scotland, and that consequently he is the Author of the present Troubles, which is what I was endeavouring to prove before I read this Paper. The Lord Paget read it in the House of Lords, and it was then sent to the House of Commons, who after the reading of it, voted him guilty of High-Treason the 18th of December, and Mr. Hollis was sent to the Lords to impeach him, and desire he might be sequestred from the House, and committed to safe Custody, which was so order'd, and the Archbishop call'd to the Bar as a Delinquent, where he desir'd Leave to fetch some Papers from Lambeth for his Defence, and it was granted, provided Mr. Maxwell Usher of the Black-Rod attended him, and had him still in Custody. Their Lordships order'd that no Member of their House shou'd visit him. The next Day Mr. Hampden was sent to the House of Peers, to let them know that the Commons had Informations of a high Nature against Matthew Wren Lord Bishop of Ely, for setting up Idolatry and Superstition, and being himself an Idolater; that the Commons heard he was running away, and therefore they desir'd he might be secur'd; upon which he was oblig'd to give 10000 Pounds Bail for his forth coming. Notwithstanding the long Bill of Articles against Laud, which the Lord Paget read in the House, Mr. Echard asserts there was nothing in Form particularly produc'd against him till ten Weeks after; whereas the very formal and ample Charge against him was read by the Lord Paget in the House of Lords before it was reported in the Commons House. He adds, the great Mens Hatred against him, was for his punishing Sir Robert Howard and the Lady Purbeck with Penance for their Amours. What a Trifle is this to his endeavouring to destroy the Reform'd Religion, and the Rights and Liberties of the People of England? The Lords order'd Sir Robert Howard 500*l.* Damages

A.D. 1640. mages against the Archbishop; which according to Echard he paid with great Difficulty; so I believe, if by that he understands Reluctance; tho' a few Months before he cou'd lend the King 10000*l.* to raise an Army against the Protestants in Scotland.

Princess Anne's Death. About this time dy'd the Princess Anne, his Majesty's third Daughter, four Years old, very much lamented on Account of the Hopes she gave by the Pregnancy of her Parts.

Windebank flies. Secretary Windebank Archbishop Land's old Friend, having releas'd several Popish Priests, and countermanded Writs for seizing the Lands and Goods of Recusants convict, and order'd Magistrates to forbear prosecuting them, was summon'd to answer for those and several other Offences before the House of Commons, of which he was a Member, tho' an unworthy one; but instead of appearing, his Guilt gave Speed to his Flight, and he got into France to be out of their reach.

Lord-Keeper Finch flies. The next Minister who ran away from Punishment, was Finch the Lord-Keeper, who before he fled, desir'd to be heard by the House of Commons, hoping they wou'd not be able to withstand his Eloquence. It was granted, and a Chair set for him near the Bar. He came into the House the 12th of December, carrying the Purse himself; and when the Speaker told him his Lordship might sit, he made a low Obeysance, and laying down the Seal and his Hat in the Chair, lean'd on the Back of it, in which Posture he made a long rhetorical Speech, which very little extenuated his Crime. He began thus, "I give you Thanks for granting me Admittance to your Presence; I came not to preserve myself and Fortunes, but to preserve your good Opinion of me; for I profess I had rather beg my Bread from Door to Door with Date Obolum Belisario with your Favour, than be ever so high and honour'd with your Displeasure." His Conclusion was, If I may not live to serve you, I desire I may die in your good Opinion. This Speech was deliver'd so gracefully, and was in itself so moving, that the Minds of many Members of the House of Commons received Impressions by it: But Echard is too credulous and too positive in saying, "The Lord Clarendon makes it visible, that this great Man was still so much in Favour of the House, that they wou'd gladly have preserv'd him in his Place," there being not the least Visibility of any such Disposition in them; and it is partially and unjustly said only to represent the Parliament as unjust and partial. Mr. Rigby presently answer'd the Lord Keeper thus, Had not this Syren so sweet a Tongue, surely he cou'd never have effected so much Mischief to this Kingdom. You know, Sir, Optimorum Putrefactio pessima, the best Things putrify'd become the worst, and as it is in the natural so in the Body politick. And what's to be done then? Ense recidendum est, the Sword of Justice must strike; Ne pars sincera trahatur, lest the sound Part suffer. And so very desirous was they to keep him in his high Office, that the very same Day they voted him a Traitor; 1. For refusing to read the Remonstrance against the Lord Weston. 2. For soliciting, persuading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their Opinion for Ship-Money. 3. For several illegal Acts in Forest Matters. 4. For ill Offices done in making the King dissolve the last Parliament. The next Day he was accus'd before the House of Peers, but he got up earlier than ordinary, gave them the Slip, and escap'd to Holland. He was succeeded as Keeper by Sir Edward Littleton Lord-Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas.

Judges. On the 20th of December the famous Mr. Waller was sent to the Lords with a Message from the Commons, that they had receiv'd divers Informations of Crimes of a very high Nature against Sir John Bramstone Lord-Justice of the King's-Bench, Sir Humphry Davenport, Justice Berkley, and Justice Crawley, and desir'd they might put in Bail to abide the Censure of Parliament. The Judges submitted themselves to the Pleasure of the House of Peers, who order'd them to give Security for their Appearance.

Dr. Cofins afterwards Bishop of Durham, was sent for as a Delinquent, and voted guilty of Superstitious Innovations tending to Idolatry, of speaking scandalous and malicious Words against his Majesty's Supremacy, and the Religion establish'd. This lets us into a Secret which Clarendon, Echard, and all that sort of Writers have endeavour'd to keep from us, which is, that the Parliament of England do not look upon Land, Neile, Wren, Harsnet, Montague, Manwaring, Pierce, Skinner, &c. Prelates, nor upon Sibthorp, Pocklington, Cofins, and such inferior Clergy, to be of the establish'd Church, which however they have always in their Mouths; but of an idolatrous superstitious Church which they were about establishing. Notwithstanding this Vote, the reverend Historian informs us Cofins was a strict Churchman, very loyal; and when he fled to France, converted there many Papists to the Protestant Religion.

Dr. Chaffin a West-Country Parson, was also sent for as a Delinquent, for a Sermon preach'd by him in the Cathedral-Church of Salisbury; as was also one Jones Parson of Oswfield in Devonshire, for scandalous Words against the Parliament in a Sermon preach'd at Triverton. Chaffin was reprimanded by the Speaker, and order'd to make a Recantation in the Cathedral at Salum.

Sir John Lamb was brought upon his Knees for levying Money to set up Organs. But there wou'd be no end of it, if one shou'd pretend to particularize the Instances of every Priest who turn'd the Artillery of the Pulpit against the Religion, Rights, and Liberties of their Country, for which Reason the Author or Authors of the History of the Rebellion, labour so much to charge the Puritans with beating the Ecclesiastical Drum.

One of the last Things that were done this Year in Parliament, was the bringing Archdeacon Pierce Son to the Bishop of Bath and Wells, upon his Knees at the Bar of the House of Commons, for saying to one Mr. Coleman, who seem'd to be concern'd at the Dissolution of the last Parliament, A Pox of God take them all. You see what the Archdeacons of the Laudean Stamp were: They were puritanical factious Fellows; the King will never be quiet till some of their Heads are off; he may have two Millions of Money of a Spanish Don if he will. He was excellently well taught both as to Piety and Politicks by his Father Bishop Pierce, who, as we have related, never distinguish'd himself so much by any thing, as by his Zeal for Revels and Sabbath-breaking. The swearing Archdeacon was order'd into Custody of the Serjeant at Arms; and I think if he had had his due, another Keeper wou'd have had him in keeping, the Words being prov'd by three Witnesses.

In the beginning of the next Year, a Petition from Kent, and some time after another from Gloucester, were presented to the House concerning the Evils suffer'd by Reason of the Government of Bishops; both which were refer'd to the Committee for Pennington's Petition: And on the 14th of January Mr. Edward Hyde afterwards Earl of Clarendon, had the Thanks of the House of Commons for his great Service in vindicating the Liberty and Property of the Subject with respect to the Business of Ship-Money, and the Impeachment of the Lord-Keeper Finch for High-Treason, in which there are some Things remarkable, for that this same Mr. Hyde does in Clarendon's History declare, Many believ'd the real Necessity of Ship-Money, and thought the Burden reasonable; it did not seem of apparent ill Consequence, that the regal Power shou'd supply the Impotency of the Law. And tho' this Mr. Hyde was order'd to assist the Lord Falkland when

A.D. 1641. when he carry'd up the Articles of Impeachment against Finch; wherein the Parliament say, by the Lord Falkland, "Here are many and mighty Crimes, Crimes of Supererogation. So that High-Treason is but a Part of his Charge, pursuing him fervently in every several Condition; a silent Speaker, an unjust Judge, an unconscionable Keeper, his Life appears a perpetual Warfare, with Mines, Battery, Battel and Stratagem, against our fundamental Laws; yet the Parliament, according to the Lord Clarendon, would fain have kept him in Keeper.

Monopolists.

On the 21st of January the Parliament proceeded against Monopolists, and finding some of their own Members among them, they were expell'd; as Sir Nicholas Crisp Baron for Winchelsea a Cinque-Port, William Sandys Esq; Burgess for Evesham in Worcestershire, Sir John Jacob Baron for Rye a Cinque Port, Thomas Webb Esq; Burgess for — Edmund Windham Esq; Burgess for Bridgwater in Somersetshire, a small Dealer, his Monopoly being the marking of Butter-Firkins; he was afterwards Governor, for the King, of the Town he represented, and was expell'd there too by Sir Thomas Fairfax and Oliver Cromwell.

Popular Counsels.

There being no stemming of the Tide for Redress of Grievances, and no breaking up of the Parliament while the Scots Army was in England, the Court was advis'd to swim with the Stream, and for once to try the Effect of popular Counsels, which, says Eckard, was an infirm Piece of Policy; so politick is he himself, as to think the Love of the People a weakening of the Prince; There was no surer Way to make him belov'd, than to employ those whom the People lov'd. The Earl of Bedford, the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Warwick, and the Lord Say, were sworn of the Privy-Council; and according to the reverend Historian, they soon shew'd how unfit they were to have Seats at that Board, by telling the King, They ought not to give him any Advice which was disagreeable to the Sense of the Parliament his great Council. How weak were these new Counsellors? The Historian with his usual Simplicity reflects upon them again for counselling the King to be only advis'd by the Two Houses. If the King had any Interest separate from that of the People, which I verily believe that Author thinks he might have, he is in the right to upbraid those Lords of the Privy-Council for giving him such Advice: But if the King's Interest and his People's are inseparable, as common Sense teaches one, then the Advice of his Parliament cou'd be the only sure Foundation for his Majesty to build upon. The Earl of Bedford was to be Lord-Treasurer; in order to which, Dr. Juxon had already begg'd Leave of the King to resign his White-Staff, which indeed had encroach'd too much upon the Pastoral one. He resolv'd, says the Archdeacon, to withdraw from the impending Storm, with no less Honour than Security. He cou'd not keep it any longer. His Bishoprick was in Danger, and much more his Treasurership. How ridiculous is this Air which is maintain'd thro' the History. Juxon was one of the principal Actors in the Convocation, in the Star-Chamber, and High-Commission Courts. As great as his Security was, he was fin'd 10000*l.* by the Parliament for acting in that Synod; he was order'd to make Reparation to Mr. Burton the Minister for the barbarous Sentence he pass'd upon him in the Star-Chamber, and to Mr. Prynne for his cruel unheard of Punishment, and to others who had suffer'd the like bloody Sentences: Yet, if you can believe Mr. Eckard for once, he was in no Danger of losing his Post of Lord-High-Treasurer of England, but voluntarily petition'd to part with it, that he might apply himself to his Episcopal Function, so consistent with the pecuniary Employments he had been so long in possession of. The Archdeacon again; "The Lord Say was to be made Master of the Wards in the "room of the Lord Cottington, who was promised to be indemnify'd for the future." He has the Lord Clarendon's Word for it. But was Mr. Hyde so much in Mr. Pym's Confidence, that he reveal'd all his Secrets to him? Pym on the same Account was to be Chancellor of the Exchequer. Cottington was so far from being indemnify'd, that he was order'd to make Satisfaction to Mr. Prynne and the other Sufferers, for the Sentences he pass'd against them in the Star-Chamber.

Tho' there is not the least Appearance of Wit in all the Archdeacons Folio Histories, but when the Terms godly, seeking God, Purity or Reformation lye in his Way, yet he nibbles at it here, whete he says, Mr. Pym's overflowing Zeal might have been diverted by a Place; which was not very likely, when Mr. St. John, who was made Solicitor-General, whose Zeal overflow'd as much as Mr. Pym's, gave an exemplary Instance, that when a Person is truly animated with a publick Spirit, he grows above all Temptation, and sacrifices all other Interests to that of the Publick. The Earl of Essex was made Lord-Chamberlain; but his Zeal continu'd to overflow, when the Service of his Country requir'd it. This Constancy to the Common-Weal, the reverend Historian terms a long and rooted Malignity to the Government. And it is observable in his and the Earl of Clarendon's Histories, that they do their Business by Words, without having any Regard to the Fact or to the Argument. There's more secret History still to come; "Bedford and Pym promis'd to obtain a liberal Provision and Settlement for the King's Revenues;" insinuating that if the Earl of Bedford had been made Lord-Treasurer, and Mr. Pym Chancellor of the Exchequer, they wou'd have sacrific'd the Rights and Liberties of the People to the King's Will and Pleasure, which is what he means by Government. For if by Government he understood a steady Adherence to the Constitution, the limited Prerogative of the Crown, and the ancient Privileges of Parliament, he wou'd have known that there had been no such Government in this Reign; and that what he calls a rooted Malignity to it, was a strenuous asserting of the Liberty of Englishmen both in Spirituals and Temporals.

A Bill being brought into the House by Edmund Prideaux Esq; for Triennial Parliaments, the Lord Digby spoke to it forcibly and eloquently the 19th of January, I will be bold to say, Mr. Speaker, that an Accumulation of all the publick Grievances since Magna Charta, one upon another, unto that Hour in which the Petition of Right pass'd into an Act of Parliament, wou'd not amount to so oppressive, I am sure not so destructive a Height of Magnitude to the Rights and Properties of the Subject, as one Branch of our enslaving since the Petition of Right. His Lordship says no more nor no less, than that one Act of Misgovernment since Laud and Wentworth were at the Head of it, was more oppressive and destructive, than all the illegal Acts in the Administration for four hundred Years past, under the Garvasons, the Spencers, the Empsons, the Dudleys, the Wolseys, the Cars, the Villiers, &c. And yet there must be no Tyranny spoken of in this Reign. This Triennial Bill going forward, and Petitions being daily presented to the House of Commons against the Hierarchy and Dissolutions of Parliaments, the King sent for both Houses to the Banqueting-House the 25th of January, where making a Speech to them, he put them in mind of the two King's Armies, and the Charge of maintaining them. As healing to Bishops, he said, he wou'd not say but they may have overstretch'd their Power and encroach'd upon the Temporal. If they will reform the Abuse he is with them, but he will not consent to take away their Vote in Parliament. This was truly healing, as the Archdeacon terms it, and 'tis great Pity that the Fervour of some leading Men had not cool'd a little.

A.D. 1641. a little. Here was a happy Opportunity to have thrown out all Superstition, and to have broken the spiritual Courts to Pieces, to have hinder'd Innovation and Persecution for ever; and I know not what any good Englishman and good Protestant ought to hope for more as to Spirituals. Here we must own that the Zeal of those leading Members overflow'd; but what human Counsels are at all Times free from Error?

Goodman the Priest. The King had repriev'd one Goodman a Priest, who had been condemn'd at the Old-Baily, of which the Commons having receiv'd Information; they sent Sir John Colepeper to the Lords, to desire a Conference, which being agreed to, Mr. Hyde and other Members were appointed to manage it; Mr. Hyde returning from the Conference, brought a Message from the King, "That Goodman had not perverted the King's Subjects, that he was merciful like Queen Elizabeth and King James, that he was willing Goodman shou'd be imprison'd or banish'd, and did not intend by this particular Mercy to lessen the Force of the Law." It is worth remarking, that since the new Privy-Counsellors had Seats at the Board, the Style of the Speeches and Messages are soft and obliging; whereas while Laud had Influence there, and after the new Counsellors were no more advis'd with, the Style is study'd to displease, and sometimes to exasperate. The two Houses agreed upon a Remonstrance concerning the Reprieve of Goodman, and the Favour shewn to the Papists, which was deliver'd by the Lord-Keeper to the King. In this Remonstrance it is said, the Favour shewn to Papists, and particularly to Goodman, had so offend'd the Citizens of London, that they absolutely deny'd to lend Money for the publick Occasions till they were satisfy'd in those Points. His Majesty most graciously comply'd with the humble Request of his Two Houses of Parliament, and left Goodman to the Law; and the Priest shew'd himself worthy of national Mercy as well as national Justice, by petitioning the King to be executed rather than be the Cause of a Misunderstanding between his Majesty and the Parliament.

Earl of Strafford's Trial. All this while Preparations were making for the Tryal of the Earl of Strafford, which Echard represents as a Conspiracy of the Parliament to destroy him. They proceeded by private Steps, as these Steps in Parliament Order'd, "That his Majesty be mov'd that the Committee for preparing the Charge against the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, may have the Lord Mount Norris's Papers. Again;

Order'd, "That the Committee have Power to send for Records, Parties, and Witnesses, or any other thing which they shall think may conduce to the perfecting of that Charge.

It is observable that before the Articles against him were perfected, the House of Commons debated the Matter of Attainders, and a Committee was appointed to search after Records of former Attainders, the Commons having then in their Prospect Proceedings against the Earl of Strafford. How private this Step was. We see here that the Design to attain him, was form'd even before he was try'd, tho' the Attainder is represented as a sudden Change of Process, upon their apprehending that the Tryal might not serve their End. I cou'd give many other Instances of such private Steps taken openly in the House of Commons, if these were not sufficient to shew how unreasonable it is to expect Sincerity or Impartiality from that Historian.

The Bill for Triennial Parliaments having pass'd the House of Commons, was sent to the House of Peers by the Lord Digby, a Nobleman of fine Qualities, which were all blasted at once by his Apostacy, and giving up that excellent Reason of which he was Master, to his two ungovernable

Passions Revenge and Ambition. The King pass'd A.D. 1641. that Bill the 15th of February, and made another healing Speech, for with the Triennial Bill there pass'd another for granting his Majesty four entire Subsidies.

On the 26th of February Mr. Pym carry'd up to the Lords the Articles against Archbishop Laud, an Abridgment of which is as follow.

1. "That he had traiterously endeavour'd to subvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the Kingdom, to introduce arbitrary and tyrannical Power; and to that End had wickedly and traiterously advis'd his Majesty that he might raise Money at his own Will and Pleasure without Consent of Parliament, which he affirm'd was warrantable by the Law of God.
2. "That for the better Accomplishment of his traiterous Designs, he had procur'd Sermons to be preach'd, printed, and publish'd against the Authority of Parliament and the Laws of the Land.
3. "He hath by Letters, Messages, Threats and Promises to the Judges, perverted the Course of Justice, whereby several of his Majesty's Subjects have been depriv'd of their lawful Rights, and subjected to his tyrannical Will, to their Ruin and Destruction.
4. "He hath traiterously and corruptly sold Justice in the High-Commission Court, hath taken unlawful Gifts and Bribes, and endeavour'd to corrupt other Courts of Justice, by advising the King to sell Places of Judicature contrary to Law.
5. "He hath traiterously caus'd a Book of Canons to be compos'd and publish'd contrary to the King's Prerogative, to the fundamental Laws and Statutes, to the Right of Parliament, to the Property and Liberty of the Subject, tending to Sedition and to the Establishment of a vast, unlawful, presumptuous Power in himself and his Successors. To which is added a wicked and ungodly Oath to be taken by all Clergymen and some Laymen.
6. "That he hath traiterously assum'd a Papal tyrannical Power in Ecclesiastical and Temporal Matters, and deny'd the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction to be deriv'd from the Crown, which he has exercis'd to the Destruction of divers of the King's liege People.
7. "That he hath traiterously endeavour'd to alter and subvert God's true Religion by Law establish'd, and instead thereof to set up Papish Superstition and Idolatry; hath maintain'd divers Papish Doctrines and Opinions, enjoin'd Papish superstitious Ceremonies, without any Warrant by Law, hath cruelly persecuted those who have oppos'd the same by corporal Punishments and Imprisonments, and unjustly vexed others who refus'd to conform thereunto, by Suspension, Deprivation, Degradation contrary to Law.
8. "That to advance his traiterous Purposes, he intruded on the Places of divers great Officers, and upon the Right of other his Majesty's Subjects, and preferr'd to great Promotions in the Church such as have been Papishly affected, or otherwise unfound and corrupt in Doctrine and Manners.
9. "For the same traiterous and wicked Intent, he hath employ'd such Men to be his domestick Chaplains, whom he knew to be notoriously disaffected to the Reform'd Religion, and to them hath committed the licensing of Books, by which means divers false and superstitious Books have been publish'd.
10. "He hath traiterously and wickedly endeavour'd to reconcile the Church of England with the Church of Rome, and for effecting it hath comforted and confederated with Papish Priests

A.D. 1641. " and Jesuits, hath kept secret Intelligence with
" the Pope of Rome, and permitted a Popish Hierarchy to be establish'd in this Kingdom.

11. " That he in his own Person, and other " Officers by his Command, have caus'd divers
" learned, pious, and orthodox Ministers to be silenced, suspended, depriv'd, degraded, excommunicated, without just Cause; hath hinder'd
" the preaching of God's Word, caus'd divers of " his Majesty's loyal Subjects to forsake the Kingdom; and increas'd and cherish'd Ignorance and " Prophaneness among the People, that he might " effect his own wicked and traiterous Design of " corrupting the true Religion here establish'd.

12. " He hath traiterously endeavour'd to cause
" Division and Discord between the Church of " England and other Reform'd Churches, and to " that End hath suppress'd the Dutch and French
" Churches in this Kingdom.

13. " That he hath maliciously and traiterously
" plotted and endeavour'd to stir up War and Enmity between his Majesty's two Kingdoms of " England and Scotland; and to that Purpose hath " labour'd to introduce into the Kingdom of Scotland, divers Innovations in Religion and Government, tending all to Popery and Superstition, to " the great Discontent of that Nation; and for " their refusing to submit to such Innovations, he " did traiterously advise his Majesty to reduce them
" by Force of Arms: And when a Pacification
" was made, he so incens'd his Majesty against his
" said Subjects of Scotland, that he did thereupon,
" by the Advice of the Archbishop, enter into an " offensive War against them.

14. " That to preserve himself from being question'd for these and other his traiterous Courses, he hath labour'd to subvert the antient Course
" of parliamentary Proceedings, and falsly and maliciously incens'd his Majesty against Parliaments.

The History has shewn most of these Articles to be true, and they were fully clear'd up and proved at his Tryal. Mr. Pym expatiated upon every Article in a Speech, which for Style and Sentiment has a true Roman Spirit. I do not know a better in our Language; and as I refer the Reader to it at large in Rushworth, I doubt not but the Pleasure he will take in reading it, will more than pay for the Time it takes up. Whoever will compare it with the most eloquent of the Lord Clarendon's, will find the same Difference between them, as there is between Substance and Shew, Beauty and Affectation. The Archbishop continu'd the Use of the Episcopal Power while he was in Prison, of which the House having Information, a Motion was made to restrain it; but both Friends and Enemies agreeing it was better to bring him to a Tryal, that Motion dropp'd. What can one think or say of Historians, such as Clarendon and Echard, who shall solemnly declare that this great Criminal had the Meekness of a Dove, the Virtue of a Philosopher, the Piety of a Saint, the Constancy of a Martyr, the Charity of a primitive Christian, and the Perfection of an Angel? There is not half of what might to be said against Laud, if I wou'd make use of Mr. Pym's most powerful and eloquent Oration and Argument, and the additional Articles which were exhibited against him afterwards, of which something must be said in the Sequel. While those high and capital Crimes are fresh in the Reader's Memory, it will be very proper to shew the most beautiful Picture of him painted by the Earl of Clarendon; the Features in the Parliament's Picture are all Deformity, in the Earl's all Beauty; and we may by that make a safe and sure Judgment of the rest of his Characters: He apply'd all the Remedies he cou'd to the Mischiefs which daily broke in to the Prejudice of Religion; his Virtues were very exemplary; he believ'd Innocence of Heart, and Integrity of Manners, to be a strong Guard, enough to secure any Man in his Voyage thro'

the World; he wanted Power to go thorough with the Reformation of the Church; he thought he shou'd have much to answer for, if he did not apply Remedies to the Diseases of the Church; he propos'd no End in all his Actions but what was just; and sure no Man had ever a Heart more entire to his Country than he; he thought Art and Industry wou'd make the Integrity of his pious Designs suspected, and therefore he never let them appear but in their own natural Beauty; he more advanc'd the Protestant Religion than it had been from the Reformation; he preach'd in Scotland with all the Marks of Approbation and Applause; and it is thought if the King had introduc'd the Liturgy while Bishop Laud was there, it wou'd have been submitted to without Opposition. The Trust his Majesty put in him, was infinitely to the Benefit and Honour of the Church; his Intentions were most sincere and worthy; no Man had ever so good a Conscience as he; he had no Support, but the Splendor of his pious Life, and his unpolish'd Integrity; singular were his Graces, and immense his Virtue; all Men were convinc'd of his Integrity, and absolv'd him from any Crime against Law; few ever attain'd to his Learning, Piety, and Virtue; and to crown all, the Earl or his Author says, I had always a great Affection and Reverence for him. I need not observe, that the Falsity in this Character is study'd. What little has been shewn of Laud's unparallel'd Qualities in this History, will shew that it is impossible for the Earl's Description of them to have any Truth in it. If Pride and Cruelty can be consistent with Piety and Charity, Reformation with Superstition, and Meekness with Tyranny, I have injur'd the Archbishop and the Earl, and am at the Reader's Mercy.

This Digression was necessary to justify my having said so much of Archbishop Laud in the Course of this History: But he was such a Busybody in Temporals as well as Spirituals, that there was no avoiding it.

Upon the reading of the before-mention'd Articles against him, the Lords order'd he shou'd be remov'd from Mr. Maxwell's, in whose Custody he had been ten Weeks, and sent to the Tower March the first. And that he and the Earl of Stratford shou'd not come together. Thus he continu'd a Prisoner without putting in his Answer, or petitioning for Tryal, for near two Years Space; then the Commons exhibited additional Articles against him, and proceeded to his Tryal.

On the 5th of March the Star-Chamber Court was brought upon the Stage, and the Lord Andover spoke thus of it in the House of Peers; " By the Statute of 3 Hen. 7. the Chancellor, Treasurer, Privy-Seal, two Judges, one Bishop and a Lord of Council, were authoriz'd to cite People to appear for Misdemeanors, which was the Infancy of the Star-Chamber. Cardinal Wolsey rais'd it to Man's Estate, from whence being now unlimited, it is grown a Monster.

On the 2d of March the House of Commons voted, That for Bishops or any other Clergymen whatsoever, to have Employments as Privy-Counsellors at the Council-Table, or as private Officers, is an Hindrance to the Discharge of their spiritual Function, and a Prejudice to the Common-Wealth. One wou'd have hop'd that Dr. Laud one of the Lords of the Treasury, and Dr. Juxon Lord High-Treasurer, might have understood this Matter as well as the Commons, but it was not so. Those two Bishops did not think their sitting at the Treasury and the Council-Table, was any Hindrance at all to their Function, or Prejudice to the Common-wealth, but of great Benefit to themselves.

About this Time the Dutch Ambassador made an Overture of Marriage between William, the young Prince of Orange, and the King's eldest Daughter, the Princess Mary, to which his Majesty was well inclin'd, but as his Condition then stood, he thought fit to acquaint the Parliament with it.

164 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1641. We still observe the good Effects of the King's new Council; he made a Speech to the House of Lords, in which he acquainted them, that he thought the Alliance with the Prince of Orange, and the United Provinces, would be of much Advantage to his Kingdom. Then he gave his Reasons for it, and the Proposition was generally embrac'd by all People, and soon took Effect.

Plots. The Reverend Historian is merry with the Rumours of Plots, an invincible Army of 15000 in Lancashire, 8000 in Ireland, which was visibly rais'd by the Earl of Strafford now coming to Trial. The Earl of Worcester was nam'd as another General of a Popish Army, which prov'd true enough a Year or two after. Whitlocke says nothing came of these Rumours, and they are therefore hardly worth speaking of.

Judge Berkley. Sir Robert Berkley, one of the Ship-Money Judges, who had busy'd himself much in that wicked Work, was impeach'd of High Treason at the Bar of the House of Lords, by Sir John Colepeper, in the Name of the Commons of England: Upon which Maxwell, Usher of the Black Rod, was commanded by the Peers to take him into Custody; Maxwell came to the King's Bench as the Judges were sitting, and took Judge Berkley off the Bench, and carry'd him away to Prison; which struck great Terror in the rest of his Brethren, then sitting in Westminster Hall.

Queen. The Queen being inform'd that the Parliament took Offence at her setting Agents to work, Sir Kenelm Digby, Mr. Walter Montague, and others, to get Contributions from the Papists to carry on the War against the Scots, and at the great Refort of Papists to her Chapel, sent a Message by the Comptroller of the Household, wherein she took to her self the "Honour of having persuaded the King to call this Parliament: She promis'd to send away the Pope's Nuncio, and not to exceed what was convenient for the Exercise of her Religion at her Chapel; as to the Money collected among the Papists, she did it out of meer Affection to the King: If any Thing be illegal, she was ignorant of the Law; and being desirous to employ her whole Power to unite the King and his People, she desires the Parliament to look forwards, and pass by such Errors and Mistakes of her Servants, as may have been formerly committed." This Message for some Time put a stop to the Clamour of those who thought her Majesty's Zeal for her Religion was too active and dangerous. There were great Debates for two Days together in the House of Commons concerning Episcopal Government, some were for Reformation of Bishops, others to have them quite taken away. It was agreed by most, says Rushworth, to take from them their Lordly Prelacy, to tie them up from meddling with temporal Affairs, and so restrain their Jurisdictions. The Lord Digby, who according to Mr. Echard, spoke severely against the Petitions for abolishing the Order, fell in with those who were of the last Opinion; there is no Man within these Walls more sensible of the heavy Grievances of Church Government than my self, nor whose Affections are keener to the clipping of those Wings of the Prelates, to which the Archdeacon is for tacking more Pinions, whereby they have mounted to such Insolencies, nor whose Zeal is more ardent to the searing them, so as they may never spring again. We may learn by this to what Insolence the Wings of Laud had mounted, when it provok'd the Champion of Prelacy to reflect on him with so much Severity. The Lord Digby was every whit as good a Churchman as the Earl of Clarendon, and yet how differently do these two Lords think on the same Subject. It is probable that the Intrigues of the Court had gain'd the Lord Digby about this Time: That was the Card they had now to play; and very busy they are with Mr. Capel, Sir John Colepeper, Sir Ralph Episcopacy. Hopton, Sir John Strangeways, Sir Francis Seymour, A.D. 1641. Lord Falkland, and others, who deserted the Country Interest, and became, some of 'em at least, as errant Courtiers as Villiers or Wentworth; convinc'd by the same solid Arguments which had prevail'd upon Wentworth, Noy, &c. Mr. Fienes justify'd Mr. Fienes the London Petition, which had been back'd by several Petitions from Counties, Cities and Boroughs, and fully answer'd the Charge against it, 175, & seq. that it was contemptible and irrational. This Speech is long, but well worth reading. Sir Benjamin Rudyard was for punishing Laud, Wren, and the present Bishops, and for reducing and preserving the Calling for better Men. The Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard affirm again and again, there never were better Men. Lord Falkland, the Hero of the History of the Rebellion, said some of the Bishops have so industriously labour'd to deduce themselves from Rome, that they have given great Suspicion, that in Gratitude they desire to return thither. In that and what follows, his Lordship lays his Finger upon Laud: Some have evidently labour'd to bring in an English, though not a Roman Popery; I mean not only the Outside and Dress of it, but equally absolute, a blind Dependence of the People upon the Clergy, and of the Clergy upon themselves. And speaking of their Court Sermons for Arbitrary Power, he proceeds, This alone were Occasion enough for us. And Court to accuse them as the Betrayers, though not the Destroyers of our Rights and Liberties; they whose Ancestors in the darkest Times, excommunicated the Breakers of Magna Charta, did now by themselves and their Adherents, both write, preach, plot and act against it, by encouraging Dr. Beale, by preferring Manwaring, by promoting Monopolies and Ship-Money, and blasting all that oppos'd them as Puritans. See now what the true or pretended Lord Clarendon says, as directly opposite to this as Artick and Antartick, and then make a Judgment of the Truth of his Lordship's History; If the Sermons of those Times preach'd at Court were wrong, collected together, and publish'd, the World would receive the best Bulk of Orthodox Divinity, convincing Reason, and admirable Devotion, that hath been communicated in any Age since the Apostles Time. This surely is to say the Thing which is not, in a very extraordinary Manner. Besides the London Petition, there was a Remonstrance against the Bishops, sign'd by 700 Ministers, which the Lord Falkland mov'd to have committed, as being more for reforming than abolishing: And it is a Thing to be lamented, that there were not Members enough of his Lordships Judgment and Temper to have made a Majority. Mr. Bagshaw, afterwards corrupted by the Court, said, He was for retaining Alderman Pennington's Petition, and for a thorough Reformation of all Abuses and Grievances of Episcopacy mention'd in the Ministers Remonstrance, and not for altering Church Government to Presbytery. Mr. Pleydell spoke heartily for Episcopacy, Mr. Grimstone told the House, he wonder'd not at all dell. at the Multitude of Petitioners, considering the Sufferings of the People under the Tyranny of the Bishops. He did not think it strange they should cry out in their Petitions, Crucify, crucify, or that they would have them up by the Roots: This is the worthy Gentleman of whom Echard says, He continu'd with the Parliament, but did not concur with them. The Sense of the House at that Time was for the Reduction of Episcopacy, and not the Destruction; and we may well lament, that the Behaviour of the Bishops afterwards should provoke the Parliament to proceed further against them than they now did; for the Vote was only to take away their Votes in Parliament and Star-Chamber, &c. as is before hinted.

After a great deal of Pains taken by the Committee for the Triennial Bill, they perfected it, and it pass'd the House of Commons, who sent it to the House of Lords, where it had a quick Passage; Triennial Bill.

A.D. 1641. sage; and as we read in Whitlocke, the King was with some Difficulty persuaded to give it the Royal Assent, at which Time he told both Houses, that it was a Mark of the Confidence he had in them, and in their future Proceedings, the Favour being greater than any King of England before him had ever granted to the People. I cannot understand this. Was it a Favour to have a Parliament once in three Years, when by the ancient Laws and Customs, there was to be a Parliament once a Year? Was it a Favour to have an Act for such Assemblies to meet for redressing of Grievances, which the King by his Coronation Oath was sworn to redress of himself? Where's the Favour of doing what one is by Law and Conscience oblig'd to do? The Parliament thank'd his Majesty for passing this Act, and gave Orders for Bonfires and Rejoycing in the City, that their Friends might partake of the Pleasure they took in it. The Subsidy Bill pass'd at the same Time; and it is observ'd, that most of the gracious Acts in this Reign were accompany'd with some Money Bill, and rather fold than granted.

lington's Crime;

About the same Time, one of the Clergy included in the Lord Clarendon's Panegyrics, Dr. Packlington, was accus'd as a great Introducer of Superstitions, Innovations and Idolatry; and particularly for writing a Book, intituled, Sunday no Sabbath, such was the Religion of the Laudean Doctors: The Lords summon'd Packlington to appear at their Bar, where the Lord Keeper Littleton pronounced this Sentence against him, "That he should never come within the Verge of his Majesty's Court, be depriv'd of all his Ecclesiastical Livings and Preferments, be for ever disabled to hold any Place, and his Book to be burnt by the Hands of the Common Hangman." He was Benefic'd in Bedfordshire, and for this rare Doctrine was made the King's Chaplain. Mr. Harvey, one of the Gentlemen of the County of Bedford, and his Parishioner, brought the Accusation against him.

And Censure.

An Act against Superstition.

The House of Commons order'd a Bill to be brought in, to abolish Superstition and Idolatry; a numerous Committee was appointed, among whom, besides Sir Robert Harley, Sir Edward Deering, Mr. Rons, Mr. White, &c. we find the Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepepyr, Sir Edmund Verney, Sir Nevil Pool, Sir William Bowyer, Sir Thomas Hutchinson, Sir Thomas Smith, Sir Richard Buller, Sir Roger North, Sir Guy Palmes, Lord Ruthyn, Sir Christopher Wray, Sir Richard Lewson, Sir Robert Pye, &c. so universal was the Aversion of the People of all Ranks to Laud's Idolatry and Superstition, for none of their Historians pretend the Votes and Acts are not pointed directly against the Archbishop.

Lord Seymour.

The first of the Patriots who was call'd off from the Pursuit of Grievances, was Sir Francis Seymour, created Baron Trowbridge, and he will be soon follow'd by George Lord Digby. In the mean Time, the House of Lords order'd the Records about Ship-Money, which were in the Exchequer Court, to be vacated. The Committee for the Charge against the Earl of Strafford, continu'd sitting all this while at their appointed Times, Mr. Whitlocke Chairman; and when they agreed upon the Articles, they were reported to the House of Commons, who order'd Mr. Pym to carry them to the House of Lords, and their Lordships sent for the Earl to hear them read, containing 200 Sheets of Paper. The Lord Strafford desir'd three Months to make his Answer, but the Peers allow'd him twenty-five Days only, which expir'd the 24th of February; all which Time Sir Richard Lane, and others of his Counsel, were employ'd Night and Day in drawing it up with great Labour. The Answer consisted of 100 Sheets of Paper. Nothing can be more unfair, if not untrue, than what Echard says of this Prosecution, The Commons em- ploy'd a Month about it, without performing any material Business. The Triennial Act is so far from being a material Business with him, that he gives us a wretched Pun upon it, taken out of a Woman's Letter, who probably cou'd not spell better, and said, they had pass'd the Tyrannical Parliament, instead of the Triennial; and adds he, She was a Prophet as much as himself is a Wit. This too was no material Business, An Act for the Relief of his Majesty's Army, and the Northern Parts, being a Grant of four entire Subsidies: There was much more material Business perform'd, while the Committee were preparing the Articles against the Earl of Strafford, as may be seen in Rushworth.

A.D. 1641.

The City by Alderman Pennington, offer'd to London lend 100000 Pounds on the Security of the four ers. Subsidies, and the House declar'd the same to be an acceptable Service. Thus we find Pennington had Influence over other Citizens besides the Rabble.

The Tryal of the Earl of Strafford approaching, Strafford's the Peers press'd hard to have it in their House, Tryal.

but the Commons insist'd upon it, that they might come as a House, being the Impeachers of the Earl; and after some Debate, the Lords agreed that the Tryal should be in Westminster-Hall, to which his Majesty assented. On the 22d of March, Rushw. the Lord Strafford's Tryal commenc'd, perhaps with as much Solemnity as ever was seen on the like Occasion at Athens or Rome. The Lords were in their Robes on several Seats in Westminster-Hall. The Earl of Arundel, Lord High-Steward, in a Chair of State. The Earl of Lindsey, Lord High-Constable, had the ordering of the Place: The Commons, as a Committee of the whole House, sat uncover'd on Scaffolds, with many Hundreds of Gentlemen: Behind the Peers was a Chair and Cloth of State for the King and Prince: On a Scaffold below the State, sat the Ladies of Quality, who, if we may believe Echard, took Notes, and wrote down all they could preserve of the Earl's charming Eloquence. At the lower End, on the Right Hand, even with the Lords, was a Place with Partitions for the Committee of Managers, and a Door backwards to a Withdrawing-Room, where they might consult, as Occasion offer'd. On the other Side was a Place for the Earl of Strafford, with a Seat and Room for the Lieutenant of the Tower to be next to him, and Places for the Earl's Secretaries and Council to be near him. Whitlocke informs us, the Bishops were excluded by the Canons of the Church to be assistant in Cases of Blood and Death, and therefore they absented themselves from this Tryal: And Rushworth adds, They gave no Proxies, which indeed none of the Lords were allow'd to do in this Case. Echard, who shews us that if he had been a Bishop, Blood shou'd not have kept him from his Seat, complains that the excluding Canon was old; as if a Law could be the worse for being old, when the Reason of it was still the same. The Lord Clarendon and the Reverend Historian affirm, that the Bishop of Lincoln betray'd the Fundamental Right of his Order, to the Ruin of the Earl; directly contrary to what Bishop Hacket, in the Life of that Prelate, asserts that the Lord of Lincoln made a learned Speech to prove the Original and present Right of Bishops to sit in Judgment in Cases of Blood. This wou'd be very surprizing, if it was meant of Timothy, Titus, and the Apostolical Bishops. Ambrose Philips, in Bishop Williams's Life, tells us, he pleaded strongly in Behalf of the Earl, who was a most incomparable Person; the Parliament turbulent, mutinous and clamorous, thirsting after his Blood so much, that they resolv'd to have him murder'd, if the King had not pass'd the Bill of Attainder. One may perceive by this fine Stroke of History, that it was written in a College.

Strafford's
Tryal.

I shall not enlarge upon the Particulars of the Earl's

166 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1641. Earl's Tryal, referring the Reader to Rushworth.

The Managers of the Tryal were the most eminent Members of Parliament, Mr. Pym, Mr. Glyn, Mr. Maynard, Mr. Whitlocke, Mr. St. John, Mr. Palmer, Lord Digby, Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Hampden, &c. with whom the Earl, according to Mr. Archdeacon, soon shew'd he had Ability enough to wrestle. That is, he had as much Reason and Sense as Mr. Pym and Mr. Hampden, as much Law as Glyn, Maynard, St. John, Whitlocke, Palmer. He cannot help overdoing it, when he speaks of Archbishop Laud or his Friends. Mr. Pym with his usual Eloquence and Spirit open'd the Charge, which consisted of twenty-eight Articles, containing in Substance;

Articles against Strafford.

*That he had said at York, when he was President of the North, The King's little Finger should be heavier than the Loins of the Law, prov'd by Sir David Fowles: That he said, Ireland was a conquer'd Nation, and the King might do with them what he pleas'd, prov'd by the Earl of Corke, who prov'd also his saying, he would have neither Law nor Lawyers, and any of his Acts should be as binding as an Act of Parliament: That he procur'd a Sentence of Death against the Lord Mountnorris, Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, Principal Secretary of State, and Keeper of the Signet, without any Warrant or Authority of the Law: That without any legal Proceeding, he took away the Lands and Tenements of Thomas Lord Dillon: That he imprison'd several of his Majesty's Subjects in an Arbitrary Manner: That he procur'd the Customs to be Farm'd to his own Use: That he rais'd Money by Soldiers, prov'd by Serjeant Saville: That he shut up the Ports by Proclamation, to prevent bringing Complaints against him, prov'd by the Earl of Desmond: That he had levy'd Money in the County of York by Force, to maintain the Militia. The Earl in his Answer to this said, the great Council of the North join'd with him in it: But that Council disclaim'd the doing it, and affirm'd the same to be unjustly charg'd upon them. He was also accus'd of contriving an Oath in Ireland to support Arbitrary Power: That he incited the King to the Scots War, and proclaim'd the Scots Rebels, and said he wou'd destroy them Root and Branch: That upon the Citizens refusing the Loan, he said, it wou'd never be well till they were laid by the Heels, and some of the Aldermen hang'd, prov'd by Alderman Garraway, &c. The main Part of the Earl's Defence lay in his having the King's Commission, and acting only in Conjunction with other Counsellors. He said Sir David Fowles was his Enemy; that it was hard to lose his Honour and Life for hasty Words: He insisted upon it, that the Lord Mountnorris deserv'd to die, but he got him a Pardon, and make the worst of the Sentence, it was but Felony: And the imprisoning Persons for disobeying his Orders, was but a Misdemeanor. True it is, his Answer was well drawn, and evaded the Charge as much as the Dexterity of the most dextrous Lawyers cou'd pretend to do: But through all the Branches of his Ministry he behav'd imperiously and tyrannically, as well in the Court of the North, as in Ireland, which however did not amount to Treason, and no Accumulation cou'd make it so, if there had not been something behind, which was in the highest Degree treasonable. In the Course of his Tryal, a seal'd Paper was produc'd, which being open'd and read, appear'd to be sent from the Parliament of Ireland, whose Approbation he had just spoken of. The Contents were, that they had voted the Earl of Strafford guilty of High-Treason. The Earl was startled at it, coming in so seasonably to discredit what he had been saying of his great Services in the Parliaments there, and cry'd out, *There is a Conspiracy against me to take away my Life: upon which, if we have Faith in Mr. Echard, the grave and wife Mr. Pym gave a great Shout, and the Managers requir'd Justice from the Lords against the Earl, who standing impeach'd of High-Treason, accus'd the Parliaments of two Kingdoms of a Conspiracy against him. At this the Lord Strafford fell down upon his Knees, and humbly crav'd Pardon, Protesting he did not intend the Parliament, but only some particular Persons. As to his Oppression in Ireland, Echard calls it Activity, a Word he always makes use of, when any of his Heroes or Heroines are about doing what they should not do. When the Queen rais'd Money among the Papiests, he approves of her Activity; When Laud's Zeal was at work in the Star-Chamber, and High-Commission Courts, he adores his Activity. I have not insert'd that part of the Charge against him concerning the Lord Loftus, Lord Chancellor of Ireland, whom he degraded and imprison'd for not obeying his Orders, because it is not in Rushworth. The Earl of Clarendon might insert it, for that as Mr. Archdeacon words it, the Crime proceeded from a noble Root, to oblige the Lord Chancellor to make a Settlement upon his Son, whose Lady, says the same Reverend Author, was so much in the Lord Strafford's good Graces, as to render his Justice the more suspected: He assures us, the Earl made all Things appear not only less than Treason, but no very great Misdemeanors; though when all the Crimes were heap'd together, it was the Opinion of the most learned Lawyers, that they amounted to Accumulative Treason without the twenty-third Article, which without much Learning in the Law, will appear to be as much Treason against the Constitution of England, as ever Traytor was guilty of. Larrey writes, whatever the Earl could say in his Defence, either in Person, or by his Council, though both he and they spoke very forcibly, he could not prevail over the Prejudice of the People. The Evidence to the twenty-third Article not being so full as was necessary, Sir Henry Vane, Junior, committed a Breach of Trust to strengthen it. His Father, Secretary Vane, being out of Town, sent a Letter to his Son, Sir Henry Vane, the younger, with the Key of his Cabinet for some Papers there; among which, the Son lighted upon certain Notes taken by the Father at a Meeting of the Junto on the 5th of May, 1640, the very Day the last Parliament was dissolv'd. These Notes being of great Concernment to the Publick, and declaring so much against the Earl of Strafford, he held himself bound in Duty and Conscience to discover them; accordingly he shew'd them to Mr. Pym, the chief Manager, who urg'd him, and prevail'd with him, that they might be made use of in Evidence against the Earl, as being most material, and of great Consequence, in Relation to that Article. I take all this to be Theatrical, and doubt not the Notes were taken to do Strafford a good Turn one Time or other, and the Key was sent on purpose to have this Paper found among others. Be that as it will, Mr. Pym produced those Notes in the House of Commons, and the same Day in the Conference with the Lords. When the Earl was brought next to his Tryal, the Contents were openly read, thus headed, No danger of a War with Scotland, if Offensive, not Defensive: Then follow'd the Questions and Answers upon it.

King Charles. How can we undertake an Offensive War, if we have no more Money?

King Charles.

Lord Lieut. Ireland. Borrow of the City 100000 Pounds; go on vigorously to levy Ship-Money, your Majesty having try'd the Affections of your People; you are absolv'd and loose from all Rule of Government, and to do what Power will admit. Infinite Treason! If what follows was not more Reasonable; Your Majesty having try'd all ways, and being refus'd, shall be acquitted before God and Man. And you have an Army in Ireland, that you may employ to reduce this Kingdom to Obedience, for I am confident the Scots cannot hold out five Months. Needed there any more Articles? Prove this upon him,

Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

A.D. 1641. and had he as many Heads as he had Hairs, he would have forfeited them all.

Archbishop of Canterbury. You have try'd all Ways, and have always been deny'd, it is now lawful to take it by Force. What Love he had for his Country, as we have seen in Clarendon?

Lord Cottington. Leagues abroad there may be made for the Defence of the Kingdom. Here are Counsellors! What Leagues could be made with any Protestant State for the Defence of Tyranny and Superstition? Leagues with France or Spain could be of no Service to the Religion, Rights, and Liberties of a Protestant free People. Cottington again; The lower House are weary of the Church, all Ways shall be just to raise Money by in this inevitable Necessity. Observe the Cant! All Ways are to be us'd, being lawful.

The Archbishop is afraid the Scots Presbyterians would not be destroy'd soon enough, and therefore he advis'd,

All are lawful for an offensive, not a defensive War.

Lord Lieut. Ireland. The Town is full of Lords, put the Commission of Array on foot, and if any of them stir, we will make them smart.

This traitorous Counsel needs no Aggravation nor Remark. I know very well great Endeavours have been us'd to invalidate this Evidence, on account of the Enmity between Vane and Wentworth, tho' that rather confirms than destroys it: For one cannot doubt but that Vane finding what a Disposition Wentworth had to erect a Tyranny on the Ruins of the Constitution, might be the more vigilant to catch what he said to that Purpose, and take Notes of it, which might be produc'd against him upon Occasion. As to the Intelligence between the Father and the Son, I do not regard it; the Notes are forth coming, and it is no Matter how we came by them. As to the Evidence of their being genuine, they bear all the visible Marks of it from their Date, the Day of the Dissolution of the Parliament, from the Situation of Affairs, and the Characters of the Persons introduc'd. These Notes made a stronger Impression on the Lords and the Auditory, than whatever had been said before; and the Earl being requir'd by the Lord High-Steward to proceed, if he had any Thing farther to say, the noble Prisoner made a most moving Speech, which he deliver'd with inimitable Grace, and at a proper Pause, shew'd his weeping Children who stood by him, to the Lords, saying, My Lords, I would not have troubled you so long, were it not for the Interest of these dear Pledges, which a Saint in Heaven has left me. At this he for a short Space melted into Tears; and here notwithstanding I should have given my Vote with Mr. Pym, I could not have forbore to have kept him Company.

Ld Digby quits his Party.

The fatal Notes before-mention'd being left with the Committee of Managers, they were stolen, and every one of the Managers clear'd themselves of the Guilt by a solemn Protestation of Innocence. The Lord Digby protested it with more Earnestness and deeper Imprecations than any of the rest; yet afterwards at the Battel of Naseby, a Copy of these Notes was found in the King's Cabinet under Digby's Hand, by which the Conveyer of the Paper to the King was fully discover'd. And thus he began his Conversion to the Court, for which he is applauded by the Archdeacon, with Treachery and Perjury. It is evident by the Charge against the Earl of Strafford, that the Lord Clarendon does not wrong him, where he says, He indulged his own Appetite and Passion in his Government of Ireland, was of too high and severe a Deportment. A Man ought not to lose his Head for being proud, but if he adds Oppression and Cruelty to his Pride, and Treason to both, I do not see how a Divine, such a one as the Archdeacon is, could say seriously, That never so white a Soul return'd to its Maker.

The Affair being likely to be spun out to a great Length by the Opposition it met with in the House of Lords, the Commons resolv'd to return to their Bill of Attainder, which was brought in by Sir Arthur Haslerig. Eckard's Reason for it is wonderful; finding a great Defection in their Party, about four to one, 204 to 59, as by the last Division. The Lords going on in their own Way, heard the Earl's Council Lane, Gardiner, and Lightfoot; but the Commons would not reply, because of their Bill to attain him, which was read the twenty-third of April, when the Lord Digby first appear'd as grand an Apostate as formerly he had charg'd Strafford to have been. He did not deny Sir Henry Vane's Notes to be genuine, he only call'd them disjointed Fragments, without Result or Conclusion, a Remark very unworthy that Lord's admirable Talent. Such Counsels as those are not wont to be taken in Form, or be preserv'd in Registers; and it was as much as Vane could do to minute the most important Heads of such dangerous Discourses. Neither is his Argument much stronger, tho' mightily insisted upon in the Injustice of a Law made a Posteriori, as if in all Governments there was not an absolute unlimited Power to act with or without Law for the Preservation of the State. This Power in France and Fex is in the King, in England it is in the King, Lords, and Commons, and there is no Danger of its ever being exerted unreasonably or unnecessarily. The Lord Digby was oblig'd to explain some Parts of his Speech; and being now to shew the Court that he would stick at nothing to please them, he did it so insolently, that the Country Party disown'd him, and order'd his Speech, which he printed, to be burnt by the Hangman; so the Court found it necessary to remove him to the House of Lords, which began to fester the Sore, which was before in a fair way of healing.

We have now both in the Lord Clarendon's History, and its Copy the Archdeacon's, an Account of a Conference between the Author, Mr. Hyde, and the Earls of Bedford and Essex, which has not one probable Cast in it, but a very improbable one at the End of it, where we are told the Earl of Essex should say, with respect to the King's being urg'd to pass the Bill of Attainder against his Conscience, The King in Conscience is oblig'd to conform himself and his Opinion to the Opinion and Conscience of his Parliament. This was an unknown Doctrine maintain'd by their Divines. Where does that appear? Where was it preach'd? Who was the Preacher? The Doctrine then preach'd, was doubtless that the Earl by his traitorous Counsel given the King, had incur'd the Punishment due to Traytors; and on a Supposition that Vane's Notes were true, no Traytor could have said more to have brought Destruction on his Country. 'Tis the worst Sort of Enthusiasm, to put Conscience in Opposition to Fact. The King did not deny that there was any such Advice at all given by Strafford, tho' he objected to the Notes. Warwick, one of the sorriest Advocates the Cause ever had, says the Notes ought not to have been taken Notice of, because the Paper was blotted, which every one knows Minutes taken in haste are wont to be. He has the vulgar Objection to the Construction of the Earl's Words, this Kingdom, did not mean England, but that Kingdom Scotland. The Way of construing doubtful Expressions is by the Context: Borrow Money of London, raise the Money vigorously all over England: If they won't pay, you are acquitted before God and Man, and have an Army in Ireland to make them do it, which is the natural Sense; but put to reduce Scotland in the Place of it, and it is Nonense.

I never find these Men pretend to Conscience in the Breach of Laws and Privileges, and the Invasion of the Rights, Properties, and Liberties of

A.D. 1641. of the Subject, and cannot think this was the Question. The King had all along assur'd his ill Ministers, that he wou'd protect them: They had all along flatter'd him with an unlimited Prerogative, and if he gave this Man up to Justice, who after that wou'd dare to be the Minister of his arbitrary absolute Power? How cou'd he answer it to a Number of Delinquents to whom he had given the like Assurances. Here it sticks, and a better Face cou'd not be put upon it than Conscience.

London
Petition.

Rushw.

A Petition from London is just mention'd by the reverend Historian, as an Artifice to give the Bill of Attainder a fresh Push. Thus does he insult the Legislature, and treats the Petitioners as so many Villains, tho' never did Petition deserve more Respect, being sign'd by 20000 Persons of good Quality and Rank, whom he insolently taxes with a Design to murder the Earl of Strafford by hastening his Execution. Among many other deplorable Complaints, the Petitioners represent the Loss of Trade from the unsettled Condition of the Kingdom, the stopping Money in the Mint, the vast Sums of Money unduly taken by his Majesty's Officers, the strong and secret Opposition to the Punishment of Incendiaries, the distracted State of the Church, Papists still armed, the Laws against them not executed, some of the most active of them still at Court, Priests and Jesuits not yet banish'd, the Irish Popish Army not yet disbanded, Courts of Justice not yet reform'd. Oh the felicitous Times! And the Earl of Strafford, who as now appears, hath counselled the plundering of the City, not yet brought to Justice, which they humbly pray may be executed upon him, &c. The Commons sent the Lord Russel to the Lords, to desire a Conference on the Substance of this Petition. Mr. Glyn and Mr. Hill were order'd to manage the Conference, with Instructions to desire the Lords to expedite the Bill of Attainder, and to petition with them for disbanding the Irish Army, and removing Papists from Court.

Mr. St.
John's Argument.

Mr. Solicitor General St. John, was also order'd to maintain the Point of Law concerning the Attainder; and for obeying the Command of the House, Echard, with his accustom'd Modesty, calls him that implacable Man, and turns one of the best Law Arguments which ever was made by Lawyer, into his own wretched Buffoonry, We give Laws to Hares, we knock Wolves on the Head. Mr. St. John prov'd the Treason to be within the Statute of 25 Edw. 3. He took notice of what the Earl of Strafford had said in his last Speech about the Lords being more skilful in the Art of killing than their Ancestors. This Appeal of his from yourselves to your Ancestors, we admit of, said Mr. Solicitor, your Lordships will be pleas'd to bear what Judgment they have already given in the Case. He then quotes many Precedents of Attainders in Parliament for Treason not within the before-mentioned Statute, and talks with good Law and good Sense: Though your Lordships Ancestors were willing to make the Statute of 25 Edw. 3. the Rule of the inferior Courts, yet they left the Attainders, Parliament Precedents, to themselves untouch'd, wherein the Legislative Power had been exercis'd. There's nothing in them whence it can be gather'd, but that they intended to leave them as free for the future. There is more Law in that Argument of Mr. St. John's, than in all Mr. Hyde's Arguments which have yet appear'd in Print. Yet the Archdeacon, who is as ignorant even as myself in these Matters, takes upon him to condemn Mr. St. John's Argument both as to Law and Eloquence, of both which indeed he is equally a Judge. He calls it fallacious and barbarous; he might as well have call'd it schismatical and barbarous, there being no more Barbarity in it, than in all Pleadings which are powerful enough to bring Criminals to Punishment. Clarendon, Warwick, Echard, and all of them, cry up Mr. Lane's Answer to St. John's Argument, that by Statute 1 Hen. 4. nothing was to be adjudg'd

Treason but what was ordain'd by the Statute 25 A.D. 1641 Edw. 3. and I did not think they had all impos'd on us, Lane and all his Panegyrist, till I read what the learned Lawyer Acherley says, The Commons were well furnish'd with Matter to have reply'd to this Argument, if they had so pleas'd; and then he knocks all Lane's Argument on the Head by Authorities and Reasons. See Brit. Const. p. 429. & seq.

In the mean time Mr. Hyde, who was not yet plung'd over Head and Ears in Court-Waters, was sent to the Lords with a Message, That the Commons had receiv'd Information which hath moved in them some Fear that the Earl of Strafford may have a Design to make his Escape, they therefore desire that his Guards may be strengthen'd. To which the Lords consented. His Majesty gave the two Houses Audience the 28th of April, and told them concerning Papists residing at Court, he wou'd give no just Cause of Scandal. It is observable that this King in his Speeches has generally some Epithet to a Word which keeps the Interpretation in himself still. If he had said he wou'd give no Cause of Scandal, it wou'd have been some sort of Answer, but with that good Epithet just, it is no Answer at all; or rather a Denial; for his Majesty thought those Papists his best Friends. He lov'd them, and they lov'd him, and cou'd any body therefore be justly scandaliz'd at their living well together? As to the Irish Army, he found many Difficulties in disbanding it, but he wish'd all Armies might be disbanded.

The Bill of Attainder going forward, the King came to the House of Peers three Days after, and sending for the Commons, spoke in Favour of the Earl, denying not the Notes themselves, but the Substance of the Notes, and declar'd he cou'd not in Conscience condemn him of Treason; but he was clear as to Misdemeanor, and thought him not worthy of any Place for the future; no not that of a Constable. 'Tis a very pitiful Case to see Echard and Warwick's Delphian Oracle reduc'd by King Charles himself to the Capacity of a Tything-Man. The Earl, as Heylin owns, took that Expression worse than Death, and wish'd it had been spar'd, in a Letter he wrote to the King. Strafford and his Friends did not thank the King for interfering, and believ'd his Earnestness to save him hasten'd his Destruction. The Commons were a little displeased at the King's interfering in the passing of a Bill before it came regularly to him, and it was generally look'd upon as a new Breach of their Privileges. 'Tis pretended the Lord Say gave the King this traiterous Counsel; but rather, I believe, to accuse that Lord of Treachery, than the King of Weakness. What Echard says here of the House of Commons being in a Confederacy with the Watermen, Porters, Shoemakers and Taylors of London, to destroy the Earl of Strafford and the Church, is too incredible and too impudent to bear Remark. A Doctor of Divinity, and his Band-Dogs, are his chief Actors in this Confederacy. Thus he stiles the Citizens of London, who came to Westminster waiting with Impatience to hear the Bill of Attainder was pass'd. These Citizens presented an humble Petition to the Lords, complaining of a Conspiracy for the Earl's Escape, in order to which the Garrison of the Tower was to be reforc'd with 100 Soldiers under Captain Billingsley. This was certain, Sir William Balfour Governor of the Tower, declar'd to the six Lords who were sent to examine him, that he had receiv'd Orders to admit Billingsley and his Reinforcement; that the Earl of Strafford offer'd him 20000 l. and to marry his Daughter to his Son; that it shou'd be done under Pretence of removing him to some other Prison, and the Earl wou'd take his Opportunity to escape; that he shou'd have the King's Warrant to indemnify him; for in those Days that Warrant was thought an Indemnification for the Breach of all the Laws in our Law-Books and

A.D. 1641. Statutes. Captain Billingsley confess'd upon Oath, that he was employ'd to get an hundred stout Fellows for a secret Service by Sir John Suckling one of the Army Conspirators. But Echard invalidates Sir William Balfour's Evidence because he was a Scotsman, for which that brave Nation is much indebted to him. Sir William refus'd to admit Billingsley and his Soldiers, or any other but the Hamlet Men.

It is common with the History Writers, such as Heylin, Sanderfon, Echard, &c. to say as Warwick does, that the Parliament declin'd the Prosecution by Tryal, and brought in the Bill of Attainder because they had not Proof; and Sir Henry Vane's swearing to his Notes, signify'd no more than if one of themselves had sworn to them; and this their Great Vulgar and their Small run away with; whereas the Lords voted the Earl guilty of High-Treason, not upon the Notes, of which so much has been said, but upon the fifteenth Article, for levying Money in Ireland by Force; and upon the nineteenth Article, for imposing an Oath upon the Subjects: Which Vote wou'd have condemn'd the Earl without the Bill of Attainder; but it was manifest the Commons were resolv'd to make the King a Party in it; and tho' the common Way of Process wou'd have convicted him capitally, as appears by the Lords Vote, yet then the King wou'd have been passive only in his Punishment, and they resolv'd he should be active in Terror to all future Evil Counsellors; which his Majesty perceiving, it no doubt contributed something to the Tenderness of his Conscience.

When we have read Whitlocke's Account of the Vote of the Peers upon two other Articles of High-Treason, how flat do all the Arguments in the History of the Rebellion against the Notes appear, which are not once mention'd in the Vote of High-Treason? But the merriest Part of that Historian's Falsification is this, The Bill pass'd the House of Commons with only fifty-nine negative Voices, when there was near two hundred in the House; whereas there were above two hundred affirmative Voices only; and such is the Way of Tale throughout all that History. On the 2d of May the Marriage between the young Prince of Orange and the Lady Mary then twelve Years old, was solemniz'd at Whitehall. His Highness had been in England scarce a Fortnight, and never was Joy more just nor more general than on this happy Occasion, to which we do in some Measure owe the real Felicities of all the glorious Reigns since the Revolution.

The next Day Mr. Pym acquainted the House that there were divers Informations of desperate Designs both at home and abroad, of Endeavours to disaffect the Army, and bring them up against the Parliament; that several Persons about the Queen are deeply engag'd in these Plots, and there was Cause to fear an Intent upon Portsmouth, &c. Then Sir John Wray spoke, If we intend to perfect the Work, let us take the right Way, let us become holy Pilgrims (not Popish) and endeavour to be loyal Covenanters with God and the King, first binding ourselves by a parliamentary and national Oath (not a Straffordian nor a Prelatical one) to preserve our Religion entire and pure, without the least Compound of Superstition or Idolatry, &c. This doing we shall be a blessed Nation: But if we shall let go our Christian Hold, and lose our Parliament-Proof, and old English well-temper'd Mettle, let us take Care that our Buckler break not, our Parliaments melt not, and our Golden Candlestick be not remov'd; which never let me live to see, nor England to feel the Want of. After the Reader has this short, hearty, truly English Speech in his Memory, let him turn to the long Sentences, the Sophistry, and Affectation in the Lord Clarendon's florid Discourses, and see how they will relish on his Palate. How piquant and pleasing is the blunt Honesty of this Lincolnshire Knight? How flat and fulsome the eternal Flattery and Prevarication in the History of the Rebellion? The House taking that honest Speech into Consideration, RESOLV'D, That a Protestation should be taken by all the Members, To defend the Reform'd Religion express'd in the Doctrine of the Church of England, against all Popery and Popish Innovations; they mean Laud's: The whole Body, Lords and Commons, and even Bishops, mean his Innovations so much cry'd up by Clarendon and Echard. To defend his Majesty's royal Person, Honour, and Estate, the Power and Privileges of Parliaments, the lawful Rights and Liberties of the Subjects; to oppose and bring to condign Punishment all such as shall by Force, Practice, Counsels, Plots, Conspiracies, or otherwise do any Thing contrary to this Protestation. How excellent is the Archdeacon's Observation, that the Clause to defend the true reform'd Protestant Religion, was intended against making Alterations in the Hierarchy; and more excellent still is his other Observation, that the Plot which occasion'd the Protestation was imperfect; so in his Way of thinking was the Gunpowder-Treason, for that the Parliament was not blown up, nor was this over-aw'd by the Army. He introduces more Gunpowder into his Farce, and with wretched Raillery insults the House of Commons upon the Fright the Report of it puts them into: His Actors in it are Sir Walter Earl, Mr. Middleton, Mr. Moyle, and Sir John Wray, whose Motion for the Protestation he never will forgive, tho' he was Knight of his own Shire. What he observes about a Church, is as false as it is foolish. The Lord Clarendon informs us, the Parliament was so careful not to have it understood in Echard's Sense, that they made this Explanation of it: By these Words was and is meant only the publick Doctrine profess'd in the said Church, so far as it is opposite to Popery and Popish Innovations; and that the said Words are not to be extended to the maintaining of any Form of Worship, Discipline, or Government, nor of any Rites and Ceremonies of the said Church of England. This Protestation was carry'd up to the Lords the 3d of May by Mr. Denzil Hollis and Mr. Maynard; the latter read it, and the former made a learned elegant Speech upon it: The Parliament find Jesuits and Priests conspiring with ill Ministers of State, Laud's old Friend Windbank, Cottington, &c. to destroy our Religion. They find ill Ministers conjoin'd together to subvert our Laws and Liberties; Wentworth, and too many more to be nam'd. They find Justice obstructed, Property invaded, and this very Parliament which hath sate so long, hath all this while but beaten the Air, and striven against the Stream; for I may truly say, Wind and Tide have still been against us. The same ill Counsels which first rais'd the Storm which almost shipwreck'd the Commonwealth, do still continue, they blow strong like the East Wind that brought the Locusts over the Land, &c. This Protestation was taken by the Commons immediately, no Member being suffer'd to go out of the House till he took it, which the others did as they came in. Thus in two Days time 'twas taken by 71 temporal Lords, 17 Bishops, 428 Commoners, 9 Judges, and afterwards generally. Heylin, whose Example is excellently well followed by Mr. Archdeacon, positively asserts that the Lord Digby and his Unkle refus'd the Protestation, which is a positive Falstiy. The Lord Digby and his Unkle took it one just after the other, and there was but one Man, Mr. Herbert, between the two Digbys, and Mr. Pym and Sir Benjamin Rudyard, who were two of the first Takers. The Earl of Southampton and the Lord Roberts two Noblemen who afterwards fell in heartily with the English Interest, wou'd not take it as being too nearly related to the Scotts Covenant. But the Earl of Lindsey, Earl of Northampton, Earl of Carnarvon, and several others, who sacrific'd their Lives for the King, did take it.

Straffordians.

The Citizens of London continuing impatient at the Delays the Bill of Attainder met with, drew up a List of all the Members of the House of Commons who were against that Bill while it was passing that House, and affix'd it to the Wall of Sir William Brouncker's House in Palace-Yard, to mark those Gentlemen as Persons set apart to feel the Weight of the People's Resentments. They wrote upon it Betrayers of the Country, and Straffordians, the Title downwards, as if they would hang them up by the Heels. Their Names were, Lord Digby, Lord Compton, Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Hatton, Sir Edward Alford, Sir Nicholas Slauning, Sir Thomas Danby, Sir George Wentworth, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir Frederick Cornwallis, Sir William Carnaby, Sir Richard Win, Sir Gervase Clifton, Sir William Widdrington, Sir William Pennymann, Sir Patrick Curwen, Sir Richard Lee, Sir Thomas Fanshawe, Sir John Strangeways, Sir Henry Slingsby, Sir William Portman, Mr. Selden, Mr. Gervase Hollis, Mr. Sidney Godolphin, Mr. Cooke, Mr. Coventry, Mr. Benjamin Weston, Mr. Alford, Mr. Lloyd, Mr. Herbert, Captain Digby, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Griffith, Mr. Scawen, Mr. Bridgman, Serjeant Hyde, Mr. Fettiplace, Dr. Turner, Captain Charles Price, Dr. Parry, Mr. Arundel, Mr. Newport, Mr. Holborn, Mr. Noel, Mr. Kirton, Mr. Pollard, Mr. Price, Mr. Trevanion, Mr. Jane, Mr. Edgcomb, Mr. Chicheley, Mr. Mallory, Mr. Porter, Mr. White, Mr. Warwick, fifty-six in all. Mr. Warwick the Memoir Writer, distinguishes himself by a Place in this List, and by nothing else that I have yet met with concerning him. Of the three other negative Voices, Mr. Edward Hyde may be suppos'd to be one, by his declaiming so much against the Parliaments bloody Doings in this Bill of Attainder. This List so affrighted some of the Lords as well as Commons, that they left their House, as the Earl of Holland, Earl of Hertford, Earl of Bristol, Duke of Lenox; and the Lord Saville, who had been Strafford's profess'd Enemy, stuck close to him.

Earl of Bedford's Death.

The Death of the Earl of Bedford, which happen'd at this Time, is said by the Lord Clarendon to have forwarded the Earl of Strafford's, which is what the Criticks call subtilizing in History, or making Judgment by Guesses, where there is no Foundation for it in Fact. If the Earl of Bedford promis'd to save his Life, no doubt he had thought of some Way of doing it; but the Doubt is whether he made such a Promise, it being inconsistent with that Lord's known Sincerity and Zeal for the Commonwealth. The Historian owns he had been the Earl of Strafford's mortal Opposer; and it is not very likely that the Assurance of the Treasurer's Staff, which Dr. Fuxon thought it high time to resign, shou'd have such Influence on so noble a Peer, as to make him all at once become the Earl of Strafford's Protector. Such unnatural Changes may happen with your Wentworth's, your Noy's, Saville's, Digby's, &c. but not with Gentlemen of solid Principles and Virtue.

The Judges, as bad as they had been, being now to give their Advice to the Lords about the Bill of Attainder, thought the Treasons so plainly prov'd before their Lordships, according to their own Votes, That the Earl of Strafford doth deserve to undergo the Penalty and Forfeitures of High-Treason; upon which the Bill pass'd the House of Peers the 8th of May; and Judge Heath was sent to the Commons with the Message, that their Lordships had pass'd it without any Alteration. It now stopp'd with the King, who, by Advice of the Lords, consulted Dr. Usher Archbishop of Armagh, Dr. Moreton Bishop of Durham, Dr. Potter Bishop of Carlisle, great Divines and Casuists; also Dr. Williams Bishop of Lincoln, and the late Lord High-Treasurer, Dr. Fuxon Bishop of London, of whom Sanderfon, his very good Friend, says after one who heard the King speak it, He acted cunningly, and said nothing at all. But Echard, his very good Friend also, vouches for him that he acted heroically, and told the King, He ought to do nothing against his Conscience upon any Consideration in the World. The Archbishop of Armagh, in a Writing of his on this Subject, informs us, The Bishop of London spoke nothing at all, and the Bishop of Lincoln not only spoke, but deliver'd the King a Paper, containing a Promise of Pardon which the King had given the Earl under his Hand, and cou'd not be prevail'd with to pass the Bill till that Paper was restor'd. Sanderfon assures us the Bishop of Lincoln, in Concert with Sir William Balfour Governor of the Tower, found Means to get it from the Earl under Pretence of doing him Service; and it was with a View of Pardon upon sight of that Promise, that he wrote the Letter to the King so much talk'd of by his Adorers, wherein he gave his Consent to his Majesty's passing the Bill. We read in Sanderfon, if any of the Bishops depended on the Judgment of the others, it was the Bishop of London, who at the last Meeting, when all the other Bishops gave their Opinion in the Affirmative with Archbishop Usher, and that upon the whole Matter Treason might be justly charg'd upon Strafford, spoke not a Syllable. Echard writes, He gain'd a Reputation by what he said, that ought to render him immortal in History; and as a Proof of it, he has put him into his own, where he is sure of as much Immortality as the Merit of saying nothing amounts to. Mr. Philips intimates that Sanderfon has wrong'd Bishop Williams in the Matter of the Paper, which I cannot entirely fall in with, because Archbishop Usher, in the above-mention'd Writing, owns he put a Paper into the King's Hand, wherein what was contain'd his Brethren knew not; but I do entirely agree with him in what he says of Sanderfon; He relates Things false as often as true, and it is pity his History fell into Mr. Echard's Way. The Form of consulting Casuists being over, his Majesty sign'd a Commission in Council on Sunday the 9th, to the Earl of Arundel and two other Lords, the Lord Privy-Seal, and the Lord-Chamberlain, to pass the Bill of Attainder, and the Bill for Continuance of the present Parliament.

Sanderfon 414.

Sanderfon. K. Charles passes the Attainder, and for Continuance of the Parliament.

There is a general Error in the Histories not only of disaffected Authors, but of others; and it is thence become a general but a false Opinion, that the Commons were so fearful of the ill Consequences of this Bill of Attainder, that there was a Clause in it, that it shou'd never be drawn into Precedent. Heylin is the first in this Folly and Falshood; A Clause was added that it shou'd not be drawn into Example for Time to come. Warwick out-does him, and indeed every one else in such sort of Nonsense, they stigmatiz'd their own Bill with a Proviso, this Judgment shou'd not for the future be drawn any more into Example. 'Twas impossible for Echard not to copy this weak Passage, with which he cou'd not but be enamour'd, because he fancy'd it reflected on the Justice of the Lords and Commons of England: There was a special Proviso that this Act shou'd not be a Precedent. Of which special Proviso there is not one Word in the Bill. Rushworth speaking of the true Proviso in the Bill, which relates only to Judges and Justices in inferior Courts, says, This Proviso hath occasion'd the common Discourse and Opinion, that this Judgment against the Earl was enacted never to be drawn into Precedent in Parliament, whereas it expressly respects only Judges in inferior Courts. Dr. Welwood has the same Observation, I cannot help taking notice of a silly Mistake which has gain'd some Credit in the World, as if the Bill of Attainder was of so extraordinary a Nature, and so much out of all the known Methods of Justice, that the Legislators themselves were oblig'd to insert a Clause into the Body of it, that it shou'd never be drawn into Precedent; whereas that Clause doth expressly relate to Judges in inferior Courts. I am sensible that Decency and Delicacy of History admit

The Proviso confuted.

A.D. 1641. admit not of such unhandſome Epithets, as ſordid, filly, and the like, nor ſuch rude ones, as villainous, infamous, &c. But it is our Miſfortune that we have hardly any Perſons to deal with on one ſide of the Queſtion, but what are the Subſtantives of theſe Adjectives, and one cannot help talking in proper Phraſe; which Dr. Welwood had the Experience of as well as my ſelf.

The King ſent the Secretary of State, Sir Dudley Carlton, to acquaint the Lord Strafford with what was done, and the Motives to it; He receiv'd the Meſſage of Death with great Sweetneſs, to uſe Echard's own Words, becauſe they are Antipodes to the Truth. Sanderſon relates it thus, "The Earl amaz'd, ſeriously ask'd the Secretary, Whether his Maſteſty had paſſ'd the Bill? As not believing, without ſome Aſtoniſhment, that the King wou'd have done it; and being aſſur'd that it was paſt, he aroſe from his Chair, and ſtanding up, lift up his Eyes to Heaven, clapt his Hand upon his Heart, and cry'd, Put not your Truſt in Princes, nor in the Sons of Men, for in them there is no Salvation." I mention this Hiſtorian, becauſe he is in the ſame Degree of Credit for good ſtanch Principles, with the Author of the Hiſtory of the Rebellion. Whitlocke ſpeaks of Sir Dudley Carleton's Meſſage in the like manner; and the Earl of Strafford's Behaviour did doubtleſs occaſion great Remorſe in his Maſteſty, who ſent a Letter by the Prince of Wales to the Lords, wherein he deſir'd them to confer with the Commons to ſpare the Earls Life; which had no Effect, and the King was much blamed by Heylin and his Brethren; for ſtooping ſo low to the Houſe of Peers, as to ſubſcribe his Letter your Friend: Miſſives bearing always Sovereigns Names a-top, and without any Adjunct.

King writes to the Lords in Behalf of the Earl.

After the Archdeacon has told us the Earl of Strafford underſtood Divinity better than any Layman, he tells us, he might have ſav'd his Life if he wou'd have perſuaded the King to take away Episcopacy; but he bravely rejected the Offer made by his Brother-in-Law, Mr. Denzil Hollis. Mr. Hollis was juſtly eſteem'd one of the wiſeſt Men of thoſe Times, and there never were Times in which there were wiſer; and unleſs he had been authoriz'd by the two Houſes of Parliament to make that Propoſition, nothing could be more raſh and extravagant, which the Earl muſt know too well to truſt to. When the Earl was going to Execution, the 12th of May, he made a low Bow to the Archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was at a Window, and beg'd his Bleſſing, which the Archdeacon informs us the Archbiſhop gave him, and fell into a Swoon; As if his Soul wou'd have forc'd its way to have join'd the Earls in its Paſſage to Eternity; he plays with Eternity as Flies do with the Flame. Is it nothing to appear before the tremendous Bar of Judgment, with the Guilt of Idolatry, Superſtition, Profanation of the Sabbath, Perſecution, Cruelty, Tyranny, Blood, and the huge Maſs of Crimes prov'd upon theſe two Criminals? The Earl bow'd again, and pray'd God to protect the Archbiſhop's Innocence: We have ſeen, and ſhall ſtill ſee, what that Innocence was which he prays to God with his dying Breath to protect: After which he march'd to a Scaffold, like a General to a Triumph; Mr. Echard's Similies are extremely Natural. Nothing in the World is ſo like a Triumph, as to have one's Head cut off. He had triumph'd over the Laws, Rights, Properties and Liberties of the People ſo much, that his Maſteſty was pleas'd to ſay, he was not fit to be a Conſtable. His Behaviour on the Scaffold, was like that of a Man who had long expected to die upon one, and was prepar'd for it: 'Twas brave and decent; yet when he was Beheaded there was ſo great Acclamation, that Echard informs us, his Enemies too rode back in Triumph, waving their Hats, and crying, His Head is off, his Head is off.

Strafford Executed.

The Reflections the Reverend Hiſtorian make on the Act for the Continuance of the Parliament, have the uſual Solidity; It was a new Conſtitution though they had not one Privilege more granted them by it, except the ſingle one of Sitting.

A.D. 1641. All for continuing the Parliament. Earl of Leiceſter.

The Earl of Leiceſter was now made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland: He was Heir to Sir Philip Sidney, his Uncle, as well as to Sir Henry Sidney, his Grandfather, who had with great Honour, and much Integrity, long continued Chief Governor of Ireland in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth. The Earl of Hertford was made Marquis, and the Prince's Governor, &c we hear of him no more among the Country Party. The Earl of Effex was made Lord Chamberlain; the Lord Keeper, the Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Chief Juſtice of the Common-Pleas, Lord Newburgh, and Sir Henry Vane, Secretary of State, were appointed Commiſſioners of the Treasury.

The Houſe of Commons being in Debate about Deans and Chapters, Dr. Hacket, afterwards Biſhop of Litchfield and Coventry, was admitted to ſpeak in their Behalf, and did it with more Applauſe than Succeſs. Then was deliver'd a Petition from the Univerſity of Oxon, and the moſt remarkable Thing in it, is the Date of it, Dat. Anno Dom. Milleſimo Sex Cent. Quod primo è domo Convocationis in celebri conventu Doctorum, & Magiſtrorum omnibus & ſingulis Aſſentientibus; but they forgot the Month, and Day of the Month. They aſſure the Parliament, that in ſome Western Churches, as well as Eaſtern, there has been a continual Succeſſion of Biſhops down from the very Apoſtles to this preſent Time, the like whereof cannot be affirm'd of any other Form of Government; upon which Conſideration, they earneſtly deſire the ancient Apoſtoliſcal Order may be protected from Ruin and Diminution: You find them all in the ſame Tone. Thus Titus and Becket, Timothy and Wolfey, were the very ſame ſort of Biſhops, or the Function muſt have receiv'd very great Alterations during ſo long a Succeſſion, and conſequently either be or not be the ancient Apoſtoliſcal ones. If Becket's Episcopacy was the ſame as Titus's, 'twas Apoſtoliſcal and Ancient, whether the Chain was broken or not; if it was not the ſame, the Succeſſion is of no Signification; it being the Function, and not the Perſon, that was in Debate. And not the Function, as it was Primitive and Pure, but as it had ſuffer'd various Changes and Augmentations, during the Court of fifteen Centuries. There had been no Difference about the Name and Function, if that wou'd have ſerv'd the Univerſities Turn: However, when any Profeſſor of Hiſtory ſhall prove that there has been a continu'd unbroken Succeſſion of Biſhops in any two Western Churches, I know what they pretend about the Pope, Erit mihi Magnus Apollo. The Subſtance of the Cambridge Petition is as modeſt as the Date. Data frequenti Conventu Noſtro Cantab. tertio Idus Aprilis, they pray that honourable Court, the Houſe of Commons, to reform Innovations and Abuſes that have crept in by ſome Mens Miſcarriages; and that Foundations eſtabliſh'd for the Advancement of Learning, might be preſerv'd; all which was juſt and reaſonable. A Complaint was brought into Parliament againſt Dr. Stern, Maſter of Jeſus College in that Univerſity, for encouraging Superſtition, and maintaining Arbitrary Power; but we ſhall find him, and Dr. Coſens, Head of Peter-Houſe, lately charg'd with the ſame Crime in the beſt *Episcopop*al Sees in England, before we have done with this Hiſtory, to encourage others to follow their Example.

Cambridge Petition.

The Tyranny of the Earl of Strafford, as Preſident of the Council of the North, was ſet forth at large by Mr. Edward Hyde, in a Speech at a Conference between both Houſes of Parliament, about a Fortnight before the Earl was beheaded; wherein he ſaid, This Court, by the Spirit and Ambition of the Miniſters truſted there, hath ſo prodigiouſly

A.D. 1641. giously broken down the Banks of the first Channels in which it ran, that it hath almost overwhelm'd that Country under the Sea of Arbitrary Power, and involv'd the People in a Labyrinth of Distemper, Oppression and Poverty. To overwhelm with a Sea, and involve in a Labyrinth at one and the same Time, is extremely regular in Metaphor; and this is the Eloquence which is so much boasted of in the History of the Rebellion. Is it not strange that the Earl of Clarendon's great Skill in Divinity shou'd not have taught him better; and that so white a Soul should be guilty of oppressing and beggaring the People, and of drowning them in a Sea of Arbitrary Power? Mr. Hyde speaks further of the Tyranny of that Court, of which Strafford was Lord President, or chief Tyrant; and the Issue was, that this favourite Court of his was demolish'd with Ignominy, about the same Time that the President was executed.

Farmers of the Customs. The Farmers of the Customs, Sir Paul Pindar, Sir Abraham Dawes, Sir John Wolfenholme, Sir John Jacob, being question'd for levying Tonnage and Poundage, without Consent of Parliament, offer'd and paid 150000 Pounds Composition; which shews they must have unmercifully peculated, or they cou'd have made no such Payment: Some think that their Crime deserv'd Corporal Punishment much more than Mr. Prynne's Book against Vagabonds and Strumpets.

Mr. Taylor Member. Mr. Taylor, Member of Parliament for Windsor, was brought upon his Knees in the House of Commons, for saying they had committed Murder with the Sword of Justice, and he would not for a World have so much Blood lying on his Conscience, as did on theirs for the Sentence. The Words were prov'd against him by the Mayor of Windsor, so he was expell'd the House the 27th of May, and voted incapable of ever being chosen a Member of Parliament, order'd to be carry'd down to Windsor to recant these Words, and then to be committed to the Tower during Pleasure.

Army Plot. The Plot between some Courtiers, the Jesuit Orleans says the King himself, and some Officers of the Army to over-awe the Parliament, is call'd a pretended one by Mr. Archdeacon, and a real one by both the House of Lords and House of Commons. 'Tis fairly related in Whistlocke, and we may by this Event be confirm'd in our Judgment of the Archdeacon's and the Lord Clarendon's Sincerity. Echard will have it, that there was no Plot at all; and the Earl of Clarendon, who cannot deny but that there was some Plotting, assures us, 'twas because the Parliament did sometimes give the Scots the Money which was intended for the English. That sometimes was once, upon the pressing Instances of the Scots for a present Supply; 10000 Pounds was order'd them out of 50000 Pounds which had been design'd for the English Army. The Reverend Historian affirms, they took 10000 out of 15000 Pounds. Commissary Wilmot, a Member of the House, resenting that the Scots Request was comply'd with, said, If such Papers from the Scots cou'd procure Money, he doubted not but the Officers of the English Army cou'd soon do the like. It was perceiv'd some of the King's Servants had very weakly as well as rashly, been tampering with the Army to march directly to London: what Business they were to do there, is not hard to be conjectur'd. The two chief Plotters in this Politick Plot were two Poets, Sir John Suckling, and Sir William Davenant; and the chief Officers were Commissary Wilmot, Colonel Goring, Mr. Fermyn, Captain Leg, Mr. Pollard, Colonel Ashburnham, Sir John Coniers, Oneal, Brother to the Irish Rebel, and Mr. Piercy, whom Orleans stiles Piercy Earl of Northumberland, for the Credit of the Plot. The Archdeacon admires that French Jesuit as an Historian. To pacify the Army, the Speaker was order'd to write a Letter to Sir Jacob Ashley, who command-

A.D. 1641. ed it in the Absence of the other Generals, where in they were promis'd Money, Cloaths, and what else they demanded. This Letter was sent by Mr. Rusworth, who writes of this Plot quite contrary to Mr. Archdeacon, and had a good Effect upon the Soldiers, who were not so ready to draw their Swords against the Parliament, as the Conspirators wou'd have had them. Colonel Goring being examin'd concerning this Conspiracy, gave Information that Sir John Suckling made the first Overture to him about marching the Army to London; that he afterwards met Mr. Piercy, Colonel Ashburnham, Sir John Berkley, Mr. Pollard, Mr. Fermyn, and Oneal the Irishman, who all took a solemn Oath of Secrecy, not to reveal the Subject of their treasonable Conferences. That 'twas propos'd to send a Declaration to the Parliament before the Army began their March, which was first mov'd by Fermyn, and oppos'd by Goring, Wilmot, Ashburnham, and Pollard. That both the King and the Queen knew of the Conspiracy, which his Majesty call'd the setting the Army in a good Posture. The Officers agreed upon a Petition to the King and Parliament for Money, not to Disband before the Scots; to preserve Bishops, to settle the King's Revenue; which if not comply'd with, they were to perform Wonders. His Majesty saw this Petition, and to shew his Approbation of it, sign'd it C. R. with a Direction to the Bearer, who carry'd it down to the Army, that none shou'd see it as yet but Sir Jacob Ashley. In this Petition they made the Army offer to wait upon his Majesty, hoping to appear as considerable in his Defence, as what Number soever should appear to the contrary: Several Officers sign'd it in the Army, but upon the Discovery of the Treason the Traytors fled, and a Proclamation was publish'd the 8th of May, commanding Henry Piercy, Esq; Henry Fermyn, Esq; Sir John Suckling, William Davenant, and Captain Billingsley, whom we find very ready for any Mischief, to surrender themselves. Davenant was taken as he was making his Escape, Piercy and Fermyn got into France. The King sent a Warrant to Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, to provide a Ship with all Speed, to carry Piercy to Diep or Calais. The Parliament voted, That there was a Design not only to poison the Affections of the Army towards the Parliament, by making them believe they were neglected, and the Scots prefer'd to them; but to bring up that Army to London to awe and force both Houses, &c. This Echard terms averring confidently there was a Plot, though the Lord Digby had invalidated Goring's Evidence, for which he was publicly expell'd the House of Commons, says he very ingeniously; as if it was possible to expel a Man privately, when there were three or four Hundred in Company. The Lord Digby was the same Day call'd up by Writ to the House of Peers, notwithstanding the Parliament petition'd his Majesty not to confer any Honour or Employment upon him; but the perverse Measures, and obstinate way of pursuing them, are reviving, and doubtless are owing much to the Malignity and Vehemence of Digby's Temper, who is now the favourite Counsellor to both King and Queen, and their Matters are like to thrive accordingly. Modest Mr. Echard proceeds; After the Parliament had play'd this Plot, Mr. Pym privately got Piercy to write a certain Letter to his Brother, the Earl of Northumberland, which shou'd blow up all his Companions, yet there was a very little Show of Proof of a real Design, tho' the Letter agreed with Goring's Evidence. What can one make of such Anecdotes? Who told him Mr. Pym did it privately? He can have Acquaintance with none whom Mr. Pym wou'd be acquainted with, or have so much Confidence in, as to impart such a Secret to them. In this certain Letter there was the following great Show of a real Design. The 10000 Pounds to the Scots, was the Cause of many Discourses of Dislike

A.D. 1641. like amongst us of the Army, and came to this Purpose, that we were disoblig'd by the Parliament, and not by the King: This being said often to one another, we did resolve, Wilnot, Ashburnham, Pollard, Oneal, and my self, to tell his Majesty of it, and represent it as a great Service done him, when his Affairs were in so ill a Condition. After this we agreed upon the Petition for Bishops, and I spoke to the King, who I found had been spoken with before, in a way more sharp and high, not having Limit either of Honour or Law. The Petition of the Soldiers was soon quash'd, says the Reverend Historian, but he owns the King had sign'd it, and there cou'd not be a greater Breach of Parliamentary Privilege, than to excite an arm'd Power to oppose the Sense of the Nation, declar'd by their Representatives concerning Bishops. The King own'd he had set his Name to it, but had no Intention to do what was therein intended: I will here repeat after the Lord Clarendon, what his Majesty is made to say in his Declaration from York, the next Year, I cannot without Indignation suffer my self to be reproach'd, to have intended the least Force or Threatning to my Parliament, as to be privy to the bringing up of the Army, would imply. He was privy to the Consultations which were held to that Purpose. He approv'd of them in the most solemn Manner, by setting his Hand to the Paper which the Conspirators drew up. Goring and Piercy prov'd this, and his Majesty acknowledg'd in the same Declaration he had written C. R. upon it; yet how unconscionably do the evil Counsellors deal by their Master in making him call God to Witness, He had never any such Thought, nor knew of any such Resolution. The Parliament

Clar. 545, in their Answer argu'd, That his Majesty's Admission 555, 587. of reading and signing the Petition, and yet insinuating that he did not think of, or intend any Force towards the Parliament, was Protestatio contra Factum, a Protestation against the Fact; and therefore in Regard of the Conspiracy, was as injurious to the Constitution, as the Fact was evident and undeniable: The Parliament never ceas'd to pass it as a Reproach upon the King throughout the whole Controversy. A little Shame, without much Conscience, was sufficient to have hindred those evil Counsellors from putting a Denial and a Confession of the same Thing into the same Declaration. General Ludlow, who knew these Things as well as Chancellor Hyde, is positive; "There was a treacherous Design set on Foot, not without the Participation of the King, as appear'd under his own Hand, to bring up the English Army, and by Force to dissolve the Parliament: The Plunder of London being promis'd to the Officers, as a Reward for that Service: This was confess'd by the Lord Goring, Mr. Piercy, and others. The Scots Army was also tried, and the four Northern Counties offer'd to be given to them, in case they wou'd undertake the same Design.

P. 15.

Madam de Motteville, who tells us she had her Memoirs from Queen Henrietta Maria, affirms, that Goring and Wilnot engag'd the Army in the King's Service, and to carry over those Troops to him, that were entirely devoted to his Service. Goring desir'd the Queen to speak to the King about it, which she did, but Goring afterwards discovering the Plot, 'twas all spoil'd. Motteville adds, the Queen did all she could to save Strafford: Not a Day pass'd over her Head, but she closetted the most violent of the Faction, whom she sent for privately by the Back-Stairs into an Apartment near her own, which belong'd to a Lady that was in the Country, where with a Flambeaux in her Hand, without trusting any body with the Secret, she went all alone to meet them in the Night, and offer'd them every Thing she cou'd think of, but all was in vain. A rare Minister must this Strafford be, who had so far gain'd the Affection of a Popish bigotted Queen, as to tempt her to lay by her Royalty to serve him,

The Queen, her Mother, had been here about A.D. 1641: three Years, and given so much Encouragement to Rosetti, the Pope's Agent, that the Parliament took Notice of it: The Multitude also threatned her House while the Agent was shelter'd there. The King, who had other Occasions enough for Ship-Money, allow'd her near 40000 Pounds a Year, when France wou'd not allow her a Livre. However, the Archdeacon is very well pleas'd with the Company of this illustrious Lady, but the House of Commons pray'd the Lords humbly to beseech the King that she might depart the Kingdom. There seem'd to be a strange Infatuation in the Conduct of this Court, who suffer'd that Lady to stay till the People had her be gone. The Reasons they gave for it were, Ill Instruments about her: The flowing of Priests and Papists to her House: The Use and Practice of the Idolatry of the Mass. To quicken her Journey, the Parliament not only order'd 10000 Pounds for it, but gave Intimation that it shou'd be follow'd by more, when she was out of England. I have touch'd on this Queen's Residence here elsewhere, and the 10000 Pounds she had of Mr. Capell's Money for his being made a Lord. Cardinal Richieu's Hatred to this Princess, pursu'd her implacably wherever she went: He envy'd her the Air she breath'd, and the Food she eat; and her Royal Entertainment in England, made him an Enemy to the Court that entertain'd her. He was not ignorant of the King and Queen's good Intentions to assist her against him, when it was in their Power, and he let no Opportunity slip of giving them Trouble. King Charles, in his Letter to the Queen of the 13th of March, 1643, writes, If this Rebellion had not begun to oppress me when it did, a late great Queen had ended more glorious than she did not many Months after at Cologne, where she had hardly any Thing to subsist her but what was given her by the Parliament.

On the 13th of May the King came to the House of Lords, and gave the Royal Assent to the Act for the Remainder of the six Subsidies, for which Commissioners both Lords and Commons had been appointed in the Bill; and the Earl of Bristol being one of them, the Parliament were so sensible of his deserting their Cause, and of his approving the Treachery of his Son, the Lord Digby, that they order'd his Name to be struck out, and put the Earl of Stamford in its Place. When there are so many Affairs transacting at once, it is impossible to observe the Order of Time exactly, and not break the Thread of the History.

There was all this while a Bill moving in the House of Commons, for taking away Bishops Votes in Parliament. The Reasons in the Archdeacon's Account of it are mutilated, and misrepresented. He asserts that the main Reason was to get rid of the Scots, who declar'd they wou'd not stir till that Bill pass'd: The Lords scrupling to pass the Bill as the Commons had drawn it, there was a Conference between the two Houses; and the Commons Reasons were, 1. Because it is a great Hindrance to their Ministerial Function. 2. Because they do vow and undertake at their Ordination, when they enter into holy Orders, that they will give themselves wholly to that Vocation. 3. Because Councils and Canons in several Ages do forbid them to meddle with secular Affairs. 4. Because the twenty-four Bishops have Dependance on the two Archbishops, and take their Oath of Canonical Obedience unto them. 5. Because they are but for their Lives, and therefore are not fit to have Legislative Power over the Honours, Inheritances, Persons and Liberties of others. 6. Because of Bishops Dependancy and Expectancy of Translation to Places of greater Profit. 7. Because several Bishops have of late much encroach'd upon the Consciences and Liberties of the Subjects, and they and their Successors will be much

After the Bishops then in being, came Sheldon, Morley, Cosins, Stern, Henchman, Gunning, Hyde, Ward, Sparrow, Mew, Blandford, Glemham, Parker, Lake, Ken, &c.* 8. Because the whole Number of them are interested to maintain the Jurisdiction of the Bishops, which hath been found so grievous to the three Kingdoms, that Scotland hath utterly abolish'd it. 9. Because Bishops being Lords of Parliament, it settles too great a Distance between them and the rest of their Brethren in the Ministry, which occasions Pride in them, Discontent in others, and Disquiet in the Church: And as to their having had Votes a long Time, the Answer is, If it be inconvenient, Times and Usages are not to be consider'd with Law-Makers; some Abbots voted as anciently in Parliament as Bishops. Dr. Williams, now made Archbishop of York, attempted to answer these Reasons in a Pamphlet, intitled, The Abstract: To which presently came forth a Reply. And it were to be wish'd Mr. Archdeacon had answer'd them in his History, instead of telling us the Lords declaim'd against the House of Commons for meddling with an Affair that concern'd themselves; and made use of this most convincing Argument, if they bring up this Bill one Day to take away the BISHOPS, they may bring another the next Day to take away the DUKES; because the Dukes and the Bishops have the same holy Vocation: And all the Reasons given by the Parliament make against the Dukes, as much as against the Bishops. This is some of the strongest Arguments in their Histories. Sir Simon d'Erwes, the famous Antiquary, inform'd the House, that in the ancient Manuscript Copy of the Greek Bible, in St. James's Library, the Epistles run thus, The first to Timothy, written from Laodicea; to Titus, written from Nicopolis; whence he infer'd, that the stiling of Timothy to be the first Bishop of Ephesus, and Titus the first Bishop of Crete, were the spurious Additions of some Eastern Bishops or Monks, at least 500 Years after Christ. Mr. Edward Hyde was Chairman of the Bill concerning Bishops, and according to his own impartial History, he behav'd so dexterously, that he puzzled all their Enemies. The Reverend Historian vouches for the Truth of it; but there is not the least Appearance of it in Whitlocke, or Rusworth, or indeed in Fact or Probability. Whitlocke writes, there were not many very eager for the Bishops: Deans and Chapters, were brought into the Bill afterwards, and Mr. Thomas made an elegant Speech against that Institution; as did also Mr. Pury, Citizen for Gloucester, in which he said, Seeing therefore the said Deans and Chapters are but Trustees, and the Profits of the Lands so ill employ'd by them, contrary to the Trust in them repos'd, I am clearly of Opinion, that by a Legislative Power in Parliament, it is fit to take them away, and to put them into the Hands of Feoffees, to be dispos'd of to such pious Uses as they were first intended for. The next Speech upon this Bill was Sir Edward Deering's, and the whole Story of it in Echard is an incredible Piece of Secret History, with some other Infirmities. The Addition he offer'd to the Bill, was the very same Proposition which Mr. Pury had made for putting Church Lands into the Hands of Commissioners. Sir Edward Deering, among many other Things, said, I am for abolishing our present Episcopacy, both Dioceses and Diocesans, as they now are: But I am withal at the same Time for Restoration of the pure primitive Episcopal Presidency. Cut off the usurp'd Adjuncts of our present Episcopacy, reduce the ancient Episcopacy, such as it was in puris Spiritualibus. And because he does not allow the Prelacy of Laud to be pure primitive Episcopacy, which the Archdeacon positively avers, therefore is Sir Edward a Madman and an Idiot. Indeed Archbishop Usher was not of his Opinion, as to the Laudean Hierarchy, Whitlocke informs us, "that he offer'd an Expedient for Conjunction in Point of Discipline, that Episcopal and Presbyterian Government might not be at a far Distance, but reducing Episcopacy to the Form of Synodical Government in the ancient Church." So that according to the most Reverend Father, Archbishop Usher, Laud's Church was not the ancient Church, which is what I have all along been contending for, and no more. Ever since I was capable of knowing what was the Meaning of the Words Bishops and Presbyters, the Church of England has been blest'd with so many holy, wise, and learned Fathers, that all the Arguments made use of in these Times against Bishops, have no manner of Relation to them. If our Church had always been so blest'd, the sacred Function wou'd have always met with the Reverence that is due to it: But the Laudean Prelates setting their Hearts entirely on the Things of this World, on Power, Wealth and Dignity, gave general Offence to all sincere Christians, and the holy Order it self was affected by the Pride and Weakness of the Men.

The Act for Tonnage and Poundage has been sufficiently spoken of already; and there is hardly a Man of common Sense in the Kingdom, who does not know that any Revenue which the Crown holds by the Gift of the People, cannot be legally levy'd, till it is given; Yet now the Parliament past an Act for levying it, the Reverend Historian is very angry, that in the Preamble of that Act, the King is made to grant what no King ever deny'd, that the Crown had no Right to take a Gift before it was given. By which, says this judicious Writer, He was strip'd of all he had left. This Act was to be in Force two Months only, while a new Book of Rates was making; and then another Act was to be pass'd for levying it, during the Life of the King, as usual, if no ill Measures interven'd to obstruct it.

When those two monstrous Courts, the Star-Chamber and High-Commission was abolish'd by Parliament, the excellent Historian last mention'd, laments the Loss of them, as the Bulwarks of the Peoples Liberties, Spiritual and Temporal. He says in so many Words, the Star-Chamber was a Bulwark for the Liberties of the Subject, that it was hastily destroy'd, and after an unprecedented Manner, an Act of Parliament. We have shewn in the preceding Pages, what a rare Defence this was of the Peoples Rights and Liberties; and it is farther explain'd by a Speech of the Lord Andover in the House of Peers before-mention'd, The very Words of the Statute for it shew, that it was a needless Institution; they who are to judge, can proceed with no Delinquent otherwise, than as if he were convicted of the same Crime by due Process of Law: And do your Lordships hold this a rational Court, that sends us to the Law, and calls us to the Law, and calls us back from it again? such a Confusion as cou'd not but be pleasing to so clear a Head as that of the Historian. It is unnecessary to add more of the Lord Andover's Arguments, when the plain Fact prov'd the Court to have deserv'd eternal Infamy for its Tyranny and Cruelty. The High-Commission Court never had a Word said for it, by Men of Capacity and Conscience. Mr. Archdeacon begins this Matter with a flagrant piece of Sophistry; He says, Queen Elizabeth establish'd it against Popery and Schism, but he sinks there being no temporal Penalties in the Statute. Dr. Fuller informs us, It was against Magna Charta, no Man being to be condemn'd to the loss of Liberty or Property, but by the lawful Judgment of his Peers. This Court tender'd an Oath to such as they suspected, obliging the Party to discover what might be Penal to himself, which was conceiv'd to be unjust; and so detestably unjust, that it is astonishing to see Ministers of the Gospel concerning themselves in such wicked Work; and most of the Judges were of that

A.D. 1641. that Function in the highest Order. I need not repeat more of Dr. Fuller's Arguments against this Commission, nor any of the pretended Answers, except the chief of them, which is in Echard: That these Judges punish'd Fornication and Profaneness; whereas the quite contrary is so very true, that they punish'd those who wou'd not be profane, if Sabbath-breaking may be reckon'd Profanation: He declaims again, these two Courts might have been of excellent Use to the Church and the State: So excellent the Use of them, that the Grievances occasion'd by them were some of those that contributed principally to the Destruction of both. Before the King pass'd these two Acts, he gave the Royal Assent to the Poll-Tax; A Gift, says the Speaker, of so vast Extent, that Time cannot parallel it by any Example; however, his Majesty wou'd not pass the two other Bills at the same Time; they being all three offer'd together; which gave so great Disgust to the Parliament, that the King came four Days after and pass'd them; but this ungenerous manner of doing Things, took off much of the Merit of it.

The Infolence of the Popish Priests was grown to such a Height, that one of them, Father Philips, belonging to the Queen, having been found guilty of holding treasonable Correspondence with his Brethren abroad for advancing the Popish Cause, the House of Commons sent for him, and he told the Messenger, The Queen had order'd him not to go till he had spoken with the King, and he wou'd obey her Commands before those of the Parliament; upon which they sent a Warrant to apprehend him as a Delinquent, and another to seize Count Rosetti. The latter made his Escape, but Philips at last appear'd at the Bar of the House, and after Examination was impeach'd, For the damnable Doctrine which he and other Jesuits hath taught, which hath been the Cause of the Civil Wars like to befall these Kingdoms, if God in his Mercy does not prevent, according to the third Article of the Impeachment. His Majesty in the Close of his Speech on passing the two last Bills, said, I have one Word more to speak unto you; it is concerning my Nephew the Prince Elector Palatine, who having desir'd me and the King of Denmark, to give Consent to a Writing concerning the Diet at Ratisbon with the Emperor, I cou'd not but send my Ambassador to assist him, though I am afraid I shall not have so good an Answer as I expect; which my Nephew foreseeing, hath desired me for the better Countenance of the same, to make a Manifesto in my Name, about which I desire your Advice; and the House gave it very cheerfully, and voted to give his Majesty the necessary Assistance if the Manifesto did not succeed, in which the House of Lords also concurr'd; another Proof how much all good Englishmen and good Protestants had at Heart the Interests of the Palatine House. The Speeches as well as the Prayers for them came from the Puritans; we find them never mention'd by the Laudeans, unless with Marks of Hatred or Neglect. Mr. Hollis in his Speech to the Lords, said, The House of Commons look on those distress'd Princes with an Eye of Tenderness, wishing that every Drop of that Princely Blood, may ever be illustrated with Honour and Happiness. Laud, on the contrary, struck them out of the Prayers of the Church.

Sir Benjamin Rudyard said, the good Effect of the German Match was lost by ill Counsels, Villiers, Weston's, Laud's, &c. And speaking of the belov'd Queen of Bohemia, his Majesty's Royal Great-Grandmother, he added, By assisting the Prince Elector, we shall refresh and comfort the needful Heart of that most noble, virtuous, and magnanimously suffering Queen of Bohemia, who is ever to be highly and tenderly regarded by this House, by this Kingdom. Sir Simon d'Ewes, It concerns us now at length to provide that the Prince Elector himself, and the other princely Branches, shou'd not be dispos'd of his Inheritance, he being the second if not the first A.D. 1641. and most antient of the Empire; and this first and most antient of the Imperial Families in Germany, is now happily and gloriously united in the Royal House of Great-Britain. With what Pleasure must every good Englishman observe, that the Hearts of their Ancestors were bound up in Interests of the Queen of Bohemia and her Posterity; and with what Indignation read that there was at any Time a Set of Men so wicked as to refuse them their Prayers?

The Judges had hitherto lain under parliamentary Censures only, but now six of them, Brampston, Berkley, Crawley, Davenport, Trevor, and Weston, were impeach'd at the Lord's Bar: Berkley by William Pierpoint Esq; second Son to the Earl of Kingston; Crawley by Mr. Waller, Davenport by Mr. Hyde. Mr. Hollis made a Speech in Praise of Sir Randal Crew, who was remov'd from the Chief-Justiceship of the King's-Bench, for refusing to join in the odious and illegal Imposition of Ship-Money.

There being still many Remains of Romish Idolatry in Churches and publick Places, the House of Commons order'd, all scandalous Pictures, Crosses, and Figures to be remov'd; to please the Presbyterians, says Echard, very unfairly; because a very great Majority of the Reform'd Church of England were as much pleas'd with it as the Presbyterians. Sir Robert Harley Ancestor to another Presbyterian of that Name in our Time, was appointed for this Work, Whitlocke tells us he perform'd it zealously; and his Successor and Namesake fided afterwards with those who were for setting them up again.

The Pacification with the Scots, which had continu'd all this while in Treaty, being now in great Forwardness, and Money given for disbanding the two Armies, the King nam'd the Earl of Holland General of the English, and he went to the Army to do that Service. Then his Majesty sent a Message to the Parliament to notify his intended Journey to Scotland in fourteen Days from the 28th of July, which was not well lik'd; and in the Interim they receiv'd Information from the Earl of Holland, that he found the Army had been tamper'd with, from what Sir Jacob Aspley own'd to him. The Parliament, as they had Reason, suspecting this Journey, was the more jealous of the King's frequent pressing to have the Scots Army disbanded before he began it, and his own Army paid. The House took the former into Consideration, till Mr. Strode rose up and said, Mr. Speaker, We ought not in such Haste to part with the Scotch Army, lest the Sons of Zerviah in their Absence be too hard for us; upon which it was resolv'd, not to disband the one without the other.

The Commons being inform'd that the Queen intended to go to the Spaw for Recovery of her Health, much impair'd by some Discontents of Mind, and false Rumours spread against her; they had a Conference with the Lords about it, and Reasons were then agreed upon to be presented to his Majesty for Stay of the Queen's Journey; in which they offer'd to do any thing which cou'd be reasonably desir'd for the Ease of her Majesty's Mind; and the Queen putting off her Journey, they gave her Majesty Thanks for it in very respectful Terms.

The Impeachment against Wren Bishop of Ely, was carry'd up to the Lords by Sir Thomas Widdrington. The Preamble of which shews us the true Spirit of the Laudean Prelates and Clergy, the Source of the Mischiefs of these perilous Times: "The said Matthew Wren being popishly and superstitiously affected, did at his first coming to be Bishop of Norwich, endeavour by sundry Ways and Means to suppress the powerful and painful preaching of the Word of God, did introduce divers Orders and Injunctions tending to Superstition and Idolatry, did disturb and disquiet

A.D. 1641. " quiet the orderly and settled State of the Ministers, People, and Churches of that Diocese, to the great Prejudice of his Majesty, the great Grief, Disquiet, and Hazard of the Estates, Consciences, and Lives of many of his Majesty's loyal Subjects there, to the manifest bringing in and increasing of Prophaneness, Ignorance, and Disobedience." Then follow particular Instances of his tyrannical idolatrous Practices; he punish'd one Mr. Daniel Whayman for coming within the Rail of a Communion-Table; he excommunicated Mr. John Shyming, Mr. Samuel Dunckon, Mr. Edmund Day, Mr. John Frowar, and others, for not kneeling at the Sacrament; he suspended Mr. William Leigh, Mr. Richard Prond, Mr. Matthew Brownrigg, Mr. Mott, and several others, for not reading the wicked Book of Sports on the Lord's-Day. Mr. Powell, Mr. Richard Raymond, Mr. Jeremy Burroughs, he forbade preaching Preparation-Sermons; he excommunicated and suspended Mr. John Carter, Mr. Robert Peck, Mr. Thomas Scot, Mr. William Green, Mr. Greenhill, Mr. Nicholas Beard, Mr. Robert West, Mr. Thomas Allen, and above fifty more Divines for the like Pretences: He drove Mr. Edmund Calamy and Mr. Broom out of his Diocese. In a word, he ruin'd the Manufacturers and Manufactures at Norwich and other trading Towns, by forcing the Ministers to quit their Habitations, and their Flocks soon follow'd them.

King's Journey to Scotland.

The House of Commons desir'd a Conference with the Lords about the King's Journey to Scotland, and it was resolv'd to petition his Majesty to appoint a Custos Regni in his Absence, with Power to pass Bills; but, says Echard, if he had left any such Power, it had been illegal; which is so contrary to Fact, that the granting Power by Commission to Lords to pass Bills, was of no longer Date than the Attainder of the Earl of Strafford; and the King did now actually sign a Commission for passing Bills in his Absence; the Commissioners being the Lord-Keeper Littleton, the Earl of Manchester, the Earl of Lindsay, the Marquis of Hertford, the Earl of Bath, the Earl of Dorset, and the Earl of Essex, who was also made General of all the Forces on this Side Trent, with Power to raise Soldiers. His Lordship was about the same Time sworn Lord-Chamberlain, and Sir Peter Walsb Comptroller of the Household, in the room of Sir Thomas Fermyn.

Acts pass.

The Act of Pacification with the Scots, being ready for the royal Assent, the King came to the House, and pass'd it the 10th of August, as also the Act about Knighthood, that for regulating the Clerks of the Markets, that against monopolizing Salt Petre and Gunpowder, against the Oppressions in the Stannery Court, and an Act declaring Ship-Money unlawful. Then his Majesty made a short Speech, desiring the Care of the Parliament in his Absence to preserve the Kingdom's Peace, and took his leave of them. He began his Journey two or three Hours after, having in his Coach with him the Elector Palatine, the Duke of Richmond, and the Marquis of Hamilton. The two Houses appointed Commissioners to attend the King in Scotland, William Earl of Bedford, Edward Lord Howard, Nathaniel Piennes Esq; Sir William Armyne, Sir Philip Stapleton, and John Hampden Esq; The Parliament sent a Draught of their Commission to the King to sign; it empower'd them to treat with Scots Commissioners according to the Instructions they receiv'd from the Two Houses with the King's Consent, but his Majesty would not sign it; and indeed he look'd on those Commissioners as no better than Spies upon his Actions; which the Parliament thought convenient, considering he took that Journey contrary to their Advice, and therefore they were jealous that it might be contrary to their Interest. The King's Earnestness to go to Scotland, where those whom he look'd upon as

A.D. 1641. his Enemies, and whom he lately had proclaim'd Rebels were Masters, was really very unaccountable, unless he was upon a hot Scent of the Intelligence between the Heads of the Puritan Party and the Scots, which is very probable. Wentworth had got Intimation of it in general while he was at the Army, and thought he had learn'd Matter enough against Mr. Pym and some others to form an Impeachment, which the King and he were very intent upon; but Pym was before-hand with him, as has been related. His Majesty cou'd not forgive Mr. Pym the Prosecution of Strafford, which had oblig'd him to consent to the Death of a Man contrary to his Promise; the reverend Historian wou'd have said contrary to his Conscience, as every thing ought to be that is contrary to one's Word and Honour. We have Reason to believe that the King was in Hopes of being fully inform'd of that Intelligence by some false Brethren among the Scots, such as Montrose, and Lord Saville, doubtless gave him the necessary Informations of Persons and Things for that Purpose. The Effect of it was, that at his Return he had Articles of High-Treason ready against the Lord Kimbolton and five Members of the House of Commons, and was resolv'd to have them prosecuted to Death, as will be seen hereafter. Thus there seem'd to be a Fatality in this Scottish Journey, as well as in almost all the ill Steps taken by this ill-advis'd and unhappy Prince.

We have said little of the Act of Pacification with the Scots, because we intended to speak of it by itself, that the Thread of the Treaty might not be broken. On the 23d of November the King granted a Commission to the Lords already mention'd, to treat and conclude a Pacification with the Scots Commissioners, to whom the Committees of that Kingdom had given the like Power by their Commission, dated the 31st of October, and 4th of November, and sign'd Rothies, Montrose, Cassilis, Lothian, Lindsay, Balmerino, Naper, Burghly, Es. Couper, Thomas Hop, William Riccarton, Home, W. Caprinton, J. Gartgrith, Dundas, Edward Edgar, Richard Maxwell, James Scot, Southerfield, William Hamilton, Master W. Moir, Ja. Sword, Hew Kennedy, Rutherford.

The first Article of the Treaty was, that the Acts of the Scots Parliament which the High-Commissioner had not pass'd, shou'd be confirmed, leaving out some Words in the Preamble and Conclusion which reflected on his Majesty's Authority, and related not to the Substance of the Acts.

2. The Castle of Edinburgh, and other Strengths of the Kingdom, to be furnish'd for the Defence of the same.

3. The Scots in Scotland not to be censur'd for subscribing the Covenant, nor press'd with Oaths and Subscriptions contrary to it.

4. The Authors and Cauers of the late Troubles to be censur'd and sentenc'd by Parliament.

5. All Ships and Goods to be restor'd, and Damages made good on both Sides.

6. The great Expence of the Scots to be paid, and their Losses satisfy'd.

For which the Parliament gave 300000 Pounds, and appointed the following Commissioners to receive it and pay them: Earl of Bedford, Earl of Essex, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Holland, Earl of Stamford, Lord Wharton, Lord Mandeville, Lord Brook, Mr. Capell, Mr. Martin, Sir Thomas Barrington, Sir Arthur Ingram, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir Robert Pye, Mr. Henry Bellasis, Sir Walter Erle, Sir William Litton, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir Thomas Cheek, Sir John Strangeways, Mr. Arthur Goodwin, Mr. Hampden, Alderman Soam, Alderman Pennington. These Commissioners for paying the Scots were nam'd about the beginning of February, so that Mr. Capell and Sir John Strangeways had till then kept their Integrity, and call'd the Scots their Brethren.

A.D. 1641.

Brethren, as they were term'd in this Act; the Benefit of which was not to extend to John Earl of Traquair, Sir Robert Spotswood, Sir John Hay, and Master Walter Balcanquhall, cited and pursu'd as Incendiaries. The Scots were to have Liberty to sue for Reparation of Losses.

The constant and friendly Conjunction of the two Kingdom to be firmly observ'd and continu'd to all Posterity; England nor Ireland not to make War on Scotland without the Consent of the Parliament of England, and so vice versa; all who do so to be deem'd Traitors. Commissioners of both Kingdoms to be appointed in the Interim between the sitting of Parliaments to keep the Peace now happily concluded; both Armies to be disbanded when the Act is past; the Garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle to be remov'd, &c. The ratifying Clause comes last, His Majesty for himself and Successors doth promise in Verbo Principis, never to come in the contrary of this Statute and Sanction, &c. Like as the Parliaments of both Kingdoms give full Assurance to the Observance of the whole Articles inviolably, hinc inde, in all Times to come. These Articles and the ratifying Act, were by the King's Command printed at Oxford, upon Advice that the Scots were raising an Army to assist their Brethren in England two Years after, pursuant to this Treaty. What good Effect the printing of it then cou'd produce for the King, is not to be comprehended, it only putting the Scots in mind of doing what by this Treaty they were oblig'd to do against all who took Arms against the Parliament. But I observe King Charles very often printed and publish'd Papers with Intent they shou'd make for him when they made against him.

Parliament.

Mr. Echard tells us that the Members of Parliament after the King went for Scotland, grew weary of sitting, or being afraid of Infection, for this Reign was much visited with the Plague, left the Town, and there remain'd but twenty Lords and an hundred Commoners, which is false as to the Number of Commoners, who taking Advantage of thin Houses, laid the Liturgy aside, which was then much reverenc'd throughout the Kingdom, just as much as his Histories are at present. The much greater Part of the Nation were Puritans, who groan'd under it, and desir'd to have it abolish'd, which is evident from the general Clamour for abolishing Episcopacy. This pack'd Assembly, according to him, voted the taking away the Rails and removing the Communion-Table to the Middle of the Church. What follows proves still farther how he abounded with good Judgment and good Manners: The Lords for the major Part being sensibly offended that the Commons shou'd presume to disturb the Peace of the Church by such unprecedented Insolence. This Falsity is so barefac'd, that the House of Commons complain'd that this major Part of the House of Lords were but eleven to nine. A Majority 'tis true, but one of the eleven had made it none; yet as small as it is, he has not Modesty enough to restrain him from calling the Representative of the People of England Insolent, a worse Name than I durst venture to give him, if there is not Falshood with the Insolence. We have the true History in Larrey; "The Parliament which had now struck all the great Strokes they design'd, were apprehensive of nothing during the King's Absence, and thought of giving themselves some Respite after their long and painful Session; and most of the Peers and Commons were glad to return to their Counties to receive there the Applause of the People for the vigorous Opposition they had made to Episcopacy and arbitrary Power." So very wide from the Truth is what the Author of the HISTORY OF THE REBELLION pretends, and what Echard has slavishly and blindly follow'd, that those Members who remain'd sitting were the only vigorous Opposers of Episcopacy; for those who went into the Country, did it to receive the Applause of the People for that vigorous Opposition against Episcopacy; and there was not one Opposer of Bishops who much reverenc'd the Liturgy. The Fact is really the very Reverse of their Histories: It was the Absence of a good Number of Lords, which gave the Friends to the Common-Prayer Book an Opportunity of continuing it by a Majority of eleven to nine; the Commons saying in their Declaration publish'd with the Consent of the Lords upon it, "The last Order of the House of Lords was made with the Consent only of eleven Lords, and that nine other Lords who were present did dissent from it; so that it may be well hop'd when both Houses shall meet again, the good Propositions and Preparations in the House of Commons for preventing the Grievances, and reforming the Disorders and Abuses in Matters of Religion may be brought to Perfection." The Lords who dissented were the Lord-Keeper Littleton, Earl of Manchester Lord Privy-Seal, Earl of Bedford, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Clare, Lord Mandeville, Lord Newport, Lord Wharton, Lord Hunsdon, who declar'd, They held it fit to have the Consent of the House of Commons in those Things which so nearly concerns the quiet and Government of the Church. The Lords in the very Order for continuing the Service, direct that no Parsons, Vicars, or Curates, presume to introduce any Rites and Ceremonies which may give Offence. Such were all the Innovations introduc'd by Land and his Followers, the Rails, the Cringes, the Bowings, which the Commons had voted against, and for which Mr. Archdeacon calls the Parliament Insolent.

There was a Debate about disbanding the Armies, whether the English or Scottish Armies shou'd be first disbanded; at last it was agreed that it shou'd be done at one and the same Time, which did not need much debating. Accordingly it was done the 6th of August, the Scots having receiv'd their first Payments, upon which they were to begin their March. After this the Parliament adjourn'd to the 20th of October, having appointed a Committee of fifty to sit during the Recess with ample Powers, but not with so much Power as their Principals the Parliament itself had, which the reverend Historian avers as positively as if it had been true. All the Power they had, was, 1. To meet when they thought fit. 2. To receive and answer Letters from their Committee in Scotland. 3. To take Care of the disbanding of the Army, and of paying them. 4. To recall the Scots Committee if they see Cause. 5. To prepare Matters against Delinquents; and three or four other Particulars of less Consequence. The Committee of the House of Commons, were Sir John Colepepyr, Sir John The grand Franklyn, Lord Falkland, Mr. Lawrence Whitaker; Committee Sir Thomas Bowyer, Mr. Wheeler, Sir William Drake, of Commons Sir Richard Cave, Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Sir Simon D'Erwes, Sir Robert Pye, Sir Edward Hales, Sir Thomas Dacres, Sir William Litton, Sir Henry Mildmay, Sir Thomas Barrington, Sir John Clotworthy, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir Gilbert Pickering, Sir Samuel Luke; Sir Henry Vane, Serjeant Wilde, Mr. Pym, Mr. Bridgman, Mr. Goodwin, Mr. Wingate, Alderman Soame; Alderman Pennington, Captain Venn, Mr. Vassal, Captain Rainsborough, Mr. Bence, Mr. Holland, Mr. Winwood, Mr. Scawen, Mr. J. Goodwin; Mr. Morley, Mr. Martin, Mr. A. Goodwin, Mr. White, Mr. Glyn, Mr. Bedingsfield, Mr. Blakeston, Mr. Waller, Mr. Solicitor St. John, Mr. Strode, Mr. Spurstow.

The House of Lords also appointed a Committee Of Lords during the Recess, who were Lord-Keeper Littleton, Earl of Manchester Lord Privy-Seal, Earl of Essex Lord-Chamberlain, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Clare, Earl of Denbigh, Earl of Cleveland, whose Powers were limited to the three or four first Articles of those of the Committee of Commons.

About the time of the King's Journey to Scotland, there was a Day of Thanksgiving for the Pacification Thanksgiving.

A.D. 1641. cification with the Scots, appointed by Parliament. Bishop Williams had prepar'd a Form of Prayer to be us'd at St. Margaret's Westminster, where the House of Commons us'd to go on such Occasions; but to avoid that Form, they went to Lincoln's-Inn Chapel.

The Archdeacon gives a Summary of the King's great Concessions in passing several Bills before he went to Scotland. He and his fellow Writers always represent the redressing of Grievances as a Concession from the Crown; as if the sovereign Power was given to do Hurt, and it was the King's super-abounding Goodness only when it did Good. He affirms his Majesty had now done all his Subjects cou'd desire for their Security and Welfare: Therefore from this Period of Time, says he, impartial Posterity may best judge which Side was most blameable in the succeeding Transactions. The very next Transaction of the King's, was his breaking into the House of Commons with an arm'd Power, and invading their Rights in such an enormous Manner, that it caus'd a general Uproar and Mutiny in the City of London: And why may not impartial Posterity begin their Judgment from that the very next Period, which Side was most blameable?

The King's Design by his Journey. I have hinted already that the Journey to Scotland, a Kingdom hated by the King, cou'd not be undertaken so hastily out of a Desire to see the People. The English Parliament oppos'd it for several Reasons urg'd to the Lords by Mr. Hollis; and his Majesty's being deaf to those Reasons, must proceed from some secret Design, which Mr. Acherley hit on, with this Mistake only, that he calls the Intelligence an Invitation, whereas the latter was an Imposture, and the English Puritans went no farther than Encouragement. "All Things being now quieted, says the learned Lawyer, the King in Execution of Part of the Design, resolv'd in July 1641, to make a Tour into Scotland to settle, as was given out, Affairs in that Kingdom, but in Reality to accomplish some Undertakings that were not publickly own'd; which Resolution alarm'd the leading Inviters at Westminster, who cou'd not imagine what shou'd be the Meaning of that Journey by the King, who had so lately within nine Months arraign'd and pronounc'd the Scots to be notorious Rebels, and had with Vehemence press'd the chasing them as such out of England. The Inviters therefore suspecting the Design, spar'd no Endeavours, nor Insinuations, nor even parliamentary Addresses, but in vain, to prevent the Journey. However, they procur'd a Committee of Parliament to be sent to take Care that Lord Waristoun shou'd keep stable, and never part with the Original Invitation. Mr. Acherley means the Letters before inserted. The King and his Ministers being at Edinburgh, discover'd that many who were now the leading Men in both Houses of the English Parliament, solicited the Scots to invade England, and found ample Evidence to prove the Facts. The King cou'd prevail no farther with Waristoun than to make some faint Promises to bring the original Engagement into England." The Lord Waristoun knew by this Time the whole Secret of the Letters, and was so deep in the Correspondence with those leading Men, that he cou'd not have brought them on the Stage without bringing himself: For notwithstanding the Act of Oblivion, the Court wou'd have found Means to have made away with him under Colour of Justice, as they did afterwards. The Names of the seven Lords to the forg'd Letter were, as I have hinted already, cut out, and each Name deliver'd to the Lord to whom it belong'd: But Saville pretended to the King that their Names were genuine, and wou'd have excited him to try them upon it for High-Treason, if that counterfeit Original had been produc'd. Acherley proceeds; A.D. 1641. "Those Measures were for a long time kept in Obscurity, and the obstinate Prosecution of the Invitation, may be accounted the very true tho' hidden Spring and Ground of all the Wars and Troubles that ensu'd. He says elsewhere, The Queen, whose Power with the King was absolute, incens'd him at his own Concessions;" and the Cabinet-Council resolv'd, as Father Orleans confesses, That since his Majesty cou'd not be beloved, he shou'd put himself into a Condition to be fear'd. A Prince in such Circumstances is in the worst Condition in the World, and has no great Reason to desire to live in it longer. The Queen and these evil Cabinet-Counsellors, incessantly solicited the King to prosecute those Members of both Houses who had corresponded with the Scots to draw them into England; and as soon as he return'd from Scotland, they put him upon that irrecoverable Step the violent Entry into the House of Commons. The Scots were not only forgiven the Invasion they made upon England, but the Invaders were rewarded with Posts and Honours: Of Course there remain'd no Guilt in that Invasion, those that acted having been more criminal than those that counsell'd; common Policy therefore would have pardon'd the less criminal as well as the greater, and not have push'd his Majesty's Repentments against them so far, as in the Pursuit of them, according to Acherley, to cover the three Nations with Calamities dreadful and amazing. And now let impartial Posterity judge again on whose Side the Blame lies.

While his Majesty was at Edinburgh caressing Reybold, the Scots, he sifted them to see whether he cou'd not prevail with them to invade England on his Account, and assist him to subject the Parliament to his Will. He offer'd them the three Northern Counties as a Reward for that Service; he cajol'd them in the highest Degree; but all his good Words and fair Promises succeeded not, the Scots being sensible that after the English had lost their Liberty, they shou'd not be long in Possession of theirs.

The King had not been many Weeks in Scotland, before News came to London of a Conspiracy at Edinburgh to murder the Marquis of Hamilton and the Earl of Argyll. Lord Clarendon confesses it was a true Plot, but Echard says of it as he said of Goring's Conspiracy, it was only a pretended one. The Truth is, Montros himself offer'd to get those two Lords assassinated; and as Acherley adds, no doubt Waristoun was to have kept them Company. This every one concluded Montros dar'd not do, if he had not known that the Mind of the Government labour'd with Revenge. This Rumour sufficiently alarm'd the Inviters at Westminster, who had good Reason to take the Alarm, if they believ'd that bloody Proposal to cut the Throats of those two great Lords cou'd be received, and the Proposer come off with Impunity. Mr. Pym Chairman of the Grand Committee during the Recess, having Information of it, wrote to the Lord-Mayor to place convenient Guards in several Parts of the City, and propos'd to the Committee that a strong Guard might be kept in the Cities of London and Westminster; which was agreed to by the Committees of both Houses, and Letters written to their Committees in Scotland to inform his Majesty of it. The Train'd-Bands of Westminster attended in Arms in the Palace-Yard, and the Lord-General the Earl of Essex appointed an hundred of them to do Duty by Day and by Night; tho', says Echard, the Plot was only a Matter of Ridicule. It must not be in his History, where when the Author renders himself ridiculous, his Matter is extremely melancholy. If the Sham had not taken, Mr. Pym and his Committee wou'd have been called to an Account by the Parliament for what they had done against the Common-Prayer-Book, the Communion-Table, and the Rails about it, the bowing to the Altar, &c. In

A.D. 1641. In Scotland King Charles pass'd an Act which condemn'd Bishops as contrary to the Word of God. He also gave away the Church-Lands to some of the Covenanters. He dignify'd with new Titles the Marquis of Hamilton, who was made a Duke, the Earl of Argyle a Marquis, General Lesley Earl of Leven, Lord Lowdon Earl of Lowdon, &c. for which General Lesley cry'd out, according to the same sincere Historian, May my Hands rot off if ever I act more against so gude a King; which being so agreeable to the Manners of the Scots Presbyterians, cannot but gain due Credit with the Reader. The Scots Parliament prosecuted the Earl of Traquair, the Bishop of Ross, and the Earl of Montross, for dangerous Practices against the Kirk, and gave the King to understand that their Lives were spar'd purely in Consideration of the Concessions he had made them.

Irish Massacre. While the King was at Edinburgh, he receiv'd News of the damnable Rebellion and Massacre in Ireland, where the Papists rose upon the Protestants on the 23d of October, a Day dedicated to St. Ignatius Loyala, Patron of the Sanguinary Order of Jesuits. Never was such a dreadful Butchery seen or heard of, either as to the Number of those who were Butcher'd, or the Variety of Cruelties inflicted. But though the Execution of this Barbarity is prodigious, yet it is less surprizing than the miraculous Manner by which Dublin, the Capital City of the Kingdom, was sav'd; and which afterwards gave the English an Opportunity to repair this great Loss; and to chastise the diabolical Murderers, and re-establish their Dominion and Religion. Echard calls this infernal Massacre a Concussion only; and tells us from an Author, whom he calls ingenuous, and who indeed seems to be as ingenuous as himself, that those who cut off the Earl of Strafford's Head, were the true Cause of the Insurrection of the Irish; the Stupidity and Insolence of which are equally inconceivable: For if they have any Meaning at all, it must be, that if the Earl of Strafford had been alive, he wou'd by his good Government, have kept the Irish Quiet: As false a Suggestion as one can meet with in any History but his own. For in Truth there was then a Committee of both Houses of the Irish Parliament sent over on purpose to represent the heavy Pressures the Kingdom of Ireland had for some Time suffer'd, under the Government of the Earl of Strafford; though the Archdeacon avers with a surprizing Confidence, that the taking off Strafford's Head did not a little contribute to the Tragedy. An Italian Papist, Gregorio Leti, speaking of this Massacre, says, as in the French Translation of Cromwell's Life, On n'a jamais bien su, Si le Comte de Strafford, avoit eu part ala Resolution des Irlandois, mais il y en eut toutes les apparences; "It is not very well known whether the Earl of Strafford was concern'd with the Irish in this Conspiracy, but it is very likely that he was." I have as little Faith in Leti, as I have in Echard, but the former, in my Opinion, is more credible than the latter; who relates the Causes the Irish pretended for their Rebellion, which Causes are all groundless; but he must say something to extenuate their Crime; he says, they were seldom treated as freeborn Subjects. Sir John Temple, a Privy-Counsellor in Ireland, assures us, The Lords Justices did gently unbend themselves into a happy and just Compliance with the reasonable Desires of the People. Echard again, They were provok'd by a Saying of one of the Leaders of the House of Commons, that they should be converted with the Sword. Sir John Temple, Their religious Rites and Ceremonies were freely enjoy'd without any manner of Disturbance. And to load the Presbyterians with the Guilt of so much Protestant innocent Blood, the Reverend Author insinuates, the Earl of Argyle, and the Scots Covenanters, were privy to the Conspiracy, which was general, and had been concerted with so much Secrecy, that it was not discover'd till the very Time that the Conspirators were going to put it in Execution. The Discovery was made by one Owen O-Conelly, a Servant to Sir John Clotworthy, a Native Irishman, yet a Protestant. Mac Mahon, a Grandson of that obstinate Rebel the Earl of Tyrone, was one of the chief Conspirators, and it was he who reveal'd the Conspiracy to Owen O-Conelly, over a Bottle of Wine, at a Tavern in Dublin, the Night before the Castle of Dublin was to have been seiz'd, the Lords Justices murder'd, and the Massacre to have commenc'd in the Capital City, where a great Number of the Conspirators were already arriv'd, to enter upon the intended Tragedy the next Day. Owen O-Conelly seem'd to approve of the hellish Design, and drank Mac Mahon to a Pitch, to find out the bottom of it, in doing which, he got fuddled himself; and when he came to give Information of it to Sir William Parsons, one of the Lords Justices, he did it with the Distraction that accompanies Drunkenness, which gave him the less Credit with the Lord Justice Parsons, who however dismiss'd him, with Orders to return to Mac Mahon, and get as much more out of him as he cou'd. The Lord Justice immediately took Care for the Safety of the Castle, where were Arms for eight or ten Thousand Men, which was the chief Booty the Conspirators aim'd at. He also order'd the Lord-Mayor of Dublin to double the City Watch, and to seize all Strangers, expecting the Return of Owen O-Conelly, who was seiz'd by the Watch, and was carrying to Prison, but rescu'd by one of the Lord Parsons's Servants, who accidentally came by. Parsons was gone to Sir John Borlace's House, the other Lord Justice, where they were attended by Sir Thomas Rotheram, and Sir Robert Meredith, two of the Privy-Council, who took Owen O-Conelly's Examination, containing in Substance, that the Lord Macgwire, Colonel Mac Mahon, and a great Number of Papists, were then in Dublin, resolving to take the Castle, possess themselves of the Magazine there, then to fire the City, and murder all the Protestants: That the Irish were to rise at the same Time in other Parts of the Kingdom, which nothing cou'd prevent: Mac Mahon suspecting that Owen O-Conelly wou'd make a Discovery, resolv'd to keep him till the Blow was struck, and he was forc'd to leap over a Wall to make his Escape. On so many Accidents depended the Fate of Ireland; for had Dublin Castle and City been taken, it wou'd have been impossible to have recover'd that Kingdom without an immense Expence of Blood and Treasure, more than the People of Great Britain could at that Time spare. Other Lords of the Council attending the Lords Justices, they sat up all Night in Consultation. They caus'd Mac Mahon to be seiz'd in his Lodgings, as was the Lord Macgwire soon after: Hugh Birne, Roger Moore, Colonel Plunket, Captain Fox, and other chief Conspirators, made their Escape; and the next Morning the Lords Justices publish'd a Proclamation concerning the Discovery of the Conspiracy, and requiring the People to betake themselves to their Defence. The same Night the Lord Blaney arriv'd with the News of the Surprizal of his House, his Wife and Children, by the Rebels of the County of Monaghan. Next Day Sir Arthur Tyringham sent Advice of the taking of the Newry, which was follow'd with a terrible Account of Burnings, Spoilings, Murders of Men, Women, and Children, in the Province of Ulster, where the Irish first rose. Persons were continually arriving with fresh Information of Slaughters, Rapes, Robberies, the Detail of which wou'd be too long and too shocking. I shall content my self with a few Particulars; cutting of Throats, and stabbing, were the mildest Treatment the Protestants met with; some had their Eyes pluck'd out, and were seve-

A.D. 1641. several Days dying in the most exquisite Torments; some were drown'd, some burnt, the Murderers forcing the poor harmless Creatures to fetch the Straw that was to burn them: some perish'd by Cold, others by Hunger, others by Thirst, and some were bury'd alive; Mothers were hang'd on the Gallows, and their Children about their Necks: There was no Regard to Women great with Child, nor to Children at the Breast: And by an Excess even of Popish Cruelty, at which Nature shrinks, one of these miserable Wretches being deliver'd while she was under the Hands of the Tormentor, the Rebels flung the Child to be eaten by a Dog and a Hog, which they brought thither to satiate their hellish Appetite of Blood, and feed their Eyes with the grateful Sight of seeing the Newborn Infant thus devour'd. Nay these infernal Monsters carry'd their Inhumanity yet further, and oblig'd Fathers and Mothers to murder their own Children, Children their Parents, Husbands their Wives, and Wives their Husbands: Matrons and Maidens were first deflower'd, and then butcher'd. When their devilish Lust and Cruelty were thus glutted, they left the naked Carcasses in the most obscene Postures with the dead Men they had slaughter'd, to make Sport, which the Devil himself must abhor: These were the fine Subjects, with whom a Cessation of Arms was made by Command of the King two or three Years after, and some of them sent to England, to act as far as they cou'd the like Tragedies there. In this Massacre, which reach'd from one end of Ireland to the other, two hundred Thousand Protestants perish'd. Echard, who speaks with singular Tenderness of these barbarous Butchers, reduces the Number to 50000; but those who diminish the Number most, make it amount to 154000.

Two Days after the Discovery, the Lords Justices dispatch'd Owen O-Conelly, the Discoverer, with a Letter to the Earl of Leicester, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, who in Person communicated it to the House of Commons, accompany'd with thirteen Lords of the Privy-Council. It is impossible to express the Grief, Terror and Indignation, with which both Lords and Commons receiv'd this dreadful News. The first and most natural Reflection was, that the continu'd Favour to Papists during all this Reign, had embolden'd them to take Arms in this dreadful Manner, to establish their idolatrous Religion by the Destruction of the Protestants.

When the Earl of Leicester had read the Lords Justices Letter, and Owen O-Conelly's Examination, his Lordship, and the Lords of the Council withdrew, and the House took the Information they had receiv'd into Debate: Instead of imputing this bloody Massacre to the Death of the Earl of Strafford, to the Scots Invasion, or the Earl of Argyle's Contrivances, as the ingenious Echard does with equal Judgment and Probity, let us see what the Parliament thought of it. "As soon as the Earl of Leicester withdrew, says Larrey, the Members began to explain themselves, and spake of the Irish Massacre as a Conspiracy of the Papists, not only of that Kingdom, but of England, excited by the Pope's Nuntio, supported by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Earl of Strafford, during the Life of the one, and the Liberty of the other, and by their Party since the Earl's Death, and the Archbishop's Imprisonment. They added, that all these Enemies of the Protestant Religion were supported and encourag'd by the Queen, who openly protected them, and indirectly by the King, who had too much Complaisance for the Queen on that Point, which was but too apparent in my Lord Strafford's Government of Ireland, during which Time it could not be doubted the Plot was concerted: The modest Mr. Echard assures us, if he had been alive, there had been no Plot at all. "Their Suspicions went farther, and they were apprehensive the Conspiracy was form'd against the three Kingdoms, and that from Ireland they design'd to have proceeded to Scotland and to England. It was to that End, said they, the Earl of Strafford's Levies were design'd, as also the Provisions and Ammunition that were found in the Castle of Dublin: So fairly does this Foreigner represent it, and so wildly does it stand in the History of the Rebellion, and the Arch-deacon's History.

What he says of the Queen's protecting the Irish Papists, is confirm'd by Bishop Burnet. The Earl of Essex told the Bishop, that he had discover'd when he was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that the Queen hearken'd to the Propositions made by the Irish, to take the Government of Ireland into their Hands, which they thought they cou'd easily perform, and then they said, they wou'd assist the King to subdue the hot Spirits at Westminster; with this the Plot of the Insurrection began, and all the Irish believ'd the Queen encourag'd it; but in the first Design there was no thought of a Massacre; that came in Head as they were laying the Methods of executing it: The Priests were the chief Men that set on the Irish to all the Blood and Cruelty.

As to the King's being indirectly concern'd in the Irish Rebellion, it is not only said by Larrey, but by Gregorio Leti, as thus translated out of the Italian, Il est certain que le Roy fut coupable indirectement dans cette occasion car si il n'eut pas donne aux Catholiques un pouvoir si ample de s'assembler a Kilken, comme ils firent, ce Massacre ne seroit pas arrive, &c. 'Tis certain the King was indirectly guilty on this Occasion; for if he had not given the Catholicks full Power to assemble at Kilkenny, as they did, the Massacre had never happen'd. He turns it thus, that the Papists in Ireland being alarm'd at the Zeal and Proceedings of the Parliament of England, sent eight Deputies to the King, for Liberty to meet and consult how to defend themselves, in case the English Parliament, whom they call'd audacious and insolent, shou'd give them Disturbance. The King not penetrating into their Design, authoriz'd them to meet at Kilkenny, where they consulted how to establish their Religion, and to throw off the English Yoke. In this Assembly, one Peeton, an Irish Lawyer, made a Speech, wherein he insinuated, That the Sicilians had no way to deliver themselves from the French Servitude, but by massacring them, as they did in the famous Sicilian Vespers; and if they wou'd deliver themselves from the English who were in Ireland, it must be the same Way: Upon which they enter'd into a Combination, and mutual Engagement by Oath, and as the Italian Papist says, were guilty of one of the most horrible Massacres that was ever heard of among Christians. Warwick assures us, the Parliament was not displeas'd when they heard of the Irish Rebellion: General Ludlow, The News of this Rebellion was not displeasing to the King, as I have heard from Persons of undoubted Credit, though it was attended with the Massacre of many thousand Protestants.

I don't think the King gave the Irish a formal Commission to fall upon his Protestant Subjects in Ireland; but as much as I have said of it, I do believe; and that the Queen's protecting, and his indulging them, gave them that Spirit, of which they made this damnable Use. Certain it is, the Irish gave out they had his Commission. Having before me Manuscript Memoirs of the Life of the Lord Brogil, written from his Lordship's own Information by his Chaplain, Mr. Thomas Morris, Vicar of Harpford in Devon, I shall transcribe what relates to this Rebellion.

"His Lordship arriv'd in Ireland the very Day the Rebellion broke out; but it was not known then in Munster that the Irish were in Arms. He "landed

A.D. 1641 " landed safely with his Lady, and came to Lymore, his Father the Earl of Corke's chief Seat. " Two or three Days after, the Earl of Corke and the Lord Broghil, went to dine with the Earl of Barrymore at Castle-Lyons, where when they came, they met with the Lord Muskerry, and other Irish Papists, with whom they were very free and familiar; but it happen'd that while they were at Dinner, a Gentleman brought Letters to the Earl of Corke, and a Message, the Horror of which appear'd in his Looks, containing part of the Story of the Irish Massacre, as is before related; adding, that the Irish were Masters of almost all Leinster, inasmuch that he was forc'd to take the most private ways to come to him, which had made him so long on his Journey. In the Packet of Letters was the Lords Justices Proclamation, which having read, the Earl of Corke call'd the Lord Muskerry to him, and told him what he had heard and read; Muskerry laugh'd at it, and said, 'twas only some few Malecontents in the North who were risen, and he cou'd not believe the Irish wou'd generally rise. The Lord Corke seeing the other make so light of it, acquainted all the Company with the Information he had receiv'd, and call'd the Gentleman who brought the News to confirm it: This Gentleman addressing himself to the Lord Muskerry, said, You are suspected to know it well enough; Muskerry positively deny'd it, and laugh'd again: But the English Gentlemen made haste home to stand on their Defence. The Earl of Corke sent immediately to Sir William St. Leger, President of Munster, to give him the same Information he had receiv'd. Muskerry told every one he met that there was nothing in it, and a few Days after appear'd himself in Arms at the Head of four or 5000 Irish Papists, who committed the like Acts of Cruelty and Rapine. The Earl of Corke summon'd in all his Tenants, who with some Volunteers form'd several Companies of Foot, and a Body of Horse, commanded by the Lord Broghil, his Son, who join'd the Lord President St. Leger, and march'd against the Rebel Muskerry, who had then about 3000 Men with him marching towards Limerick. St. Leger's Troops were not above 1500, and those in no very good Plight. Muskerry halted to let him come up, and both Parties drew up in Battalia. While the Lord President St. Leger was preparing for a Battle, a Trumpet arriv'd from Muskerry, with one Walsh an Irish Lawyer. The Lord President, who had then with him the Lord Kinelmealy, and the Lord Broghil, sent two or three of his Attendants to demand what Errand they came upon; Walsh said, about Business of the greatest Consequence, and he desir'd to speak with the President; which being permitted, Walsh and the Trumpet advanced, and coming near enough to be heard by Sir William St. Leger, and the Officers who stood at the Head of their Men, drawn up in Battalia; Walsh told the Lord President he must speak with him alone, some few Paces off from his Men; Sir William St. Leger, and the Gentlemen who were with him, seeing and knowing Walsh, upbraided him with his Disloyalty and Rebellion; and expressing great Wonder that a Person of his Parts and Education should be guilty of so much Wickedness and Madness, as to join with the Rebels; Walsh reply'd, We are no Rebels, as I will soon convince you, if I may speak with the Lord President in private. Sir William St. Leger, a very brave Gentleman, was presently for speaking with him privately; but the Lords who were with him demurr'd upon it, not thinking it safe that their General should be trusted alone with an Enemy; therefore they told Walsh, they would not suffer any such Conference with him, but if he wou'd

" speak to the Lord President, it should be in their A.D. 1641. " Presence; upon which Walsh threaten'd to be gone, without delivering his Message, which Sir William St. Leger wou'd by no Means suffer; and it was at last agreed, that Walsh should have Liberty to talk privately with the Lord President, provided a Party was plac'd on either Side of them, while they were at their private Parley, to revenge any Violence Walsh should offer to the Lord President: Walsh riding up towards him, was met by St. Leger, the Guards not being within Hearing: Then said Walsh in few Words, You must take Care what you do in fighting against us, for the Lord Muskerry has a Commission from the King for what he does; and by virtue of that Commission he has rais'd Men, to assist his Majesty in all Extremities; and if I may have a free and safe Conduct, I will bring the Commission to you under the Great Seal, and shew it you at your own House to morrow Morning. The Lord President was mightily surpris'd at this Message, and having assur'd Walsh he should have safe Conduct, if he came the next Day with the Commission, Walsh departed; and Sir William St. Leger returning to his Company, told the chief of them what Walsh had told him, at which they were all astonish'd, and the Lord Broghil question'd the Truth of the Irish Lawyer's Message, saying, The King wou'd never grant out Commissions to those whom in his Proclamation he calls Rebels. He therefore desir'd the Lord President diligently to peruse the Commission, if Walsh brought any, which he doubted; and that it was only a Trick of the Lord Muskerry's, to amuse them while he pass'd by: However, 'twas agreed to wait the Lawyer's Return, Sir William St. Leger's House being within a few Miles of the Place; so he encamp'd his Men, and Muskerry drew off his. The next Morning Walsh and the Trumpet came again to the Lord President's Quarters; they were immediately receiv'd, and conducted to his Lordship's House, where the Lawyer, as before, desir'd to be in private with him, and the Lords, as before, would not let him; but contented that he should be admitted into a Room with the President, one Man standing at the Door with a drawn Sword, and a Pistol charg'd; which being done, Walsh produc'd a large Parchment, wherein there was a very formal Commission drawn up for the Lord Muskerry to raise 4000 Men, and the Broad Seal was affix'd to it: St. Leger having read it over, dismiss'd Walsh, and return'd to the Lords, telling them Muskerry has really a Commission for what he does; I will disband my Men, and stir no more in this Business, for I will die before I will be a Rebel: Upon which the Lords and Gentlemen who were with him, withdrew to their several Homes; and St. Leger took it so much to Heart, that he never held up his Head afterwards, but dy'd in a short Time, and the Earl of Inchiquine was made Lord President of Munster in his Room." The Devonshire Parson who wrote this Account, was one whom a Reverend Divine recommended to me thus; I can depend upon his Veracity, having been well acquainted with him, and his good Character was indeed universal: I shall often make use of this Manuscript, and it was therefore necessary to acquaint the Reader with its Authority. The Author informs us that the Lord Broghil believ'd the Commission to be a Cheat, and found it out at last, but does not tell us how, and flurs it over in such a Manner, as makes but a weak Impression on our Mind after his History, so circumstantiated, had made so strong a one.

The House of Commons in England, who had met the 20th of October, pursuant to their Adjournment, receiv'd the terrifying News of this Massacre a Week after it was begun to be perpetrated in

Ireland, and voted 50000 Pounds to be forthwith provided for the Service of that Kingdom. That Owen O-Conelly have 500 Pounds paid down, and 200 Pounds a Year Pension, till Provision be made for an Inheritance of greater Value; and that the Lords be desir'd to appoint a select Committee of the Commons, and take Cognizance of the Affairs of Ireland. Three or four Days after, they RESOLV'D, that 200000 Pounds be forthwith supply'd for the Occasions of Ireland; that a convenient Number of Ships be provided for guarding the Sea Coasts of that Kingdom; that 6000 Foot, and 2000 Horse, be rais'd for the present Expedition into Ireland; that the Magazines of Provisions and Stores of War in that Kingdom be supply'd, and all other Methods taken for the speedy Relief of the distress'd Protestants in that Kingdom. The Lords Justices, Sir William Parsons, and Sir John Borlace, were so sensible of the great Care and Sollicitude of the Parliament to assist them, that they return'd them Thanks by their Letter of the 27th of November; yet Echard charges them with Supineness and Negligence in the Irish Affairs; their whole Business being Designs against his Majesty's Prerogative; whereas in Truth, his Majesty's stretching that Prerogative so much as he did, immediately after his Return from Scotland, oblig'd the Parliament to consider their own Safety in England, as well as that of their Brethren in Ireland. For no sooner was the King come from Scotland, than he dismiss'd the Guard of Train'd-Bands, which had done Duty near the Parliament-House, and order'd others in their Places, which the House of Commons discharg'd, and their Petition for a Guard in which they could confide, was absolutely deny'd. It was contriv'd that his Majesty, when he return'd to London, should be receiv'd with uncommon Magnificence, to shew how much he had the Affection of the City, and mortify the Parliament, who pretended to be possess'd of them: This was manag'd by the Queen, who gain'd the Lord-Mayor in the King's Absence. On the 25th of November, the King and Queen set out from Theobalds with the Prince, Duke of York, Prince of Orange, Elector Palatine, Duke of Richmond, Duke of Hamilton, Master of the Horse, Earl of Essex, Lord Chamberlain, and other Lords; at Stamford-Hill he was met by the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, George Garret, and George Clarke, with 72 Men in Scarlet Cloaks. There was a Passage made from Kingsland to Moorfields, for this Royal Cavalcade: In the first Field, Mr. Richard Gourney, Lord-Mayor, had pitch'd a sumptuous Tent, at the Entrance of which his Majesty's Coach stopp'd, and the Nobility and Gentry who waited there to congratulate his Return, had the Honour to kiss his and the Queen's Hand; there the Recorder, Mr. Thomas Gardiner, made a Speech, blessing himself and the Nation, in the hopeful Succession of King Charles the Second, and King James the Second: He assur'd their Majesties, that no King nor Queen was ever so well belov'd by the Londoners as they were; he then made a Present to them of their Hearts as a New-Year's-Gift, a Month before Christmas; and pray'd his Majesty to uphold the Authority of the Mayor, and the Reverence due to the Aldermen. The King made a long Speech in Answer to Mr. Recorder's, wherein he expresses his Comfort that all the Misreports of him in his Absence, had not the least Power to do him any Prejudice in their Affections; and assures them he will protect the true Protestant Religion, as it was establish'd by his Famous Predecessor, his Father; after which his Majesty was pleas'd to Knight the Lord-Mayor and the Recorder with the City-Sword; and then the Court proceeded in a very solemn manner through the City to White-Hall; there was great Affection of Love and Loyalty, of Favour and Affection on both Sides. The King was very well pleas'd with the Conduct of the Lord-Mayor and Citizens, and they were transported with the King's gracious Speech; but we shall in a few Days find that it was all Outside, and the Joy no better founded than on the Show and Glitter of the Court: 'Twas observ'd that the King was continually pulling off his Hat, which was a rare Thing with both his Father and himself.

The only popular Thing which was attempted at that Time, was the promoting some Divines who were frequent Preachers, to Episcopal Sees, though they were not likely to be a Penny the richer for their Bishopricks; as Dr. Thomas Winniffe to be Bishop of Lincoln, vacant by the Promotion of Dr. Williams to the Archbishoprick of York, Dr. Henry King to the See of Chichester, Dr. Ralph Brownrigg to that of Exeter, Dr. Thomas Westfield to that of Bristol, and the Bishoprick of Carlisle was given in Commendam to Archbishop Usher. As grateful as these Divines were to the People, their Promotion at this Time was very ungrateful, not on Account of their Persons, but their Function; and it was done with a Design to put a stop to the Bill for taking away Bishops Votes in Parliament; which no body could think his Majesty would consent to, when he had so lately added so many to their Number; but then he had almost as lately entirely abolish'd the very Order in the Kingdom in which he was born.

His Majesty in his first Speech to the Parliament, after his Return from Scotland, tells them he ment. had left that Kingdom quiet and contented, but finds this distracted with Jealousies and Alarms: He took Notice of the joyful Reception he had met with from the City of London, and recommends to them the State of Ireland: He told them also he did not repent of the kind Things he had done for them, and would be ready to do more upon Occasion; which Speech was the more extraordinary, for that the Parliament had the Night before, December the first, presented him with the grand Remonstrance drawn up by them since their Meeting after the Recess. They sent the Remonstrance by a Committee, who were Sir Ralph Hopton, who had not even yet deserted the Country Party, Mr. Pym, Sir Simon d'Ewes, Sir Arthur Haselrigg, Sir Arthur Ingram, Sir James Thynne, Sir Henry Bellasis, Lord Grey, Sir Christopher Wray, Lord Fairfax, Sir Richard Wynn. Sir John Corbet, Sir Edward Deering. The Report of the Delivery of it was made by Sir Ralph Hopton, who told the House, the first Thing his Majesty spoke to, was that Part where they charge him with having a malignant Party about him, who design'd to change Religion; upon which the King said, The Devil take him, whoever he be, that designs to change Religion: And as to appropriating the Rebels Lands in Ireland towards the Expence of the War, he was pleas'd to say, we must not dispose of the Bears Skin till the Bear be dead. The Remonstrance was rough enough in the wording of it, but it was not the less true. It contain'd all the Mistakes, Misfortunes, Illegalities and Defaults in Government, since the King's coming to the Crown, the Evil Counsels and Counsellors, &c. It did not pass by a great Majority, and Mr. Palmer and Mr. Hyde two Lawyers protested against it after a most disorderly and unprecedented Manner, for which Palmer was sent to the Tower, and Hyde escap'd very narrowly. This Remonstrance was the first Stroke of the Paper War, which gradually drew on the Civil. The other Remonstrances and Petitions of Parliament are express'd as forcibly, and the King's Answers to all of them are as evasive as his Answer to this, which upbraided the House with printing their Remonstrance contrary to his Desire. He justify'd the Votes of Bishops, as grounded on the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom; so were once the Lord Abbots and Lord Priors. The fundamental Laws are always urg'd on this Occasion, as if they had never been

He desir'd the Parliament to name the Evil Counsellors; and might they not have named the Lord Digby, and a much greater one who lay in his Royal Bosom? His Answer was follow'd by a Declaration, wherein among other Things it was said, He had preferr'd no Persons this Session but what were in particular Estimation with the People. The Lord Digby, the Lord Falkland, and Sir John Colepepyr, are meant here. The Lord Falkland was made Secretary of State, Digby and Colepepyr reconcil'd and preferr'd. Sir Ralph Hopton, who deliver'd the Remonstrance, made his Bargain soon after them. These Gentlemen were justly in the Estimation of the People while they were in their Interests, from which when they apostatiz'd, the People no longer held them in Esteem. It will not be expected that we would shew how fallacious many of these Papers are on both Sides, neither shall we insert them entire. The Lord Clarendon does not lose a Word of the King's Declarations, Messages, or Answers, tho' they are long to Excess. He doubtless was enamour'd with them for the Sake of the Drawer, who probably was himself, there being such a Redundancy of Words, as Warwick observes of his Writings, and no where is he more redundant than in his History and Characters. The Parliaments Petitions and Remonstrances are written with more Spirit and more Regard to Truth, than his tedious Declarations.

P. 196.

'Tis surprizing that Foreigners and Papiſts shou'd think more justly of these Things than the English Protestants and even Lawyers. "Persons of Condition, says Salmonnet, thought that the King shou'd have made Advantage of this Remonstrance; and having not been hitherto fully inform'd of the Conduct of his Ministers in abusing his Authority and Confidence, he might have manag'd better for the future, and prevented the Peoples laying the Faults of the Ministers at the Door of the Prince."

An Act for pressing.

There being an absolute Necessity to raise an Army for the Relief of Ireland, a Bill was brought into the House for pressing Soldiers; in the Preamble of which it was declar'd, That the King cou'd in no Case but upon an Invasion from a foreign Power, press a free-born Subject; which as agreeable as it is to common Justice and common Sense, was a Doctrine unknown to the Lords, according to Echard, who inclin'd to hear the Attorney-General argue the Case before them; but the Commons resolv'd their Committee for Ireland should not sit till the Bill for raising Men was pass'd; and the King coming to the House, offer'd to pass it with a Salvo Jure to his Prerogative; a Word which is ever in the Mouth of an ill King, and has hardly been once mention'd from the Throne since the Revolution: For their Majesties King William, Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King George, have made so good use of their Royal Prerogative, that the People have frequently rather thought it too little than too much: But in this and the former Reign it was never mention'd but to be abus'd. Both Lords and Commons join'd in a Petition to the King, to declare the Name of such Person by whose Information he was induc'd to that Violation of their Privileges, by taking Notice of the Contents of a Bill before it came to him in due Course.

Sir Will. Balfour and Lunsford.

In the mean time Sir William Balfour Lieutenant of the Tower, was remember'd for refusing to take a Bribe and let the Earl of Strafford escape. The House of Commons having Notice that there was a Design to remove him, order'd his Attendance, and examin'd him about it, who explaining the Cause of his Removal, they debated a Petition to the King for his Continuance; but before they came to a Resolution, Sir William Balfour resign'd the Keys of the Tower to his Majesty, and Colonel Lunsford a Ruffian was put in his Place. We shall see how he was qualify'd for such a Post by the Character which the Parliament gave him, A Man of a decay'd and desperate Fortune, and so may be tempted to undertake any ill Design. He had been condemn'd in the Star-Chamber for an Attempt to murder Sir Thomas Pelham in his Coach as he was coming from Church. Echard takes no Notice of this Man's Infamy, but imputes the Care of the Commons for the Safety of the Tower to a seditious Clamour. The Lords wou'd not join with the Commons in a Petition to the King to turn out Lunsford, tho' the Citizens were afraid to bring their Bullion to the Mint, while so profligate a Person had the Command of it. Several great Lords, as the Earl of Northumberland, Earl of Bedford, Earl of Warwick, Earl of Essex, Earl of Suffolk, Earl of Carlisle, Earl of Holland, Earl of Clare, Earl of Stamford, Earl of Newport, Earl of Bolingbroke, Earl of Pembroke, and about a Dozen more Lords, were for agreeing with the Commons: But the Courtiers were as tender of the Prerogative as if no ill Use had been made of it. However the Commons order'd Sir Thomas Barrington and Mr. Martin to repair to the Earl of Newport Constable of the Tower, and desire him to reside there and take the Custody and Guard of that Place, while Lunsford was continu'd Lieutenant to the extream Terror of the City. The Court was always complaining of the Fears and Jealousies of the People, and yet always doing Things to make them more jealous and fearful. The Citizens were in continual Alarms till that Assassin Lunsford was remov'd from the Government of the Tower; even the very loyal Lord-Mayor Gourney represented to the King the great Danger of an Insurrection, if Lunsford was not turn'd out immediately; which was done, and the Keys given to Sir John Byron. The Office of Constable was taken from the Earl of Newport as soon as it was known that the Parliament had so great Confidence in him. We often read in Clarendon and Echard, that there were false Rumours rais'd by the Artifices of Mr Pym, Mr. Hampden, and the greatest Names in Parliament; but we now meet with one so extravagant, that it cou'd never gain the least Belief with reasonable Men, which is the Report of a Plot to seize the Queen and her Children while the King was in Scotland. His Majesty was inform'd of it, and hearken'd to the Information, that the Earl of Essex, the Earl of Newport, the Lord Say, the Lord Mandeville, the Lord Wharton, the Lord Dungarvon, Mr. Nathaniel Fiennes, Sir John Clotworthy, and Mr. John Pym, had a Consultation for that Purpose at Kensington. The Earl of Newport hearing of this vile Rumour, waited upon the Queen with some other Lords, and with many Asseverations, assur'd her of the Falsity of it. Her Majesty seem'd satisfy'd; but when the King return'd, the false Report was reviv'd, and his Majesty demanded of the Earl of Newport whether he himself had not said at the pretended Consultation, If there's a Plot in Scotland, here are his Wife and Children. His Lordship deny'd there were any such Words said, the King reply'd, I am sorry for your Memory. The Earl gave Information of it to the House of Peers, who finding some Commoners concern'd in it, desir'd a Conference concerning these scandalous Rumours, that those who spread them might be punish'd. Both Houses agreed upon a Petition to the King to that Effect; and his Majesty answer'd, I do not believe the Report; I have ask'd Newport some Questions about the Business, but far from that Way of expressing a Belief of the Thing which Newport hath had the Boldness and Confidence to affirm, which I cou'd easily make appear, but I think it beneath me to contest with any particular Person. His Majesty refus'd to tell who it was that inform'd him of the pretended Plot.

A Plot by the Parliament.

The

A.D. 1641. The Removal of Lunsford not being known, the Citizens who had petition'd against him, Common-Council Men, and Men of like Repute, attended at Westminster, whither came also several Apprentices with a Petition against Papists and Papish Innovators, such as Archbishops, Bishops, and their Dependants; the Extirpation of which Government Root and Branch, had been humbly desir'd by several Petitions from this City, and was now more vigorously insisted upon than ever. It was very natural for these Citizens to cry out, No Bishops, it being what they came about. One Hyde an Officer in the Army under the Earl of Strafford, fell foul on these Citizens, saying, he would cut the Throat of those round-headed cropp'd-ear'd Dogs; whence the Term Roundhead was given to the Friends to the Parliament. Hyde stoutly drew his Sword upon the unarm'd People, and desir'd some Gentlemen to second him, which they refusing, he was apprehended, brought before the House of Commons and sent to Prison; he was afterwards cashier'd. The same Day, December 27. Lunsford coming thro' Westminster-Hall with thirty or forty such Gentry as himself, met with the Londoners who brought the last mention'd Petition: Lunsford presently drew his Sword, which began a Fray, and some were hurt. This was enough to give a just Alarm to the whole City, who had an Abhorrence for that Bravo, and many hundreds of the younger fort came to assist their Fellows at Westminster, which caus'd a great Uproar; and tho' Lunsford and his Crew shuffled away as fast as they cou'd, yet the Storm being rais'd, 'twas some time before the troubled Waters cou'd subside. Echard misrepresents this Matter in every Particular; he tells us that Lunsford's Followers were the King's Household Officers, and the Citizens a contemptible Rabble, tho' only two of the Londoners who petition'd against that Bully, Mr. Randal Marwaring, and Mr. Maximilian Beard, cou'd have bought Lunsford and all his Household Officers, if they had all been no richer than himself. An Historian of those Times sets it in a truer Light; The best affected Citizens,

Tumult.

Chron. 56. Men of the best Note and Quality of the whole City both for Piety and Ability, went with this Petition to the Parliament House in most grave and substantial Equipage in fifty or sixty Coaches, and were most graciously receiv'd by the Lords and Commons. No doubt there were Infantry as well as Cavalry, some afoot as well as in Coaches, as is unavoidable on these Occasions. Echard, Some brisk Gentlemen of the Inns of Court did also offer their Service to guard his Majesty, who in Truth was very well guarded by the Militia of Westminster and Middlesex. General Ludlow, who was a Witness of this Tumult, writes thus, "The King finding that nothing less would satisfy the Parliament than a thorough Correction of what was amiss, and full Security of their Rights for the future from any Violation, consider'd how to put a Stop to their Proceedings, and to that End encourag'd a great Number of loose debauch'd Fellows about the Town to repair to Whitehall, where a constant Table was provided for them, These are Echard's Household Officers. Many Gentlemen of the Inns of Court were tamper'd with to assist him. These are the Inns of Court Gentlemen who, he says, offer'd their Service. Things were brought to such a pass, that one of those Courtiers said publicly in my Hearing, What shall we suffer those Fellows at Westminster to domineer thus? Let us go into the Country and bring up our Tenants to pull them out; which Words not being able to bear, I question'd him for them, and he either out of Fear of Publick Justice, or of my Resentment, came to me the next Morning, and ask'd Pardon, which by Reason of his Youth, and want of Experience, I pass'd by." The reverend Historian affirms that General Ludlow made this Story. This is all Invention. He'll say he nam'd not the General, but he names the Thing. Some of the Londoners being got into the Abby, Dr. Williams Archbishop of York that the Doors upon them, and detain'd them; which others of them hearing, they flock'd thither, and endeavour'd to break down the Doors; but the Archbishop's Men flung Stones upon them from the Leads, his Grace not at all approving of the Petition against Archbishopricks. Several Citizens were hurt, and, says Rushworth, among the rest Sir Richard Wiseman one of the Archdeacon's Foot-Rabble, who dy'd soon after of the Hurt he receiv'd.

The next Day the House of Commons fell into Debate concerning the Affairs of Ireland, and the Obstructions which the Relief of it met with. One was the Want of a Proclamation under the Great-Seal, declaring the Irish Papists in Arms and their Adherents to be REBELS and TRAYTORS; which was very inconsistent with the Declaration publish'd in Ireland by Sir Phelim Oneal Head of those Traytors and Rebels, wherein it is said, Be it known to all our Friends and Countrymen, that the King's most excellent Majesty, for many great and urgent Causes him thereunto moving, and reposing Trust and Confidence in our Fidelity, hath signified to us by his Commission under the Great-Seal of Scotland bearing Date the First of this Instant October; then follows the Commission itself, to arrest and seize the Goods, Estates, and Persons of all the English Protestants. The Lords and Commons in their Address to the King at Theobalds two Months after, said, "That the Design of destroying the Protestant Religion, was laid by those who were most in the King's Favour; that the Queen and the Pope's Agents who resided about her, were the principal Chiefs; that the Troubles of Scotland proceeded from the same Source, and the Irish Massacrers boasted they had the King's Ap probation, and that they had only taken up Arms to restore his Authority which was depress'd by the Puritans, according to an intercepted Letter from one of the Chiefs to his Brother in England; to which they added an Order sign'd C. R. that is, Charles Rex, to Captain Legg, to receive on board his Ship such of the Conspirators as shou'd demand it, and to transport them wherever they desir'd. Mr. Jephson a Member of Parliament affirm'd it at a Conference between the two Houses, that Dillon, whilst he resided at Court, wrote to two of the Leaders of the Rebels, Muskerry and Taaf, of the King's Approbation; that Reasons of State oblig'd him to dissemble at present, but that he would support them in a proper Season." If the Traytor Oneal's Commission is forg'd, and if Ludlow goes too far in saying the King was not displeas'd with the Massacre, most certain it is, the Parliament of England were so jealous of his Majesty's Disposition, that they would not trust him with the Management of the War; and it is as certain their Jealousy was not unreasonable, as appear'd by the Peace he made with those Irish Rebels not long after, contrary to his positive Engagement with them; and sent for a great Body of those Cut-throats to act against them and their Friends.

One of the Reasons for a Proclamation to declare the Irish REBELS, was because they had given out as if they had some Authority for what they did. Sir John Colepeper and others were appointed to draw up a Declaration concerning the Obstructions of the Relief of Ireland; and on the First of January a Proclamation was publish'd, declaring the Irish Papists who were in Arms, and their Adherents, REBELS and TRAYTORS; but the Secretary of State Sir Edward Nicholas, in his Warrant to the Printer said, It is his Majesty's Pleasure that forty Copies only shou'd be printed, and those not to be publish'd till his Majesty's further Pleasure was signify'd; upon which Mr. May observes, All Men extremely wonder'd, comparing it with

Bishops ill advis'd. About the beginning of the Year, the Bishops took a Step which one wou'd think they were put upon by the Courtiers to facilitate their Ruin, which cou'd not have been so suddenly effected without it; and there wou'd be the better Pretence to drop them when they had brought the Destruction upon themselves. They drew up a Protestation, and deliver'd it to the King, wherein they declar'd against all Laws, Orders, and Votes which have pass'd or shall pass, since they absented themselves from the House of Lords. If this Indiscretion had been the Effect of their great Application to the Divine Duties of their Function, which estrang'd them to the Wisdom of this World, it wou'd rather have been laudable than blameable. But it cou'd not be thought that Wright Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, Goodman of Gloucester, Pierce of Bath and Wells, Owen of St. Asaph, Skinner of Oxon, Towers of Peterborough, Owen of Landaff, Wren of Ely, and Cooke of Hereford, cou'd have become Strangers to human Policy, by devoting themselves entirely to the Cure of Souls and the Study of Divinity. The three other Bishops, Dr. Williams Archbishop of York, Dr. Moreton Bishop of Durham, and Dr. Hall Bishop of Norwich, were not in ill Terms with the Parliament on their own Account, but for the Company they kept. The former was skilful enough in Politicks, but as it often happens, he lost himself in this Protestation. Bishop Morton and Bishop Hall were primitive apostolical Fathers of the Church, and deserv'd to have been distinguish'd on this Occasion, tho' they were drawn in by the others to protest with them. His Majesty immediately sent the Protestation to the Lord-Keeper to have it register'd. What need was there of taking that Burden upon himself? It was no sooner read in the House of Peers, than their Lordships sent a Message to the House of Commons by Sir John Banks and Judge Reeves, to desire a present Conference; at which the Lord-Keeper Littleton deliver'd the Protestation, and spoke as follows, The Petition and Protestation of the twelve Bishops contain Matters of high and dangerous Consequence, and such as my Lords are very sensible of, and such as require a speedy and sudden Resolution, it extending to the deep entrenching upon the fundamental Privileges and Beings of Parliaments; therefore the Lords have thought fit, that this Matter concerning the whole Nation may be communicated to the House of Commons, it being a Thing of so great and so general a Concernment. After this Communication, the House RESOLV'D to accuse these twelve Bishops of High-Treason for endeavouring to subvert the fundamental Laws and Beings of Parliament; which was done at the Bar of the House of Lords by Mr. Glyn, who was order'd also to thank the Lords for communicating the Bishops Protestation to them with so much Affection and Speed, and for expressing their Sense thereof, so great was the Harmony in this august Senate on this Occasion, which Mr. Archdeacon represents as the Effect of Artifice and Seditious. Immediately Warrants were issu'd out by the House of Peers for their Seizure and Commitment, directed to the Usher of the Black-Rod, who soon apprehended them all, and brought them to the Bar of that most honourable House, by whom they were all sent to the Tower, except the pious and reverend Dr. Moreton Bishop of Durham, in Regard, says Rushworth, of his worthy Parts, and Dr. Wright Bishop of Coventry and Litchfield, in regard of his Age and Indisposition, who remain'd with the Black-Rod. The People rang the Bells, and made Bonfires, as if at last they had obtain'd their long-wish'd for Triumph over Episcopacy. Mr. Archdeacon pretends, that this very much lessen'd the Respect and Veneration that had formerly been entertain'd for Parliaments. But the Disciples of Land had before so far lost all Veneration and Respect for Parliaments, that there was nothing left to be lessen'd. As for the rest of the Nation, it no where appears that this Proceeding had the least Effect on the People's Good-will to the Parliament. To this is added another Falsity, the absent Members of both Houses were three Parts in four; whereas the Numbers of the sitting Members much exceeded that Proportion before the Recess. These Falsities are still aggravated by a third, The King's Servants were of the best Fortunes and Reputations in their several Counties; that is, Mr. Hyde had a better Estate than Mr. Hollis, Mr. Warwick a better Estate than Mr. Hampden, and the Lord Cottingham than the Earl of Bedford. This Comparison wou'd run thro' both Houses, and agrees exactly with Echard's three Parts in four absent. For three or four Months after this, when many of the Members of the House of Commons had deserted the Service of their Country, there were in that House three hundred Members, fifty more were employ'd by the Parliament in the Country, fifty had express'd Leave to be absent, and fifty-one had been expell'd for absenting themselves without Leave. And six Years after this, when the Members were seclud'd by the Army, you will find in Pag. 353 of this very History, that the House consisted of above four hundred Members; tho' the Earl of Clarendon, or whoever wrote the History of the Rebellion, taught Echard so falsely to misrepresent their Number.

The King sent a Message to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, which the Secretary of State Sir Edward Nicholas notify'd to the Recorder, and that it wou'd be brought by the Lord Newburgh Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, who deliver'd them a Paper concerning the Tumults, in which his Majesty told them it was out of Idleness that the Citizens came flocking to Westminster. Indeed most of the Petitions at that Time complain'd of the great Decay of Trade occasion'd by the Favour shewn to Papists, and the Tyranny of the Prelates, as is express'd in very strong Terms in the Petition of the Apprentices. I cannot find that the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council, took any more Notice of the Lord Newburgh's Message to prevent tumultuary Assemblies, and not believe the Reports of ill-affected Persons, than to agree among themselves to spread it abroad and make the Message known, and that the Lord-Mayor shou'd issue out his Precepts for Watch and Ward.

The House of Commons order'd Mr. Hollis to carry a verbal Message to the King, that a Guard might be assign'd them under the Command of the Earl of Essex Lord-Chamberlain. They complain'd that there had been several Attempts to bring Parliament Destruction upon their whole Body at once, and sent ad-Threats and Menaces against particular Persons; that there was a malignant Party bitterly envenom'd against them, daily gathering Strength and Confidence, and now come to such a Height, as to have given Boldness to some to imbrue their Hands in the Blood of his Majesty's Subjects in the Face and at the Doors of the Parliament. The Threats against particular Persons, refers to a Plague-Plaister sent Mr. Pym to infect and murder him. The reverend Author makes a Jest of it, tho' the murderous Design has certainly nothing ludicrous in it in the Conception of Persons of Sobriety and Virtue. The Plaister is too filthy to be much spoken of; the Letter which contain'd it was sent to Mr. Pym in the Parliament House with these Cavalier Expressions, Mr. Pym, Do not think that a Guard of Men can protect you, if you persist in your traiterous Courses and Designs. I have sent a Paper Message to you, and if this do

In the mean Time you may be forborn, because no better Man may be endanger'd for you. REPENT TRAYTOR. These Menaces and the Rage of Lunsford and the House Officers, produc'd this Address: In answer to which the King blam'd them for their groundless Jealousies, Distrusts, and Fears, and protested if he had Knowledge of any such Design, he would pursue the Authors to condign Punishment. He told them he would appoint them such a Guard as he would be responsible for to God Almighty. The Commons in the mean time order'd Halberts to be provided and brought into their House for their better Security, and they remain'd there a considerable Time afterwards; by which we may see they had good Information of what was contriving against them; and the Court might have seen that their Contrivances would end in their Confusion.*

It shou'd have been mention'd, that during the Parliament's Adjournment in the Christmas Holydays, a grand Committee was order'd to meet at Guildhall, and a less Committee at Westminster, till the two Houses met on the 3d of January; when the Lord-Keeper acquainted the Lords that his Majesty had given Order to Sir Edward Herbert Attorney-General, to acquaint their Lordships with some Particulars from him; which Particulars were a Charge of High-Treason against the Lord Kimbolton, Denzil Hollis Esq; John Hampden Esq; Sir Arthur Haselrigge, John Pym Esq; William Strode Esq; The Lord Kimbolton after the Charge was read, stood up and offer'd to obey whatever the House shou'd order. The Lords sent a Message to the House of Commons, that some of their Members were accus'd of High-Treason; and at the same time Information was brought that several Persons were sealing up the Trunks, Doors, and Papers belonging to the accus'd Members; upon which the House order'd that their Serjeant shou'd have Power to break open the Doors and Seals upon the Trunks, &c. 'Twas also resolv'd upon the Question, that if any Person came to seize their Persons, those Members shou'd stand upon their Guard. While they were debating these Things, Serjeant Francis came from his Majesty to arrest the Five Members, but the House would not let them go, and order'd Sir John Colepeper, the Lord Falkland, Sir John Hotham, and Sir Philip Stapleton, to attend his Majesty, and acquaint him that the Matter concern'd the Privilege of Parliament, and therein the Privilege of all the Commons of England; that they would take it into Consideration, and return an Answer in all Humility and Duty, with as much Speed as the Greatness of the Business would permit; and in the mean Time the said Members shall be ready to answer any legal Charge made against them; accordingly the Speaker, by Command of the House, enjoin'd the five Members to constant Attendance. Here was a Crisis! Had there been so much Wisdom and Temper in the King's Counsels, as to have been satisfy'd with this prudent Message of the Parliament, there had been no Civil War; for from his Conduct at this Time, 'twas easy to observe that there was no Probability of preventing it. The Lords made a like Order about the Doors and Trunks, and resolv'd to join with the Commons in a Petition for a Guard. The latter commanded their Speaker to issue out Warrants for apprehending Sir William Fleming and Sir William Killebrew, who had presum'd to seal up those Trunks and Doors. They also order'd a Conference to be desir'd with the Lords, to acquaint them that there is a scandalous Paper publish'd, containing Articles of High-Treason against the Lord Kimbolton, &c. And forasmuch as it is against the Members of both Houses, they desire the Lords that Right may be done against the Publishers of the said scandalous Paper. A.D. 1642. and an Enquiry made who were the Authors and Publishers thereof, that they may be punish'd, and the Commonwealth be secur'd against such dangerous Persons. Thus it is plain that the Parliament resolv'd to defend the accus'd Members against a Charge, which, says a learned Lawyer, was smil'd at as chimerical, and as having in Truth no Foundation, which he fully proves. And it is amazing, that when the Court saw the vigorous Opposition that was made to those treasonable Chimeras, they shou'd add Violence to Violence, and pursue their desperate Measures to an open Rupture between the King and his Subjects; For the next Day, January the 4th, the House of Commons was inform'd by one Captain Langrisb lately an Officer in France, that he came from among the Officers and Soldiers at Whitehall, and understanding by them that his Majesty was coming with a Guard of military Men Commanders and Soldiers to the House of Commons, he pass'd by them with some Difficulty to get to the House before them, to send in word how near they were. A certain Member, suppos'd to be Mr. Pym, had had private Intimations from the famous Countess of Carlisle Sister to the Earl of Northumberland, that Endeavours would be us'd that very Day to apprehend the five Members, the Countess of Carlisle happening to be in the Room when the Queen talk'd of it to the King, and urg'd him to it with an indecent Eagerness. She who understood French perfectly well, knowing the Design, went out of the Room immediately, and so down the Back-Stairs, that she might not be observ'd, and going directly to her Brother Northumberland, told him all she knew; of which he immediately inform'd Mr. Pym. The House upon Captain Langrisb's Information, requir'd the five Members who were there attending according to Order, to depart forthwith, lest Michief shou'd follow, if the Soldiers attempted to pull them out by Force, the Commons being resolv'd in such Case to defend them with their Halberts, which, says Welwood, might have endanger'd the King's Person. Four of the five Members left the House, but Mr. Strode would not stir; Sir Walter Earle his old Friend, strove to push him out, the King being by this Time in the Court of Requests. At last a Member told him Mr. Hampden wanted to speak with him below, and then Strode follow'd the rest just as his Majesty was entering with his Officers, Reformades, and Soldiers.

When he came to the Door, his Majesty gave a loud Knock, and it was thrown open. He enter'd, and as he pass'd towards the Chair, cast his Eye on the right-hand where Mr. Pym us'd to sit, but not seeing him, he went forward and said, By your Leave, Mr. Speaker, I must borrow your Chair a little; which the Speaker quitting, the King stept up into it, and after he had stood there a while, cast his Eye around upon the Members, but cou'd not see those for whom he came. He then made a Speech, wherein he said, He came to apprehend some that were by his Command accus'd of High-Treason; in which Case no Person hath Privilege, and as long as those Persons are here, he cou'd not expect this House would be in the right Way, and he must have them wheresoever he found them. He assur'd them he never intended any Force; which the Reformades and Soldiers were a plain Proof of. The Speaker standing below by the Chair, his Majesty ask'd him whether he saw any of those Persons in the House. The Speaker falling on his Knee, reply'd, I have neither Eyes to see, nor Tongue to speak, but as the House pleases to direct me, whose Servant I am here; and humbly beg your Majesty's Pardon, that I cannot give any other Answer than this to what your Majesty is pleas'd to demand of me. The King told the Speaker he thought he was in the right, and then left the House, which was in the greatest Disorder, many Members crying out aloud, so as he might hear them, Privilege, Privilege, and immediately adjourn'd to the next Day. I have refer'd the Reader to Acherley for the Articles of Impeachment against the five Members, and his judicious Remarks upon them. It gives one Pity to see how the Earl of Clarendon, and Archdeacon Echard, labour to explain away an outrageous Act against the Peoples Rights and Privileges, which is attended with so many aggravating Circumstances. Mr. Archdeacon informs us, it was follow'd with a Proclamation, to prevent the Persons accus'd from flying out of the Kingdom, and to forbid all Persons to entertain them; which methinks should not have been mention'd, since their Accusers were preparing to fly the Kingdom, and that the Citizens of London not only entertain'd them, but offer'd to defend them at the Hazard of their Lives and Fortunes. The House of Commons full of just Resentment, which the Reverend Historian calls Rage, Voted the King's entring their House to be done in a warlike Manner, and therefore they in great Fear, Trouble and Confusion, adjourn'd for seven Days, 'till Tuesday the 11th of January, but appointed a Committee to sit in the mean Time at Guild-Hall, which had been done before in this Session. This Committee were, Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepepyr, Sir Robert Coke, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir Thomas Walsingham, Sir John Hippeley, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir John Hotham, Sir Walter Erle, Sir John Wray, Sir Thomas Barrington, Sir Christopher Wray, Sir Samuel Rolle, Sir Edward Hungerford, Sir William Linton, Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir Richard Cavé, Mr. Whitlocke, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. N. Fiennes, Mr. W. Long, Mr. Herbert Price, Mr. Wheeler, Mr. Glynne, Mr. Grimston, Mr. Wylde.

Committee of Parliament in the City.

The same Day the King came to the City with his usual Attendance; and the People, as he went along, cry'd out aloud, Privilege of Parliament, Privilege of Parliament; Mr. Walker, an Ironmonger and Pamphleteer, threw a Paper into his Coach, as the compleat Historian tells us, wherein was written, To your Tents, O Israel; for which he was committed, and afterwards proceeded against at the Sessions. This Paper was a Sermon on that Text. His Majesty was nobly entertain'd at Dinner by one of the Sheriffs, and after Dinner return'd to Whitehall, without interruption of Tumults. The Committee of the House of Commons at Guildhall employ'd themselves in drawing up a Declaration touching his Majesty's late coming to their House. They were upon it five Days, examining Persons to prove the Words, Actions, and Gestures of those that follow'd the King, and stood ready at the Door of the House of Commons.

Lord-Mayor, &c. Petition.

In the mean Time the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Common-Council petition'd the King, "Complaining of the great Success of the bloody Irish Rebels, the want of Aid to suppress them, of Designs to destroy the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of his Majesty's Subjects, by putting out Persons of Trust from being Constable and Lieutenant of the Tower, of fortifying Whitehall with Men and Ammunition, of wounding Citizens in their passing to Westminster, of tampering with Inns of Court, of the Misunderstanding between his Majesty and the Parliament, by Reason of Mitinformation, of his going to the House of Commons with a great Multitude of armed Men besides his ordinary Guards, in Breach of the Privileges of Parliament; All which tends not only to the Overtthrow of Trade, which we already feel in a A.D. 1642, deep Measure, but also threatens the utter Ruin of the Protestant Religion, and the Lives and Liberties of all his Majesty's Subjects. Their Prayer was, that Ireland may be speedily reliev'd by the Advice of Parliament; the Tower put into the Hands of Persons of Trust, suspected and unknown Persons to be remov'd from Whitehall; a known and approv'd Guard to be appointed for the Parliament; and that the Lord Kimbolton, and the Five Members, may not be restrain'd of Liberty, nor proceeded against, other than according to Privilege of Parliament." To which Echard tells us the King return'd an Answer, uncommonly obliging and condescending, as in the following Instance, There has been nothing left undone on the King's Part, as to Ireland, and his Zeal for its Relief will appear, in a DECLARATION which will be speedily publish'd; that his Majesty wonders they should entertain any Fears about the Tower, after he had remov'd a Servant of good Trust and Reputation, Lunsford, and put in another, whose Ability and Reputation were unquestionable; that as to the fortifying Whitehall, his Majesty did not doubt but they had themselves observ'd how he was provok'd to it by seditious Language, utter'd under his own Windows; and if any Citizens were wounded, he is confidently assur'd they deserv'd it: How wonderfully obliging! He disown'd the Knowledge of Fireworks in the Hands of Papists, mention'd in the Petition, and alledg'd, that no Privilege cou'd extend to Treason or Breach of Peace, and that his Attendants, when he went to the House, had only Swords.

The Committee remov'd from Guildhall to Grocers-Hall, to give the Common-Council Room to assemble in the former about this Petition, and appointed a Sub-Committee to draw up Heads for their safe coming to Westminster, with the five Members in their Company, on the 11th of January. It was resolv'd that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex shou'd then raise the Posse Comitatus to guard the King and Parliament that Day. The Masters of Ships and Mariners came to the Committee with a Petition sign'd by 1000 Hands, offering their Service to guard them by Water to Westminster, which was accepted of. After these came the Prentices with their Offer, but Serjeant Wylde gave them Thanks in the Name of the Committee, telling them there wou'd be no need of it, the Seamen being to attend them by Water, and the Train'd-Bands wou'd do the same by Land. The accus'd Members assist'd at the Committee who drew up the Declaration about the King's entring the House, all Members that came being to have Votes. The Reader will observe, that of this Committee were Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepepyr, Sir Ralph Hopton, and some of the most eminent Members of that illustrious Assembly, who declare, "That his Majesty came to the House, attended with a Multitude of arm'd Men in a hostile Manner; that several Soldiers, Papists, and others, about 500 in Number, came with him, some of them with their Pistols cock'd near the Door, said, I am a good Marksman, I can hit right: Pox take the House of Commons, a Pox of God confound them, &c. true Cavalier Language. The publishing of this Declaration was much to the Parliament's Dishonour, according to Echard; and then he contradicts himself, by saying, It was more detrimental to the King's Affairs: He adds, the Shops of the City were generally shut up, to insinuate that the Citizens took this Declaration so ill, that they wou'd not Trade upon it. The Truth is, the Shops were shut while the Citizens attended the Committee and the accus'd Members, to the two Houses of Parliament, which they did in a triumphant Manner: The Committee and the five Members took Boat at the Three Cranes, attended with thirty or forty Bar-

188 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. Barges, with Guns and Streamers, and a great Number of Citizens in Boats; thus they row'd to Westminster, with Sound of Variety of Musical Instruments, interrupted only with the loud Acclamations of the People, while the Train'd-Bands march'd thither by Land, to secure the Passages that way. The whole was to be perform'd with so much real Pomp and Splendor, that the Court to avoid so magnificent, but to them so hateful a Sight, left the Town, and the King never saw it afterwards, 'till he was brought thither to his Tryal. Eckard tells us, this Return of the Committee, and the five Members to their Seats in Parliament, was interpreted at Whitehall as the beginning of the War, and so interpreted no where else. The beginning of the War was before this, and well explain'd by the judicious Lawyer. It appear'd also, that if the five Members attempted to sit again, the King, or his Men at Arms, would be at Hand to come and seize them; and that therefore without Guards, they, or the House, wou'd never more sit safely; and if so, the Inference is incontestable, that this STORM on the House, was the FIRST STROKE that was given in the WAR. He proceeds, "The King not being able to see the five Members so generally espous'd; for what is said in the History of the Rebellion, and the Archdeacon's History, of a pack'd Mob, is all directly contrary to known Truth; and himself and his Prosecution so disappointed, did on the Day before, Monday the 10th of January, retire from Whitehall to Hampton-Court, after that to Windsor, and from thence to Tork, and absented and would never after return to his Parliament.

See what the Conjuror Lilly says on this Subject. "The King disliked these too frequent Addressess unto both Houses in so unwarrantable a Manner, whereupon fearing the worst, as himself pretended, he had a Court of Guard before Whitehall of the Train'd-Bands: He had also many dissolute Gentlemen that kept within White-Hall, with their Swords by their Sides, to be ready upon any sudden Occasion: Verily Mens Fears now began to be great, and it was by many perceiv'd, the King began to swell with Anger against the Proceedings of Parliament, and to intend a War against them. Some Speeches dropp'd from him to that Purpose. Of his breaking into the House of Commons for the five Members, Lilly writes, "All this Time he had a Guard with him, consisting of many Gentlemen with Halberts and Swords. This rash Action of his cost him his Crown; for as he was the first of Kings that ever, or so imprudently broke the Privileges, by his entring into the House of Commons assembled in Parliament; so by that unparalleled Demand of his, he utterly lost himself, and left scarce any Possibility of Reconcilement: He not willing to trust them; nor they him, who had so often fail'd them. It was my Fortune that very Day to dine in Whitehall, and in that Room where the Halberts newly brought from the Tower were lodg'd, for the Use of such as attended the King to the House of Commons. Sir Peter Wich, e're we had fully din'd, came into the Room I was in, and broke open the Chests wherein the Arms were, which frighted us all that were there: However, one of our Company got out of Doors, and presently inform'd some Members, that the King was preparing to come into the House, else I believe all, or some of these Members had been taken. Eckard, the Author of the History of the Rebellion, and all the Authors of that precious Kidney, do every where treat the City of London as a Nest of Rebels, the Sink of Sedition and Schism; for the Zeal of the Citizens in Defence of English Liberty, and for promoting a thorough Reformation. They learnt this of Laud; and King Charles, in Pursuance of the same Lesson treated them accordingly, which naturally dispos'd them to make all Opposition to his arbitrary Government, and on all Occasions to appear for the Parliament, the Bulwark of their Rights and Privileges. He highly provok'd them a little before the breaking out of the Scots Troubles, by countenancing one Sir Philips, a beggarly Knight, as my Author calls him, from whom I take the following Account; "Philips exhibited his Bill against the Citizens of London, for certain Misdemeanours pretended to be committed by some of their Officers in Ireland, about the Parts of London-derry. True it is, the Citizens of London very gallantly, about the coming in of King James, sent Colonies of their own in great Numbers, and at their own extream great Charges, to settle Plantations in the North of Ireland. They had a large Patent from King James, and many Privileges granted them for their so doing, and Planting: Above 30 Years they had quietly possess'd their own Lands there, had built many beautiful Market-Towns, one or more City or Cities, many Churches in the Territories assign'd them; but about the Year 1639, this Sir Philips demanding some unreasonable Things of the Citizens, and being denied them, he in Malice exhibits his Bill for Misdemeanours of their Officers against the Londoners in the STAR-CHAMBER, and brought the Cause unto a Hearing. The Court of Star-Chamber fin'd the Londoners deeply, adjudg'd their Plantations forfeited to the King, who as eagerly and greedily swallow'd them for his own. This very Act, in or near this Exigence of Time, so im-bitter'd the Spirits of the Citizens, that though they were singularly invited for Loan of Monies, and had as great Plenty in their Possessions as ever, yet they wou'd not contribute any Assistance for Money against the Scots." Eckard and Clarendon cannot find Words good enough for this Star-Chamber, and this King's Justice and Piety.

The Sense of the Nation, with respect to the Somersetshire Petition.

Danger that threaten'd them from the King's unparalleled Breach of Parliamentary Privileges, and preparing Forces to support it, appears by a Petition to the Parliament, from the Knights, Gentlemen, Freeholders, and other principal Inhabitants of the County of Somerset, in Behalf of themselves, and many Thousands of the County, shewing,

"That whereas instead of settled Peace and Safety, (the long expected Fruit of your faithful Endeavours, and our chearful Contributions) great Distractions and Dangers are daily multiplied and increas'd, threatening the utter Disappointment of our Hopes, and the Overthrow of the very Foundation of our Weal and Liberty; especially for the late Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, in an unparalleled Manner, by the wicked Devices of a malignant Party, as we conceive of Popish Lords and Bishops, and others; we being stricken with the Sense and Horror of so desperate a Mischief, do hold it high Time to declare the sincere and ardent Affection of our Hearts, which we are ready to seal with our purest Blood, in Defence of our Religion, his Sacred Majesty, our dear Country, and that which is the Life of our Liberty, the Rights and Privileges of Parliament.

"May it therefore please this honourable Assembly to assist the earnest Desires of your Petitioners, that all Privileges of Parliament, the Inheritance and Safety of the Subject, may be made firm. That Popish Lords and Bishops be forthwith remov'd from voting in the House of Peers; that all Evil Counsellors, and other Delinquents, may receive condign Punishment; that a sufficient Remedy be provided against the scandalous Ministers; that to secure us from all home-bred

A.D. 1642. "bred and foreign Practices, this Kingdom be speedily put into a Posture of Defence; and that the Relief and Safety of our distressed Brethren in Ireland be effectually prosecuted, &c." This Petition was presented by Sir Thomas Wroth, Burges for Bridgewater in Somersetshire, and the rest of the Representatives of that County, the Knight introducing it with a Speech, which began thus: Mr. Speaker, The High and Glorious Assembly of the three Estates in Parliament, hath a near Resemblance to the Day of Judgment; for in Parliament we are call'd to Account for our Actions, both Good and Evil; here we hear the Voice of Ite and Venite: From this Venite, the Knights, Gentlemen, and Freeholders of the County of Somerset, have been encourag'd to intrust us humbly to present their Petition: He then excuses its coming late, and not attended with a multitudinous Troop, on Account of the Distance of the Petitioners from London; but he said, We have Hearts and Hands as zealous and ready to maintain the Contents of our Petition, as any of the preceding Counties. We see then, that these Addressees were the Vox Populi, and not the Effect of Artifice and Imposture, as Mr. Archdeacon represents them; and that in Particular, the Knights, Gentlemen, and principal Inhabitants of this Rich and Spacious County, in the Behalf of many Thousands, address'd the Parliament to prepare for their Defence, though the Lord Clarendon affirms, they were there One and All for the King. Echard mentions this noble Knight in his noble History, nor at all to his Honour, as will be seen in the Sequel.

Arms, &c. sent to Whitehall. Before we proceed further, we must reflect a little on Mr. Archdeacon's Representation of the King's low Condition at this Time. He had lately been supply'd with Arms out of the Tower. Rusworth informs us, that the very Day he enter'd the House, there were privately brought to Whitehall 100 Arms, 200 Barrels of Powder, Match and Shot proportionable; which was a sufficient Magazine for a King who intended to live in Peace with his Subjects. Echard means, he had not furnish'd himself with warlike Stores for Sieges and Battels, which no body then thought of, if they did not think of it at Whitehall. His Words are, He had neither Arms, Money, nor Credit, therefore nothing but a Sense of Honour, Loyalty or Gratitude, could have brought so many to join him in the ensuing War. After this vain and groundless Reflection, see what General Ludlow says, who, as an Historian, is as much superior to him, as the Cause of Liberty is above that of Slavery. He is opening the Civil War as well as the Archdeacon; "I thought the Justice of the Cause I had engag'd in to be so evident, that I could not imagine it to be attended with much Difficulty: For tho' I suppos'd that many of the Clergy, who had been the principal Authors of the Miseries, together with some of the Courtiers, and such as absolutely depended upon the King for their Subsistence, as also some Foreigners would adhere to him; yet I could not think that many of the People who had long been oppress'd with heavy Burthens, and now with great Difficulty obtain'd a Parliament compos'd of such Persons as were willing to run Hazards to procure a lasting Settlement for the Nation, would have been either such Enemies to themselves, or so ungrateful to those who had trusted them, as not to stand by them to the utmost of their Power. At least, though some might not have so much Resolution and Courage, as to venture all with them, yet that they would not be so treacherous and unworthy to strengthen the Hands of the Enemy against those who had the Laws of God, Nature and Reason, as well as those of the Land, on their Side." Every Word in Clarendon and Echard, is the Reverse of this. General Ludlow then gives the Reason why the Lord Falkland, Sir John Colepeper, Sir Ralph Hopton, the Lord Capel,

Sir John Strangeways, and a good Number of worthy Gentlemen of the House of Commons, and a great Number of Country Gentlemen deserted the Country Interest, and fought for the Court in the Civil War. "Finding by Experience the strong Combination of Interests at Home and Abroad against the Parliament; the close Conjunction of the Popish and Prelatical Parties in Opposition to them; what vast Numbers depended on the King for Preferments or Subsistence; how many of the Nobility and Gentry were contented to serve his arbitrary Designs, if they might have Leave to insult over such as were of a lower Order; a Remark worth a Hundred in Clarendon and Echard; and adding to all this the Corruption of the Nation, I became convinc'd of my former Error, and began now more to wonder how they found so many Friends to assist them in their just and lawful Undertaking, than I had done before at the Opposition they met with.

The Earl of Clarendon values his Cause very much on the Offer of some brisk Gentlemen, but nameless, of the Inns of Court, to be a Guard to the King. He did not know, or would not tell us, that some other as brisk Gentlemen of the same Inns, offer'd to be a Guard to the Parliament; as Mr. Rich Fiennes, Son to the Lord Viscount Say, Mr. Charles Fleetwood, whom the Earl calls a Trooper, Son to Sir Miles Fleetwood, Mr. Edmund Ludlow, Son to Sir Henry Ludlow, all of the Inns of Court, and many young Gentlemen more of those Inns, who procur'd an experienc'd Officer to instruct them in the use of Arms, and prepare them for the Parliament's Service.

General Ludlow omits one strong Reason why so many Gentlemen of Worth deserted the Service of their Country, besides the Digbys, the Hydes, and others, from whom no better could be expected, and espous'd a Quarrel they had till then abhorr'd, Arbitrary Power, and Priestcraft; and that was the Jealousy they had conceiv'd one of another. Mr. Pym, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Hampden, and a few more leading Members, had apparently the Authority and Management in the House of Commons, where the others were like to act under Parts only; but if they betray'd their Party, and revolted to the King, they might be Chancellors and Secretaries, and Comptrollers, and Barons, and Earls, and what not. Poor Considerations! and such as large and generous Minds despise, if not to be acquir'd without sacrificing the Publick to private Interest.

Upon the King's absenting himself from his Parliament, Mr. Acherley observes, The House of Commons were ever after oblig'd to stand upon their own Defence, and to provide themselves with Guards, to prevent the like Surprise. Thus do reasonable Men argue on the Necessity the Lords and Commons found themselves in, to prepare to defend their Session against future Insults, and to be arm'd if War was made upon them, for which they knew Preparations were making. "In this Posture of Affairs, says the learned Lawyer last mention'd, the Ministers held secret Counsels with the Queen at Windsor, which were guided by her Popish Cabal; for the Nuntio and the Priests satisfy'd the Queen, and she the King, as Father Orleans tells us, That the Treason of calling in the Scots, should be prosecuted with War, and Force of Arms." The French Jesuit, who consulted our abdicated King in his History, confesses that King Charles had resolv'd upon an Offensive War before the Parliament had taken any Step towards a defensive one: For that End, it was concluded that the Queen, under the Umbrage of conducting her Daughter, the Princess Mary, lately marry'd to the Prince of Orange, to her Husband, should take that Opportunity to transport her self to Holland, and at the same Time to negotiate the Supplies of Men and Money: That the King should retire to York, there-

190 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. there to make his first Levies, and seize the Magazine at Hull, but proceed slowly, which occasion'd the many dilatory Messages, and evasive Answers the Parliament receiv'd from him. Here I think the French Jesuit has determin'd the Beginning of the War, and that the King had resolv'd to reduce the Parliament by Force of Arms, before ever they had come to any formal Resolution to defend themselves. The two Houses order'd Thanks to the City of London, for their friendly Behaviour towards the Committee, and the accus'd Members; as also to the Masters of Ships, and Mariners, for their Kindness. Colonel Skippon was appointed to attend with such a Guard of the Train'd-Bands as he thought sufficient, which was two Companies, every Day at Westminster: The King propos'd 200 of them under the Command of the Earl of Lindsey, but they excus'd it, and took Skippon for their Captain.

Buckinghamshire
Petition.

The next Day, several Knights, Gentlemen, and Freeholders, to the Number of 5000, chiefly from Buckinghamshire, came to London, riding every one with a printed Protestation in his Hat, and presented a Petition to the House of Commons, complaining of the King's late Breach of the Privileges of Parliament, and offering to live and dye in their Defence; for which they receiv'd the Thanks of that House, and afterwards of the House of Lords, for the like Address to them. They then sent eight of the Petitioners to Windsor with a Petition to the King, in which they declare their Astonishment at a Charge of High-Treason against their Representative Mr. Hampden, which was to wound them thro' his Sides. They desir'd that the Privileges of Parliament might be secur'd, and Delinquents brought to Punishment. The King told them he had wav'd the Accusation of the five Members, and did not conceive that their Crimes cou'd in any Sort reflect upon those his Subjects. But the Parliament was not satisfy'd with waving the Accusation for the present only, since he said in his Message he wou'd still proceed against them. There is not a Step taken but there seems to be Fatality in it; they therefore resolv'd to begin first, and fell upon Sir Edward Herbert Attorney-General, whom they impeach'd of High-Crimes and Misdemeanors, for drawing up a false and scandalous Charge against the Lord Kimbolton and the five Members. Both Lords and Commons join'd in a Petition to the King, which was sent by the Earl of Newport and the Lord Seymour, to be inform'd of the Proof against those Members, and to know the Names of their Accusers. To which his Majesty reply'd, that he having found Cause wholly to desist from proceeding against the accus'd Members, he had commanded the Attorney-General to proceed no farther. However, the two Houses proceeded farther against the Attorney-General; and the Lords having consider'd the Impeachment of the Commons, voted, That he shou'd be incapable of being a Member, Assistant, or Reader in either House of Parliament, and of all Offices saving that of Attorney-General, and be committed Prisoner to the Fleet during their Pleasure.

Digby in Arms at Kingston.

Rushworth says, "Information was given to the House that the Lord Digby with Colonel Lunsford and other disbanded Officers and Reformades, have with Troops of Horse appear'd in an hostile Manner at Kingston in Surrey, where the Magazine of Arms for that Part of the County lies; and a Committee being appointed to examine into the Matter, they reported, That there were about two hundred Men at Kingston, most of them Officers; that the Town was full of Horse; that they have Pistols, and carry themselves in a disorderly Manner to the Terror of the People; that the Lord Digby was there on Horseback with Pistols; that Colonel Lunsford and two others of that Name were there also; and that there were two Cart-loads of Ammunition. The Action was so near London, that if there had not been two hundred arm'd Men at Kingston; if the Town had not been full of Horse; if Digby and those Ruffians the Lunsfords had not behav'd to the Terror of the People, this Report of the Committee of Parliament must have been a Jest, and such a Discredit to all their Reports, as wou'd have render'd them incredible and contemptible. The Earl of Clarendon, as usual, is the Reverse of all this too: He affirms the Lord Digby was not there on Horseback, that he came in a Coach with six Horses only to visit Colonel Lunsford. He is mightily improv'd in his Company as well as Politicks. Echard backs this righteous Evidence with a positive Number; the six Coach-Horses were all the Horses that appear'd there. We are like to have hopeful History from them in the Course of the Civil War, which they begin so cleverly. General Ludlow assures us, those that the King had formerly entertain'd at Whitehall, appear'd at Kingston in a military Posture with the Lord Digby and Colonel Lunsford at the Head of them. The two Houses having Notice thereof, desir'd the King to disperse the said Troops, and to return to the Parliament. Lunsford was taken and sent to the Tower, and the Lord Digby accus'd of High-Treason, but he avoided the Punishment by flying the Kingdom. The Parliament order'd the Train'd-Bands of Sussex and Hampshire to suppress those Forces, as Rushworth terms them, and prevent the carrying of Arms and Ammunition to Portsmouth; the Governor of which Fortrefs Colonel Goring, was requir'd not to deliver it up, nor receive any Forces into it without their Consent.

Portsmouth.

The Debate about securing Portsmouth, gave Hull. Occasion to another about Hull; and at the Conclusion of it, Sir Philip Stapleton was sent to the Lords to concur with the Commons in an Order, "That some of the Militia of Yorkshire near the Town of Hull, shou'd be put into the said Town under the Command of Sir John Hotbom, for securing the King's Magazine there; and that he, or whoever he shou'd appoint under him, shou'd not deliver it up without Consent of both Houses, to which their Lordships agreed." The Care of the Parliament to secure that Magazine, was on certain Intelligence that the Earl of Newcastle was secretly withdrawn from London with the same Commission from the King, who had also given a like Commission to Colonel Legg to possess himself of Newcastle, before the two Houses came to any Resolution about Hull. The Earl of Newport Master of the Ordnance, and the Lieutenant of the Tower, were requir'd not to let any of the Stores there be remov'd, and Colonel Skippon was order'd to appoint a sufficient Guard both by Land and by Water about the Tower, to prevent the carrying off any Ordnance or Ammunition. A Parcel of great Saddles were discover'd at Kingston for the use of Echard's Coach and Six Horses. What Patience shou'd one be endow'd with to deal with such History! The House was inform'd by Mr. Bagshaw of Windsor, where the Court then was, that he saw divers Troops of Horse hovering about that Place, and that a Waggon loaden with Ammunition was arriv'd there, where were about four hundred Horse and forty Officers, to shew how far the Court were from making any military Preparations. Upon this an Order was made for ten Horsemen to patroll always, and give Intelligence if any Forces approach'd near the City, and for the like Service Boats and small Vessels were order'd to ply up and down in the Thames. A Committee was appointed the 14th of January, three Days after the King left London, to consider of some Heads for putting the Kingdom into a Posture of Defence; Sir Richard Cave, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir Henry Vane, Sir John Colepeper, Mr. Pierpoint, Mr. Hollis, Mr. St. John, Mr. Glyn.

Committee for the Defence of the Kingdom.

Mr. Archdeacon uses all his Art, which is not considerable,

A.D. 1642. considerable, to turn the just Fears of the Parliament and People into Ridicule; and among other such Witticisms, tells us there was a Plot to blow up the Thames with Gunpowder, which threw the whole City into inexpressible Consternation. He makes the like Sport with the Petitions the House of Commons receiv'd from the several Counties and Cities which we have already mention'd. He represents them as Trick. The Counties of Essex, Hertford, Berks, Surrey, and most of the Counties and Cities of England, sent up Petitions one after another to the same Purpose as that from the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council of the City of London; who being desir'd to lend 100000 Pounds for the Relief of Ireland, gave these Reasons for the Obstructions the Loan met with.

London
Petition.

1. "The refusing of the Offer of 10000 Scots to be sent to Ireland.
2. "The not passing the Bill for pressing.
3. "The slow issuing out Commissions to those who are willing to serve.
4. "The not disarming Papists in England, and not removing the Lieutenant of the Tower.
5. "The suffering Delinquents to make their Escapes in the King's Ships.
6. "The sheltering of many Thousands of unknown desperate Persons in Covent-Garden and thereabouts, to be ready for an Attempt against the Parliament and City.

Essex.

Hertfordshire.

7. "The not vindicating the Privileges of Parliament, the not punishing Delinquents, nor suffering the Laws to be put in Execution against Priests and Jesuits." All which Premises occasion the Decay of Trade, and increase the Fears of the People, which discourage them in parting with their Money. The Petition of the Knights, Gentlemen, Ministers, and Freeholders of Essex, complain of the great Stop of Reformation in Matters of Religion; and pray that Papists may be disarm'd, Ireland speedily reliev'd, and the Kingdom put into a Posture of Defence; as also that Bishops and Popish Lords be excluded the House of Peers. The Petition of the Knights, Gentlemen, and Freeholders of Hertfordshire, "acknowledge the great Care of the Parliament for the Good of the Commonwealth in procuring the Execution of exemplary Justice, in putting down arbitrary Courts, Ship-Money, Monopolies, and other illegal Impositions." They add, That the malignant Party of Prelates and Papists, and their Adherents, have by their manifold wicked Practices and Designs, endeavour'd to hinder all thorough Reformation in Church and Commonwealth, and stifle all good Bills in their Birth. Of this Party most certainly was the Earl of Clarendon, which will not be deny'd; and how fairly he has represented those good Englishmen who promoted that thorough Reformation, may easily be imagin'd as well as seen. The Men of Hertfordshire pray that the Kingdom might be put into a Posture of Defence, the Privileges of Parliament repair'd and thoroughly vindicated; that the Votes of the Popish Lords and Bishops might be taken away, speedy and strong Relief sent to Ireland, and Delinquents brought to further Punishment. These Petitions were read in the House of Lords by Mr. Pym, who explain'd them in an eloquent Speech, which wou'd be an Ornament to History, but I have not Room for Speeches, Declarations, and Messages at length. The Earl of Clarendon does not lose a Word of them; but, as his good Friend Warwick observes, he was a great Dealer in Words himself, and took much Delight in it. Mr. Pym speaking of Evil Counsellors, of whom that Lord was always understood to be one, said, "Their Influence hath been the Cause of the Preparation for a War with Scotland, of the procuring a Rebellion in Ireland, of corrupting Religion, suppressing the Liberty of this Kingdom, and of many fearful and horrid Attempts, to the subverting the very Being of Parliaments, which was the only hopeful Means of opposing and preventing all the

"rest; and this appears to be a most predominant Evil of the Time, whereat we need not wonder, when we consider how Counsellors have been preferr'd and prepar'd. I appeal to your Lordships own Consciences, whether the giving and the countenancing of Evil Counsels, hath not been almost the only Way to farther Advancement." This evil Counsel is in the Earl's History, the Wisdom, Virtue, and Sobriety of the Nation. Mr. Pym had the Thanks of the House for his Speech; and the King hearing of it, sent a Message to them concerning a Passage, that since the Ports had been stopp'd against all Irish Papists by both Houses, many Officers now in the Head of the REBELS had been suffer'd to pass by his Majesty's immediate Warrant, which he desir'd might be prov'd; and the Commons in their Answer prov'd it, naming Colonel Butler a Papist, Uncle to the Marquis of Ormond, Sir George Hamilton another Papist, the Lord Nutterfield's Son, and several others. To which his Majesty reply'd in general only, that those Papists who had had Passes, were not in the Rebellion, and that he expected there may be Wariness us'd before such publick Aspersions be laid upon him. In a Message of the 20th of January, he advis'd them to digest into one Body all the Grievances of the Kingdom, and to send them to him, promising his favourable Assent to those Means which shou'd be found most effectual for Redress, wherein he wou'd not only equal but exceed the most indulgent Princes. This is what Father Orleans call'd proceeding slowly, and it was by such flattering Messages as these, that he gradually gain'd over great Numbers of Lords, Gentlemen, and others, who, without seeing one Grievance effectually redress'd, after they drew their Swords for him, continu'd fighting in hopes of so weakening the Parliament, that the King might have it in his Power to break or keep the Laws according to his Will and Pleasure.

On the 28th of January the House of Commons sent an Answer to this most healing Message, That they return'd his Majesty most humble Thanks for his gracious Message, which they resolv'd to take into speedy and most serious Consideration; and to enable them with Security to discharge their Duties, they petition'd, "That the Tower and other principal Forts of the Kingdom may be put into the Hands of such Persons as his Parliament cou'd confide in, without which, in all human Reason, the great Disfranchisement of the Nation must needs overwhelm it with Misery and Ruin." To which the King reply'd, "that he thought the Militia to be lawfully subject to no Command but his own, and therefore wou'd not let it out of his Hands." Father Orleans informs us, 'twas the Resolution of the Queen's Junto to deny all Particulars. "That he had preferr'd to the Lieutenantcy of the Tower a Person of known Honour, Fortune, and unquestionable Reputation, and that he wou'd prefer none but such to the Command of his Forts and Castles, yet wou'd not intrust the Power of conferring those Places and Dignities from himself, being deriv'd to him from his Ancestors by the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom." This is all along the Cant of the History of the Rebellion. The sovereign Power when exercis'd according to Law, as it has been in all the glorious Reigns since the Revolution, and was never so exercis'd in any other Reign since Queen Elizabeth's, is doubtless one of the fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, and the best Security the Subjects have for their Rights, Liberties, and Properties; but in the Abuse of it, and when exerted against the Laws, which is the well-known Case of this Government, it becomes tyrannical, and Tyranny is a Contradiction to the Fundamentals of Government. According to Law, the Laws of the Land, and the like, are every where in Clarendon's History, as if Ministers were to be as well protected in the Breach of them as in the Execution. The

A.D. 1642. The King's Denial of this reasonable Request alarm'd the House of Peers, who till then had not meddled much with this Matter, but now they join'd with the House of Commons in a second Petition the 2d of February, for putting the Tower, Forts, Castles, and the whole Militia of England into the Hands of such Persons as they shou'd recommend to him. Eckard now corroborates the Evidence of the Jesuit Orleans, and confesses the King dealt doubly with the two Houses in his Answer, and said what he never was positive to consent to, Things not being yet ready. He promis'd to put such Persons into those Places as both Houses should recommend to him, with a proviso, That he had no Exceptions against them; which were easy to be made against any Man who had made Exceptions against his Government.

Tower. After a long Debate about the Lieutenantancy of the Tower, the House resolv'd to move the King, that Sir John Biron be put out, and Sir John Coniers be put in, which was granted. The Archdeacon's Comment upon this, is another shining Instance of his exquisite Judgment in the Choice of his Authors: It was a plain Proof that at this Time he had no Thoughts of a War; which is agreeable to what the old Earl of Bristol said, "That nothing so much terrify'd his Conscience from taking Arms against the King, or more confirm'd him in his Duty of adhering to him, than the certain and infallible Knowledge he had of the King's unfeign'd Desires and Endeavours to have prevented the War; an Authority that will stand good against a thousand Opinions and Conjectures." This at first sight is false, and yet with what Confidence he tells it. The Earl of Bristol cou'd not know it, and therefore did not know it; for there is not one sober Author but asserts the quite contrary. Whitlocke, the fairest of all Writers, says, The Queen obtain'd Leave of the King, who also acquainted the Parliament, that his Daughter was to go to Holland to her Husband the Prince of Orange, and that her Mother desir'd to go with her; accordingly the Queen went over with her Daughter into Holland, and carry'd with her all her own and the King's Jewels, not leaving behind the Jewels of the Crown; that with them, and the Assistance of the Prince of Orange, a sufficient Party might be rais'd for the King. Another Author writes, "The Queen pass'd into Holland under Pretext of keeping her Daughter Company to her Husband, but she carry'd with her the Crown Jewels of England, and pawn'd them there, whereby she bought Arms for that War that ensu'd, and was it seems then design'd by the King against the Parliament."

I have seen an Account of the Sums borrow'd in Holland to buy Arms and Ammunition for the War intended against the Parliament.

Here's above 100000 Pounds borrow'd to make Provisions for War, and all with a sincere Intention to keep the Peace. The Absurdity of this Pretence is ridiculous, and it is further prov'd by the sending Cockrain to Denmark to desire Assistance of that King before the War commenc'd. The Substance of his Instructions was, "To inform the King's Uncle of a dangerous Combination of his Majesty's Subjects against him, and to demand his Assistance against them, who intended to set up a Commonwealth and Prelbytery, whereas Episcopacy is the chief Column of the Crown: That his Majesty has been forc'd to forsake London, and send the Queen to Holland: That the States of Holland have agreed to give her Majesty the Queen a Convoy of the greatest Part of their Fleet: That the Parliament design to assist the Dutch to take away his Danish Majesty's Customs of the Sound; and in order to extirpate the Royal Blood of England, they are endeavouring to bastardize all the Royal Family, by proving the King of England's Mother, Sister to the King of Denmark, to be an Adulteress, and her Children illegitimate; and to enable him to punish them, he desires his Danish Majesty to lend him 100000 Pounds on Jewels, and to send him 6000 Muskets, 1500 Horse Arms, and 20 Pieces of Field Artillery with some Horsemen only: That there is in Holland a great Collar of Rubies, and another of Rubies and Pearl, if he will lend more Money upon them, &c."

The King in a printed Declaraton from Newark, March 9. 1642, tells the Parliament, Whatsoever you are advertiz'd from Paris, &c. of foreign Aids, we are confident no sober honest Men in our Kingdom can believe that we are so desperate or so senseless to entertain such Designs as wou'd not only bury this our Kingdom in certain Destruction and Ruin, but our Name and Posterity in perpetual Scorn and Infamy. This Negotiation of Cockrain's is not deny'd. You have the King's own Reflections on such Negotiations; and after this, What can one say too coarsely of the Lord Clarendon's and Archdeacon Eckard's Histories, which are the Reverse of it? Leti agrees with Orleans; and being both Papiists, Mr. Archdeacon himself will not expect better Authority. The King staid till he had sent away the Queen to Holland, after which he declar'd he wou'd not do what the Parliament desir'd, and qu'il ne leur avoit rien accorde que par contrainte, and that he had granted them nothing but what was forc'd from him. Ludlow, "Both King and Queen design'd not only to withdraw, but also to make what Preparations they cou'd for the raising an Army against the Parliament; in order to which the Queen carry'd with her the Jewels of the Crown, and pawn'd them in Holland for Arms and Money." The Genius, Learning, Knowledge, Quality, and Fortune of this Historian, is superior to any Comparison with the Author of the History of the Rebellion; and there is nothing to be objected against his Authority, but that he was a Commonwealth's Man; which in the Earl of Clarendon and the Archdeacon's Sense, is worse than a Laplander or Canibal. Larrey represents the Matter thus; "According to the King's own Historian the Lord Clarendon, the Appearance of his designing a War was strong against him, gives the from his Design to seize on Portsmouth and Hull. War." The Parliament knew very well that it was resolv'd on to send the Queen to Portsmouth, the Governor of which Town was in her Interests, and the King himself was to seize on Hull. The Discovery of the Plot, tho' by whom is not certainly

A.D. 1642. "certainly known, was the Occasion of its not succeeding; and the Queen being afraid of a Prosecution, avoided it by going out of the Kingdom; and avoided too the Indignity of a Flight, by the Pretence of going with her Daughter into Holland." Letters were intercepted from the Lord Digby to the Queen and Secretary Nicholas, dated at Middleburgh in Zealand, advising the King to betake himself to some Place of Strength, where he and others might safely resort to him, and he doubted not but that he should do him acceptable Service. The Son knew the King was about entering upon the War, but the Father the Earl of Bristol, knew certainly and infallibly that it was his unfeign'd Desire to prevent it. We will not believe Digby's offer of acceptable Service, was of the same Kind as his Offer concerning the Five Members, whom he would have murder'd if they would not have yielded to him. Echard indeed says only, He offer'd to fetch them alive or dead. These Letters were intercepted a few Days before the Departure of the Queen. The Parliament sent to the King to desire he would not correspond with Digby nor any other whom his great Council had proclaim'd Traytors.

Militia. The House of Commons were busy in Debates touching the ordering the Militia of the several Counties; in which some declar'd their Opinions, that the Power of the Militia was solely in the King, and ought to be left to him; and that the Parliament never did or ought to meddle with the same. Others were of Opinion that the King had not this Power in him, but that it was solely in the Parliament; and that if the King refus'd to order the same according to the Advice of the Parliament, that then by Law they might do it without him; which was moved to be now done by the Parliament, the King having deny'd all their Petitions for settling the Militia as they desir'd; the Motion being seconded and well supported, the House of Commons pass'd an Ordinance the 2d of March, to which the Lords consented, for ordering of the Militia of the Kingdom of England and the Dominion of Wales. By which they appointed Lieutenants for the several Counties and Towns as follows;

Sir John Gayer, Sir Jacob Garret, Thomas Atkin Esq; Sir John Wollaston, John Warner Esq; John Towse Esq; Serjeant-Major General Skippon, Randall Manwaring Esq; Mr. William Gibbs, Mr. John Fowke, Mr. James Bence, Mr. Francis Peck, Mr. Samuel Warren, Mr. James Russel, Mr. Nathaniel Wright, Mr. William Barkley, Mr. Alexander Normanston, Mr. Stephen Estwick, Mr. Owen Roe.

This Ordinance, with a Petition to pass it, was sent to the King by the Earls of Carlisle and Monmouth, who gave for Answer, that the Queen being upon her Departure for Holland, he must re- spite a particular Reply till he return'd from accompanying her to Dover; which both Houses took as a sort of Denial, and petition'd him for a speedy Answer, which he return'd the 28th of February by the Earl of Portland, Sir Thomas Heal, and Sir William Saville, who brought him the Petition, containing in Substance, That the Ordinance was a Breach of his hereditary Right. He had before sent for the Earl of Essex Lord-Chamberlain, and the Earl of Holland Groom of the Stole, to attend him, but they excus'd themselves with the Necessity of performing their Duties in Parliament, for which they were both immediately turn'd out of their Places as they expected. His Majesty also sent for his two Sons from Hampton-Court, and the Parliament cou'd not but take it as an Indication of his intending an open Rupture. Their last Petition about the Militia Ordinance, intimated, That if he refus'd to pass that Bill, they should be constrain'd to settle that necessary Business without him. Had he really had an unfeign'd Desire, and did seriously endeavour to have prevented the War, instead of cavilling evasive Answers, he would have pass'd this Ordinance which was but temporary; and the Lords who were appointed Lieutenants were Persons whom he might as well have confided in as the Parliament, as appear'd by their future Conduct.

The House of Commons appointed a Committee to draw up a Declaration of the Causes of their Fears and Jealousies, which was deliver'd to the King at Newmarket March the 9th, by the Earls of Pembroke and Holland. In the mean time they receiv'd Advice of Negotiations with foreign Princes to assist the King against them; and both Houses commanded the Earl of Northumberland Lord High-Admiral, to fit out some Men of War for the

A.D. 1642, the Defence of the Kingdom, Beacons were now made, Sea-Marks set up, and Expresses dispatch'd to the Lieutenants of the several Counties to have an Eye on the Enemies of the Constitution. The Declaration last mention'd was read to the King by the Earl of Holland. The first Article was, His attempting to incense the late northern Army against the Parliament. 2. Jermyn's Treasons and Transportation by his Majesty's Warrant. When that was read, the King cry'd, 'Tis false. The Petition deliver'd to Captain Legg with the King's own Hand, and sign'd C. R. That's a Lye, said his Majesty; so unfeign'd was he in his Endeavours to prevent a War. When he was inform'd it related not to the Date, but to the Execution of the Warrant, he said, It might have been better express'd then. 3. The Business of the Lord Kimbolton and the Five Members. 4. The suspicious Designs of a Guard about his Person. 5. The underband promoting of the Irish Rebellion. 6. The ordering Sir John Pennington to land the Lord Digby in Zealand, from thence to alienate the King from his Parliament, and to procure for him foreign Assistance; which appears the more credible by his Removal with the Prince, and the many Advertisements from Rome, Venice, Paris, and other Parts, of Aid to be given to the King, in reference to some Design against Religion and the Parliament. 7. They desire his Majesty to put away his wicked Counsellors, and to put his Trust in his two Houses; which if he would do, they would sacrifice their Lives and Fortunes for the Honour and Greatness of his Majesty and his Royal Posterity. When the Declaration was read, the King said, I could not have believ'd the Parliament would have sent me such a one, if I had not seen it brought by such Persons of Honour. I am sorry for the Parliament, but glad I have it, for I doubt not to satisfy my People by it, tho' I am confident the greater Part is so already; and that the Parliament hath had worse Informations than I have had Counsels: What is it I have deny'd them? The Earl of Pembroke reply'd, the Militia, and endeavour'd to persuade the King to return to Whitehall, which was the surest Way to have prevented a War. His Majesty answer'd, I wish you had given me Cause, but I am sure this Declaration is not the Way to it, and in all Aristotle's Rhetorick there is no such Argument of Persuasion. The Earl of Pembroke told him the Parliament humbly besought him to come near them. His Majesty reply'd in the Terms of the Declaration, Words are not sufficient. The Earl of Pembroke then mov'd him to express what he would have. The King said, I would whip a Boy in Westminster-School that could not tell by my Answer. His Lordship then propos'd to settle the Militia as in the Ordinance for a Time: The King cry'd, By God not for an Hour. How unfeign'dly did he desire to prevent a War! His Majesty added, You have ask'd that of me in this, which was never ask'd of any King, and with which I will not trust my Wife and Children. As to the Business of Ireland, he said, It will never be done in the Way you are in: Four hundred will never do the Work. Echard affirms there were not many above one hundred in the House. If I were trusted with it, I would pawn my Head to end it; and tho' I am a Beggar myself, yet by God I can find Money for that Work. This Swearing before a Company of Puritans was extremely decent and discreet, as is the whole Dialogue, if one had room to animadvert upon it.

Sir Ralph Hopton deserts.

Parl. Chron.

Sir Edw. Deering.

In the Debate of this Declaration, Sir Ralph Hopton deserted his old Friends, and spoke against it with so much Violence that he was committed to the Tower; which rough Treatment was such a Conviction to his Understanding and Conscience, that he abandon'd the Country Interest as long as he liv'd. Sir Edward Deering growing cool in the Debate about Bishops, wherein he had been at first so hot, and afterwards instigating the Kentish-

A.D. 1642 Men to petition against the Militia Bill, was expelled the House and committed to the Tower. Echard says it was for publishing a Book of the Speeches he had made in Parliament; whereas it was rather for a Speech he printed which he had never made, and for which his Book was burnt by the Hands of the common Hangman. Echard misrepresents also the Punishment of Edward Sanderson a Laudian Taylor, which according to him was much more cruel than what was inflicted on Dr. Leighton, Mr. Lilburne, &c. for only calling the Earls of Essex and Warwick TRAYTORS, and wishing King Pym, and Sir John Hotbham hang'd; whereas it was for calling the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament Traytors; for which he was, 1st, Fin'd 100 Marks, Dr. Leighton was fin'd 10000 Pounds; 2d, To stand in the Pillory, Dr. Leighton to be twice pillory'd, and to have both his Ears cut off; 3d, To be whipp'd at the Cart's-Tail, Dr. Leighton to be twice whipp'd, to have his Nose slit, and his Face stigmatiz'd; yet the reverend Historian reflects upon it with his wonted Sincerity, that the Taylor's Sentence was more severe than had been ever pronounced in the Star-Chamber, where Dr. Leighton was sentenced. He takes no Notice of the Offence of one Browning an Essex Parson, who Sir Simon d'Efves said, was a notable Altar-Adorer, in saying, There were forty more Members of the House of Commons, besides the five accus'd Members, who were TRAYTORS; and that the King's entering the House was a just Act. There would be no End of it, if we should mention all such Offences of such Parsons as Browning, who were in a perpetual Rage against the Parliament for asserting the Rights and Liberties of the People, and reforming the Abuses in Church and State. Dr. Calamy tells us that Multitudes of Petitions came from all Quarters against their Ministers, charging them with Insufficiency, False Doctrine, Illegal Innovations, or Scandal. John White Esq; of the Temple, Chairman of the Committee of Reformation, publish'd a Century of scandalous Ministers, which was afterwards follow'd with a second Century; both were fill'd with most abominable Particularities, the concealing which had been a much greater Service to Religion than their Publication, which was but making Sport for Atheists, Papists, and Profane. Now see Mr. Archdeacon's Sincerity, They took Care to place such Preachers and Lecturers in the most populous Places, as were well known to abhor the Church of England; many of whom were impos'd upon the Parishes by the House of Commons; all canonical Clergymen were industriously discountenanced, imprison'd, or forc'd to a tedious Attendance upon the House under the unhappy Name of Scandalous Ministers, tho' they were so scandalous as to make their very Lives a Jest to Atheists and Papists. What ado does he make with his Canonical Clergymen! He has almost provok'd me to name one in our Time, who liv'd so scandalously even in Goal where he was a Prisoner for Debt, that his fellow Prisoners petition'd to be rid of him. But I am sensible People's ill Nature is apt to throw on Generals what is meant of Particulars, so I shall say no more of it.

Bad Clergy

The King, in his Absence, granted a Commis- Bill a- sion for passing two Bills. The first, To take away gainst
the Votes of Bishops in Parliament, and all temporal Bishops Jurisdictions and Offices, as to be Privy-Counsellors, Votes past.
Justices of the Peace, &c. from them, and all others
in Holy Orders: The second was, for pressing of Soldiers for the Service of Ireland. The Archdeacon speaks of the first Bill, as if all Nature had suffer'd Shipwreck, and the whole State was involv'd in the temporal Interests of the Clergy. How much better does a Layman, the Lord Wi-quesfort, understand his own Function than himself. "There are some Clergymen, who look "upon their meddling with temporal Affairs, to "be against God's Command, and contrary to
"the

A.D. 1642. " the Precepts of Christianity. God would not allow the Levites to have any Share with the other Tribes, that their Assiduity and constant Attendance on the Service of the Altar, might not be interrupted by the Care they were oblig'd to take to till their Lands, and preserve their Estates. It is for this Reason he also says, He will be their Portion and their Inheritance: Our Lord Jesus Christ says also, His Kingdom is not of this World: That those who follow him, must renounce all Things, and cast off all Sollicitude for temporal Things, that they may with less Incumbrance travel in the Path they are to follow, during the whole Course of their Lives. There is no serving of two Masters, nor dividing the Heart, which has been once given, and entirely devoted to God. At Venice the Clergy have no Share in the Management of State Affairs, &c." I do not wonder the Archdeacon's Head had no Room for such Reflections; but it is matter of Wonderment that Bishops, such as Laud and Fuxon, should, instead of renouncing all worldly Concerns, take upon them the Management of the Excise and Treasury. The King, says our Reverend Author, divested himself of the Regal Authority, by passing the Bill to take away Bishops Votes, by which Foundations were shaken; they had before been as much shaken, when twenty-seven Abbots and Priors were turn'd out of the House of Peers. It wounded his Majesty's Conscience, which receiv'd no Wound at all when he utterly abolish'd Episcopacy in Scotland about Six Months before. Were there ever such Arguers? And how do the paultry Interests of this miserable World, mislead the Judgment and Consciences of those who shou'd teach us to wean our selves from it? He will not tell us what an insolent French Jesuit said of the King's signing the Commission to pass this Bill at Canterbury, when he was accompanying the Queen to Dover, where she embark'd for Holland, God design'd to humble the English Bishops, in the Original Seat of their Episcopacy, which they had corrupted by their Schism, and so many several Errors. This Historical Dunce has the Impudence thus to abuse the purest Church in the World, I mean the Reformed Church of England; and this is the Historian Mr. Echard formally recommends in the Title Page of the Translation, as if the Work was a whit the better for. A whimsical Fellow, one Griffith, inform'd the House of a Plot to carry off the Prince into France; for which we are told Mr. Hampden took him up in his Arms, and said, my Soul rejoices to see that God hath put it into your Heart to take the right Way: A manner of Expression which agrees exactly with the Character of one of the finest Gentlemen in England, as Mr. Hampden was accounted; though not according to the modern Idea of a fine Gentleman.

Endeavours were us'd in London, to obstruct the executing the Parliament's Ordinance concerning the Militia; and the malignant Party got a Petition sign'd by three or four Hundred Hands against it. The chief Agents in it were Mr. Gardiner, and Mr. Binion, the latter a busy pragmatical Silkman, who were both committed to the Tower; and a Counter Petition was presented by the Citizens, desiring Justice against these seditious Persons, who had obstructed the Ordinance; accordingly the Parliament order'd the first Petition to be burnt by the common Hangman; but when Binion got out of the Tower, he was Knighted, as a Reward for the 3000 Pounds which the Parliament had laid upon him for Sedition and Infidelity: A severe Fine, considering he was not much better than a Bankrupt, though he made a great Bustle.

The two Houses taking into Consideration the Relief of Ireland, Voted, that two Millions and half of Acres of the forfeited Estates should be granted to Adventurers, who would lend Money for that Service. For each Adventure of 200 Pounds, 1000 Acres in Ulster; 300 Pounds, 1000 Acres in Connaught; 450 Pounds, 1000 Acres in Munster; and 600 Pounds, 1000 Acres in Leinster; to which his Majesty consented; and by this Act, no Peace was to be made with the Irish, contrary to the Contents thereof.

Secretary Nicholas sent a merry Letter to the House of Commons, which he had lately receiv'd from a Person of Quality at Venice, giving him to understand, that the Pope was much incens'd at the Proceedings of the Parliament against Romish Priests and Recusants; and if they so proceeded, his Holiness would cause an Army to be rais'd and sent into Ireland; and that the Pope took it ill that the Parliament will not discharge the Seven Priests whom his Majesty had repriev'd. Though this Secretary Nicholas makes but a very ordinary Figure in History, and such a ridiculous Business might have been expected from his Capacity, yet it is strange that all the Counsellors about the King should not have Wisdom enough to hinder the sending such a Letter to the Parliament; for which those who sent it wou'd certainly be either laugh'd to Scorn, or punish'd for countenancing Correspondence with the Pope. The House presently voted an Address to the King, that the seven Priests might be hang'd, and the Capuchin Fryars at Somerset-House be immediately seiz'd, and brought before them.

The Pope and Secretary Nicholas.

From Huntington the King sent a Message to Messengers both Houses, dated the 15th of March, that he intended to make his Residence at his City of York, and thought it necessary to publish, that he expected and requir'd Obedience from all his loving Subjects, to the Laws establish'd: By which was always understood in this Reign, a Power to raise Money without Consent of Parliament, to imprison and press Men at Pleasure, a Submission to the Oppression and Superstition of the Laudan Hierarchy, and the like. Again, and That they presume not, upon any Pretence or Ordinance, to which his Majesty is no Party, concerning the Militia, or any other Thing, to do or execute what is not warrantable by these Laws, his Majesty being resolv'd to keep the Laws himself, as has been plentifully evidenc'd to us in the whole Course of this History, and to require Obedience to them from all his Subjects. Upon the Receipt of this Message, the two Houses came to these Resolutions, 1. " To insist on their former Votes concerning the Militia. 2. That the King's Absence is not only an Obstruction, but may be a Destruction to the Affairs of Ireland. 3. That when the Lords and Commons, which is the supreme Court of Judicature in the Kingdom, shall declare what the Law of the Land is, to have this not only question'd, but contradicted, and a Command that it shou'd not be obey'd, is a high Breach of the Privilege of Parliament. 4. That a Committee be appointed to enquire where this Message was fram'd. 5. That those who advis'd his Majesty to this Message, are Enemies to the Peace of the Kingdom, and justly suspected to be favourers of the Rebellion in Ireland. 6. That those who advis'd his Majesty to absent himself from the Parliament, are Enemies to the Peace of the Kingdom. RESOLV'D, Nem. Cont. That the Ordinance about the Militia, is not any way against the Oath of Allegiance; that the Commission granted under the Great Seal, to the Lieutenants of the several Counties, are illegal and void; and whoever shall exercise any Power over the Militia, by Colour of such Commission, shall be accounted a Disturber of the Peace of the Kingdom; that in Case of extream Danger, and of his Majesty's Refusal, the Ordinance agreed on by both Houses doth oblige the People, and ought to be obey'd by the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom." To these Votes agreed the Lord Keeper Answer.

196 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. of the Great Seal, whose Conscience went still with his Knowledge; but in a few Days he left both them and the Parliament, and made his Escape to York. The very learned and judicious Whitlocke says, "The House of Commons receiv'd great Encouragement and Confirmation in these Votes, from the Opinions of several of their Members, Pym, Hampden, Hollis, Stapleton; and of Lawyers, Sir John Corbet, Lord L'Isle, and several others, chiefly from the confident Opinion of the Lord Keeper Littleton concurring with them."

The King publish'd a Declaration in Answer to that which was read to him at Newmarket; which as has been observ'd, consisted of a positive Denial of the Matters laid to his Charge; and the Parliament justify'd their Declaration, in a Petition which was presented to him at York, March the 26th, wherein they say, "We have lately receiv'd Information from the Deputy-Governor of the Merchant Adventurers at Rotterdam, that an unknown Person appertaining to the Lord Digby, did lately solicit one James Kenelly, a Mariner, to go to Elfinore, and take Charge of a Ship in a Fleet of the King of Denmark's, there prepar'd, which he shou'd conduct to Hull, in which Fleet he said likewise, a great Army was to be transported; and although we are not apt to give Credit to Informations of this Nature, yet we cannot altogether think it fit to be neglected, but that it may justly add somewhat to the Weight of our Fears and Jealousies, considering with what Circumstances it is accompany'd, the Lord Digby's preceding Expressions in his Letter to her Majesty, and Sir Lewis Dives, and your Majesty's succeeding Course of withdrawing your self Northward from your Parliament, in a Manner very suitable and correspondent to that Evil Counsel, &c." This is sober Reasoning, and carries Conviction with it. Digby advis'd the King to possess himself of some Place of Security; and what Place would be more secure than Hull? Father Orleans confesses it was agreed the King should retire into the North, and there make his first Levies. Eschard, though he is let into very few Secrets, declares it was Time now for the King to remove to York; which agrees with what General Ludlow says. The Declarations on both sides proving ineffectual, and the King's Designs, both at Home and Abroad, being grown ripe, he express'd his Dissatisfaction more openly, and withdrew to York. The Reverend Historian tells us, his Indignation was rais'd; and Larrey. It is certain he had a Design upon Hull, and it is then as certain he had a Design to make War upon his Protestant Subjects.

On the 8th of April, the King sent another Message to the Parliament, wherein he declar'd his Intention to go with all Speed to Ireland, to raise 2000 Foot, and 200 Horse, and arm them from the Magazine of Hull, which was to prepare the way for his seizing the whole. Mr. Acherley assures us, This very much alarm'd and discompos'd the two Houses, who doubted not but Ireland was the Place of Strength to which his Majesty was to retire, according to the secret Resolutions taken with the Queen. The Parliament return'd a respectful Answer, and propos'd to raise 6000 Men under the Lord Wharton, for that Service, but the King denied his Commission. There's a haughty Air, and a dry commanding Stile in this King's Messages and Answers, which were good for nothing but to sower Mens Minds, and is as unskilful in Politicks as it wou'd be in Physick, to apply Corrosives instead of Lenitives. To this must be added a Weakness, which is without Example. The King knew that the Parliament had discover'd the Contrivances of sending the Queen to Holland, of his own Journey Northward, of his Queen's Favourites with the Irish, and his own Tendernefs to that murderous Crew, and that the Parliament were A.D. 1642. not so much afraid of them, as of the Designs he was forming against the Protestants in England; yet he offers to go to Ireland with an Army: He cou'd not be at the Head of one any where, but they wou'd be taken by the Parliament to be their most mortal Enemies; and it was very unlikely they would consent to his transporting Forces to Ireland, where there were 40000 Enemies already in Arms against them and their Friends. The Parliament told him so in plain Terms, when he made the Offer for Ireland, "That it cou'd be of no Service, but prejudicial to the Protestants, by whom he was suspected, and advantageous to the Papists, who boasted of his Consent, and wou'd become more bold on his Arrival." Orleans owns his Correspondence with the Irish Catholics had some Appearance of Truth. The Truth is, the Distractions the King occasion'd by his abandoning the Parliament, were a fatal Obstruction to the Relief of Ireland. The two Houses knew not how soon they shou'd want all the Power they could raise for Self-Preservation, and that must perplex their Thoughts as to transporting Forces elsewhere. The King knew all the People of England had the Relief of their Brethren in Ireland at Heart: The Parliament minded him of it in all their Declarations; and this Offer to go himself, was to take off the Odium from him, but it did not succeed; 'twas visible that he obstructed all solid Measures prepar'd for relieving the distress'd English in Ireland, and that he never propos'd any Thing which was not either chimerical or dangerous. The Parliament were in Earnest, as they shew'd with a Vengeance, when they had secur'd themselves against their Enemies in England, and it was for that Security only, that they at any Time postpon'd the Succours, which with their whole Souls they wish'd in Ireland. This is the natural Light this Affair stands in, and we shall say the less hereafter for what is now said.

In the Act for the Irish Adventurers there was a Clause for leaving the Management of that War to the two Houses; and another Clause beforemention'd, by which the King oblig'd himself not to give any Terms to the REBELS, or to make Peace with them without the Parliaments Consent: Both which he did, at the same Time that in all his Speeches, Messages, Answers, &c. he has the Laws, and the Laws of the Land, almost in every Paragraph, in a Supposition that the People did not know how he had observ'd them, or that he had ever broken them: Upon this Act considerable Sums of Money were brought in; and says Ludlow, "The Parliament neglected no Opportunity to carry on so necessary a War. They procur'd some Forces to be sent from Scotland into the North of Ireland; and they also dispatch'd several Regiments of English thither, who were bless'd with wonderful Success against the Rebels." That General afterwards commanded in Chief in that Kingdom, but it seems was not so well acquainted with Affairs there, as Archdeacon Eschard, who says, "The War was carry'd on by such slow Steps, that the Irish Rebels daily increas'd in Strength, and by Rumours of the Parliament's Preparations, enlarg'd their Power. The Parliament were willing to drive them to Extremity, out of Revenge and Contempt, as a People easy to be crush'd." We shall find the King's best Officers among them in the Course of our History.

The King being settled at York, the reverend The King Historian tells us, "Most Persons of Quality of at York. that great County and Parts adjacent resorted to him, many Persons of Condition from London, some out of a Sense of Duty and Gratitude, and others out of Indignation against the Parliament; so that in a short time the Court appear'd with Lustre," which is the more to be admir'd at, because he owns presently after, the most Illustrious were

A.D. 1642. were afraid, or ashamed of being seen, for why else were they oblig'd to be Incognito. General Ludlow writes, "Several Lords, and others, affected to his Interest, resorted to him with Plate, Money, Horses and Arms, amongst whom were many Papists, who, though to cover the King's Designs, they were forbidden to come to Court, were yet privately encourag'd, and daily list'd and arm'd; and as the Distance of York from the Parliament was one Reason, so its Nearness to Hull was another.

Hotham at Hull.

At the same Time that the House of Commons sent to Colonel Goring, Governor of Portsmouth, to secure that Town, they dispatch'd Sir John Hotham to secure Hull; both were faithful to them at first, and both at last basely betray'd them. Mr. Hotham, Sir John's Son, posted away thither before his Father, who had Orders to put a Garrison of the Train'd-Bands nearest the Place, into the Town, for the Security of the Magazine there. Mr. Hotham, who was also a Member of Parliament, stood up in the Gallery of the House before he went, and said, Fall Back, fall Edge, I will go down and perform your Commands. The House of Commons had certain Information of the Design form'd against that Magazine and Town, and it was the Place of Strength the Lord Digby would have had the King retire to, where he might receive Assistance from Abroad. They had Notice also, that the Earl of Newcastle was sent by the King to possess himself of it, and was prevented only by the Parliaments and Hotham's Diligence.

Having mention'd the last Petition of the two Houses to the King, which was presented by the Lord Willoughby, the Lord Dungarvon, and Sir Anthony Irbys, on the 26th of March, we must also say something of his Answer, though they are all so disagreeable, that one can't take much Delight in it: We are resolv'd that no Streights or Necessities to which we may be reduc'd, shall ever compel us to do that which the Reason and Understanding that God hath given us, and our Honour and Interest with which God hath trusted us, for the Good of our Posterity and Kingdoms, shall render unpleasant and grievous to us. It was generally suspected that the King, who heartily repented of the popular Acts he had past, intended to have them made null and void, on Account of a pretended Force upon him, when it was in his Power to do it. The Parliament speak of it in this Petition; and in his Answer he said, I defy the Devil to prove there was any such Design. The Reverend Historian joins the Parliament with the Devil, which is more than the King himself did; and being false as well as scandalous, would have brought the Author into Danger of Sanderford's Punishment, if the Long Parliament had had the handling of him. The two Houses nominated the Earl of Warwick to be Admiral of the Fleet in the Room of the Earl of Northumberland, who was indispos'd, and on whose Indisposition and Recovery, Waller has a fine Copy of Verses, of which this is the last Distich; speaking of his Lordship, and his charming Sister, the Countess of Carlisle.

*With Courage guard, and Beauty warm our Age,
And Lovers fill with like poetick Rage.*

This is the Lady who Warwick says had two Gallants, the Earl of Strafford, and Mr. Pym; and this Warwick is the ingenious judicious Author, whom Mr. Echard has copy'd almost Word for Word.

The King appointed Sir John Pennington to be Admiral; the same who forc'd the English Ships to join the French Fleet against the Protestants in Rockelle; more Fatality! He receiv'd a Petition from the two Houses, that they might remove the Magazine from Hull to the Tower, where the Stores had been pretty well drain'd by the Supplies for

Ireland: But the King, says Larrey, had no more A.D. 1642. Complaisance for the Parliaments Requests, than they had for his; and being jealous of each others Intentions, from their mutual Refusal, they now thought of nothing but War, which is a short and plain State of the Case, and would save hundreds of Pages in the Earl of Clarendon's History, where he guesses, conjectures and Subtilizes without knowing it, and is every where wretchedly copy'd by Echard. His Majesty finding there was no way of satisfying the two Houses and their Adherents, but by complying a little in the Business of the Militia, order'd the Attorney-General to draw up a Bill of the same Tenure with the Ordinance, only limiting the Time to a Year; which being offer'd to the Parliament, they took no Notice of it. Larrey proceeds, "But before they came to an open Rupture, the King, who could not deceive the Parliament, endeavour'd to surprize the Governor of Hull, and coming into the Neighbourhood of that Town, accompany'd by some Gentlemen of the Country, and 300 of his Horse-Guards, he drew nearer and nearer, and sent Sir Lewis Dives to tell the Governor, Sir John Hotham, he would dine with him, a Stratagem which had not the least Prospect of Success, if his Majesty had not before-hand made sure of Sir John, which he was so far from having done, that Hotham hearing of his Approach, sent three Messengers one after another, with an humble Petition to desist, and come no nearer to the Town, where were at that Time, the 23d of April, St. George's Feast, the Duke of York, the Prince Elector, the Earl of Newport, the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, and other Persons of Quality, whom the Mayor and Governor entertain'd with great Respect: Sir John Hotham having held a Consultation with Mr. Pelham, a Member of Parliament, and Alderman of Hull, what to do in that Emergency, it was resolv'd to draw up the Bridge, shut the Gates, and command the Soldiers to stand to their Arms round the Walls. His Majesty about Eleven a Clock, advancing to Beverley Gate, call'd for the Governor, and commanded it to be open'd; but though he reiterated his Command, he could get no other Answer from Sir John Hotham, than I am intrusted by the Parliament to secure the Town for his Majesty's Honour, and the Kingdom's Use, which I intend by God's Help to do. He desir'd the King not to misinterpret his Action, protesting his Loyalty; and proffering if his Majesty would be pleas'd to come in with the Prince, and twelve more, he should be very welcome, otherwise he could not, without betraying his Trust to the State, admit Entrance to so great a Guard. His Majesty refus'd to enter without his whole Train. About one a Clock, the Duke of York, the Prince Elector, and the Lords who accompany'd them, went forth to the King, who departed not from the Gates till four a Clock, and then return'd an Hour after, when he gave Sir John Hotham one Hour to consider what he did; who then giving the same Answer as he had done before, his Majesty commanded him to be proclaim'd Traitor by two Heralds at Arms, which frighten'd Sir John Hotham as much as if it had been done by twenty. The King retreated to Beverley in great Confusion, and the next Morning sent a Herald, and others, with Offers of Pardon to Sir John, if yet he would open the Gates; but as yet he was deaf to Threats, or Flattery, and remain'd true to the Trust his Country had depos'd in him: So the King return'd to York, and sent a Message to the Parliament, to demand Justice against Hotham, and that immediately the Magazine he deliver'd up to him; and till this be done, he will intend no other Business; to be in worse Condition than the meanest Subject, not to enjoy his own; which is as Sophistical as the rest. He was not in a worse Condition. If the meanest of his Subjects had Possession of the Weapons of another

King at Hull.

198 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. ther Man, who, as he had certain Intelligence, intended to use them against him; all Laws, Human and Divine, allow'd that Subject in the Detention of those Weapons, though the Property was in that other Man. Every one of the Declarations, Messages and Answers, are as easily confuted, but indeed they do not want Confutation. It is not doubted, if the King had possess'd himself of that Place of Arms, he would soon have rais'd Forces enough at Home, and have receiv'd them from Abroad, to have fallen upon the Parliament and their Friends, unprovided for War, and have destroy'd them, according to the Scheme in the Jesuit Orleans's Revolutions, "To secure some Place of Strength, meaning first Hull, says Acherley, which was the sole Motive of his Journey Northward, in order to get the Magazine of Arms; and that in Case of Disappointment, his Majesty should go into Ireland, and never come to any Accommodation with the Parliament." The French Jesuit goes farther, and allows, that the King never intended to let any of the popular Acts he had pass'd, continue as Laws: All Mankind believ'd, says he, That the King did not grant so much, but in order to revoke all; and that he underhand was preparing for War, that the Sword might cut all those Knots he had made with his Pen. 'Twas the certain Information of this Scheme, and the Prosecution of it, which made the Parliament insist so obstinately on the Militia Bill; and it was the certain Design to pursue it, which made the King refuse it with the like Obstinacy. His Majesty order'd the Express from the Parliament to Hull to be way-laid; an illegal Act, and justifiable only in Time of open War: The Parliament, as they had good Reason, voted it a breach of Privilege, and RESOLV'D to defend their Privileges with their Lives and Fortunes: They justify'd Sir John Hotham, and order'd the Sheriffs and Justices of the Peace to suppress all Forces that shall be rais'd, or gather'd together against Hull, or to disturb the Peace. Echard, who thinks as wildly as any one, outdoes himself in his Thought on this Occasion, the Gentlemen of Yorkshire would have taken the Town of Hull with Yorkshire Men; whereas in Truth, Sir John Hotham, by Virtue of his Warrants from the Parliament, summon'd the Train'd-Bands of that County to appear at Hull with their Arms; and when he had them there, he disarm'd them, and turn'd them home again, according to Whislocke. There is no following the Reverend Historian in any Part of his History, where the Disputes between the King and Parliament are in Question; and here he takes particular Care to lay the whole Blame of the War on the two Houses; War was too remote from the King's Thoughts; the King well saw the impending Storm. It is justly believ'd, that had the King, with the Forces of the Nobility and Gentry, boldly attack'd the Town, it had been surrender'd; and a few Lines after, Sir John Hotham was better able to take York, than the King to take Hull. Such a Head as this, was most equal to the Work he undertook, and the Cause he espous'd, which is, to make the Parliament the Aggressors in Words and Deeds; when there is nothing more notorious in Chronicle, than that this King, from the beginning of his Reign to the meeting of this Parliament, had suffer'd his Ministers and the Laudean Bishops to commit all Acts of Tyranny, Oppression and Cruelty, under Colour of Courts of Justice, such as the Star-Chamber, High-Commission, Strafford's Northern-Court, &c. and that he had no Regard to the Rights, Liberties and Properties of the Free People of England, as appears by his Imprisonment of Members of Parliament, great Merchants, and eminent Citizens, by his violating their most ancient Privileges, and extorting illegal Taxes; yet as has been observ'd, and must be again, he speaks of nothing more than the Fundamental Laws, the Laws of the Land, which in the Interpretation he A.D. 1642. intends the Sovereign Power, as it was corrupted and abus'd in his Administration, and not that Sovereign Power under which the Three Kingdoms have been so safe, so happy, and so glorious, ever since the Abdication of King James, the last Male Monarch of the House of Stuart. The two Houses take Notice in one of their Papers, of that malignant Party, who by false Colours and Pretensions of maintaining your Majesty's Prerogative against the Parliament, wherein they fully agree with the REBELS in Ireland, have been the Causes of all our Distempers and Dangers; and if the Lord Clarendon, and Mr. Echard, have not also maintain'd the Prerogative against the Parliament, I have done them much Wrong.

The two Houses order'd a Committee; the Earl York of Samford, the Lord Willoughby of Parham, Sir Edward Ayscough, Sir Christopher Wray, Sir Samuel colnshire Committee. Owfield, Mr. Hatcher, to repair to the Counties of Tork and Lincoln, and Town of Kingston upon Hull, for the Peace and Safety of the Kingdom; and they requir'd all Lord Lieutenants, and all other Officers and Magistrates, to be aiding and assisting to them. The King wrote a Letter, dated the 5th of May, to the Sheriff of Torkshire, a trusty one, Sir Marmaduke Longdale, to forbid the mustering of the Militia by Ordinance of Parliament; and if any did Muster, he requir'd him to raise the Power of the County and suppress them: He also publish'd a Proclamation, forbidding the Relief of Hull; another Military Act, practis'd in War Time only, and in Sieges and Blockades; and every one King be- knows, that to starve a Town is as much making gins the War against it, as to batter or storm it: The Parliament are as yet in Peace, and 'tis to argue with Madmen and Idiots, that this is not the beginning of the War.

About a Fortnight before his Majesty's March to Hull, the Gentry, Ministers, and Freeholders of Torkshire, presented a Petition to him, wherein, after very strong Expressions of Duty and Loyalty, they pray him to declare such fit Means and Expedients, as may take away all Distances and Misunderstandings betwixt his Majesty and his great Council. The King, in his Answer, highly commended them for their Loyalty, in relying upon his Word for the Propagation of the Protestant Religion, and advis'd them to propose to the Parliament the settling the Militia as he would have it, which he said was the fittest Means and Expedient to take away all Distances and Misunderstandings; but that was too gross to take with them.

A Committee of the House of Commons; Lord York Com- Fairfax, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir Philip Stapleton, mittee. Sir Henry Cholmley, and some of the best Gentlemen of Torkshire, was order'd to remain at Tork. They had deliver'd the Parliaments Answer to his Majesty's Message about Hull, which the King not liking, gave Orders they would return back; but they excus'd their Stay, because commanded so to do by those who employ'd them; and being Gentlemen of the best Remark in that County, they had surely as good Reason to reside in it, as the Gentry to whom the King made a Speech the 12th of May, wherein he admonish'd them to take Heed lest the Committee, their Countrymen, should corrupt them, and told them, he was resolv'd to have a Guard. It goes on gradually. To which these Gentry reply'd, They willingly concurr'd in his Majesty's Preparations for a Guard, consisting of Persons unquestionable in their Religion. The Reply was made for them, the King thank'd them particularly for excluding Papists. He must have a very mean Opinion of the People's Understandings, to think that wou'd pass upon them. We must know, however, that this same Guard was not so well approv'd of by the Torkshire Gentlemen, as the Earl of Clarendon and Echard wou'd make us believe. Nor did they understand the raising

A.D. 1642. raising of it as the King understood it. They declar'd they wou'd not interpose in the Business of Hull, but wou'd serve him with their Lives and Fortunes as far as his Majesty shou'd be pleas'd legally to enable them. In another Address they said, the best Advice they cou'd offer him, was to hearken to the Counsels of his Parliament. In another they besought him to impart the Grounds of his Fears and Jealousies to his High Court of Parliament, of whose most loyal Care and Affection to his Majesty's Honour and Safety, and Prosperity of his Subjects and Dominions, they were most confident. They added in Behalf of those Members of Parliament lately employ'd to attend his Majesty from both Houses, being all of them Gentlemen of Quality and Estate in this County, and trusted to serve in that most honourable Assembly; they humbly crave his Majesty's Leave to express their Confidence in their untainted Loyalty and Affection to his Majesty to be such, as his Majesty may securely admit their Attendance; and for their Fidelity they do all engage themselves. Mr. Archdeacon affirms they continu'd at York in perfect Defiance of the King. The same Gentlemen told his Majesty he might depend on the general Fidelity of his Subjects in that County without an extraordinary Guard; and there were but few Gentlemen or Freeholders who approv'd of the Guard of Horse, knowing full well that 'twas only a Pretext to begin his Levies according to the Scheme of which they cou'd not all be entirely ignorant; so very false is what the Archdeacon tells us; that they generally and cheerfully agreed. The Committee of Parliament in a Letter to their Principals inform them, that several thousand Freeholders came to York and enter'd their Protest against concurring in a Guard; that the Committee of twelve Yorkshire Gentlemen, who were appointed to give Answer to his Majesty's Proposition about it, were divided; six were for the Answer as deliver'd to the King, and six were for the Answer wherein they told his Majesty he was safe without an extraordinary Guard; and this Answer the greater Part of the Gentlemen and Freeholders agree to. I will make no Excuse for treating Echar'd almost as rudely as he treats the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled, till I find somebody that can clear him of this audacious and incredible Falstiy. They generally and cheerfully agreed for a Guard. It consisted of a Troop of Horse, of which the Prince of Wales was Captain, and a Regiment of Foot of about six hundred Men, which was the first Levy of Troops in the Civil War, and was justly taken to be the beginning by those who did not allow the starving of Hull to be a warlike Act. Mr. Acherley speaks of it thus; Such a Body of Men might by an expeditious March, easily have enter'd the House of Commons, and dispers'd the UNARM'D Parliament, who look'd on that Proceeding as a clear Evidence of his Majesty's Intentions to make War upon them, in Pursuance of the before-mention'd Scheme form'd in the King's Cabinet-Council at Windsor just before the Queen's Departure for Holland, as we read in Orleans. "If this Scheme and Resolution be admitted to be true, says the judicious Acherley, then it is obvious that the Cause of the War was the Invitation of the Scots Invasions, and the End of it the Punishment of the Inviters;" which must have caus'd a Deluge of the best Blood in England, and the rescinding of the Acts of Reformation pass'd in this Parliament.

Upon News of the King's levying Forces in Yorkshire, the two Houses voted, "That he intend"ed to make War against the Parliament, contra"ry to his Oath, and tending to the Dissolution of "his Government; and that whosoever shou'd
"serve or assist him in such Wars, shou'd be ac"counted TRAYTORS by the fundamental Laws
"of the Land; and that the same had been ad-
"judg'd by two Acts of Parliament, 2 Rich. 2.

" and 1 Hen. 4. and that they ought to suffer as " Traytors. A.D. 1642.

The Ordnance for the Militia having had the Sanction of both Houses, the Lord-Lieutenants who were nam'd for the several Counties, were empower'd to act and appoint Deputy-Lieutenants; the Lord Paget Lord-Lieutenant of Buckinghamshire, nam'd Mr. Hampden, Mr. Goodwyn, Mr. Greenville, Mr. Tyrrel, Mr. Winwood, and Mr. Whitlocke, to be his Deputy-Lieutenants; and by their Names only we may know that the Gentlemen of the best Characters espous'd the Cause of the Parliament: For tho' many Gentlemen of Distinction deserted that Cause out of a lawless Desire to lord it over their fellow Subjects, or out of a vain Ambition for Titles and Dignities, or out of base Envy and Jealousy of the leading Senators, whose illustrious Virtues gave their weak Eyes the Jaundice; yet the most sober, the most wise, and most religious, were steady in their good English Principles both as to Church and State. The Lord-Keeper Littleton was not only confident in his Opinion for the Legality of this Ordnance, but accepted of the Lieutenancy of two or three Counties, nam'd his Deputies, and often ask'd the Clerk of the House of Lords for his Deputations, commanding him to deliver them to one of his Servants, which accordingly was done. He also agreed to the several Forms of those Deputations, and never made the least Objection to the Ordnance as against Law and antient Usage. Of the same Opinion were those great Lawyers Serjeant Maynard, Serjeant Glyn, Mr. Grimston, Mr. St. John, and Mr. Selden, who all accepted of Deputations from the Lord Lieutenants, and continu'd in the Parliament Service.

The King resolving to adjourn Easter Term from London to York, the Parliament voted it to be illegal, and order'd the Lord-Keeper not to issue Writs or Proclamation for that Purpose. The Court at York shew'd in their Conduct that they matter'd not how prejudicial any of their Counsels were to the Publick, or how little beneficial to themselves, if the Parliament were anger'd or oblig'd by them.

On the 10th of May the two Houses publish'd Parliament a large Declaration much to the same Effect as Declaration the former were, mentioning that the Rebellion on May 19. was countenanc'd in Ireland by the evil Counsellors about the King; that the proclaiming the Irish Traytors, had been deferr'd from October to January, and then but forty Copies order'd to be printed, nor any of them to be publish'd without the King's Order; whereas the Proceedings against the Scots, and proclaiming them Traytors were very sharp. This was very barefac'd; and it is astonishing that Persons who pretended a Zeal for the Protestant Religion, shou'd take Arms for the Support of a Government which did so much to support that horrid Rebellion.

The King repeated what he had said before to evade this Charge, and wrote to the Council in Scotland to acquaint them with the State of his Affairs in England; to which he receiv'd a dutiful and affectionate Answer, with a Petition from several Noblemen and Gentlemen, full of Zeal and Loyalty to his Service; which the Parliament hearing of, took a Course to turn the Ballance, and within eight Days after the Scots Council declare their earnest Desires both to King and Parliament to join in a perfect Union, and humbly desire the King to hearken to his best and most unparallel'd Council. They dissuade him from a personal Journey to Ireland, and pray that a Mediation be at Home before the Breach be wider. In the Close they manifest their true and hearty Affection to the Parliament of England, protesting to do nothing contrary to them in their Privileges. A Multitude of People at Edinburgh hearing of his Majesty's Letter to the Council there, and of the Answer to it, petition'd the

200 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. the Council not to meddle by any verbal or real Engagement for the King against the Parliament of England; which gave great Encouragement to their Friends in both Kingdoms.

Order about Arms and Soldiers going to York.

On the 28th of May the Parliament order'd that all Sheriffs, Justices of Peace, &c. within one hundred and fifty Miles of York, shou'd make Stay of all Arms and Ammunition carrying to York, and apprehend the Conveyers; and that all Sheriffs do supptels all Forces coming together by the King's Commission, and all Persons to aid them. The King in return forbids Obedience to any Ordinance of Parliament concerning the Militia, and summons the whole County of York to meet him at Heworth-Moor at a certain Day, which the Parliament declare to be against Law, and forbid Obedience. He told the Yorkshire Men, we cannot but declare our self most heartily sorry to find such Separatists and Schismatics, who presume against the Law; against which no Protestant Prince ever presum'd so much as his Majesty to foment new Doctrines and Disciplines. The King did not expect that a Puritan or Presbyterian wou'd draw a Sword for him; but considering the Bent of the Nation turn'd that Way, where was the Policy of speaking against them to the Men of Yorkshire, where they abounded as much as in any Part of England? Besides, as this is meant of the Puritans, there is not a Babe in Divinity but knows that the Doctrine of the Holy Scriptures, and the Discipline of the Apostolical Bishops, such as Titus and Timothy, which they only profess'd according to their primitive Purity, are many hundred Years older than the Romish Hierarchy and Idolatry, which, as Echard tells us, were rival'd by Laud: The King in a Declaration of his, descends to a Reflection which has still more Poverty in it, and that is the imputing the Madnefs and Rage of some German Enthusiasts, not only to those Dissenters in England who go under the Denomination of Baptists, who have that Dutch Enthusiasm in Abhorrence as much as Laud's Superstition, but also to the whole Parliament of England. Can we with Safety commit the Militia into their Hands, who in all Probability would be no sooner possess'd of it, than they wou'd revive that Tragedy which Mr. Hooker relates of the Anabaptists in Germany, who talking of nothing but of Faith and of the true Fear of God, and that Riches and Honours were Vanity, at first upon the great Opinion of their Humility, Zeal, and Devotion, procur'd much Reverence and Estimation with the People; after finding how many Persons they had enjoin'd with their Hypocrisy, they began to propose to themselves to reform both the Ecclesiastical and Civil Government. By which is understood, that all the Votes and Declarations of the Parliament tending to the reforming of Abuses in Church and State, of which we shall see presently the King himself has confess'd enough to shew the Necessity of a Reformation, were nothing better than the Effects of the Hypocrisy and Fury of the Rabble at Munster. I do not repeat his Majesty's Answers and Declarations at large, for they will not bear it; they are so full of Evasions, Colourings, Concealings, Assertions, and Denials, positive and arbitrary, that one can learn little by them of the Merits of the Cause; and when Mr. Hyde comes to have the penning of them, they are so full of Words, or as Warwick says, so redundant, we are lost as in a Labyrinth. Mr. Archdeacon tells us with his usual Consistence, The Leaders in the Parliament were confident there wou'd be no War, therefore prepar'd for it accordingly both with Men and Money. This Preparation was the mustering the Train'd-Bands of London in Finsbury-Fields before the Members of both Houses of Parliament, who were there treated by the City. The King immediately sent for Major-General Skippon, who appear'd at the Head of the Militia, to attend him at York, but the Parliament voted that he shou'd attend their Service as Captain of the Guards which did Duty near the Two Houses; and if Guards were necessary, surely the Attendance of the Captain must be of equal Necessity; and the sending for him cou'd be done with no other Design than to increase the Jealousies of the Parliament, and turn all Hope into Despair. The reverend Historian highly resents the Parliament's Orders to seize one Beckwith, who was in a Plot to deliver Hull to the King, but he thinks that he was a Papist, and as my Author adds, a great Favourite at Court. The Town was to be fir'd in several Quarters upon a Sign made from Beverley Minster; and while the Townsmen were busy'd in putting out the Fire, two thousand of the King's Forces were to assault it in several Places, and the Parliament's Officer, with whom Beckwith corresponded, and who discover'd the Treason, was at the same time to open a Gate. Mr. Archdeacon, whose History is so well ornamented with the Ridiculum, assures us it was a very ridiculous Thing to take up Beckwith, and not to take up Hotbam; but Beckwith was protected by the Court at York, and the Serjeant who came for him and other Delinquents, was us'd worse than the Committee of the Parliament who resided there, and were hiss'd when they read any thing from the Lords and Commons; at which I do not wonder, for it must be such sort of Creatures who wou'd take Arms in the Defence of arbitrary Power, Superstition, Idolatry, and Profaneness. If afterwards Men of a better Character join'd with them, it was out of Caution, Ambition, Jealousy, or Vanity, and for want of making a right Use of their Understanding. Some of the Courtiers, the Lunsfords probably, said openly, Let the Parliament Men look about them, some of 'em will soon be shorter by the Head. One Hurst a Retainer to the Lord Crofts, insulted the Committee, and was rather encourag'd than punish'd.

The Lord-Keeper Littleton, who had been a main Promoter of the Militia Bill, being requir'd to deliver up the Seal to one Elliot who was sent from York on purpose, comply'd with the Order, and the next Day follow'd Elliot himself to York. When he was upbraided with Abjection in surrendering his Office which the Parliament wou'd have supported him in, he excus'd himself on account of an Oath he had privately taken before the Seal was deliver'd to him, that he wou'd surrender it to the King at Demand; an odd sort of Oath, which shew'd some Foresight at least of the future Difference between the King and the two Houses. The Desertion of the Keeper, as Echard wou'd have us believe, threw the Parliament into Distraction; This great Man left them for their Exorbitancies. All which is of a Piece, and unworthy a Scholar at Westminster. He did not leave the Parliament for Exorbitancies, but for fear of being question'd after he had so tamely parted with the Seal; and he had himself been a principal Promoter of the Militia Business, which was the greatest Exorbitancy the Parliament was ever guilty of. Whitlocke says the King and Court did not regard him.

Ld-Keeper Littleton goes to York.

By the Desertion of several Lords and Commons at Westminster, the Court at York became numerous. Ludlow has told us what ungenerous Sentiments those Deserters were act'd by; to which we have added the Envy of some Members to the Superiority of others in the Favour of the Two House; yet nothing can be falser than that there was not a fifth Part of the House of Commons, nor above twelve Peers; for at that Time, about the Middle of June, there were four hundred Members of the House of Commons attending the Service of the House in Parliament or in the Country, or absent with Leave; and in the Upper House above thirty Peers. The King himself who magnify'd his Interest in the Number of his Attendants, did not pretend they were greater in Tale, but

The Comparison is too mean for History, and as much without Decency as Foundation. The Names of Northumberland, Bedford, Hampden, Holles, &c. sufficiently shew the Vanity of it. I am sensible this is trifling, but I was led into it by a very great Trifler, and by Declarations, Messages, Histories, and Characters. The People, says Echard, were every Day recovering from their superstitious Reverence to the Two Houses, and grew every Day sensible of their Duty to the King. This Duty throughout all their Histories, is the same with that Allegiance which the Subjects owe to Sovereigns that make the Law the Measure of their Government; which how King Charles the First did, how his Father and his two Sons did, has and will be seen from one End of this History to the other, especially in the following nineteen Propositions sent to the King at York, as the surest Means to prevent a Breach of the Peace.

Nineteen Propositions.

1. "The King's Ministers and Counsellors to be approv'd by Parliament.
2. "Privy-Counsellors to sign the Opinion they give at the Council-Board.
3. "Great Officers of State to be approv'd by Parliament.
4. "As also the Government of the King's Children,
5. "And their Marriages.
6. "The Laws against Papists to be executed.
7. "No Popish Lord to vote in Parliament.
8. "A Reformation in the Church and Liturgy.
9. "The Militia Ordinance to be confirm'd.
10. "All Members of Parliament who have been displac'd during this Session, to be restor'd.
11. "All Privy-Counsellors and Judges to take an Oath to maintain the Petition of Right.
12. "All Officers plac'd by Parliament, to hold their Places quam diu se bene gesserint.
13. "Delinquents to be punish'd.
14. "A general Pardon with certain Exceptions.
15. "Forts and Castles to be dispos'd of by Parliament.
16. "The King's new Forces to be disbanded.
17. "His Majesty to enter into Alliance with all reform'd States for the Recovery of the Palatinate; a Clause the Parliament always had at Heart, and all their Enemies treated with Neglect and Contempt.
18. "The Lord Kimbolton and the Five Members to be clear'd.
19. "No Peer to sit hereafter in Parliament without their Consent.

The French Jesuit says these Proposals were very sawcy, but the following Expressions at the end of them have no Sawce at all in them: These humble Requests being granted to us by your Majesty, we shall endeavour, as we ought, to regulate the Revenue of your Majesty, and to increase it more and more in such sort, that it shall support the Dignity Royal with Honour and Abundance, beyond whatever the Subjects of this Kingdom allow'd to the Kings your Majesty's Predecessors. We will also put the Town of Hull into such Hands as your Majesty shall please with the Approbation of Parliament, and will give a good Account of the Munitions of War, and of the Magazine. To conclude, we shall cheerfully do our Endeavours to give unto your Majesty Testimony of our Affection, Duty, and Faithfulness to preserve and maintain your Royal Honour, the Greatness and Safety of your Majesty and your Posterity. This according to Echard was receiv'd with great Indignation, it being much more easy to disdain than to answer. However, the Indignation was not so great, but that his Majesty in the Reply he made to it, allow'd and admitted many of the legal Rights which justly belong'd to every one of the three Estates, A.D. 1642 King, Lords, and Commons; and says the learned Lawyer, one wou'd have thought that Declaration which was so plain and honourable, might have been the Foundation for a good Agreement. It may be wonder'd why the Lord Clarendon took no notice of so bright a Part of the King's Answer, unless the Omission infer somebody's Insincerity, the King's or his own; and thus I am not the only Person who says the Book call'd Clarendon's History is not sincere. Mr. Archdeacon calls the Propositions unheard-of. But the same learned Author who condemns the Lord Clarendon for Insincerity, adds, The Omission in Echard of that material Part, is not disagreeable to the rest of his Misrepresentation; for that Historian has spar'd no Pains to represent his Majesty's DEPARTING from the Rules of Law to an arbitrary Power to be in all Things RIGHT, and the Parliament's Proceedings to reduce that arbitrary Power, to be in all Things WRONG; whereas this Royal Declaration was a contradictory Judgment proceeding out of the King's own Mouth, whereby most of the Steps of his own Government before this Parliament, stand condemn'd as illegal; and yet Echard has rack'd his Invention to honour and even adore the one, and disparage the other with the most affecting Epithets, as far as his Capacity and Elocution extended; for his Praise is the most nauseous Flattery, and his Dispraise the most stupid Malice which ever dropp'd from so voluminous an Historian. Mr. Acherley, as sober and judicious a Writer as any in our Time, charges Echard with racking his Invention to abuse the Lords and Commons of England; which I think is the worst Sort of Falshood, and he speaks not much better of Clarendon, which I hope is some Excuse for the honest Liberty I have taken and shall take with both of them. Mr. Acherley has collected some of his Majesty's Confessions quite contrary to the Lord Clarendon's and Mr. Echard's Histories, which are thus prov'd to be false by King Charles the First's Account of himself: He admitted that before this Parliament he had departed from the known Laws to an arbitrary Power, and that great Mischiefs had grown from the Exercise of that arbitrary Power, and that the Pressures and Sufferings of his Subjects had proceeded from the long Intermission of Parliaments; and therefore his Majesty had resolv'd, without putting any Gloss upon his former Commands, which the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard put for him in almost every Paragraph of their Histories, or endeavouring to make any Excuse for his Ministers Buckingham, Strafford, Laud; and he promis'd that the Measure of his Justice and Favour by way of Reparation, shou'd far exceed the Oppressions and Sufferings his good Subjects had undergone. Yet in all his Messages, Answers, Declarations, Proclamations, there are no Expressions repeated with more Tautology than the Laws, the Laws of the Land, the fundamental Laws, tho' those Laws had been so much invaded and abus'd, as by the King's own Confessions; yet himself, or the Penman of those Papers, endeavour'd to impose upon the People that the King had kept to the Letter of them, and was now forc'd to take Arms in their Defence.

King confesses his illegal Acts.

While his Majesty was caressing the Torkshire Militia Gentry and Freeholders, and lifting them in his Troops, the Parliament order'd all Deputy-Lieutenants to be present at Musters, pursuant to Warrants issu'd by the Lord-Lieutenants of the several Counties. They also made an Order for bringing in Horses and Arms, Money and Plate, for the Defence of the King and Parliament, and for preserving the publick Peace: This was after his Majesty had commanded Commissions of Array to be issu'd in most Parts of England, which is another beginning of the War on his Side. His Commission for Leicestershire was directed to the Earl of Huntington, the Earl of Devon, Henry Hastings Esq; Son to the Earl of Huntington, Sir Henry Berkley,

A.D. 1642. Berkley, Sir George Villiers, Sir Thomas Burton, Sir Henry Skipwith, Sir John Skeffington, Sir Richard Holford, Sir Wolstan Dixie, Sir Richard Roberts, Sir John Bolle, Sir Thomas Hartop, Sir Erasmus de la Fontaine, Sir William Jones, Henry Hastings Esq; George Asbby Esq; and John Hale Esq; some of whom would not accept of the Honour, as George Asbby Esq; and Sir Thomas Hartop, whom I find among the Parliament's Commissioners, as will be seen next Year. The House of Commons upon the Question, voted the Commission to be against Law, against the Liberty and Property of the Subject. This did not hinder these Array-men, who understanding there was a Magazine of Arms and Ammunition laid up at Leicester by the Earl of Stamford Lord-Lieutenant of the County, order'd Mr. Hastings the Sheriff to seize it. Accordingly he came to Leicester with a good Troop of Horse under Pretence of guarding the Judges at the Assizes, which the Committee of Parliament in the North having Notice of, Information was given to the Two Houses, who order'd three Companies of Foot to be rais'd for the Defence of the Magazine. The Captains nominated for this Employment, were Major Gray, Dr. Bastwick, and Captain Ludlow the General's Brother, who repair'd to Leicester to raise their Companies, but before they had compleated them, the King with all his Cavalry, consisting of about two thousand Horse, arriv'd at Leicester, against whom three Companies being no way sufficient to defend the Town, the three Officers resolv'd only to secure the Place where the Magazine lay; which not being large enough to receive above one Company, Major Gray remain'd there with his Men, and Dr. Bastwick and Captain Ludlow dispers'd theirs, and set forwards for London, but had not rode many Miles before they were seiz'd by the Sheriff's Troop, brought back to Leicester, and from thence sent to the common Goal at York; where, according to the Cavalier manner, they were cruelly treated. These were the first Prisoners, and the King's Men took them. Major Gray capitulated, and the Magazine was sent to the several Parts of the County for which it was provided.

The Parliament, who by no means wanted Intelligence, had early Intimation of the Queen's carrying off the Crown Jewels to pawn them in Holland, against which they pass'd a Vote, declaring all such as brought Money into England which was borrow'd upon them, or paid any Bill upon that Account, to be Promoters of the War intended by the King, and to be Enemies to the State.

A Committee was appointed to take Care that all Votes and Orders of the House should be divulg'd, dispers'd, and publish'd; which Committee were Sir Walter Erle, Sir Peter Wentworth, Sir Samuel Rolle, Arthur Goodwyn Esq; Mr. Pury, Mr. Noble;

The House of Lords took into Consideration the Desertion of several Peers to the King at York, and voted an Order for their Appearance on Pain of Delinquency. A Summons was sent to them, and they return'd an Answer the 4th of June, subscrib'd by Northampton, Devonshire, Dover, Monmouth, Rich. Andover, Grey of Ruthen, Coventry, Capel; wherein they told the House of Lords, they hop'd no Character would be fix'd upon them but what became Men of Honour to bear. The House of Commons impeach'd them for deserting the Parliament, and refusing to return upon Summons, and the Lords pass'd Sentence against them not to sit or vote in that House during this Session of Parliament, not to enjoy parliamentary Privilege, and to stand committed to the Tower during the Pleasure of the House. The House of Commons laid a Mulct of an hundred Pounds upon every one of their own Members who absented themselves from the Service of the House; so desirous were they to have their Assembly full, and the Sense of the Nation to be as general as possible; and so far from using Artifices to lessen their Number, and pack a Company for private Ends, as the Archdeacon more than once intimates with equal Modesty and Truth.

The Commissioners of Array beginning their Work in the Country, and putting the People in Motion, the Parliament quicken'd the Execution of the Ordinance for the Militia, which in a great Measure frustrated the Designs of the Array-Men, who, if they had succeeded, would soon have got a Power together with the King at the Head of it, which would have dispers'd the Parliament, and consequently have utterly destroy'd the Constitution, as was the Queen's Design, which the King did not dislike. Orleans says, "The Queen was zealous for restoring the Catholick Religion, full of that Spirit which warms the Blood of absolute Monarchs. A limited Authority seem'd to the Queen no better than Servitude, which caus'd her to make the utmost Efforts to rescue the King her Husband from it. She always had a Nuntio with her; she openly corresponded with the Catholick Lords; she stood up with Heat for every Thing that regard'd the Church. The King gave her full Liberty, and supported her, which made it suspected he was no thorough Protestant; and the Zeal with which he promoted the Archbishop's Design, gave his Enemies good Ground to accuse him of being a Catholick. What can be plainer? The Queen is resolv'd to establish Popery and arbitrary Power." The King supports her in it; the Archbishop has a Design too against the Protestant Religion, and the King promotes it; the French Jesuit who wrote his History in Concert with King James, tells us so; and if we had an hundred other Proofs of their Resolution and Design to alter Religion and Government, one might take Father Orleans's Words for it.

On the 19th of June the Two Houses resolv'd, that all those who are Actors in putting the Commission of Array in Execution, shall be deem'd Disturbers of the Peace of the Kingdom, and Betrayers of the Liberty of the Subject. We have mention'd the first Attempt to disturb the Peace and betray the Peoples Liberties, which was made by Mr. Hastings in Leicestershire. The same Commission was begun to be executed in Cambridgeshire, but the County suppress'd it, and petition'd the Parliament for Arms to stand on their Defence against that malignant Part.

Sir Richard Gurny Lord-Mayor of London, had been so much flatter'd by the Courtiers for his Loyalty, that he gave himself up entirely to them, and proclaim'd the Commission of Array notwithstanding he had been warn'd to the contrary by the House of Lords, who committed him to the Tower for his Contempt, and depriv'd him of his Mayoralty. The Ordinance for the Militia took Effect in the City under the Management of Sir John Wollaston, Alderman Gibs, Alderman Towse, Alderman Warner, and other Magistrates, the most wealthy and eminent Citizens. The King to obstruct them sent for Sir John Wollaston and Alderman Gibs to attend him at York, but the Parliament commanded their Attendance at London, and declar'd it was against the Laws of the Land, for which his Majesty declares himself a Champion, to command any of his Subjects to attend him, but only such as are bound by special Service; which I am sure is agreeable to common Sense, if not to common Law.

The Earl of Northampton was very officious with his Commission of Array in Warwickshire, but to as little Purpose as Sir Richard Gurny in London, for the Militia Ordinance being executed there by the Lord Brook, no less than eight hundred Horse and two thousand Foot appear'd to support it. Upon which the Earl of Northampton dropp'd his Commission,

Cheshire. In Cheshire, Earl Rivers, a Papist, who had lately been an Occasional Conformist, taking the Oath of Allegiance to qualify him to do Mischief, imprison'd several Persons for not obeying his Commission of Array; and the Papists were grown so presumptuous in those Parts, by the Countenance of the Lord Rivers, and Sir Thomas Aston, that they demanded the Re-delivery of their Arms, which had been taken from them according to Law; but the Ordnance of the Militia being put in Execution, above three Fourths of the County fell in with it. All these Attempts, the great Provision made for War by the Queen and Cavaliers in Holland, are with Echard only Evidences that the King never intended to break the Peace. It was a Matter of Wonder, says that wise Man, and still remains Matter of Censure, that the King never put himself into a Posture of Defence: He had indeed rais'd Horse and Foot in Yorkshire, and was preparing to besiege Hull: He had try'd what he cou'd do with Commissions of Array, to set the People every where in Arms; which not succeeding as it was hop'd, Mr. Archdeacon wonders that he did not do what he could not do better than he did. He is perfectly well vers'd in the Cant of the Court Declarations, the Law, the Laws of the Land, the Fundamental Laws; and not only the King, who confess'd that he had been breaking of them sixteen Years, but all the Lords and Gentlemen who made so glorious an Appearance at Tork, were such, who by regular Observance of the Laws, had render'd themselves unblameable to the People, by whose Representative a great Number of them lay under Impeachment for the breach of them. I am not at all surpriz'd at that prodigious Falsity, where he informs us, that the Parliament collected eleven Millions Sterling only out of London, Middlesex and Essex, by their Order for bringing in Money and Plate; the whole Sum collected by them since their Session, being but 1,267,326 Pounds: A Man that cou'd believe eleven Millions were rais'd in London, and two Counties, must be well acquainted with the Cash and Stock of the Nation, and very well deserve our Attention to what he reports. He confirms it by another Falsity, that the Lecturing Preachers accus'd all those that did not bring in their Plate and Money. This Order was made the 10th of June, and was introduc'd with the Cause of it, the levying Forces, and issuing Commissions of Array by the King, which oblig'd the two Houses to provide for their Safety, and the Preservation of the publick Peace. The Security of the Parliament, which was their own, and the Interest at eight per Cent, brought in Treasure enough in a few Days, to answer their present Occasions.

The sending for the Aldermen of London, was back'd with a Letter to forbid the Citizens lending Money: His Majesty's Counsellors cou'd not but know that all these Letters expos'd his Authority, which cou'd not have its due Weight, while 'twas exercis'd in Defiance of the Parliament.

Letters intercepted by the Parliament. In the mean Time Letters were intercepted coming from Holland, in which 'twas said, There are Fourscore Gentlemen ready to transport themselves to York; that much Money had been got upon the Jewels, and all sorts of Arms of Proof were provided, in order to preserve the Quiet of the Kingdom, and defend the Privileges of Parliament, as was the Cant at York; that Prince Rupert was shipping Horse, and one Lightfoot, a Merchant, had bought 15000 Pounds of Powder, and was buying Match; that one Jewel was pawn'd for 40000 Guilders; that in a Ketch belonging to one White of Dover, there were many Pats of Match, with Provision of War; that Prince Rupert, Prince Maurice, Lord Denby, Lord Digby, Oneal the Irish Traytor, Sir Lewis Dives, Colonel Wilfon,

Colonel Cockram, and that brave Captain Hyde, were ready to imbarke, being very jownd, and had in their Cups made Dividends of the Parliament Mens Lands. A Letter from General Wilmot to Mr. Crofts, was also intercepted, wherein he wrote him the naked Truth, and spoke the Sentiments of his Heart; by which one may see, how the Cavaliers deluded one another with false Reports, and vain Hopes; the King is become the Favourite of the Kingdom: His Enemies are not able to raise an Army: Indeed here lies the Jest, for they will be follow'd just enough to forfeit their Estates, which I have heard you say often, were better bestow'd on some of us; and without doubt 'twas with this View, that the Appearance was so glorious at York; that so many Lords and Gentlemen deserted the Country Interest, and embark'd with the Court. Yesterday, continues Wilmot, the House sent for Berkley, Ashburnham, and myself, but the King gave the Messenger a short Answer, and an Officer or two gave him a short Cudgel, so he return'd to London with his Arm in a Scarf, like a fine Gentleman: It must be own'd the Cavaliers were very good at Cudgelling, when they had Liquor and Number on their Side. They are like to have their Bellyfuls of it in a little while.

The King being surrounded with such a shining Circle of Lords, we are told their Lordships were desir'd to sign a Paper, containing the Particulars of some Affronts they had receiv'd in the Tumults at London, as good Reasons for their Absence; but these Lords having the next Day thought better of it, desir'd the Paper might not be publish'd, and some of them declar'd if it was, they would disown it; which shews us how little Regard was had to strict Truth in those Papers: For if what the Court had prepar'd for their Lordships to sign, had been strictly true, they needed not to have disown'd it, nor to have been afraid of its being seen. Echard, without entering into any such scrupulous Considerations, tells us, the Paper wou'd have been of sovereign Use, if the Lords had not repented of their signing it, and would have suffer'd it to have been made Publick: But to make some Atonement, they enter'd into an Engagement the next Day, To obey no Orders nor Commands, but what were warranted by the known Laws of the Land. As for Instance, the Ordnance for the Militia, which was declar'd to be the Law of the Land, by the Lord Keeper Littleton, who was the first Peer who set his Hand to this contradictory Agreement; in which was added, the Defence of his Majesty's Person, Crown and Dignity; the true Protestant Religion, establish'd by the Law of the Land, the Liberties of the Subject, the Privileges of Parliament: The Subscribers were, Lord Keeper Littleton, Duke of Richmond, Marquis of Hertford, Earl of Lindsey, Earl of Cumberland, Earl of Huntington, Earl of Bath, Earl of Southampton, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Dorset, Earl of Cambridge, Earl of Bristol, Earl of Westmorland, Earl of Berkshire, Earl Rivers, Earl of Newcastle, Earl of Dover, Earl of Carnarvon, Earl of Newport, Lord Mowbray and Matravars, Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Lord Howard of Charlton, Lord Newark, Lord Paget, Lord Chandos, Lord Falconbridge, Lord Powlet, Lord Lovelace, Lord Saville, Lord Dunsmore, Lord Seymour, and the nine Lords expelled the House of Peers, for deserting their Duty in Parliament. They also sign'd a Paper, wherein they profess'd before God, That the King had no Intention to make War upon the Parliament; which we also have shewn already, and shall shew again and again, before the Year is out. The Earl of Salisbury was so ill satisfi'd with this Service, that he left Tork the next Day, and was readmitted to his Seat in Parliament.

His Majesty, to enable him to go through with The King the Delign he had on Foot, offer'd the Security of raises his roy.

A.D. 1642. his Lands, Forests and Houses, to such as wou'd advance Money, which he said was a more real Security than that of the Parliament; but he found the People thought otherwise, and had former Loans too much in their Head, to crowd to Tork with their Treasure, though several Lords, Gentlemen and Clergymen, contributed according to their Abilities, both of Mind and Purse. Mr. Archdeacon has a very clear way of expressing himself; the King was so far from being in a Condition to make War, that he had not one Post, the Earl of Newcastle having, says he, just secur'd that Town upon the Tyne, for his Majesty's Use; and just then the Ship Providence arriv'd from Holland, with Powder, Arms, Artillery great and small, to let the World see the King had no Intention to make War; so immediately after these Stores were brought to Tork, he granted Commissions for raising Regiments of Horse and Foot, and made the Earl of Lindsey General of his Army, Sir Jarob Ashley Major-General; all which was before the Parliament voted the raising an Army, or declared a General; and was a very plain Proof that the King was determin'd for War, and that the Parliament was not. They wanted not early Information of every Step that was taken at Tork, nor Wisdom to guard against it. To that End they order'd the Earl of Warwick to secure the Fleet, as is already hinted; the King wrote to the Earl, to deliver it up to Pennington, another such trusty Person as Lawsford, which was obey'd like the Letter to the Londoners; to lend no Money. His Lordship writing to Mr. Pym, said, "I resolv'd, however, not to defer taking on me the Charge committed to my Trust, wherein God hath made me hitherto so successful, but to continue it till it shall be revok'd by the Authority which entrusted me; which having declar'd to my Captains at a Council of War, all of them unanimously and cheerfully took the same Resolution, excepting five, who were the Rear-Admiral, Captain Fogg, Captain Barley, Captain Slingsby, and Captain Wake, who at first pretended to stand in their Defence against me, only Captain Barley came in and submitted. The next Morning I weigh'd Anchor, and caus'd the rest of my Ships to do so. All Things being in a Readiness to attack those who stood out, Sir John Mennes, the Rear-Admiral, and Captain Fogg, came in to me, but Slingsby and Wake refus'd still, whereby I let fly again over them, and sent them word I had turn'd up the Glass, and if in that Space they came not in, they must look for me aboard them: My own Boat, and most of the Boats in the Fleet, went with the Message, and their Answer was so peremptory, that my Master and Sailors grew impatient, and though they had no Arms at all, enter'd the Ships in a Moment, took hold of the Shrouds, seiz'd the Captains, struck their Yards and Top-masts, and brought them in to me." All this was doing, while the King was privately resolving to take the Fleet into his own Hands, which the Parliament had publicly resolv'd to take into theirs. Mr. Archdeacon gives us a tedious Account of the private Resolution; which being a Reckoning without one's Host, is equally vain and impertinent; Doubtless had Sir John Pennington been there, the greatest Part of the Fleet had been preserv'd for the King. The Truth is, he staid all the while at Dover, to see whether any of the Ships wou'd receive him as Admiral: But all the Commanders sign'd a Writing, That they would readily obey the Earl of Warwick, and not desert the Parliament. Which Writing his Lordship sent to the two Houses, and soon after took the Lyon, a Ship of 42 Guns, which had in her Company a little Ship, loaden with Gunpowder and Ammunition for his Majesty's Use. The King reclaim'd the two Ships, but the Earl refus'd to part with them.

Earl of Warwick
and the Fleet.

A.D. 1642. His Majesty, to give further Proof of his peaceable Intentions, let out from Beverley on the 6th of July, with 3000 Foot, and 1000 Horse, to besiege Hull. Pray observe, as yet there was no Army voted to be rais'd, nor no General in Nomination for the Parliament. The Lord Willoughby of Eresby, and Sir Thomas Glenham, were detach'd from the King's Army with 200 Men, to cut off all Supplies from Barton upon Humber. Sir John Hotbam, Governor of Hull, drown'd the Country about the Town, and sent the Parliament Information of the Siege with which he was threatened. The two Houses order'd two Men of War to Hull, the Captains of which were to obey Hotbam, and publish'd a Declaration, that they would make good the Damage the Country receiv'd by Drowning it, and satisfy and protect all Persons that should convey Supplies to the Town. The Cavaliers burnt the Town Mills, but not without Loss of some Men from the Cannon on the Walls. However this is not to be deem'd a War, burning of Mills not being Bloodshed. The Earl of Newport was wounded in one of the Skirmishes between the Besiegers and the Besieged. Now it was that Beckwith's Plot, before-mention'd, was discover'd, which so enrag'd the Inhabitants, that they took Arms almost to a Man, for the Defence of the Place. About the latter end of July, Sir John Meldrum sall'y'd out with 500 Men, who being very well known to the Train'd-Bands in the King's Army, the latter refus'd to Fight, and the rest of the Forces that were with them took to their Heels, leaving 30 of their Company behind them Prisoners, but two only were kill'd. Sir John Meldrum made another Salley with 60 Horse, and 300 Foot, who drove away those of the Cavaliers who were nearest the Town, kill'd 21, and took 15; after which he advanc'd to Aulbie, about four Miles from Hull, where the King's Magazine was kept in a Barn; Sir John vigorously attack'd the Guard, who made small Resistance; and being mostly Train'd-Bands, threw away their Arms, and fled to their several Homes. This Loss oblig'd the King to give over all Thoughts of reducing Hull, and to remove the Seat of the War which he had begun, into the Heart of the Kingdom. To cover this Disgrace at Hull, the Lord Clarendon, and Echard after him, tell us a long Story of the Lord Digby's corresponding with Hotbam to betray the Town. He came from Holland in a Bark, which was taken, and carry'd into Hull, where he made himself known to the Governor Sir John Hotbam; and so debauch'd him by his Persuasions and Flatteries, that Hotbam commenc'd that Treason, for which he afterwards suffer'd, though he cou'd not accomplish it, for the brave Sir John Meldrum, Lieutenant-Governor of the Town, could not be corrupted; and indeed it is astonishing, that so many gallant Men, in Appearance and Character, were so liable to Corruption, and cou'd be tempted by vain Titles, and imaginary Honours, to desert the best Cause in the World, that of Religion and Liberty, and espouse the worst, absolute Lawless Power, Superstition and Persecution. The Townsmen of Hull were zealously engag'd with Meldrum, and the Earl of Warwick appearing in Sight with the Fleet, the King no sooner saw the Admiral's Flag than he thought it was high Time for him to march off.

The Parliament being not to be perswaded by all these peaceable Dispositions, that there was no War intended against them, RESOLV'D on the 12th of July, that an Army be forthwith rais'd for the Safety of the King's Person, Defence of both Houses of Parliament, and of those who have obey'd their Orders and Commands, and preserving of the true Religion, the Law, Liberty and Peace of the Kingdom: RESOLV'D, That the Earl of Essex shall be General: RESOLV'D, That in this Cause, for

A.D. 1642. for the Safety of the King's Person, &c. as before, This House will live and die with the Earl of Essex, whom they have nominated General: RESOLV'D, That a Petition be fram'd to move his Majesty to a good Accord with his Parliament, to prevent a Civil War: To which Resolution the Lords agreed, and the Earl of Holland, Sir John Holland, and Sir Philip Stapleton, were order'd to repair to Beverley, and present the Petition to his Majesty. The Earl of Bedford was voted General of the Horse, and a Declaration was made upon it, shewing in many Particulars that the King had begun the War.

Earl of Bedford General of the Horse. The King began the War.

1. "By Mr. Hastings opposing the Sheriff of Leicester in the Execution of his Office, to keep the Peaces with 200 Foot, and 100 Horse.
2. "By putting a Garrison of Soldiers into New-castle, under the Earl of that Name, who was order'd to seize Hull, and would have seiz'd it, had not the Parliament prevented it.
3. "By fortifying the Mouth of the River Tyne, to intercept the Coal Trade between Newcastle and London.
4. "By sending for, and receiving Artillery, Gunpowder and warlike Stores from Holland.
5. "By warlike Preparations in Yorkshyre, issuing Commissions for raising Regiments, and naming Officers of the Army, in which are several Papists, and other Persons of desperate Fortune, ready to execute any Violence, Rapine and Oppression. Troops of Horse are sent into Lincolnshyre, who have driven the well-affected People from their Dwellings. Horses are taken away from the Owners by Force, Acts of Hostility are committed, Provisions are restrain'd from coming to Hull, and an Army sent to besiege it. They conclude, The WAR being by his Majesty thus BEGUN, the Lords and Commons in Parliament held themselves bound in Conscience to raise Forces for the Defence of their Religion, Rights, Liberties and Properties, in which they desire the Concurrence of all well-dispos'd Persons." With whatever Confidence the Archdeacon tells his Readers that the Parliament began the War, it is notorious that all those Articles are true, and that the King actually began it with the Siege of Hull; he invested the Town with his Army, says Larrey, he laid Siege to it in Form, and open'd the Trenches. Again, This first Enterprize of the Royal Army, presag'd but indifferently for the King: Again, The King's Troops first took the Field.

Marston a malignant Clergy-man.

There was not at this Time wanting a great Number of Laudean Clergy, who though they durst not preach so openly against the Rights and Liberties of the People, as when Laud was at their Head, yet they could not forbear expressing their Rage against those who asserted and defended them. One Marston, a Parson in Canterbury, was brought to the Bar of the House of Lords, for speaking scandalously of the two Houses, saying, He would stab the Hearts Blood of those who oppos'd the Kentish Petition against the Militia BILL, That the Parliament cozened and cheated the Country, and that there would be Bloodshed in England before Midsummer Day, and there was within three Weeks of it; for which Sayings he was sentenc'd to be depriv'd of all his Ecclesiastical Livings and Dignities, to be incapable of any for the future, and to be imprison'd in the Gatehouse during their Lordships Pleasure.

Petition at Beverley.

The Earl of Holland, Sir John Holland, and Sir Philip Stapleton, deliver'd the Parliament's Petition to the King at Beverley, wherein they pray'd him to disband his Forces, recall his Commissions of Array, and return to his Parliament. But he refus'd it all, pursuant to the Scheme resolv'd on by the Queen's Cabinet Council at Windsor, to prosecute the accused Members with War, and Force of Arms; and while he prepar'd for it, to deny all Particulars that could possibly be deny'd, to the Parliament, which is what the Reverend Historian A.D. 1642. calls his firm Resolution; and his Majesty in his Answer does not a little confirm the just Fears of the Parliament, that he intended to rescind all the good Acts to which he had given the Royal Assent, during their Session; for he said, He had never consented to any Thing since the beginning of the Parliament, which had been prejudicial to him, but he had been promis'd he should receive no Damage from it, and yet he always found himself mistaken. A very frank Confession that he thought himself injur'd by the popular Acts he had pass'd, and might right himself by Arms, he would be no more swagg'd into Concessions, says the Earl of Clarendon; which as Mr. Acherley observes, implies as if his Majesty's Sentiments were, that the former Acts had been extorted; and the Opinion of the People was become almost general, that those Acts of his Majesty's Justice and Favour, without the secret Operation of the Scots Encampment in England, had never been obtain'd; and that therefore those arbitrary Powers; call'd his Majesty's Rights and Prerogatives, would, whenever the Force could be resum'd, be remov'd. This Belief being so general, was there any other Safety under Heaven for the Parliament and People of England, but that of the Militia, in the Hands of those they could trust? For besides all the open Acts of Violence which have been just mention'd, and all the warlike Preparations in England and Holland, Mr. Acherley speaks of Negotiations with the Pope's Nuncio to procure 40000 Men from the Kings of France and Spain; of a Treaty with the King of Denmark, which was unquestionable, for 6000 Muskets, and 1500 Horse-Arms, 20 Pieces of Artillery, and as many Troopers as wou'd agree with the Danish Affairs. Directions were given for landing them at Newcastle, secur'd for that Purpose by the Earl of that Name, or Holy-Island; which last Place was describ'd as the fittest Harbour in England, having an excellent Road in and out, and a strong Fort, under the King's Command. After all these known Truths had been render'd unquestionable, with what Conscience could the Author of the History of the Rebellion, and Mr. Echard, endeavour to impose on their Readers a Belief that the Parliament drove on furiously to a War, and the King never thought of it, till he was almost surrounded by their Armies? Mr. Archdeacon tells us, the King had no Money. Whitlocke, he was furnish'd with Money upon the pawn'd Jewels, and by Contributions from the Cavalier Lords and Gentlemen, and a Loan from Oxford University, who have never been behind-hand when any such good Work has been going forward. The Masters and Fellows of all the Colleges in Cambridge, sent their Plate to the King at York; so anxious were those Reverend Gentlemen for the Preservation of the publick Peace; Many wishing, says Fuller, that every Ounce was a Pound. The Parliament look'd on it as an Act unjust in it self, and dangerous in its Consequences; for the present Masters and Fellows were only Fiduciaries, not Proprietors of the Plate, to keep and use, but not to dispose of it: The University took not this into Consideration. The Dominion of the Laudean Clergy was in Danger, and a Church Reformation threaten'd. Nothing but the King's absolute Power could prevent it, and the Maintenance of it warranted any Injustice. His Majesty did not enquire into the Title of the Masters and Fellows to that Plate, but the Parliament brought the University to a Reckoning for it afterwards; Dr. Beal, Dr. Martin, and Dr. Sterne, Masters of St. John's, Queens and Jesus College, were brought to London, and imprison'd in the Tower for their Activity in the Plate Business, as was Dr. Holdsworth, the Vicechancellor, for printing the King's Declaration, contrary to a Vote of the two Houses. A Consistory being held at Cambridge, they were requir'd to contribute to the Parliament, as they had done to the King,

Ach. 457.

A.D. 1642. King, but they refus'd it, and some of the Fellows were imprison'd in St. John's College. Dr. Robert Pink Warden of New-College Oxon, and Vice-chancellor of that University, was very busy there in forwarding the Commission of Array, which the honest Townsmen did not approve of, and for which he was afterwards apprehended and committed Prisoner to the Gatehouse at Westminster; so zealous were our two famous Universities for absolute Monarchy and Bishop Laud's Hierarchy, and so little Concern had they for the Preservation of the true Protestant Religion, and the Rights, Properties, and Liberties of their Fellow Subjects. Learning never flourish'd long but with Liberty, and their being insensible of so invaluable a Blessing, was a sure Presage of the Dearth of it which succeeded.

From Beverley the King remov'd to Leicester, where he courted the Inhabitants, but proclaim'd the Earl of Stamford Traytor; he might as well have been proclaim'd an Hermaphrodite. Where was the Treason in obeying the Call of his Country, and preparing to defend it from Violence and Injustice? The two Houses vindicated him by a Declaration for removing the County Magazine, and setting Guards about it; and return'd an Answer to a Message from the King peremptorily requiring the Town of Hull to be immediately surrender'd to him, and the Parliament to remove their Session to some other Place where he might reside safely. The Two Houses justify'd their keeping Hull "for the Security of Religion, the Rights" and Liberties of the People, all which they saw "in imminent Danger, but no Reason why his" Majesty should require the adjourning of the "Parliament, since the Loyalty and Fidelity of the" City of London, and the honest Care of the Two "Houses, render the usual Place as safe for his Royal Person as any." Thus, says Echard, they denounced War, which his Majesty had only whisper'd in Yorkshire, by raising an Army, laying Siege to Hull, &c. We have mention'd Sir Richard Gurny, whom he calls the BRAVE Lord-Mayor, and affirms he was put out of his Office contrary to the Laws of the Land, and Alderman Pennington chosen Mayor contrary to the Rules of Election, and by the Noise and Clamour of the RABBLE; which to say the worst we can of it, is as false as any Thing in his History: For the Rules of Election were exactly observ'd by Pennington, but Sir John Cordel whom the Cavalier Faction put up against him, had many Voters who had never before been seen at Elections, and were not on the Livery; these with clamorous Voices, to use my Author's Words, cry'd out a Cordel, others were for Alderman Towle a worthy grave Citizen; but the most numerous and hearty Votes were for Alderman Pennington, who had more Voices than Towle, and Towle more than Cordel. Yet the reverend Historian very modestly asserts he was chosen by the Clamour of the Multitude; and that Judge Mallet was another Object of the Parliament's Severity, who for refusing to read their Orders, was disgracefully taken off the Bench at Kingston Assizes. This was particularly charg'd against him; yet the Author's next Words are, he was kept Prisoner in the Tower two Years without any particular Charge against him. Another particular Charge was his promoting the Commission of Array in Kent. When he was seiz'd, he produc'd the King's Letter for his Protection, which was not likely to do him much Service when his Majesty had begun the War.

The two Parties King and Parliament have now appeal'd to the Sword; the natural Consequence of which was, that each of them wou'd give the Law where they had Power to do it, as far as was necessary for their Preservation. Yet the Earl of Clarendon, and after him Echard, are perpetually holding up their Hands in Astonishment, that the Two Houses should dare to do or say any thing contrary to the Authority Royal, which is with both of them the only Law of the Land. The Parliament A.D. 1642. have declar'd that Authority to be exercis'd in Breach of the Trust for which it was repos'd; and yet these two renown'd Historians are amaz'd at their Impudence in opposing it, after they had rais'd an Army to defend themselves against the Violence with which they were threaten'd by it; For the Clouds began now to rise in the South as well as the North; Goring whom they had sent to Portsmouth to secure that Town for them, prov'd a Traytor, deserted their Service, and declar'd for the King. The Parliament immediately order'd the Earl of Warwick, who was return'd from Hull, to place a Guard of Ships, and hinder all Supplies to Portsmouth by Sea, while the Train'd-Bands block'd it up by Land. Goring's Men found Means to make their Way thro' them by Night, and to plunder Portsey-Island. The Lord Wentworth sail'd out with sixty Horse, and took a Piece of Ordnance which the Parliament's Soldiers had left in that Island. In another Salley Colonel Goring and the Lord Wentworth advanc'd to the very Court of Guard in the Blockade; but being receiv'd very warmly, they retir'd with the Loss of three Men, one Glover, and a Servant to Mr. Weston Brother to the Earl of Portland, were two of the slain, Winter their Guide was taken. This was about ten Days before the King set up his Standard, and the Place held out against the Parliament's Forces near a Month. It was then surrender'd to Sir William Waller upon Articles. Sir William Waller, Sir Thomas Fervaise, Sir William Lewis, and Colonel Hurrey took Possession of it for the Parliament. The Governor Colonel Goring, the Lord Wentworth, Mr. Lewkner, Mr. Weston, and their Party, having Liberty to depart and to dispose of their Effects. Goring embark'd for Holland, but soon return'd to the same Service in England, and became one of the most famous and most hated of the King's Generals.

The Parliament having voted all the Commissioners of Array Traytors, the King did the same by the Earl of Essex and all the Colonels and Officers of his Army, which still remain'd quiet in and about London.

On the 12th of August the King publish'd his Proclamation and Declaration very large, setting forth what he had done in Favour of the People, and for the Satisfaction of the Desires of the Parliament; then the evil Actions of the Parliament against him; and in all justifies his own, and condemns the Parliament's Proceedings. His own are thus represented by General Ludlow upon his rejecting the NINETEEN Propositions, "He was" resolv'd to steer another Course, presuming he "might obtain as good Terms as these if reduc'd" to the last Extremity; and that if his Arms succeded according to his Hopes, his Will might pass for a Law, pursuant to the Opinion of those "who thought no way so likely to render his Authority absolute, as the making a War upon his People." The King at the same time requir'd all Men to repair to his ROYAL STANDARD at Nottingham on the 22d of August, which, he said, all good Subjects were oblig'd to attend. Let the King govern according to Law, or contrary to Law, let him do what he will, let his Subjects suffer what they can, they are not good Subjects unless they sacrifice their Lives for him. Excellent Logick!

The Two Houses finding there was no Safety for the Constitution but in a defensive War, proceeded in the forming of their Army; the Earl of Pembroke was made Lieutenant-General of the Foot, the Lord Kimbolton a Lieutenant-General, Sir John Meyrick and Sir William Balfour Major-Generals.

The following were Colonels: The Lord Roberts, the Lord St. John, the Lord Rockford, the Lord Grey, the Lord Willoughby, the

the Earl of Peterborough, the Earl of Stamford, the Lord Wharton, the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Brook, the Lord Fielding, Mr. Hollis, Mr. Hampden, Sir Henry Cholmley, Sir William Constable, Sir Philip Stapleton, Sir William Waller, Sir Samuel Luke, Colonel Grantham, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Colonel Fiennes, Colonel Goodwyn, And other Members of both Houses; whom the Reader may put into the Scale with those Gentlemen whom his Majesty valu'd himself upon for their Quality and Weight.

Before the Royal Standard was erected, the King in a Declaration recapitulated, says the reverend Historian, the insolent and rebellious Acts of the House of Lords and House of Commons, when there had not been the least Pretence of Rebellion in any Acts of the Two Houses, except to resist an unlawful Power be to rebel. A rare Doctrine for the People of England at this Day, a rare Complement to be address'd to his late sacred Majesty King George the First, a rare Piece of Service to the Constitution; for which, to the Shame of his Patrons, the Historian met with other Kinds of Rewards than he deserves. If I knew the Names of those who recommended him to his late Majesty, they shou'd live as long as this Work with the Scandal of it; and the Excuse they gave for it, that they did not know what was in his Book, and were sorry for what they had done, shou'd not preserve their Memory from the due Animadversion of History. The Parliament, says he, were now proclaim'd REBELS, and we are now entring upon a dark Scene of Misery, a calamitous Season, usher'd in by Prodigious and strange portentous Sights seen in the Air, as Musketeers, barne'd Men, and Horsemen moving in the Clouds in Battel-Array, and attacking each other in several furious Postures. A Man that's capable of writing such Stuff as this, must have an immense Capacity for sound Reason and Argument. He has pick'd up a fine Cause, and the Cause has pick'd up a fine Historian; which has the best of it, the Historian or the Cause, I can't say.

Fights in the Clouds out of Echard.

King's Standard set up.

P. 67.

Lilly erected a Figure upon the erecting of his Majesty's Standard, under an evil Constellation, which he describes thus in his Observations on King Charles's Life and Death; "The Heralds or at least those who were then with the King, were ignorant how and in what Manner to set up the Standard Royal; they therefore hung it out in one of the Turrets or Upper-Rooms of Nottingham-Castle within the Castle-Wall, where King Richard III. set up his Standard. His Majesty dislik'd his Standard as plac'd within the Castle; he said it was to be plac'd in an open Place, where all Men that wou'd might freely come unto it, and not in a Prison: They therefore carry'd it at his Command without the Castle, towards or into the Park there adjoining, into an open Place and easy of Access. When they came to fix it in the Ground, they perceiv'd it was a meer Rock-Stone; so that they with Daggers and Knives made a Hole for the Standard to be put in, but all wou'd not serve. Men were enforc'd for the present to support it with the Strength of their Arms and Bodies, which gave great Occasion to some Gentlemen there present, to give a very sad Judgment on the King's Side, and to divine long beforehand that he wou'd never do any Good by Arms. I have also heard that in eight or ten Days he had not thirty attended the Standard or list'd themselves."

We have spoken of the King's Averfion to the Londoners, whom he now charges with those Tumults which he said oblig'd him to leave Whitehall and the Parliament for ever. That this Charge is not fair, will appear by what follows; and that the Author of Eikon Basilike, is no fairer than other Authors on the same Side, read William Lilly upon it; "Whereas the Writer of the King's Portraiture complains, that the Insolency of the Tumults was such, that his Majesty's Person was in danger in the Streets: This is a very great Untruth, for notwithstanding his Majesty dined in the City that Day he requir'd the Five Members of the Citizens, yet he had no Incivility in the least Measure offer'd unto his Person, only many cry'd out as he pass'd the Streets, Sir, Let us have our just Liberties, we desire no more; unto which he several Times answer'd you shall. An honest Citizen, as I remember, threw into his Coach a new Sermon, the Text whereof was, To thy Tents O Israel. Indeed the Citizens, unto their immortal Honour be it spoken, did with much Resolution protect the Five Members, and many thousands were willing to sacrifice their Lives in Defence of the Parliament." This Clarendon and Echard represent as the beginning of the Rebellion, and it is much the same in Eikon Basilike; of the Veracity of which, one may from thence have a just Conception. It was not the Londoners only whom the King was displeas'd with, the Seamen had shewn their Zeal for the Protestant Religion and English Liberties, in refusing to serve under Pennington against the Rochellers; they now also did the same in offering their Service to defend the Parliament, and particularly the Five Members; which his Majesty being told of, said, I wonder how I lost the Affection of those Water-Rats; and this Saying being reported among them, 'tis no wonder the Earl of Warwick soon after so easily got Possession of the Fleet, he being exceedingly belov'd by the Sailors.

P. 60.

A.D. 1642.

London not tumultuous.

After the Standard was set up at Nottingham, The Standard set up with a most thin Appearance of Soldiery, and Omens more ominous than all Mr. Archdeacon's impossible Visions in the Air, as its tumbling down again, and the gloomy Looks of the People, as if the Standard was going to be hang'd instead of being erected: The Royal Army march'd to Coventry, but, says Echard, the King found the Gates shut against him to his great Surprise; whereas Coventry Gates shut against the King.

every Man who knew any thing of the Matter, would have been surpriz'd if he had not found them so shut; for his Undertakings were not so very well lik'd as to make wise Men fond of his Company. The Train'd-Bands of Nottingham refus'd to march out of their County, and the Townsmen of Nottingham wou'd not let any Part of their Magazine be taken from them. However, his Majesty sent to Coventry to let the Inhabitants know he intended to come and reside with them some time, requiring them to provide Billets for his Army. The Mayor, Aldermen, and chief Citizens return'd for Answer, That his Majesty shou'd be most welcome in Person, but they wou'd not permit his Soldiers to enter their City; for which my Author assures us he threaten'd to lay it in a Heap of Rubbish. What Surprise then cou'd he be in to find Entrance deny'd to his Army, who endeavour'd to force it, and fir'd several Pieces of Ordnance against the Town. One Shot beat down Part of the Lady Hales's House in the Whitefryars, killing the Lady herself and an old Gentlewoman who had five Years lain bed-ridden. The Townsmen assisted by three hundred Men from Buckingham, fir'd on the Cavaliers, who in their Retreat had their Rear attack'd and so roughly dealt with, that they were forc'd to leave some of their Ordnance behind them. The Parliament had made timely Preparations for the Relief of Coventry, the Lord Brook, the Lord Say, the Lord Grey, Colonel Hampden, Colonel Hollis, Colonel Cholmley, with six thousand Foot and three hundred Horse, were on the March for that Purpose. The Archdeacon tells us they were but one thousand two hundred, and that the King's General Wilmot was blam'd for suffering them to advance without attacking them, which he might easily have done, and it wou'd have been

Parl. Chron. 139.

A.D. 1642. been a seasonable Victory. Of such Facts and Reflections, and sometimes even worse, is his History compos'd. The Lord Brook and the other Parliament Officers, took up their Quarters at Southam; and if the Royalists had attack'd them, they wou'd have had some Advantage by the Number of their Horse one thousand four hundred, whereas the Parliament Cavalry exceeded not three hundred; but the latter were superior in Foot, and the Lord Brook having march'd towards Dunsmore to meet the Enemy, and the Earl of Northampton coming in sight of them, the Parliamentarians prepar'd for Battel, Hampden's Regiment leading the Van. The Lord Brook had seven or eight Pieces of Ordnance, with which he cannonaded the Cavaliers with so good Effect, that the Earl of Northampton's Foot soon quitted the Field, and his Horse follow'd their Example. There were about twenty kill'd, and twelve taken Prisoners of the Royalists, among the latter were Captain Legg who commanded a Troop of Horse, and Captain Clarke. The Lord Brook took his Cannon also, but did not pursue him for want of Cavalry; or this Action, tho' little talk'd of, might have been decisive, the King having so small an Army with his Standard, it must have been ruin'd by the Loss of so considerable a Body of it. The Parson of Southam, a Man of evil and dissolute Conversation, in the Words of the Chronicle, had his House full of the King's Soldiers before the Lord Brook came, for which his Lordship order'd it to be search'd, and there was found Store of Ammunition, Saddles, Muskets, Powder, &c. which were all seiz'd together with the Priest: and we shall find many more of his Cloth and Character engag'd in this Quarrel, for which the Archbishop of Canterbury was so well provided, that his Palace at Lambeth being search'd, there was discover'd a Magazine of Arms sufficient for five hundred Men. The Parliament had Information of an hundred and twenty Pieces of Cannon small and great, that lay near the Water-Side four Miles below Gravesend, and they order'd a Troop of Horse to secure them, as also to search Cobham-Hall, where they met with some Resistance; but having forc'd their Entrance, they found in it five Cartloads of Arms and Ammunition; fresh Instances that the Cavaliers never had the least Thought of War till they were forc'd to it by the Roundheads.

The Ordnance for the Militia was put in Execution in Somersetshire by Colonel Popham, Colonel Pyne, Sir Thomas Wroth, Sir John Horner, Mr. Cole, Mr. Asb, Mr. Hippesley, Mr. Sandford, Mr. Harbyn, Mr. Strode, and other principal Gentlemen, Deputy-Lieutenants of that rich and spacious County; to oppose whom the King sent the Marquis of Hertford Governor of the Prince, with Orders to execute the Commission of Array; in which he was vigorously assisted by the Lord Powlet, Sir John Stawel, Sir Ralph Hopton, Mr. Smith, and other Gentlemen, who procur'd a sort of Petition from some of the County to hinder the Execution of the Militia Ordnance. Accordingly Sir Ralph Hopton arrested Mr. Strode for High-Treason, and Mr. Smith behav'd with so much Insolence, that both he and Sir Ralph were expell'd the House of Commons, and sent for as Delinquents, as were also Sir Francis Dodington, a scandalous Minister, and five or six others, who took Care to keep out of the Way. The Marquis of Hertford proclaim'd the Commission of Array at Wells, and got together five hundred Horse, Sir John Stawel join'd him with a Regiment of Horse, and Sir Ralph Hopton and others brought in so many Men, that they form'd a little Army, on which the King built much of his Hopes. But the County at that Time Protestant and sober, was for the most part against them, excepting those Gentry and Peasantry who had oppos'd the putting down Revels and Riots. Colonel Popham and his Brother Captain Edward Popham, Sir John Horner, Mr. Asb, &c.

were desir'd to gather a Force, and drive the Array-Men out of Somersetshire, who had already begun to plunder the Houses of all those that were not of their Faction. Sir John Horner, most zealous in the Cause of the Reform'd Religion and Liberty, whose Merits and Memory do Honour to his Name, arm'd his Servants and Tenants, and his Neighbours took Arms to assist him. Being thus provided he march'd to Chewton, where he join'd Colonel Alexander Popham and his Brother Captain Edward Popham afterwards Admiral. Colonel Popham Grandson to the Lord-Chief-Justice, set a like Example to his Posterity, as did gallant Sir John Horner in a vigorous Opposition to an absolute Monarchy and a persecuting Hierarchy. He brought with him about a thousand Men besides his own Regiment of Militia, that of the Eastern Division of the County. To them came Mr. Asb, and soon after Sir Edward Hungerford and several Gentlemen from Bristol, with Reinforcements, who altogether made a Body of four thousand Men, and encamp'd on Mendip in sight of Wells, whither the Array-Men retir'd after they had plunder'd Shepton, and were very welcome to Pierce the Bishop, and his Cathedral Clergy. Colonel Popham, Sir John Horner, the rest of the Gentlemen who headed the Militia, and their whole Army, lay all Night on the Hill, resolving to fall on the Enemy the next Day; Sir John Horner had a Furze-Bush for his Bed, as they all had; and the brave old Knight, animated with a true English Spirit of Liberty, was wont to say, His Furze-Bush was the best Bed he ever lay on. The Marquis of Hertford and his Men of Array did not like the Neighbourhood of the Militia, whom they saw on the Hill, and sent to treat. Sir John Horner's Men were impatient to fall on them, and chastise them for their Rapine and Insolence at Shepton-Mallet, and wou'd allow the Marquis and his Followers but an Hour's time to consider of the Terms they sent; which the Lord Hertford employ'd in causing his Soldiers to march off as quietly as they cou'd, himself, Sir Ralph Hopton, Sir John Stawel, Sir Francis Dodington, and the rest of the Cavalier Gentry, making the best of their Way to Shireburn, a Manor which had been Sir Walter Raleigh's, and then Car Earl of Somerset's, and was now in Possession of the Earl of Bristol. Horner's Men having waited beyond the Time appointed for an Answer, and receiving none, enter'd the City of Wells without Opposition, except from the ill Tongues and ill Conduct of the Cathedral Company of the Minster; for which, according to my Author, they met with some Knocks and Loss. At the other End of the County Sir William Portman, Mr. Cole, Mr. Pyne, and others, enter'd Taunton with a Body of Horse and Foot, where, in one House, Mr. Brown's a Papist, they found sixty Men's Armour. In Alderman Skinner's House twenty Arms, and in the House of one Tucker Steward to the Bishop of Winchester, who is Lord of that and several adjacent Manors, an hundred Mens Armour for Horse and Foot, twenty Barrels of Powder, fifty great Saddles, and Shot of all Sorts, which Bishop Curle had provided as a Proof that no body had ever thought of making War for Church and King, till the Earl of Essex was on the March.

At Bridgwater was found good Store of Arms and Ammunition, and the like at Glastenbury, Ilchester, and Imminster. Mr. Basset and Mr. Barret search'd Bath, and in all were discover'd Arms for one thousand eight hundred Men, one hundred and fifty great Saddles, twenty-five Horses for Service, and ten thousand Pounds ready Money stor'd up in the Houses of Delinquents and suspected Persons, which were all lodg'd in the Castle of Taunton. Ludlow mentions an Action between the Militia-Men and the Array-Men at Martial's Elm on Poldon Hill, which is said to have been the first in this War, but we have seen otherwise in the Course

A.D. 1642. Course of the History. Thus was this populous trading County secur'd for the Parliament; but thro' the Corruption of the leading Men, and the Inconstancy of the People, so many deserted this Cause afterwards, as gave great Trouble to the well-affected in those Parts. Those Deserters were not the Horners, the Pophams, the Harbys, the Hippesleys, the Wroths, who continu'd in the Interest and Service of their Country.

Message. His Majesty's Affairs promising so ill in the beginning of the War, his Followers prevail'd on him to send a Message to the Parliament by the Earls of Southampton and Dorset, Sir John Colepeper, and Sir William Udall, with Proposals of a Treaty, but couch'd in such Terms as shew'd it to be the Effect of Fear, and not a Desire of Peace. The two Houses took it so, and return'd for Answer, That in setting up of his Standard against them, he had put the Two Houses of Parliament, and in them the whole Kingdom, out of his Protection; therefore until he recall'd his Proclamations whereby the Earl of Essex, both Houses of Parliament, and all their Adherents, are declar'd TRAYTORS, and until he had taken down his Standard, he had put them into such a Condition, that by the fundamental Privileges of Parliament, the publick Trust repos'd in them, or with the general Good of this Kingdom, they cou'd not give him any other Answer. This the reverend Historian calls unheard-of Insolence, and is in a Rage at their refusing to let the Deserters who brought the Message sit in either House of Parliament. The King said that he never intended to declare the Parliament TRAYTORS, but if Proclamations of Traytors be recall'd by them, he will recall his and take down his Standard. The two Houses voted that the Arms of the Parliament for the Religion, Laws, and Liberties of the Kingdom, shall not be laid down till Delinquents be left to Justice, that their Estates may discharge the Debts of the Commonwealth; than which nothing cou'd be more just and equal, that those who were the Cause of the Distemper might pay for the Cure. Echard makes this Vote to subject all the Estates in England to the Power and Pleasure of the Parliament, who wou'd declare whom they pleas'd to be Delinquents. A vile Suggestion! which the whole Tenor of the History disproves; for they had often declar'd who were the Delinquents, all those evil Counsellors who had counsell'd the King to govern as he had done against Law and Justice, during fifteen Years Intermission of Parliament, all those who had been active Judges in those cruel and unjust Courts, the Star-Chamber and High-Commission; all those who had countenanc'd the Tyranny of the Laudian Hierarchy, Superstitions, Innovations, Profanation of the Sabbath, &c. all those who had executed the Commissions of Array, which put the Parliament under a Necessity to oppose Force with Force for their own Preservation, and the Preservation of the Laws, Rights, and Liberties of the People. Those and many more such Offenders about the King made a whole Host, and there cou'd be no Safety for the Innocent while the Guilty remain'd unpunish'd. The Parliament were so moderate, that in the Article of Exception, which was the fourth of their Directions to the Lord-General the Earl of Essex, there were but few nam'd to be excepted by him out of any Pardon he was empower'd to grant Delinquents. The Earl of Bristol, Earl of Cumberland, Earl of Newcastle, Earl of Caernarvon, Earl Rivers, Duke of Richmond, Secretary Nicholas, Lord Viscount Falkland, Lord Viscount Newark, Mr. Endymion Porter, Mr. Edward Hyde; the latter is said to be the Author of the History of the Rebellion; and having been excepted out of every Pardon, propos'd by the Lords and Commons of England, no doubt he wou'd be extremely impartial and candid in his History and Characters of them. It is not to be suppos'd that the Parliament excepted A.D. 1642. Mr. Edward Hyde, and Mr. Endymion Porter, out of Greediness for their Estates, whatever they might have in View by the Viscount Newark's and Secretary Nicholas's Manors and Mansions.

The Parliament according to the reverend Author, wax'd so proud, that they seiz'd on all Persons of Quality whom they did not like; and if they were Abettors of Tyranny and Superstition, the Parliament never lik'd them. They imprison'd them with all Circumstances of Cruelty and Inhumanity; and then he names the Lord Montague of Broughton. But he does not tell us he was a notable Malignant, as another Historian styles him; and that his Prison was only the House of his own Daughter the Countess of Rutland, as his own Warwick informs us. By Delinquent and Malignant, the Language of those Times, are to be understood Persons who endeavour'd to introduce arbitrary Power as well Ecclesiastical as Civil, and to sacrifice the Privileges of Parliament, and the Rights, Properties, and Liberties of the People to the King's Will and Pleasure, and under him to their own. In what Fury is Mr. Archdeacon, when he speaks of the Parliament's pious Design of reforming the Clergy; the Wildfire was kindled by the Mouths of their Preachers, who had driven the most learned from the Pulpits; and most of whom had really been so driven by Laud and his persecuting Brethren. Many were much set against the Bishops, says Dr. Calamy, by observing Men of Parts and Piety silenc'd, while insufficient and vicious Men, the very same whom Echard means by the most learned, were encourag'd and preferr'd. This is not the only false Representation in his and the Earl of Clarendon's Histories, concerning the sober Ministry who sided with the Parliament. Dr. Calamy again; It hath indeed been asserted that it was the seditious Preachers who stirr'd up the People, and were the Cause of all the Commotions, which is a notorious FALSITY; many indeed there were who discover'd their Dislike of the Book of Sports and bowing to Altars, and diminishing Preaching, and silencing Ministers, and were glad that the Parliament attempted a REFORMATION; which was a Death Stroke to Echard's most learned Clergy, whom it drove out of the Pulpits; but very few even of these stirr'd up to War. The Parliament who we are told had just rais'd Eleven Millions by voluntary Contributions, are now, as he tells us, in such Distress three or four Months after, that they voted all who wou'd not contribute shou'd be disarm'd. There was so little need of Compulsion, not on account of Mr. Archdeacon's Eleven Millions, but the People's Readiness to bring in their Wealth, that many voluntarily offer'd great Sums as a Gift and not a Loan, particularly the Lady Rumney of London sent two thousand Pounds as a free Gift to Guildhall; and other Ladies and Gentlewomen did not stick to part with their Jewels and Plate for the Service of the Parliament; Women of inferior Rank bringing in their Rings and Bodkins as so many Mites to the Publick Treasury. A few Members of the House of Commons excus'd themselves, and wou'd not contribute, as Sir Sidney Montagu, and Mr. Fountaine the Lawyer, who for reflecting on the Contributions were both imprison'd; but Fountaine contributed afterwards, and enrich'd himself by his Practice on both Sides.

Contributions to the Parliament.

Before the King left Nottingham, his two Nephews Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice came to him, and had Commands given them in his Army. I do not repeat all the King's Messages nor the Parliament's Answers; both the one and the other have very thin Disguises, but the latter are more plausible and popular, and it cou'd not be otherwise. The King cou'd when he pleas'd have given the Parliament a reasonable Security for their Religion, Liberties, and Properties; the Parliament cou'd not give themselves up to his Will and Pleasure.

A.D. 1642. sure, without not only betraying the Trust the People had repos'd in them, but utterly destroying the Constitution in Church and State: For as to the Law, the Laws of the Land, and the fundamental Laws, in almost every Paragraph of the King's Speeches, Messages, Declarations, and Answers, we have observ'd already it must provoke Mirth or Indignation in all Men of Thought, who had seen and felt how shamefully they had been broken ever since this Royal House reign'd in England, if their Memories were of so long standing: And what a Jest must it be now to read the King's Messages, wherein he would make the People believe while he was drawing into Wales, still farther off from the Parliament, he was extremely desirous to be with them. The Two Houses reply'd, that the Oppressions, Rapines, and Murders, which had been committed upon his good Subjects, were but ill Tokens of a real Disposition to Peace; that they sought nothing but their Religion, Liberty, and the Tranquility of the Kingdom; that the Parliament might be secur'd from the open Violence and subtle Practices of a wicked Party who had long plotted their Destruction. They complain'd that Irish TRAYTORS and REBELS were admitted to his Presence, Grace, and Favour; which is not to be deny'd without Blushing; and if he would return to his Parliament without his Forces, they would secure his Royal Person, Crown, and Dignity, which is not to be question'd: The Contest not being now with the King's Person, but with his Government; not with the Monarchy, but with the Ministry; and the protecting Delinquents spiritual and temporal, was certainly the fatal Obstacle to Peace, and the Cause of all the ensuing Calamities both to King and People.

King's March and Speech. From Nottingham the King remov'd to Derby, thence to Stafford, thence to Wellington, where he made a Speech to his Army, and thence to Shrewsbury. In his Speech he mention'd again his good Intentions to govern by the known Laws of the Land, which gave Comfort and Satisfaction to the Well-men on the Marches, and Life and Encouragement to the Soldiers, who by lifting under Lunsford, Goring, &c. shew'd they had a great Concern upon them about the Laws of the Land. The Lord Clarendon, and my reverend Author after him, assure us these Borderers thought the King's Word a greater Security to them than an Act of Parliament. They liv'd so far off, that probably they had never heard of the Nature of that Security, and had so little to pay, that they knew not what was meant by Loans, Benevolences, Ship-Money, and the like. Mr. Acherley speaking of this ridiculous Business, says, The noble Author's Story of it is so mean and insipid, as to be far from coming from the Pen of that exalted Genius, without fixing an Imputation upon Shrophire-Men, as if they were a People of much Zeal and little Knowledge; which is to put them in the same Predicament as they appear'd to be in after Sacheverel's Condemnation. The reverend Historian adds, his Majesty convinc'd all the antient Britons that he was the Father of his Country. One is tempted to say it may as well be taken in a literal as a figurative Sense. Indeed we meet with Things so mean and insipid, as Mr. Acherley observes, in both Clarendon and Echard, that 'tis impossible to observe always the Gravity and Decency of History. The Borders of Wales are so far from Whitehall, that the Borderers might be easily convinc'd of a Thing which they knew nothing of. The Petition from Cornwall, sign'd among the rest by Vicars and Curates; and that from Cumberland speak in the same Tone: And Mr. Acherley gives us the Reason for it, so natural, so easy to be conceiv'd, that 'tis not possible it could have escap'd any Writer whose Conception was easy and natural. Those on whom the Parliament's Representations prevail'd, were generally People of the Midland Counties, and the Traders in the Southern Parts of the Kingdom, who had smarted A.D. 1642. most by the arbitrary Acts of Power, such as Seizures of their Goods, Prosecutions for Ship-Money, Loans, Tonnage and Poundage, Fines and Punishments in the Star-Chamber and Forest Courts, at the Council-Table by Martial Law, illegal and irremedial Imprisonments. These People being the richest as well as the most numerous Part, we must remember his Majesty's Weights and Scales were invigorated by that eternal and irreconcilable Enmity implanted in human Nature against Oppression, which makes Men rack their Inventions to free themselves from it whenever Time offers the Means. Those on whom the King's Representations prevail'd, were generally his Subjects in the farthest Parts of the Nation, in Wales, Cornwall, Cumberland, &c. who were the least sensible, and had been the least afflicted with the late Pressures and Sufferings under the King's Exercise of arbitrary Power after the departing from the known Laws; which his Majesty has said an hundred times he is forc'd on a War to defend. The Counties nearest London, as Middlesex, Essex, Kent, Surrey, Hertfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, Huntingdonshire, Suffolk, Norfolk, never admitted of any of his Garisons, or never for any Time worth speaking of. They had long groan'd under the Pressures and Sufferings mention'd by the learned Lawyer, and cou'd not be convinc'd by Speeches, nor be persuaded by Declarations, that the King who had govern'd for fifteen Years together contrary to the known Laws, was at the End of that Term making War in Defence of them. Tho' the King had other Persons about him besides Machiavels, yet they were cunning enough to see that the Inhabitants of the Counties nearest to London would not do his Business, therefore they drew him first towards the Northern Counties, and then to the Borders of Wales, where the Ignorance and Poverty of the People had defended them against the Oppressions by Taxes, and the Prosecutions in the Spiritual Courts.

The Earl of Essex rendezvous'd his Army at St. Albans, where he muster'd about 16000 Horse and Foot. He was attended by several Members of both Houses of Parliament, and a Multitude of People crowd'd the Way as he march'd to wish him Victory. A Committee accompany'd him to take Subscriptions for Loans, to order Matters concerning Delinquents and Malignants, and consider of the Good of the Army. The Parliament's Directions to their General before-mention'd, were, 1. To restrain all Prophaneness in the Army. 2. To His Instructions fight the Army with the King, and rescue his Person, the Prince, and Duke of York, from those about him. 3. To present their Petition to his Majesty, and if he shall please to withdraw himself from the Army, then to cause those Forces to disband and to guard the King in his Return. 4. To declare Pardon for those who lay down their Arms taken up against the Parliament, except those I have elsewhere named, particularly Mr. Hyde, who in his History, if it was his, boasts of the Malignancy of his Family; and indeed he was one of the first who was set a-part for Justice.

The Cavalier Spirit breaks out often in the Course of this Contest, to the Terror of all such as had any Sentiments of Pity or Humanity. Dr. Bastwick, and Captain Ludlow, who had been taken at low Leiceſter, were order'd to be try'd for their Lives; but the two Houses sending a Message to Judge Heath, that they would cause two for one to be hang'd, if those Gentlemen were executed, a stop was put to that bloody Design.

Among the many brave young Gentlemen who offer'd their Service to the Parliament, were Mr. Fiennes, Mr. Fleetwood, Mr. Ludlow, whom we have elsewhere spoken of, Mr. Rich, Mr. Roswell, &c. who with Major-General Harrison, Colonel Thomlinson, Colonel Twistleton, Major Whitby, and others, to the Number of 100, form'd a Troop of Life-Guard for the Lord General, under the

A.D. 1642. Command of Sir Philip Stapleton. The Earl of Essex detach'd Colonel Essex to possess himself of Worcester, where the Cavaliers had a Garrison, which had been admitted by the Mayor, without Consent of the Citizens. These were reforc'd by Prince Rupert, who engag'd the Parliament Forces in that Neighbourhood, before the General cou'd advance so far. This Engagement, call'd the Fight, at Powick, was on the 22d of September, and is reckon'd the first Fight in the Civil War. Echard describes it as a most glorious Action on the King's Side; but General Ludlow, who was present, relates it otherwise. There are but two or three Falsities in the Reverend Historian's Relation of this Fact; as that of Prince Rupert's Handful of Men, when he was superior in Number; that this Party was the Parliament's best Men, when Ludlow assures us, they knew not the Difference between Wheeling and Running; and the two Houses of Parliament order'd a Day of Thanksgiving for this Victory at Powick. In the Account of Battels and Skirmishes, I shall almost always quote my Author; and at the End of it shew how Echard falsifies it; for there is not one Action during the whole Course of the War, which the Earl of Clarendon and he have not represented otherwise than the Fact was, according to the Report of the fairest Writers.

Powick Fight.

The King increas'd his Army to 22000 Men at Shrewsbury: The Gentry of Wales, and the Marches, being much better able to supply him with Men than with Money, which was brought him from Oxford; some collected at London, and sent thither; and some rais'd by the Contributions of the Colleges and Halls, contrary to the Universities solemn Promise to Whitlocke, who with the Lord Say, and a Body of Militia, had visited it; and had Whitlocke's Advice been taken, it had been Garrison'd for the Parliament, before any of the King's Forces shew'd themselves in those Parts.

The King refuses the Petition from Essex.

Prince Rupert staid at Worcester, only while he cou'd draw off his Troops and Baggage; and he had not been gone many Hours, before the Earl of Essex enter'd the City with the main Body of the Army; from thence he sent to Shrewsbury for a safe Conduct, and free Access to his Majesty, he having a Petition from the Parliament to deliver to him: His Lordship address'd to the Earl of Dorset, who wrote back that the King's Answer was, He would receive any Petition that should be presented to him from his Parliament, and give free Access to those that should bring the same; but he would not receive any Petition out of the Hands of any TRAYTOR. After which way of Thinking, he cou'd receive no Petition at all; for he had declar'd the Earl of Essex, and all his Adherents, Traytors; which included the Parliament of England, who had voted to live and die with the Earl, and all the People who adher'd to them.

Parliament send Envoys Abroad.

The two Houses now despairing of an Accommodation without War, sent Agents to Foreign Parts, to inform Princes and States of the Necessity they were under to take Arms for their Preservation, and to remove the Prejudices which his Majesty's Ambassadors had rais'd against them. To Holland they sent Mr. Strickland, an obscure Gentleman, says Echard; whereas he was as conspicuous, as being a Member of Parliament, and of one of the best Families in England could make him. Mr. Strickland inform'd the States-General, that the Parliament contended for nothing but to enjoy the Benefit of the ancient and fundamental Laws of the Kingdom, which had been all violated by his Majesty's assuming a Power to govern contrary to them, by his arbitrary Will and Pleasure, and by his endeavouring to make himself an absolute Lord, and his Subjects slavish Vassals; that they acted purely on the defensive Part, and had continually invited the King to return to his Parliament, offering to

ach. 531.

be obedient according to the Law of the Land, but A.D. 1642. his Majesty obstinately stood out against Treaty and Peace. The learned Lawyer proceeds, "The Parliament produc'd, and shew'd to the foreign Potentates, the Preambles of several Acts of Parliament, to which the King had lately given the Royal Assent: By which it did appear, that the several Instances of his Misgovernment did thereby stand not only acknowledg'd, but by himself condemn'd." Yet the whole Drift of the History, which goes by the Earl of Clarendon's Name, is to prove that those very Things were just and laudable which the King himself condemn'd. This Evidence so far prevail'd on them, especially the King of Denmark, that his Majesty was forc'd to order Cockrain, his Resident at Copenhagen, to present a Memorial to that King, in which he apologiz'd for making the Concessions the Parliament had insisted upon. In short, all the foreign Potentates either deny'd, or fail'd to send the King Assistance; objecting that his Majesty needed none, for he had in his own Hands Means to relieve himself; which was to return to his Parliament, and conform his Government to the Laws of his Kingdom; in Defence of which, his Majesty proclaims every-where he has taken Arms: And the Earl of Clarendon and Mr. Echard every where proclaim, he had never broken them.

The Earl of Essex staid at Worcester several Days, King's in Expectation of a softer Answer; all which Time March the King improv'd, by increasing his Army, and gathering Contributions. From Shrewsbury he march'd to Bridgnorth, having, says Echard, not one Papist a Field-Officer in his Army, but Sir Papists in Arthur Aston, which is as true as his Truths generally are. Had he never heard of Major-General Webb, Sir William Vavasor, Major-General, Sir Edward Widdrington, Sir Henry Gage, Sir Thomas Tildesley? but what need I name more, I have before me a List of some Hundreds of Lords, Knights and Gentlemen, Colonels, Lieutenant-Colonels, Majors and Captains, all Papists, and Sufferers in their Persons and Purfes, for his Service. The Papists themselves publish'd it in King Charles the Second's Reign, as an Argument for Favour to them and their Religion, on the Score of this Merit.

At Killingworth Castle, as the King was pointing out to this Center, Judge Heath late upon a Commission of Oyer and Terminer, to attain the Earl of Essex of Rebellion and Treason; an useless Provocation, which render'd those contemptible who affected to make themselves terrible by it. Mr. Echard assures us, the King had but 6000 Foot, 2000 Horse, and 1000 Dragoons, when he came to Bridgnorth, and that afterwards his Army was much inferior in Number to the Parliaments; whereas we read in a Letter sign'd by Colonel Hollis, Sir Philip Stapleton, Colonel Ballard, Sir William Balfour, Sir John Meldrum, and Mr. Charles Pym, and address'd to the Speaker of the House of Commons, that their Number was 18000 Foot, Rushw. and 4000 Horse and Dragoons, when the two P. 36. Armies engag'd in the Vale of Redborsfe, under Edgehill, near Keinton in Warwickshire, October the 23d.

General Ludlow having been in this Battel also, Edgehill let us follow his Relation of it. Sunday Morning Fight. about nine a Clock, some of the Enemies Troops were discover'd upon Edgehill. Our Forces had been order'd that Morning to Quarters of Refreshment, having had but little Rest for 48 Hours. This Order was immediately countermanded. The Enemy drew down the Hill, and we into the Field. The best of our Field-Pieces were planted on our Right Wing, guarded by two Regiments of Foot, and some Horse: Our General commanding to Fire upon the Enemy, it was done twice, on the Part of the Army where it was reported

A.D. 1642. ported the King was. The great Shot was exchanged on both Sides for the Space of an Hour, by which Time the Foot began to engage; and a Party of the Enemy being sent to line some Hedges on our Right Wing, thereby to beat us from our Ground; they were repuls'd by our Dragoons, without any Loss on our Side. The Enemies Body of Foot, wherein the King's Standard was, came within Musket-shot of us; upon which we observing no Horse to encounter withal, charg'd them with some Loss from their Pikes, though very little from their Shot; but not being able to break them, we retreated to our former Station; whither we were no sooner come up, than we perceiv'd that those who were appointed to guard the Artillery, march'd off: And our Captain, Sir Philip Stapleton, wishing for a Regiment of Foot to secure the Canon, we of the Life-Guard promis'd to stand by him in Defence of them, causing one of our Servants to load and level one of them, where a Body of Horse appear'd advancing towards us from that Side where the Enemy was; we fir'd at them with Case-shot, but did them no Mischief, our Gun being overloaded, and planted on high Ground, which happen'd very fortunately; this Body being part of our Army commanded by Sir William Balfour, who had bravely charg'd into the Enemies Quarters, and nail'd several Pieces of Cannon, and we did not discern the Signal he made us of being Friends. The Earl of Essex order'd two Regiments of Foot to attack the Body which we had charg'd before, and where the King's Standard was, but they cou'd not break it, till Sir William Balfour attack'd them in the Rear, at the Head of a Party of Horse, and we, marching down to take them in Flank, they broke, and ran away toward the Hill. In this Action was killed Sir Edmund Varney, Standard-Bearer, Who engag'd on that Side, not out of any good Opinion of the Cause, as Ludlow was inform'd by a Person of Honour, but from a Sense of a Duty which he thought lay upon him, in respect of his Office, and Relation to the King. Colonel Maurice, Lieutenant-Colonel Herbert, and other principal Officers, were then killed, and many Colours taken, as well as the Standard, which Colonel Middleton, then a Volunter, took and display'd in Token of Victory; but a strong Party of Horse coming upon us, we were oblig'd to retire with our Standard; and having brought it to the Earl of Essex, he mov'd it twice or thrice above his Head, and then deliver'd it to his Secretary, Mr. Chambers, from whom it was taken by one Captain Smith, a Papist, whom with two more, had disguis'd themselves with Orange-colour'd Scarfs, the Lord General's Colours, and pretending it was unfit that a Penman should have the Honour to carry the Standard, took it from him, and rode with it to the King, for which Action he was made a Knight Banneret. After this there was no other Engagement on either Side, only a few great Guns continued to fire upon us from the Enemy, 'till towards the close of the Day we discover'd a Body of Horse marching from our Rear on the Left of us, under the Hedges, which we of the Life-Guard first perceiving to be the Enemy, we advanc'd towards them, fell upon their Rear, and did good Execution. This was the Right Wing of the King's Army, commanded by Prince Rupert, who taking Advantage of the Disorder that our own Horse had put our Foot into, who had open'd their Ranks to secure them in their Retreat, press'd upon them with such Fury, that he put them to Flight: And if the Time he spent in plundering the Waggon's had been employ'd in taking the Advantages which offer'd themselves in the Place of Battel, it might have prov'd more serviceable to the carrying on of the Enemy's Designs. Instead of which, Prince Rupert fell upon the Waggoners, Carters, Labourers, Pioneers, and others, unarm'd, among whom many Women were slain, and this Slaughter was A.D. 1642 the greatest in the Parliament Army, according to the Lord Brooke's Speech to the Citizens in Guildhall. Ludlow adds, The Night after the Battel, our Army quarter'd on the same Ground the Enemy fought on the Day before. Another writes, "Our Army being thus wholly possess'd of the Ground which the Enemy chose to fight upon, and so Park clear Masters of it, that none dar'd to dispossess Chron. them of it, we stood there all Night till next Morning." Sir Faithful Portescue betraying his Trust, and going over to the King's Party with his Troop in the beginning of this Battel, was a great Discouragement to the Parliamentarians; but their good Heart and good Cause recover'd that Fault. The Falsities in Echard's History of this Battel are, 1. The Number of the King's Forces five or 6000 less than the Parliament's. 2. The Number of the Slain 5000, which were not above 2500. 3. Sir John Smith's Valour, by which he got the Royal Standard and Knighthood, whereas it was deliver'd to him by Mistake and Surprize, without striking a Stroke. 4. The Victory was on the King's Side. Whitlocke says, the Parliament Army had the Victory, though but a small one. 5. The Disorder in the Faces of the Earl of Essex's Men, the great Dejection of the common Soldiers. Ludlow writes, we hop'd we shou'd have pursu'd the Enemy, who were marching off as fast as they could; but instead of that, for what Reason I know not, we march'd to Warwick: Indeed the Earl of Essex's Conduct on that Occasion, was much disapprov'd. He had receiv'd a Reinforcement of 4000 Men, under Colonel Hampden, and Colonel Grantham, and might have cut the Cavalier Army to Pieces; instead of which, says General Ludlow, he let the King march off as if Master of the Field, as the Lord Clarendon, Warwick and Echard, ridiculously represent it. Some impute this Neglect to his Desire of lengthening out the War, and consequently his high Command in it; which Conjecture seems to have some Probability in it. Others tell us, the Parliament Army wanted Rest and Refreshment, which they had been without eight and forty Hours. The principal Officers slain on the King's Side, were the Lord General, the Earl of Lindsey, the Lord George Stuart, Brother to the Duke of Richmond, Sir Edmund Verney, Colonel Munro, and one of the Lunsfords: Among the Prisoners were the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Sir Thomas Lunsford, Sir Edward Stradling, who were sent to Warwick Castle. Of the Parliament Officers were slain, the Lord St. John, and the brave Colonel Essex: Among the Prisoners were Colonel Walton, a Member of Parliament, and Captain Austin, an eminent Merchant of London, of whom the last died through the hard Usage he met with in Oxford Goal. Captain Wingate, before-mention'd, who was taken at Powick, was so near Death through the like hard Usage, that had he not made his Escape, weak and languishing as he was, 'tis suppos'd he could not many Days have surviv'd the Enemies Cruelty. There is nothing strange in that Cruelty: A humane Tyranny is Contradiction in Terms; lawless, arbitrary Power admits not tender compassionate Sentiments; Rage is its Guide, and Torture and Death its Diversion; and whoever were capable of espousing such a Cause, must with it espouse all its Consequences, Rapine, Slaughter and Desolation: Whereas Liberty inspires all its Lovers with Benignity and Benevolence, and softens the Mind at the same Time that it enlarges it.

The Reverend Historian affirms, that the Lord St. John's last Words were, I did not intend to be against the King, but wish him all Happiness. Ludlow says, He declar'd at his Death full Satisfaction and Chearfulness to lay down his Life in so good a Cause. The Parliament Officers who distinguish'd themselves in this Battel, were the Earl of Essex,

Lord St. John dies of his Wounds.

A.D. 1642. the General, Sir William Balfour, the Earl of Bedford, the Lord Brook, Colonel Hollis, Colonel Ballard, Sir Philip Stapleton, the Lord Grey, Major Hurrey, Captain Draper, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Captain Cromwell, whose Name is remember'd in the Chronicle with those other Heroes: But Echard is positive that He absented himself from the Battel, and observing from the top of a neighbouring Steeple, the Disorder the Right Wing sustain'd from Prince Rupert, he was so terrify'd, that slipping down in Haste by a Bell-Rope, he took Horse, and ran away with his Troop. If we had not such a Cloud of other Witnesses of this Historian's Judgment and Sincerity, this wou'd be enough to let us into his Character. The News of Edgehil Fight came to London the next Day: The first Man that brought it, having been in that Part of it where Prince Rupert had the better, made Report accordingly, that the King was Victorious. Other Messengers soon brought other Advice, that the Earl of Essex had routed the King's Army, kill'd and taken many, and gain'd a compleat Victory; which News was almost as much too good, as the other was too bad. The King went still farther, and order'd a Day of solemn Thanksgiving for a Victory which he did not obtain. There is nothing strange in this neither, that those who had by an Edict enjoin'd the Profanation of the Lord's-Day, shou'd make a Mock-Holyday, and profane even that with dissembled Prayer; in the Form of which for this Thanksgiving, it was said, Thy Hand alone, thou God of Hosts, hath dispos'd of Victory to thy Servant the King; accomplish the great Work thou hast begun for us; not unto us, but unto thee, O God, we give the Praise; continue these Blessings on the Head of our Sovereign and his Army; continue the Fear and Consternation thou hast already cast upon the Hearts of those who have Rebelliously risen up against him; make them see, that to fight against him, is to fight against Heaven; it is not to be written or read without Trembling: God the Searcher of Hearts, knew the Pride, Vanity, Ambition, Lust and Cruelty of those Hearts thus addressing to an Omniscent, Omnipotent Being, for a Blessing on lawless despotick Power, on Superstition and Prophaneness, in Opposition to Law, Liberty and Reformation. We shall find more such Forms of Prayer on the like Occasions. The Victory for which the King and his Followers give God the Praise, is thus describ'd by Colonel Hollis, and other Colonels, in their Letter to the Speaker; Mr. Lenthall, The King's Foot are either slain, or most of them run away, and we shou'd have pursu'd them, but that we must of pure Necessity refresh our Men. Besides the Thanksgiving, his Majesty publish'd a Declaration after his VICTORY against the REBELS, which is all of a Piece; he says, He is satisfy'd there are a far greater Number of Papists in the Parliaments Presbyterian Army, than in his own: These Papists had every Day Mr. Marshall, Mr. Alb. Mr. Manton, Mr. Obadiab Sedgwick, Mr. John Sedgwick, Mr. Wickens, and several other Presbyterian Ministers to preach to them, and pray with them; to exhort them, as they did in the heat of this Battel, to stand to it, and fight for their Religion, Laws, and Christian Liberties. Besides the Papists already mention'd, the Parliament charg'd the King with granting Commissions to Sir Nicholas Thornton, Sir Thomas Howard, Sir William Riddel, Sir William Gerrard, Sir Cecil Straford, the Lord Herbert, Mr. Smith of Alb, Mr. George Wray, Mr. Edward Gray of Morpeth Castle, Mr. Lancelot Ewington of Denton, Mr. Lancelot Holtby, Mr. Clifton, Mr. William Malton, Mr. Anderson, most of them of the Lancashire and Northern Counties, and with entertaining some that were actually Irish REBELS, as the Lord Taaf, Sir John Dungan, Colonel Fitz Williams, and Dr. Meara, who having been indicted for the Rebellion in Ireland, fled that Kingdom, and was appointed Physician to Prince Rupert. His Majesty said further in his Declaration, That as to the Charge of his raising an Army against the Parliament, the Scandal was so senseless, none of his Subjects cou'd believe it; a Thing so very apparent, was scarce worth mentioning in the Declarations. Echard had told us, there were about 5000 Men kill'd on both Sides; and three Days after the Fight, he tells us there were but 300 of the King's Soldiers missing; the Lord Brook told the Londoners, not above two or three Hundred Soldiers, Waggoners, Labourers, and Women, were kill'd on the Parliament Side; which ought to be mention'd, to shew the Errors that lye in our way, and require our utmost Care to avoid them.

The Parliament in their Answer to the the King's Parlia-Declaration, say, They find it full of Scandals and ment's Invectives against them, without any Ground or Colour of Truth; as indeed that about the Papists is nooriously so in-Fact and Reason; a Charge, say they, contrary to Sense and Policy, that they who have rais'd an Army for the just Defence of their Privilege and Liberties, and of the true Protestant Religion, should make Use of the Papists, the only Enemies of them all, to be the Instruments and Means to protect them. Salmonet, a French Popish Historian, engag'd on the same Side with the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Archdeacon Echard, furnishes them with several such Truths as these: Several Catholick Priests were found amongst the Dead on the Parliament Side; for they had not only two Companies of Walloon Papists, and other Catholicks in their Army, but had done what they could to engage Sir Arthur Auston in their Service; the same whom Echard names as the only Popish Field-Officer in the King's Wing. The King prov'd that the Parliament had more Papists than he in their Troops, and that they endeavour'd to gain over all the Catholicks, by a Promise to repeal all the Laws against them. The two Houses fully answer'd what was said in the King's Declaration of the Kingdom's being govern'd by a Faction of ten or twelve Men, of Brownists and Anabaptists being in their Army, and the like; but I have not Patience to repeat all that was said in this Paper War; though I must needs say, there are on the King's Side much Assertion and Haughtiness, and much Truth and good Sense on the Parliaments, which probably I shall never be requir'd to prove, because it is so easy to do it.

His Majesty made General Ruthen a Scotchman, General of his Army; and in his March to Oxford, took in the Lord Say's House at Broughton, Banbury Castle, and two or three small Garrisons, which were not Tenable. The Falsities in the Archdeacon's History are aggravated by the Abuse of the most sacred Terms, as God, Providence, and the like; which are apply'd to Facts which either never happen'd, or not in the manner he represents them. At Oxford, the only City in England which was entirely at the King's Devotion, he was receiv'd by the University with the greatest Acclamations of Joy; to whom is to be imputed the Integrity and Fidelity of the Place; which were equal to the Fidelity and Integrity of the Historian. Whistlocke, who was at Oxford with the Lord Say about a Month before, tells us, they were visited by the Mayor, Aldermen, Vice-Chancellor, Heads of Houses, and Proctors, who protested all of them their Duty to the Parliament, their Desires of Peace, and engage themselves not to act any Thing against the two Houses, nor to send their Plate to the King; which they did a Day or two after, to shew their Integrity. The Lord Say had then with him 3000 Horse, Foot and Dragoons; and Whistlocke, as I have hinted, blames him very much for not securing the Place, as well as the Plate, which wou'd have prevented his Majesty's making it his Place of Arms, and Capital Garrison, within three Days March of London, near which City Prince Rupert

They alfo publiſh'd a Declaration for the Encouragement of Apprentices that would lift in their Service, who were to have the Time they fo ferv'd allow'd in their Apprenticeships, which was the beſt way of Recruiting the Earl of Effex's Army.

That General was honourably receiv'd at West-minſter the 7th of November, and preſented with a Gratuity of 5000 Pounds by the Lords and Commons, who did alfo Declare and Publiſh to the laſting Honour of the ſaid Earl, the great and acceptable Service which he hath done the Commonwealth, and they ſhall be ready upon all Occaſions to expreſs the due Senſe which they have of his Merit, by aſſiſting and proteſting him, and all others under his Command, with their Lives and Fortunes, to the utmoſt of their Power: This to remain upon RECORD in both Houſes of Parliament, for a Mark of Honour to his Perſon, Name and Family, and for a MONUMENT of his ſingular Virtue to all Poſterity. Echard endeavours to make a Jeſt of this glorious Monument to his Merit, though it is more valuable than all the fulſome Panegyricks in the Earl of Clarendon's Characters; 'tis the Voice of his Country, and thoſe Panegyricks only the Flattery of the Hiſtorian.

The Train'd-Bands of London were reinforce'd with part of the Train'd-Bands of the affociated Counties, Middleſex, Effex, Kent, Suffolk, Hertfordſhire, Buckinghamſhire, for the Security of the City; and a ſtrong Garriſon, under the Command of Colonel Ven, was ſent to Windſor Caſtle. Out-works were rais'd, and ſeveral Pieces of Ordnance planted upon them. Many diſaffected Perſons were taken up in the City of London, as Sir George Whitmore, Sir William Aſton, Sir Henry Garraway, and Sir John Cordel, Aldermen; and nothing was omitted that could be thought of for the Safety of that Metropolis. The King being advanc'd as far as Reading, from whence Mr. Martin, the Governor, had withdrawn the Parliament Garriſon on the Approach of the Royal Army; the News of it, according to Echard, threw the Parliament and City into a terrible Pannick; and again into a new Conſternation; ſo without further Conſideration, they diſpatch'd a Meſſenger to the King, to deſire a ſafe Conduſt for a Committee of Lords and Commons to attend him with a Petition. This Pannick and Conſternation, are the Birth of his ſeeming Fancy, or that of the Viſionary Authors whom he flaviſhly copies. The Parliament were indeed uneasy at the wrong Step that was taken by their Army's retreating to Warwick, and not purſuing the King, whoſe Troops their General might eaſily have diſpers'd, after he had been reinforce'd with 4000 Men: But their Deſire of a ſafe Conduſt proceeded not from Fear, it was to prevent the Effuſion of Blood, and reſtore the publick Peace.

At a Conference of the two Houſes three Days before the Earl of Effex return'd to London, the Earl of Northumberland acquainted the Commons, that the Committee for the Safety of the Kingdom had ſome Thoughts of Propoſitions to be made to his Maſteſty, but were of Opinion to acquaint firſt his Excellency with their Intentions; who return'd them for Answer, That he believ'd

the Committee had ſuch Reaſons for thoſe Propoſitions as were laid on ſure Grounds; but withal he hop'd, they had no Thoughts of any Weakneſs of his Army, or that the Courage of thoſe who ſtood it ſo ſtoutly in the late Battel, wou'd fail them, if nothing but a ſecond Encounter muſt decide the Matter. Both Houſes agreed to ſend Sir Peter Killegrew to his Maſteſty, then at Reading, to deſire a free Access for their Commiſſioners, the Earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, Sir John Evelyn, the Lord Wainman, and Sir John Hippeſley. The King told Sir Peter, he wou'd grant a ſafe Conduſt to any ſuch as he had not proclaim'd TRAYTORS; and then excepted againſt Sir John Evelyn. Sir Peter Killegrew was again ſent to his Maſteſty on his former Errand, and the King again gave him the ſame Answer. The great Spite againſt Sir John, was for his impeaching the Lord Digby; and the Proclamation in which he was declar'd a Traytor, was thought to be publiſh'd on Purpoſe, it being wet from the Preſs when it was firſt ſhewn. And Sir Peter Killegrew, had been kept Priſoner 24 Hours by Prince Rupert, to hinder his delivering the Meſſage 'till the Proclamation was printed: At laſt Sir John Evelyn's earneſt Sollicitations prevail'd with the Parliament to leave his Name out of the Commiſſion, that it might not retard the Peace which they all ſo much deſir'd. Mr. Pierrepont being added to the Commiſſioners, they carry'd the Petition to Colebroke, and preſented it to the King the 11th of November. His Maſteſty appointed them to attend him at Windſor Caſtle with their Propoſitions, and deſir'd the Treaty might be ſpeeded: But in the miſt of theſe peaceable Diſpoſitions, and when the Parliament depended entirely on the Faith of the Treaty; the King, as General Ludlow writes, "taking the Advantage of a very thick Miſt, march'd his Army the very next Day, November the 12th, within half a Mile of Brentford, before he was discover'd, deſigning to ſurprize the Earl of Effex's Train of Artillery, which was then at Hammersmith, the Parliament and City; which he had certainly done, if two Regiments of Foot; and a ſmall Party of Horſe that lay at Brentford, had not with unſpeakable Courage oppos'd his Paſſage, and ſtopp'd the March of his Army moſt part the Afternoon; during which Time the Army that quarter'd in and about London, drew together, which ſome of them, and particularly the Life-Guard, among whom was Ludlow, had Opportunity the ſooner to do, being at that very Inſtant drawn out into Chelſea Fields to Muſter, where they heard the Volleys of Shot that paſſ'd between the Enemy and the Parliaments little Party. The Diſpute continu'd ſome Hours, till the latter were ſurrounded with Horſe and Foot; and then being overpower'd with Numbers on every Side, many brave and gallant Men having loſt their Lives upon the Place, the reſt choſe rather to commit themſelves to the Water, than to thoſe that were engag'd in ſo treacherous a Deſign; where many Officers, as Major Quarles, and Captain Lacy, and private Soldiers were drown'd, and ſome taken Priſoners. However, the Enemy's Deſign was by this Means defeated, and they discourag'd from any further Attempt that Night. The Parliament were ſo alarm'd with the Danger and Treachery of this Enterprize, that they us'd all poſſible Diligence to bring their Forces together, ſo that by eight a Clock the next Morning, the Lord General had an Army of 20000 Horſe and Foot drawn up upon Turnham-Green; and Part of their Army which lay at Kingſton, was marching to them by way of London. The Enemy drew out a Party of theirs towards the Hill at Aſton, which the Earl of Effex order'd ſome Troops to attack, and they forc'd them to retire in Diſorder to their main Body. And hereupon, ſays Ludlow, in the Opinion of many judicious Perſons, we loſt, as at Edgehill, a favourable

A.D. 1642. favourable Opportunity of engaging the Enemy with great Advantage, our Number exceeding theirs, and their Reputation being utterly lost in the last Attempt. Whitlocke says, "Some of the King's Party did afterwards confess, if they had fallen upon them then, they had probably broken them." This Action in Time of Treaty was so ill repented, that the Parliament voted they would have no Accommodation. The Falsity of the Archdeacon's History of this Fight, consists more in the Reflection than Fact. He says, many are of Opinion if the King's Army of about 12000 Men, had attack'd the Parliament's of about 20000, it had presently given way. Another Falsity is, that Dr. Downing and Mr. Marshal, two Army Chaplains, gave Absolution to those Soldiers who had been taken Prisoners at Brentford, and broke their Words by lifting again in the Parliament Army, after they had promis'd to bear Arms no more against the King. He says gravely they did it for the better recruiting their Army with those 500 Prisoners, which in Fact were but 150, tho' the City of London was pouring out Men, as we read in Rushworth; and it was hardly worth while for the two Ministers to absolve them of Breach of Faith when they were so little wanted; which added to the Rarity of Presbyterian Absolution, makes very merry History.

Parliament Petition.

King's Answer.

Parl. Chron. 215.

Whitl.

Parl. Chron. 215.

His Majesty retreated to Reading, where he receiv'd a Petition from the two Houses, who it seems were in a little better Temper than when they voted no Accommodation, to desire him to return to his Parliament with his Royal, not his martial Attendance: That Religion, Laws, and Liberties might be settled by their Advice, finding by a sad and late Accident, he was environ'd with such Counsels as rather persuaded a desperate Division, than join'd in a good Agreement with his Parliament. The King in Excuse of that sad Accident at Brentford, said he had sent a Messenger to give Notice of it; and as to any intended Surprize and Sack of London, he disown'd it, and added, probably God Almighty would not have given such a Blessing to our Journey, as to have assisted us so by Land and Water, as with less than a third Part of our Foot, and with the Loss but of ten Men, to beat two their best Regiments out of both Brentfords; for all the great Advantage of their Works in them, to kill him who commanded in chief, and kill and drown many others, to take 500 Prisoners, &c. if he who is the Searcher of Hearts and Truth itself, had not known the Innocency of our Heart; and the Blessing of God upon this Action, will we doubt not clear us; and God so bless our future Actions, as we have deliver'd the Truth. Notwithstanding these solemn Appeals, and these boasted Evidences of God's Blessing, the Fact is otherwise; the Number of the King's Forces at Brentford Fight was treble to that of the Parliament, and instead of losing ten Men only, the King lost more than the Parliament, as one of their Author's writes; At last our Numbers and Provision increasing continually, Prince Robert and his Crew of Robbers, were forc'd to fly, being beaten back from their Ground with great Slaughter. Again; notwithstanding all those first Disadvantages, the Loss at this bloody Bickering was most constantly reported to be far more on the Enemy's Side than on ours, at least three to one. Rushworth tells us there were but 150 Prisoners taken. The best Proof of the fair Intention by attacking the Parliament's Forces in Time of Treaty, is what his Majesty says; It may appear by my not pursuing my Victory at Brentford; when he had just before spoken of his great Disadvantage by the Superiority of the Earl of Essex Army in Number, and by his giving Order to his own Army to march off before he had Notice of Forces from London. It is very likely that 24000 Men which the Earl muster'd the next Day at Turnham-Green, could gather together and his Majesty have no Notice of it. One Historian says his Army was forc'd to fly.

Ludlow, Those Persons who were against the Earl of Essex's pursuing the King, well knew the Enemy to be in a flying and not in a charging Condition: Yet his Majesty declares solemnly to the Parliament and the whole World, that he did not attack the Earl of Essex, to prove that he intended nothing at all by surprizing the Parliament's Forces at Brentford. Mr. Acherley remarks that Brentford Fight was while there was a Treaty depending, and after the Two Houses had order'd their Army to forbear Hostilities; on which Account it was call'd a perfidious Part, as bad as massacring the Parliament's Forces, who were resting under a Treaty as they thought secure. Orleans makes a sorry Excuse for it; he thought he no way transgress'd the Treaty, being scarce commenc'd. It is not to be doubted but the King's Army would not have fallen upon the Earl of Essex's Troops in Brentford, had they not depend'd upon some Advantage by the Security they were in; and then how must it shock one to read in his Majesty's Answer, that God had given a Blessing to that very perfidious Part which the learned Lawyer speaks of.

The Earl of Newcastle associated several Counties in the North of England for the King, as Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmorland, Durham, with the Town of Newcastle upon Tyne, which was too great a Power for the Lord Fairfax with the divided Forces of Yorkshire to cope with; and that Power was the more dangerous, for that the Earl's Army was full of Papists Officers and Soldiers. This formidable Combination between the Papists and their Abettors against the Religion and Laws of England, could not but alarm the Scots, and dispose them to lend a willing Ear to the Desires of the Parliament for their Assistance; and so strong an Association put the Two Houses upon taking the like Method.

Occasions the Scots entering England.

The Lord Fairfax, Sir William Brereton, Sir William Waller, Lord Grey of Groby, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Denbigh, Major-General Brown, Sir Thomas Middleton, were order'd to associate Yorkshire, Cheshire, Hampshire, Leicestershire, Essex, and the Eastern Counties, Shropshire, Berkshire, North-Wales, &c.

About the same time Colonel Skippon was made Major-General of the Army, and due Care was taken to supply the Earl of Essex with all Necessaries.

His Majesty garrison'd Reading, and made Sir Arthur Aston a Papist Governor; from thence he remov'd to Oxford, where Mr. Edward Hyde his Chancellor of the Exchequer had more Leisure to draw up Declarations than the People found to read them. Warwick owns his Language and Style were a little too redundant; and tho' he made plain the Deceitfulness of the Parliament, yet a wife Lord said of him, our good Pen will harm us, with Multiplicity and Wantonness of Words. I observ'd this in every Paragraph of the History of the Rebellion; and it is amazing that so voluminous a History without one good historical Quality, should have impos'd on the World above twenty Years: But that Imposition is wearing off to make room for Sincerity and Truth.

The reverend Historian informs us that the two Houses, "Tho' they seem'd so desirous of a Peace, severely prosecuted all such as really endeavour'd it; not one Word of which is true. It is observ'd, that their Partiality and Injustice was so notorious, that there was no Rule or Measure of Right in any Matter depending before them; every Word of which is false, and is so self-evident, that there needs no Proof of it. Again; The Two Houses found themselves press'd for Want of Money, and forc'd it from the Citizens by Imprisonment, Distress, and the late violent Methods; which is as true as the rest. Such as refus'd to obey their Ordinances for Contributions, were dealt with as the Law directs in Cases of Refusal to pay Taxes.

* 216 The HISTORY of ENGLAND, during the Reigns

A.D. 1642. But the Londoners in general contributed chearfully, infomuch that the Parliament now desiring a Loan of 30000 Pounds, they suddenly advanc'd 60000 Pounds, and resolv'd there shou'd be no Want of Money if the Earl of Essex was oblig'd to carry on the War. 'Tis worth observing what a strong Appetite the Cavaliers had to Blood: For not content with spilling it in an unnatural War, they wou'd fain have fed it by Form of Law; and to that End Heath one of their Judges was order'd to try Captain Lilburne, who had been taken at Brentford for High-Treason at Oxford, which was as foolish as it was cruel. The Parliament had more Prisoners than they, and cou'd make Reprisals on Delinquents when they pleas'd, which a little right Thinking wou'd have taught them. But they went on till Notice was given them, that if any one was put to Death for having been in the Parliament's Service, they wou'd inflict the like Punishment on such Prisoners as were or should be taken by their Forces; which the wise Heads at Oxford might easily have foreseen, and not have shewn their Teeth when they durst not bite. His Majesty publish'd a Declaration against the Two Houses raising Money by Ordinance, which he had done before, and with as good Success; but he thought to succeed better in the Affair of the Sheriffs which he nominated for the several Counties of England, whether they were in his Possession or not, which was done with a double Design, the one to exercise the Authority Royal, the other to authorize them to receive a Tax of 400000 Pounds, which had by Act of Parliament been made payable to the Sheriffs, and by them to be return'd to the Places of Receipt in the said Act specify'd; but the House of Commons RESOLV'D, That all those that presum'd to exercise the Office of High-Sheriff without Consent of Parliament, shou'd be summon'd to appear as Delinquents to answer such Matters as shou'd be justly alleg'd against them. The Author of the Chronicle assures us many of these Sheriffs appointed by the King were Papists, and all of them universally Persons very ill-affected, and fit for any Design.

About the same time the Two Houses were inform'd that Sir William Waller had taken Farnham Castle, and in it Mr. Denham High-Sheriff of Surrey, Captain Hudson, and several Persons of Note, with a great Booty of Money, Arms, and Ammunition. Sir William Brockam the new High-Sheriff of Kent, was seiz'd by Sir Michael Livesay, with his Commission under the Great-Seal, several Writs, Proclamations, and other such Ware, all which he sent to the Parliament. The Sheriff of Devonshire Sir Edmund Fortescue, was taken by a Detachment from the Garrison of Plymouth, and sent up to London, together with Sir Edward Seymour, Edward Seymour Esq; Mr. Basset, Colonel Champernoun, Captain Pomeroy, Captain Bidlake, Captain Peter Fortescue, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Shepton Clerk of the Peace, Major Firman, Robert Warren Esq; Thomas Shipcot Esq; and other Gentlemen, who had Cannon with them, and had great Things in their Heads if they cou'd have accomplish'd them.

The City and Castle of Bristol had been secur'd for the Parliament by Colonel Essex with a Party of 1500 Foot and 500 Horse before Edge-Hill Fight. Sir William Waller took Winchester, where the Lord Grandison and Commissary Wilmot commanded for the King. These with the Lord Digby had just taken Marlborough, and committed such Cruelties and Robberies as render'd their Names infamous and odious. But what better cou'd be expected from such Leaders and such Soldiers, the Corruption of the corrupt Part of the Kingdom? Digby return'd with his Plunder to Oxford. Grandison and Wilmot advanc'd to Winchester, near which City Sir William Waller, who was sent out after them, found them drawn up to receive him with an equal Number of Forces, which he drove into the Town, and pursu'd them to the A.D. 1642. Walls, where Colonel Brown soon made a Breach, and entering the Place, bravely seconded by the other Officers, the Cavaliers were forc'd to retire into the Castle, where they surrender'd at Discretion, and the Town was given the Soldiers to pillage, the Townsmen having made as much Opposition to the Parliament's Soldiers as the Royalists. What was Matter of great Scandal to the latter, was the breaking the Organ Pipes in the Cathedral dedicated to one St. Swithin, whose Saintship was owing to a Miracle of his in piecing together a whole Basket of broken Eggs. The Cathedral Men took in great Dudgeon, that the Honour of this famous Saint shou'd be thus expos'd, and his Organ Pipes turn'd into Bagpipes. It must be remember'd that during the whole Course of the War, there was no Cathedral Town but what bore its Testimony against the Defence of the Laws, Rights, and Liberties of the People, and thought Devastation and Blood a poor Sacrifice to Superstition and arbitrary Power.

Sir William Waller having garrison'd Winchester, proceeded to Chichester, and took it.

Skirmish.*

We left the Marquis of Hertford at Shireburn, where he was besieg'd by the Earl of Bedford, whose Troops being mostly Train'd-Bands, soon grew weary of the Length of the Siege, and return'd to their Homes. The Earl with the Remainder remov'd to Yeoville expecting Supplies; but the Marquis being reinforc'd with 100 Horse and 200 Foot sent him by Mr. Rogers High-Sheriff of Dorset, order'd Major Bampfild with a Detachment of 400 Horse and 200 Foot, to fall upon the Earl of Bedford's Rear. These advanc'd to Babel-Hill within a Mile of Yeoville, where, tho' with great Disadvantage of Ground, they were attack'd by the Parliament Forces, and put to Flight: Major Bampfild was taken Prisoner, Captain Hussey kill'd; but the Execution was not very great, the Royalists making the best Use of their own Heels and their Horses. In this Action Captain Ayscough, Captain Balfour, and Captain Thomson, distinguish'd themselves on the Parliament's Side. The Marquis of Hertford receiving Information that the Lord Brook was advancing to join the Earl of Bedford, and renew the Siege of Shireburn, and being dishearten'd at Bampfild's Defeat, he quitted the Castle and escap'd to Minehead in Disguise, together with the Lord Pawlet; from whence the Marquis pass'd over into Wales, leaving behind him the Earl of Bath, Sir Henry Berkley, Sir Ralph Sydenham, Sir Francis Dodington, Sir Hugh Pollard, and other Gentlemen, who were taken Prisoners by the Earl of Bedford's Forces, and sent to London. A small Addition of Force wou'd then have secur'd the West for the Parliament. These Events happen'd before the Battel of Edge-Hill.

In Cornwall the Lord Mobun was very active against the Parliament, having refus'd to attend the House of Peers upon Summons. The Earl of Bath had done the same, and the Lord Capel gave Power to the Marquis of Hertford to receive all his Rents in the Western Parts of England, which were very considerable at and about Winton in Devon; Somersetshire, for maintaining the War against the Parliament, which he had deserted. The City of Exeter was garrison'd by the Citizens, and twenty-five Pieces of Ordnance mounted on the Walls. The Earl of Bedford while he was superior in Force to the Royalists, kept Dorset, Devon, and Somerset pretty well in Awe, but for want of due Supplies he cou'd not suppress the opposite Party, who especially in Cornwall and Devon picqu'd themselves on Cavalier Notions of Loyalty, and center'd Religion in Forms and Ceremonies, without being at much Pains to know more, or know better than their Vicars or Tutors taught them; so they took hold of the first Opportunity

Opportunity to deliver themselves from their Deliverers, to reject the Authority and Protection of the Parliament, and give themselves up absolutely to the absolute Power of the King, supported by the most bloody and ravenous Part of his Majesty's Army under Goring and Green-vile.

North.

In the North the Parliamentarians could not make Head against the Cavaliers. The Earl of Cumberland commanded there for his Majesty, before the Earl of Newcastle had form'd his Army, and had proclaim'd the following Gentlemen Traitors for not joining with him: The Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax, Sir Edward Loftus, Sir Matthew Bointon, Sir Henry Forbes, Sir Thomas Maleverer, Sir Richard Darby, Sir Christopher Wray, Sir Henry Anderson, Sir John Savile, Sir Edward Rodes, Sir Hugh Cholmley, Sir John Hotham, Sir Thomas Remington, Sir Thomas Norcliffe, John Hotham, Esq; Thomas Hatcher, Esq; William Lister, Esq; John Legard, Esq; John Dodsworth, Esq; John Wastel, Esq; John Perce, Esq; William White, Esq; Thomas Robinson, Esq; John Robinson, Esq; Arthur Beckwith, Esq; Thomas Stockdale, Esq; and several others; which the Parliament resenting, did the same by the Earl of Cumberland and his Array Men. The Lord Fairfax being sensible that when the Earls of Cumberland and Newcastle had joined Forces, the Parliament's would not be a Match for them in Yorkshire, concluded a Neutrality for that Province with Mr. Bellasis the King's Commissioner; but the Parliament dissolved that Agreement, as not being made with their Consent; and the Lord Fairfax, his Son, and their Adherents, made a very gallant Defence against the Earls of Newcastle and Cumberland, who had an Army almost as great as the King's, till the Scots came to their Assistance, and drove the Cavaliers out of the

North. Capt. Hotham took Cawood Castle from Archbishop Williams, who fled to the King, notwithstanding he had been so ill used by him; and his Usage was not much better afterwards. Sir Hugh Cholmley and Sir Matthew Bointon joining Forces, fell upon Col. Slingsby at Gisborough, routed his Party of 600 Horse and Foot, and took himself and 140 of his Men Prisoners. Sir Thomas Fairfax seiz'd the Lord Savile's strong House at Howley, and found in it 500 Men, with Store of Arms and Ammunition. Sir William Savile and Major Beaumont made their Escape before the House was taken.

Tadcaster.

Mr. Archdeacon, with his wonted Sincerity, assures us, the Earl of Newcastle drove the Lord Fairfax and his Lieutenant-General, Capt. Hotham, out of Tadcaster; which little Action has also its Share of Falsty, and I will repeat what the Lord Fairfax said of it, to confirm the Reader in his Judgment of the Reverend Author's Fair History, when he writes of the Cavaliers. "I sent to Capt. Hotham to bring up the Forces to Wetherby, which being done, and the Earl of Newcastle's Army come in Sight, we drew our Men into the innermost Part of our Quarters, where we had raised some Breast-Works for our Musketeers, and there the Fight began about Eleven a Clock, and so continued a sharp Dispute till about Nine a Clock in the Evening the 10th of December, in which Time there was at least 40000 Musket-Shot discharged on both Sides, and great Numbers of Cannon-Shot. The Enemy had once Part of the Town, beaten our Men, and plac'd some of their Companies in two or three Houses, which did much indanger us. But Fairf.

Mem.

"in the End our Men with great Courage forced them out again, recovered and burnt the Houses, kill'd many of the Enemies that were there placed, and in Conclusion the Enemy retired, leaving very many of their Men dead, and very great Numbers wounded." The Reader may depend upon it that all his Relations of Fights, Skirmishes, and Sieges are of a Piece with this.

The Lord Strange, soon after Earl of Derby, Lancashire began the War in Lancashire, by the Murder shire. of one Richard Percival, a Dealer in Linnen about Manchester, which Town he besieged Manchester with an Army of 3000 Foot, and 200 Dragoons, fier. most of them Lancashire Papists. He had with him three Pieces of Ordnance, and possess'd himself of Salford, parted from Manchester only by the River: But the Towns-men, with the Assistance of Mr. Holland of Denton, Capt. Booth, Son to Sir George Booth, Capt. Ratcliffe, Mr. Ashton of Middleton, Capt. Bradshaw, Mr. Egerton of Shaw, Mr. Erid, and their Tenants, defended the Place, defenceless as it was for Want of Walls, against the Lords Strange, Molineux, Col. Evers, Sir Edward Earl of Fitton, Mr. Leigh, and their little Army, who Derby. were obliged to retire, after several insolent Summons and Assaults. The Earl of Derby, parl. then Lord Strange, was impeached for the Mur- Chron. 174. der of Percival, and would have suffer'd if the Parliament could have come at him, as they did afterwards. 'Tis said his joining with the Papists against the Protestants shorten'd his Father's Days, who died while his Son was before Manchester.

The Reader will observe that it is impossible to pursue the Thread of this History in due Order of Time; There being Action in several Parts of the Kingdom, and the Parliament sitting at the same Time at London, it would confound Civil and Military Matters, and one Action with another too much to observe a Chronological Succession of Things. Most of the Civil Part consists in Declarations, Letters, Messages, and Answers, which have been mention'd in their proper Place.

About a Month before the Battle at Edgehill the Lords and Commons pass'd an Ordinance against Stage-Plays, Interludes, &c. as expressing Lascivious Mirth and Levity; in which they have since exceeded all Bounds of Virtue and Good Manners, and have not only met with Encouragement, but the Actors and Managers of them have been favoured and caress'd, as if they had not in all Ages and all Nations been look'd upon and treated as profligate and scandalous.

The University of Oxford, when the Lord Say and his Men were there, apprehending that his Lordship would have done what Whitlocke advised, and what he in Prudence ought to have done, wrote a long Letter to the Earl of Pembroke, their Chancellor, elected upon Laud's Impeachment, to hinder a Garrison being left there, or Soldiers suffered to come amongst them; which they knew they had deserved from the Parliament for harbouring Delinquents, and refusing to send them to London upon Summons, as Sir John Biron and others. The Lord Pembroke, in his Answer, writes thus: If you had Lord Pembroke desired my Assistance, I should willingly have broke's contributed my best Endeavours for your Safety Letter to and Protection; but your own unadvised Coun- Oxford sels and Actions have reduced you to the Univ. Straits you are now in, and in Discretion you might have foreseen, that the admitting of Cavaliers, and taking up Arms, could not but make the University a notorious Mark of Opposition against the Parliament, and therefore to be be opposed by it. If you had contain'd your selves within the decent modest Bounds of an University, you might justly have challeng'd me if I had not perform'd the Duty of a Chancellor. I am sorry you have brought these Troubles upon your selves, &c. The chief Man in taking up Arms was Dr. Robert Pink, Warden of New College, and Deputy to the Chancellor, but displac'd by him for this and other Offences. The King's coming here was Matter of great Joy; This learned Militia have not a little valued themselves upon it in eloquent Addresses, and other Discourses; whose Eloquence has not however kept them from Oblivion.

Ireland.

'Twas impossible for the Parliament to do as much for the Relief of Ireland as was necessary, and as they would gladly have done, had they not been diverted by the Care of their own Preservation: But they did what they could, and were as forward to assist the Protestants in that Kingdom as the King was backward. Several Regiments had been transported to Ireland, and had given a great Check to the Rebels. Stores of Ammunition, Artillery, and all Sorts of war-like Provisions, were sent thither from Time to Time, and in greater Plenty than Men or Money, tho' they had both in greater Proportion than the Danger the Parliament were in at home could well bear. How his Majesty behav'd appears by a Letter from the Earl of Leicester, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, to the Earl of Northumberland, complaining of the Delay he met with at Court, then at York, which retarded his going into that Kingdom, and particularly as follows. "The King being

Earl of Leicester's Letter to Earl of Northumberland about it.

"informed that there were certain Draught Horses provided for Ireland, said, I must needs have them for my own Use. I did humbly beseech him not to take them away from his own Service in Ireland, for which they were bought, and besides what I said my self, I made Means by others to save the Horses, so that I heard no more of it for some Time: But then his Majesty said again; I must needs have those Horses; and would have you send for them. I represented that the Parliament might take it very ill, in regard the Horses were bought with their Money, and for the Service of poor Ireland. Therefore I did beseech him not to take them, or would secure me from being an Instrument in what I conceived would much hurt his Affairs, and that I being trusted by the Parliament, could not do it my self, nor consent that any other should do it, being a Breach of Trust. Notwithstanding which, the King sent Mr. Endimion Porter and Sir George Hay to me several Times to the like Purpose; but I return'd the same Answer, adding, I could not do it, and be an honest Man. However, his Majesty gave one Errington, who serv'd me, a Warrant to fetch the Horses. Errington told me of it, I forbid him, and told him, if he did it, he must not expect to have any thing more to do with me; adding, I doubted not the Parliament would hang him for stealing the Horses. Errington said, his Majesty had commanded him upon his Allegiance to execute the Warrant." Accordingly he went away without the Earl of Leicester's Consent or Knowledge, and seiz'd the Horses at Chester. In these Letters, that is, the Earl of Pembroke's to the Oxford Men, and this of the Earl of Leicester to the Earl of Northumberland, there is the honest Face of Truth. In every Letter, Speech, or any the like thing, in the Lord Clarendon's History, there is Wash and Paint, and Fact bury'd or hidden under a Heap of Words with so much Formality and Affectation, that if what is said had been true, the Manner of saying it must be nauseous and tiresome to Persons who have ever so little Knowledge of right Thinking and Speaking.

Three Days after the Battle of Edgehill, the King, to prepare the Citizens of London for his Reception when he could make his Way thither, sent his Pardon to that City and Westminster, excepting Alderman Fulke and Capt. Manwaring, and all those Persons whom he had before excepted. But I do not find that those who were not excepted had any more Benefit, or took more Notice of it than those that were. Another such Pardon was offer'd to Kent, excepting Sir Michael Livesay and Thomas Blount, Esq; and some other general Exceptions, and it had the like Success.

At the latter End of November, the Lords and Commons published an Ordinance for assessing all such as had not contributed towards raising Horse and Arms, the Assessors to be appointed by Isaac Penington, Esq; Lord-Mayor of London, Sir John Wollaston Alderman, Alderman Towse, Alderman Warner, Alderman Andrews, Alderman Chambers, Alderman Fulke, Sir Thomas Soame Alderman, and the Money paid to Sir John Wollaston, Alderman Towse, Alderman Warner, and Alderman Andrews. Against which Ordinance, his Majesty publish'd a Declaration, wherein Care is taken to tell all those who wonder'd at it, for 'tis excessive long and verbose, that the Anabaptists and Dissenters joining with vicious and debauch'd Persons of desperate Fortunes, had turn'd out godly, pious, and painful Divines, and put in schismatical, illiterate, and scandalous Preachers, who fill'd the Pulpits and Churches with Blasphemy. The Strength of the Argument and the Beauty of the Style seem to be Mr. Hyde's. The Penman of these Papers shews very little Art, but what there is, consists chiefly in turning the Phrases in the Parliament's Declarations, such as godly, pious, painful Divines, on one Side, and illiterate scandalous Preachers on the other, against them. The Assessment was not a Penny the worse for this Declaration. Another was put out by the King against the Parliament's Ordinance for the Receipt of Customs, and with the same Success. But both Sides did hardly ever let any of the like Papers go unanswer'd.

We have mentioned an Agreement made between the Gentlemen of Yorkshire for a Neutrality in that County, the like was done in Cheshire, the Lord Kilmurry, Sir Orlando Bridgman, for the King; Col. Marbury, and Henry Maynwaring, Esq; for the Parliament, who dissolved this Agreement, as they had done that in Yorkshire.

1643.
Subscription.

In the Beginning of the following Year, the Parliament publish'd a Declaration, shewing the Necessity of a present Subscription for Money and Plate for further Supply of the Army, wherein they urge the very great Danger the Nation is in from the many Thousands of profess'd Papists bearing Arms against the Parliament, which Papists have plunder'd, robb'd, pillag'd, and murder'd many of his Majesty's good Protestant Subjects, and their Armies encrease by the Accession of many Popish Commanders from Foreign Parts, arriving with Arms at Newcastle, where it is notoriously known the Earl does lay very great Impositions upon all Coal-Ships for London. Much Money and Plate were brought in upon this Declaration, by which the Publick Faith was engag'd to pay it with 8 per Cent. Interest.

London
petition to the King.

The Citizens of London sent a Petition to the King at Oxford, desiring his Majesty, as the two Houses had done, to return to his Parliament with his Royal, not martial Attendance; to which were added great Professions of Loyalty. This Petition was deliver'd by Sir George Clarke, Sir George Garret, Aldermen, Mr. Bateman, Mr. Peter Jones, Mr. Rhemes, Mr. Henly, Commoners: To which his Majesty return'd an Answer, that could have no other Effect than to exasperate those Minds, which before were only four'd a little. He told the Citizens, He look'd on them as Persons groaning under the same Burthens, and aw'd by the same Persons who begot the late Tumults, and the same Army which gave Battle to him; That he cannot be safe at London, while the LAWS OF THE LAND 'tis almost in every Paragraph) are so notoriously trampled under Foot; That Contributions have been rais'd there for the maintaining of an Army, who have given him Battle with a Design to murder him and his Children; That he can have no Hope while Alderman Pennington, their pretended Lord-Mayor, Ven, Fowke and Manwaring, commit such Outrages as to receive the Money the Citizens brought them. He then offer'd them Pardon, if they would desert the Parliament, and solemnly declare, they will defend the KNOWN LAWS OF THE LAND. But if they should contribute Money, suffer Men to be rais'd, or pay Tonnage and Poundage, every such Person must expect the severest Punishment the LAW can inflict; and his Majesty will seize upon any Part of his Estate within his Power for the Support of his own Army, rais'd for the Defence of the LAW, since he has given Assistance to the Rebels, which by the KNOWN LAWS, &c. And he hopes they will join with him in Defence of the LAW. This terrible Answer being written down, was so grateful to the Council at Oxford, that they advis'd the King to send a Messenger, Mr. Heron, to London, on purpose to see it delivered, for fear the Aldermen and Common-Council Men, who came to present the Petition, might sink the Answer, or leave out some of the Beaux Endroits, the beautiful Places of it. It is easy to see that the Air of it proceeded from some vain Hope of the Success of a Plot to betray the City to the Cavalier-Army, the very Thought of which makes my Blood shudder, considering what a Crew the Goring's, the Wilmor's, the Greenwills, the Lunsford's, the Digby's, had with them. The Parliament being inform'd of Heron's coming, appointed a Committee of both Houses to be present when the Answer was deliver'd to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and present. Common-Council, by Heron himself, for no Body else would venture or deign to read it. After the reading it, the Earl of Manchester complain'd of the wounding Assertions in it cast upon Persons of such eminent Affection in their City. His Lordship said the Parliament own'd themselves equally interested, and would stand by them with their Lives and Fortunes. Then Mr Pym made particular Replies to the several Parts of the King's Answer, and at the End of every Period of his Speech the Acclamations were so loud, that he was often silenc'd. He clos'd it thus: Worthy Citizens, you see what the Parliament will do for your Lord-Mayor and you. Upon which they cry'd out, We will live and die with them, we will live and die with them. Thus had Henry Heron, Esq; his Majesty's Messenger, a very fine Opportunity to inform himself of the Reason his Majesty had to call the governing Part of the City a Faction only, and the Well-affected to the Parliament a pack'd Crew of Brownists, &c. one of whom, according to the Evidence of Mr. Archdeacon Echard, hop'd shortly to wash his Hands in the King's Blood; but that Minister of Justice, the Lord-Mayor, refus'd to issue a Warrant against him; which, if it had been true, deserv'd to have been remember'd to his Infamy; but as it is invented, the Infamy sticks to the Inventor.

We must not forget that on the 16th of January the House of Commons made an Order, probably on Heron's coming to London, That if any Agent or Servant to any Person that bears Arms against the Parliament, shall presume to come to Westminster, or reside about London, he shall forthwith be apprehended as a Spy, and proceeded against accordingly. They also inhibited the Oxford Carriers from travelling, and all other Means of conveying any kind of Provision from London to Oxford, or elsewhere to the King's Army, which is rais'd at as very barbarous; as if in Time of War to distress an Enemy every Way was not customary, and according to Law Martial.

Nothing seems to me more strange in the Progress of this History, than the publishing of so many Proclamations and Declarations at Oxford, none of which had ever any Effect but in the King's own Quarters. His Majesty now sent a Letter to the Sheriffs and City of London, which declar'd, that the Lord-Mayor was no Lord-Mayor, and requir'd the Citizens to take hold of him, Ven, Fulke and Maynwaring; which was too hard a Piece of Service to be perform'd at that Time, especially after the Parliament had forbidden the reading of that Letter: In which the King mentions one Browne, a Woodmonger, as a mutinous Fellow, fit also to be laid hold on; whom I also mention, because he is the very same Person whom this King's Son made a Knight and Baronet, and who was most busy in hanging the Members of this Parliament after the Restoration.

Sir Ralph Hopton's Zeal for the King's Service increasing in Proportion to his Hatred to the Parliament, who had sent him to the Tower for some licentious Speech in their House; he, Comm. who had been a noted Puritan, got a Company War. together in Cornwall to disturb the Peace of the West. With these he march'd into Devonshire, where his Followers robb'd, plunder'd, spoil'd and and pillag'd several Towns, so the Parliament say, and committed divers Rapes and Murders. They add, And forasmuch as that now Ruin and Destruction is threaten'd, not only by that hellish and accursed Crew, but also by the Welch and other Forces in the County of Somerset, &c. They therefore appointed all Subscriptions and Contributions, which were to be rais'd in that County, to be there expended for the Defence of it, and not sent to London, and made the following Gentlemen Commissioners for the Lieutenancy and Assessments: Earl of Stamford, Sir John Horner, Sir Francis Popham, Sir Thomas Wroth, Sir George Farwell, Alexander Popham, Esq; Hugh Rogers, Esq; John Ash, Esq; Henry Sandford, Esq; Richard Cole, Esq; John Pyne, Esq; John Fraunces, Esq; John Hippeley, Esq; John Harrington, Esq; William Strode, Esq; Henry Henley, Esq; James Ash, Esq; William Seaborn, Esq; William Long, Esq; John Preston, Esq; Christopher Walker, Esq; John Pike, Esq; Thomas Hippeley, Esq; I mention the Gentlemen's Names, to shew how impartial the Earl of Clarendon is, where he says, all the Gentlemen of Somersetshire, of eminent Quality and Fortune, were on the King's Side, except Sir John Horner and Mr. Popham. But tho' the Parliament had so well provided for the Tranquillity of this large and populous County, they had too many Enemies in it to preserve it from Waste; and the Cavaliers under Goring and Greenville, from Cornwall and Devon, made such terrible Irruptions into it, that they are to this Day the Subject of Discourse and Abhorrence.

Episcopacy abolish'd.

When Archdeacon Echard comes to the passing of the Bill for abolishing Episcopacy, the Falsties are, that the much greater Majority of the Members of the House of Commons who voted for the Bill, were really against the Bill, and that there were but five Lords for it, which is left to the Faith of the Reader. One of those five Lords, the Lord Viscount Say and Sele, made a notable Speech in the House of Peers, too long to be inserted intire, but Part of it may help us a little in our Conjecture why that august Assembly gave their Assent to the Bill: Their proper Excellency is Spiritual, the Denial of the World, with the Pomps and Preferments and Enjoyments thereof; this they should teach and practise: But when they, contrary thereunto, seek after worldly Excellency, like the great Men of the World, and to rule and domineer as they do, contrary to our Saviour's Precept, Vos autem non sic: But it shall not be so amongst you; instead of Honour and Esteem, they have brought upon themselves, in the Hearts of other People, that Contempt and Odium which they now lie under; and that justly and necessarily, because the World seeth that they prefer a worldly Excellency, and run after it, and contend for it, before their own; which being spiritual, is far more excellent; and which being proper to the Ministry, is that alone which will put a Value and Esteem upon them that are of the Calling. Is it not prodigious, that the Historian, who is himself of the Spiritual Calling, should be as insensible of all these Sentiments, as if they were not Christian and Spiritual? How else could he be in a Rapture when Dr. Fuxon rode in Triumph through the City of London with the Lord High Treasurer's White Staff in his Hand; and doubtless he was as well pleas'd when Dr. Robinson was breaking the Grand Alliance as Ambassador at Utrecht. The Lord Say proceeds; As these Things hurt themselves in their Consciences and Credit, so have they, and if they be continued

still, will make them hurtful to others. The Reason is, because they break out of their own Orb, and move irregularly: There is a Curse upon their leaving of their own Place. What follows is an Allegory, which, if it had a Place in the Lord Clarendon's History, would have been extoll'd for its Beauty, Magnificence and Truth. *The heavenly Bodies, while they keep within their own Spheres, give Light and Comfort to the World; but if they should break out, and fall from their regular and proper Motions, they would set the World on Fire: So have these done; while they kept themselves to the Work of the Ministry alone, and gave themselves to Prayer and the Ministry of the Word, according to the Examples of the Apostles, the World receiv'd the greatest Benefits by them, they were the Light and Life thereof; but when their Ambition cast them down, like Stars from Heaven to Earth, and they grew to be advanced above their Brethren, I do appeal to all who have been versed in the ancient Ecclesiastical Stories, or modern Histories, whether they have not been the Common Incendiaries of the Christian World, never ceasing from Contention one with another about the Precedency of their Sees and Churches, excommunicating one another, drawing Princes to be Parties with them, and thereby casting them into bloody Wars. Their Ambition and intermeddling with secular Affairs, hath been the Occasion of shedding more Christian Blood than any thing else in the Christian World: And this no Man can deny that is vers'd in History. The Reverend Historian must by his Character be vers'd in History, and he has himself compil'd an Ecclesiastical History, without one Syllable that is in the least like this, and consequently it must be miraculously sincere and impartial. Another Historian, contrary to his Representation of the Matter, tells us in his homely Way, Bishops were Parl. Chron. voted down Root and Branch, Nullo Contradictante, for which there were Bonfires and Ringing of Bells all over the City of London. P. 150.*

About the latter End of January a Party of skirmish at Cavaliers made an Attempt on the Parliament's Henly. Quarters at Henly, where Major-General Skippon's Regiment of Foot, and another Regiment were just enter'd; after a long fatiguing March, and were dispers'd in several Places for the Convenience of Rest and Refreshment. It was Nine a Clock at Night before the Soldiers were quartered, and about Two in the Morning the Enemy from Reading, consisting of about 1000 Horse, came furiously upon them, crying out, The Town is ours, The Town is ours. But as they rode along the Lane towards the Town, Capt. Samuel Turner, who commanded the Guard, order'd a Canon which was planted against it to be fir'd: 'Twas charg'd with Musket-Ball, and did great Execution; yet the Enemy's Horse push'd forward, till hearing some of the Parliament's Soldiers cry out very loud, Fire the Rest of the Ordnance, they were put into a Terrible Fright, and Flight too, as Capt. Turner phrases it, in a Letter to his Brother. He adds, I believe they were so bit, they will scarce brag of their Victory, which they are so apt to do. A Truth Mr. Echard might easily have observ'd, with as much Pleasure as I have done, the Royalists, in every Relation, boasting they were Victorious, and by taking their Words for it, he has turn'd the Gravity of History into Merriment.

About the same Time Sir Thomas Fairfax made himself Master of the large Town of Leeds in Yorkshire, where Sir William Saville T. Fairfax commanded with a Garrison of 1500 Foot, and 500 Horse and Dragoons. Sir Thomas Fairfax had

A. D. 1643. had about nine Troops of Horse and Dragoons, 1000 Musketeers, and 3000 Club-men: So well affected was the Yorkshire Peasantry to this gallant Officer and his Cause. Sir Thomas sent a written Summons to Sir William Savile to surrender the Place to the Parliament; Sir William answered, En Cavalier; he never took Notice of such frivolous Tickets. Sir Thomas had with him Sir William Fairfax, Sir Henry Fowles, Capt. Mildmay, and other Persons of Distinction. He order'd Sir William Fairfax to begin the Assault, which was done so vigorously, and Sir William was so well seconded by Sir Henry Fowles, Sir Thomas Norcliffe, Capt. Forbes, Capt. Briggs, Capt. Frankland, and other brave Officers, who set an Example to the Soldiers, that they drove the Enemy before them, and enter'd the Town Sword in Hand with the Loss but of 40 Men on both Sides, Sir Thomas Fairfax restraining the Soldiers from Slaughter and Pillage. He took 500 Prisoners, many Arms, some Cannon, and much Ammunition. Sir William Savile, and other Cavalier-Commanders, fled soon after the Fight began by secret Ways towards Pontefract, and their Men stole away by Degrees as fast as they could. Savile was very near being drown'd as he cross'd the River, and Major Beaumont was drown'd. This Success so terrify'd the Enemy that they immediately abandon'd Wakefield, Skirburne, and Pontefract: But the Garrisons that were there strengthen'd the Earl of Newcastle's Army, which he drew into York, either to save that City or to prepare for the Queen's coming with all Sorts of Supplies from Holland, her Standard being sent before by Goring. What a fine Army that Earl's was is seen by a Description of it in a Letter from the Lord Fairfax to the Speaker of the House of Commons. *The Strength of the Enemy will be found to consist much of Papists, and Popishly affected, which in Fact was the main Strength of the Royal Army, the Earl of Newcastle granting Commissions for raising Men to Papists for the most Part. I send herewith the Names of twelve Recusants, to whom he has of late granted Commissions: Sir John Middleton, Sir Philip Hungate, Sir Walter Vavasor, Mr. Robert Trapps, Mr. Waterson, Mr. Stephenson, Mr. Andes, Mr. Bretton, Mr. Twenge, Capt. Sare, Mr. Tindal, Capt. Granger. Which Courses have so advanced Popery, that in York, where many Recusants are settled, Mass is ordinarily said in every Street, and such Affronts offered to the Protestants and their Ministry, as few do resort to Church, &c. Yet how full are the Royal Declarations of Fighting for the True Protestant Religion. Echar'd has given us the Character of this noble Earl after the Lord Clarendon, which is as happy as the rest of the Characters as to Likeness and Nature. He lov'd Monarchy, as it was the Foundation of his own Greatness; the Church, as it maintain'd the Splendor and Security of the Crown. Is not this exquisite Nonsense? How does the Church maintain the Splendor of the Crown? And what does the English Tongue mean by the Crown, but the Sovereign Power limited by the Laws as in the Constitution of England? The Splendor of that Power is maintain'd by maintaining the Rights, Liberties, and Properties of the People, which is the Glory of the Prerogative; and how has the Church done that ever since Archbishop Laud was at the Head of it? He says further the Earl lov'd Religion, as it inforc'd Order and Obedience to arbitrary Power, Superstition, and the Laudean Hierarchy; for at that Time he could mean nothing else by the Church. There is one Thing in the Earl of Newcastle's Character which is true, and on that Score deserves* particular Observation; he had a Tincture of a Romanick Spirit, which he acquir'd by his Study of Poetry; for there were some Years ago several Plays of his extant, if they may be call'd Plays, without one Word of Wit or good Sense, and hardly equal to his Wife's, who also printed a Folio or two of Plays and Poems. The Earl of Clarendon says he understood Horsemanship, but if he could ride no better than he could write he would have made but an ordinary Hero for a Romance. So remarkable was that romantick Air of his, that his Declarations were drawn in the Style of the Knight of the Oracle, and I doubt not the Lord Clarendon lik'd them not the worse for that, his own being very puffy and much swollen. The Lord Fairfax in one of his Answers, takes Notice of the Earl of Newcastle's Knight-Errantry, without following the Rules of an Amadis de Gaul, or the Knight of the Sun, which the Language of the Declaration seems to affect, &c. Mr. Archdeacon speaks also of his Amours with the Muses, with whom the Earl was in Love almost to Distraction; but the Nymphs were unmerciful, and never granted him one Favour, unless it was in bestowing upon him an illegitimate Son of theirs, Sir William Davenant, to be Lieutenant-General of his Ordinance. As I have not Patience enough to enter far into Clarendon and Echar'd's Characters, I hope this Digression will be excus'd.

After the Treaty of Colnbrook had been broken by the treacherous Action at Brentford, the Parliament did not think of another till some Weeks after, when their earnest Desire to see Peace restor'd to this distracted Kingdom, put them upon a second Attempt for a Treaty, and Propositions were prepar'd to be offer'd to the King at Oxford, where before their Commissioners arriv'd, the King held a Council of War about the Beginning of February, by whom that grand Affair was debated, Peace or War. The noble Earl of Bristol, Father of the noble Lord Digby, made a Speech, wherein there is a very handsome Panegyrick upon Slavery to encourage the Continuance of the Civil War. In Spain, where the long Time as I resided there as Ambassador, afforded me Privilege to be well acquainted with the State of that Kingdom, in no Age or Record can scarcely be found mention of intestine or Civil Wars, till these very Years, when all the World labours with Dissensions. This is false in Fact, the Reason is, because they are truly Subjects, and their Sovereign truly a Sovereign. The Earl of Dorset, who had been long enough in the Court at Oxford to be weary of such Counsels, answer'd the Earl of Bristol's Speech about Spain; That is, as I understand it, the Subjects are Earl of scarcely remov'd a Degree beyond Slaves, nor the Dorset for Sovereign from a Tyrant. His Lordship said something also which is so generous and reasonable, that I have often wonder'd it did never enter into the Heads and Hearts of those evil Counsellors whom the Parliament had declar'd Delinquents, and to save whose hated Lives, they basely suffer'd their Royal Master to lose his own; for if they had been given up to Justice, the Cause of the present War, all Contest had been over before a Drop of Blood had been spilt; but Mr. Edward Hyde, Mr. Endymion Porter, &c. insisted upon it eternally, that he could not give them up to Punishment, without a Diminution of his Absolute Power, which they always imagin'd to him as the very Apple of the Crown's Eye. See what the Earl of Dorset, who suffer'd as much as any Man in the King's Cause, said upon it: The Parliament only declares against Delinquents, such as they conjecture had misadvised his Majesty, and been the Authors of these Tumults mults in the Common Wealth; but this Declaration of theirs, except such Claims can be prov'd against them, is of no Validity; the Parliament will do nothing unjustly. There is no Meaning at all in the Lord Clarendon's History, if he does not every where mean, that the Parliament would do nothing justly. Here is the Evidence of the Earl of Dorset against the false Representations in the History of the Rebellion, and more authentick cannot, I think, be expected. Again; The Parliament will not condemn the Innocent, and certainly innocent Men need not fear to appear before any Judges whatsoever. He who shall for any Cause prefer his private Good before the publick Utility, is but an ill Son of the Common Wealth. Generous Sentiments! There is not one so just and so rational in all that voluminous History. If the Lord Clarendon and the other Delinquents had been capable of them, how soon might an End have been put to the Miseries of the Kingdom, and Peace and Prosperity have taken Place of Devastation and War.

Cirencester taken by

In the Beginning of February the King's Forces got the most considerable Victory which they could yet reasonably boast of. We have mention'd the Marquis of Hertford's passing over from Minehead to Wales, where he rais'd Forces and march'd with them to Worcester, from thence to Burford, and from thence he went to Oxford to desire that Cirencester might be reduc'd, not only to enlarge his Quarters, but to facilitate his raising Contributions in Gloucestershire and Wiltshire. Cirencester in the Beginning of the Troubles was secur'd by the Militia and Townsmen, who rose against the Lord Chandos, who after he deserted the Parliament, would have possess'd it for the King; but he was glad enough to escape without his Coach, which the Townsmen broke to Pieces. It was then garrison'd for the Parliament, and the Earl of Stamford's Regiment, with about 1000 Militia, defended it against the Marquis of Hertford. But Prince Rupert coming to the Marquis's Assistance with 4000 Horse and Foot, they both made an Army of near 7000 Men; and the Prince making a vigorous Attack, first on the Barcon, and then on the Town, carry'd it on that Side, while the Earl of Caernarvon made an unsuccessful Assault on the other, till Prince Rupert's Troops attack'd the Parliament's in the Rear, as the Earl of Caernarvon did in the Front, and so became Masters of the Place, which was plunder'd and wasted in so horrible a manner, that Echard himself is ashamed of it, and owns it was justly made use of to improve the Character of Pride and Cruelty on the King's Side: So scandalous, that the Reader could not have had Patience with it, had not sufficient Revenge been taken before the End of the War. Prince Rupert took 1100 Prisoners, who, according to that fair Writer Whitlocke, were led in much Triumph to Oxford, where the King and Lords look'd on them, and too many smil'd at their Misery, being ty'd together with Cords almost naked, beaten and driven along like Dogs. Among them were two Ministers, and several Officers of good Account, as also a proper handsome young Man, of a very white Skin, where it could be seen for the Blood of his Wounds; he not being able to go, was set naked upon the bare Back of a Horse, his Wounds gaping, and his Body all over bloody.

Cavalier-Cruelty.

Rushw.

An insolent Triumph at Oxford.

The Lord Commissioner Whitlocke was struck with so much Horror at the Report of this Cruelty, which the King saw without the least Emotion, that he tells us the Story at large: Yet the young Man sat upright upon the Horse with an undaunted Courage and Countenance, and when near the King, who did not express any Compassion for him, a brawling Woman cry'd out to him, Ah you traiterly Rogue, you are well enough serv'd. He, with a scornful Look towards her, answer'd, You base Whore, and instantly drop'd off dead from the Horse in Sight of his Majesty, whose Presence increases the Horror one conceives at the Image of this worse than Canibal Cruelty. But indeed such Barbarities had been practis'd in the Star-Chamber Court, &c. in Time of Peace, that it is no Miracle to find the like barbarous Acts continu'd by the like Agents in Time of War. His Majesty was at last so sensible of Prince Rupert's Cruelties, that he wrote a Letter to him to give a Check to them but not with so good Effect as was then wish'd for.

The Parliament, in a just Sense of the Calamities of the Nation, which were owing to their Sins, publish'd an Ordinance exhorting all his Majesty's Subjects to the Duty of Repentance, as the only Remedy for these Calamities; but in Truth, says Mr. Archdeacon, their Devotion was a Libel on the King and the Church. By Libel there, is meant a Lye, a Thing infamously false, to the Detriment of Church and King. Are the wicked Prophanations of the Lord's Day by Sports and Gamings, formerly encourag'd by Authority, a Lye or a Libel, they being the Words of the Ordinance? Is the conniving at, and almost tolerating Idolatry, a Libel? Is the high Contempt of God's holy Ordinances a Libel? Are the Multitudes of Papists and their Abettors in Arms, a Lye or a Libel? Are all Sorts of Uncleanliness, Luxury, and Excess in Eating and Drinking, Vanity, Pride, and Prodigality in Apparel, Envy, Contention, and unnatural Division, Oppression, Fraud, and Violence, a Libel? But Repentance being a Puritan Word, must needs give Offence to such as set their Hearts intirely upon Absolution.

The Earl of Stamford having with a little too much Precipitation made an Irruption into Cornwall, where Sir Ralph Hopton had been a long Time making up an Army, was obliged to retire into Devonshire, and gave Hopton an Opportunity to fall upon Ruthen, Governor of Plymouth, at Leskard, where the Earl of Stamford was to have joined him. But these two Bodies being divided, were easily put to Flight one after the other. Ruthen made his Escape by Sea to Plymouth, and Stamford retir'd first to Tavistock, and thence to Exeter. The most remarkable Thing in Mr. Echard's History of this War, is, that Sir Ralph Hopton's Men went to Prayers before the Skirmish at Leskard. Both Sides had got so little in this Dispute, that they grew alike weary of it, and agreed upon a Cessation of Arms in Cornwall and Devonshire, leaving the Strong Holds still in Possession of the Parliament.

About the same Time, the Beginning of February, Sir William Brereton, with a Party of 150 Men, defeated Sir Thomas Aston, who had with him 400 Cavaliers near Nantwich in Cheshire, and Sir John Seaton, with a strong Party of the Parliament's Forces, assaulted and took the Town of Preston in Lancashire, where he made 200 Officers and Soldiers Prisoners, among whom were several Papists of Note, as Mr. Auderton of Clayton, Major Purvey, who had been in the Irish Rebellion, Dr. Westby a Physician, Sir Gilbert Houghton fled to Wigan, and Mr. Townly of Townly, a Name that has hardly been out of any Popish Rebellion since the Reformation, got off with much Difficulty. His Wife Mrs. Townly, the Lady Houghton, and the Lady Girlington, were secur'd for the Malignity of their Husbands. Mr. Adam Morte, Mayor of Preston, Fight.

The Lord Brooke having clear'd Warwickshire of all Opposition, enter'd Staffordshire, of which County he was also Lord-Lieutenant; but understanding the Earl of Chesterfield, with about 500 Men was at Litchfield, he intended first to dislodge them, and march'd thither with about 1200 Men. He arriv'd before the Town on the 1st of March, and after some hot but short Service he drove the Lord Chesterfield into the Close, a Place which by the Strength of the Walls and otherwise was much more defensible. While his Soldiers were giving the Assault, and particularly at St. Chad's Church adjoining to the Close, the Lord Brooke being withdrawn into a House to give Directions, as he was looking out at the Window for that Purpose a Musket Ball struck him near the Left Eye, of which he immediately dy'd. His Soldiers instead of being discourag'd, were animated by Revenge, and Sir John Gell bravely supply'd his Place. They assaulted the Close so vigorously, that they got to the Wall, which they were preparing to blow up, and continue the Storm, when the Cavaliers cry'd out for Quarter, which was granted, and the Place yielded, with Store of Arms, Money, &c. Here the Earl of Chesterfield, his Son, and several other Persons of Condition were taken Prisoners; and here too the Zeal of the Cathedral Men met with the same Reward as at Chichester. But the Parliament's Forces had scarce been a Month in Possession of the Town and Close, before Prince Rupert gave them a Visit. He had just taken Birmingham, near which was a smart Encounter between some of the Horse from Birmingham and a Party of the King's, in which the Earl of Denbigh was mortally wounded, and soon after dy'd. The Prince having joined his Troops with the Earl of Northampton's and Col. Hastings, advanc'd to Litchfield, and before the City was put into a good Posture of Defence, he attack'd and enter'd it. The Close held out a Fortnight after, and then the Prince having by a Mine blown up Part of the Wall, the Parliament's Soldier's submitted upon Terms, and were allow'd to march out with Bag and Baggage under a Convoy to Coventry. The Falstity in Eckard's Account of the Lord Brooke's Expedition against Litchfield is, that he enter'd it without any Resistance. Rushworth tells us there was some hot Service; and the poor Reflections of the Lord Brooke's hearing a Sermon at Coventry before he march'd to Litchfield, are not much mended by Archbishop Laud's Observations, which turn the Musket Ball into a Judgment: It being shot by a Clergyman's Son, and upon St. Chad's Day, a precious Monk in the Reign of Wulpher King of Mercia, to whom that Cathedral has the Honour to be dedicated.

Sir John Gell having recruited his Forces design'd to march towards Stafford, and Intimation was given to Sir William Brereton to draw that Way. The Earl of Northampton, Col. Hastings, and other of the King's Commanders who lay at Stafford, being advertis'd of Gell's Approach, march'd out to meet and give him Battle, which they did on the 19th of March upon Hopton Heath, by some call'd Salt Heath. The Earl charg'd with much Bravery, and was as bravely receiv'd, both Parties fighting with true English Courage: But after two or three Hours sharp Engagement, the Parliamentarians growing weak, and ready to be utterly defeated, Sir William Brereton happen'd to come in to their Relief, with a considerable Body of Horse and Dragoons, and falling furiously on the Rear of the King's Forces, while Sir John Gell with his re-animated Troops, ply'd their Front, cut off many of them, among whom the Earl of Northampton fighting valiantly was slain, and his Earl of Forces retreated into the Town of Stafford, Gell Northampton and Brereton keeping the Field. Thus does pton slain. Rushworth tell the Story, and it appears by it that the Archdeacon's Account of it is false in almost every Line. He says Gell and Brereton were join'd when the Fight began; whereas that Junction was when the Fight was almost ended; That Gell's Forces were double in Number to the Earl's, Gell having but 1500 Horse and Foot, and the Earl of Northampton had 1000 Horse only. He says Gell was so totally routed, that he had scarce a Horse left in the Field; whereas Sir William Brereton came to his Assistance before the Royalists could break his Horse. He adds, Sir Thomas Byron charg'd Gell's Foot with good Execution; and we are told, that by the timely coming in of Sir Wil-Parl. liam Brereton, ere the Battle was ended, Sir Chron. p. John Gell obtain'd a glorious Victory, and 288. drove his Enemies quite out of the Field. The Reverend Historian affirms, that the Royalists thought fit to forbear any further Action, but what consisted in running away, and had all lb. the Ensigns of Victory, except the King's Standard, and some other Ensigns carry'd off and kept by Sir William Brereton. Eckard again; A greater Victory would have been an unequal Recompence for the Loss of the Earl, of whose Party were slain but 25 Men. The Chronicle tells us, at least 140 of the Cavaliers were kill'd, and among them Mr. Spencer Lucy, Mr. Ferdinando Stanhop, Capt. Baggot, and other Gentlemen. But what is falser still than all the rest, is where he says above 200 of the Parliamentarians were kill'd and wounded. The Chronicle tells us, the Victory was obtain'd with the Loss only of 8 or 10 Parliamentarians. I have instanc'd the many Falstities in the Archdeacon's Relation of this Fight to save my self the Trouble of doing the like again on the like Occasions, for most of his and the Lord Clarendon's Accounts of Actions are of this Kind, and they erect Trophies of Victory for the Cavaliers in the very Fields where they were shamefully beaten. He would not let us know that about the Earl of lb. p. 16. Northampton's Neck, and in his Pocket, were found a Crucifix and an Agnus Dei, as was testify'd by two Witnesses viva voce in Parliament, who were present when those Popish Trinkets were found about him. Neither would he inform us of the Recompence this Lord's Son met with for his Father's Services, and that the King gave away from him the Rangership of a Forest which his Father held; and when Endimion Porter minded his Majesty of the Earl of Northampton's losing his Life for him, and press'd him to give it to the young Earl, the King reply'd, Hath the Earl done more than became him to die for his King? No doubt it is the highest Honour when the King is fighting in the Defence of his Country.

There is something Merry enough in what follows of the Reverend Author's grave History: The Lord Herbert, a bigotted Papist, having all South Wales committed to his Care, at his own Charge, and other Catholick Friends, raised a little Army of 1500 Foot, and 500 Horse, with which he advanced, and set down before Gloucester. The King did the same soon after, with an Army of 2000 Men, and with not much better Success. Sir William Waller came suddenly Reybold.

A. D. 1643. denly on the Lord Herbert's Army of Welch Men, at fight of whom, according to Eckard, they threw down their Arms without giving or receiving a Blow, and cry'd Quarter. Waller took 1300 Foot, and 8 Troops of Horse, upon which the Historian makes this very wise Reflection. If the Money which was laid out upon the Welch Forces had been employed to the Kings best Advantage, it might have put an End to the War next Summer. How better could it have been employ'd than in raising Forces! Unless the two Houses of Parliament, their General the Earl of Essex and his Army could have been brib'd with it. There would then have been no more War in England, but what was carry'd on by Prætors and Paritors. He could not tell this pitiful Story without some Falsities. Rushworth informs us, There were so many Blows given and taken, that 500 Welch Men were slain on the Spot. The Lord Herbert was not then at Oxford, but in the Battle, and with Difficulty made his Escape thither. Sir William Waller a Week before this had taken Malmsbury, where Colonel Lunsford's Brother was Governor. Waller was beaten off at the first Attack, but at the second the Garrison desired Parley and yielded upon Quarter.

Malmsbury taken by him. We must now look into the Affairs of the North, where the King's had a good Aspect. Though his Majesty had not many profitable Employments to dispose of at present, yet he had at present Honours and Titles, which had a mighty Influence on the Vanity of the Country Gentry; Sir Ralph Hopton was created Lord Hopton of Stratton in Cornwall; and doubtless Sir Hugh Cholmley had the same Honour in View, when he deserted his Country which he had so zealously serv'd, and deliver'd up Scarborough Castle to the Royalists. He remain'd uncorrupted till the Queen landed in Yorkshire, and after that 'twas observed two Trumpets came upon one Day to Scarborough from Colonel Goring and Sir Francis Mackworth, Commanders for the King, under Pretence of exchanging Prisoners, Sir Hugh from that Time often magnify'd the Earl of Newcastle's Forces, and undervalued the Earl of Essex's and Lord Fairfax's. He complain'd that the Parliament slighted him, and from Disgust fell into Treason, and betrayed the Town and Castle committed to his Charge. The same Disgust had had the same Effect in Devonshire, where Sir George Chudleigh, who had serv'd the Parliament very successfully, revolted to the King. But Eckard will have it, that the Wound in these Gentlemen's Consciences, made by their taking Arms in Defence of the Protestant Religion, the Rights and Liberties of the People, caus'd them to apply the best Remedy to it, which was to turn to the other Side, and fight for Arbitrary Power, Superstition, and a Laudean Hierarchy, which they had so strenuously opposed.

Yorkshire. About the Middle of February the Queen landed at Burlington Key in Yorkshire, the Earl of Newcastle having drawn his Army that Way for her Safeguard. Four of the Parliament's Ships were at the Mouth of Newcastle Harbour, whose Captains having Notice of her Arrival weigh'd Anchor, and came before Burlington, where they shot at the small Vessels that were landing the Military Stores. Some of the Bullets reach'd into the Town near the House where her Majesty lay for her Repose, so that she was forc'd to remove thence to a more secure Lodging behind a Hill. Eckard avers, The Ships shot directly at the Queen's House; and that her Lodging behind the Hill was a Ditch. He adds, the Parliament Ships would not have desisted, but for some Threats from the Dutch Admiral, which is false, and foolish to a Prodigy, for the Dutch had not a Power equal to the Parliament's; and it is not likely that the Admiral of two or three Ships would have dar'd to insult the Commadore of a Squadron of the Parliament's, especially when the States had just before stopp'd one of the Ammunition Vessels, which the Queen was to have brought with her. As soon as the Lord Fairfax heard of her Majesty's Arrival he sent Sir William Fairfax with a Letter to her, offering to be her Guard, but she refus'd his Offer, and put her self under the Protection of the Marquis of Newcastle.

During these military Actions, the Treaty of Peace was renew'd at Oxford. The Parliament's Commissioners were the Earl of Northumberland, Earl of Pembroke, Earl of Salisbury, Earl of Holland, Lord Wenman, Lord Dungarvon, William Pierrepont, Esq; Sir William Armine, Sir John Holland, Sir William Litton, Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; Edmund Waller, Esq; Richard Winwood, Esq; But I do not find that all these Commissioners acted. The Parliament appointed Mr. John Rushworth, Mr. Michael Welden, Mr. John Corbet of Grays Inn, and Mr. James Standish to attend the Commissioners as Messengers, and the King order'd Passes for them. I do not see any of the Commissioners Names in this Negotiation, which was carried on by writing, but the Earl of Northumberland, Sir John Holland, Sir William Armine, Mr. Pierrepont, and Mr. Whitlocke. Others of them might be there, as particularly, Mr. Waller was, for when his Majesty gave them Audience first in Christ Church Garden, and they had the Honour to kiss his Hand in turn, according to their Quality, Mr. Waller being the last, the King said to him, Though you are the last, yet you are not the worst, nor the least in my Favour. Mr. Whitlocke observes, "The Discovery of a Plot then in hand at London, to betray the Parliament, wherein Mr. Waller was engaged with Challoner, Tompkins, and others, did manifest the King's Courtship to Mr. Waller to be for that Service." After the Commissioners had kiss'd the Prince's Hand, as well as the King's, the Earl of Northumberland read the Propositions to his Majesty with a sober, stout Carriage, and being interrupted by the King, he said smartly, Your Majesty will give me Leave to proceed, the King answer'd, I, I, and so the Earl read them all through. The Propositions were to disband his Army, and return to the Parliament, to leave Delinquents to Trial, and Papists to be disarm'd, to pass a Bill for abolishing Bishops, and such other Bills as should be presented for Reformation, Recusants to abjure Papacy, to remove malignant Counsellors, to settle the Militia as the Parliament desir'd, to prefer to Offices such as the Parliament should name, to take in all that were put out of the Commissions of Peace; a Bill to vindicate the Lord Kimbolton and the Five Members, and to enter into an Alliance for the Recovery of the Palatinate. The Interest of the Queen of Bohemia and her Royal Family, were never forgotten by this Protestant Parliament: As if they foresaw that the Security of our most Holy Religion, and the Rights, Properties, and Privileges of their Successors and Posterity, would one Day depend intirely on the Protection of that illustrious House; and those good Sentiments have ever since inspir'd all true English Men with the same Zeal and Affection, and will, we hope, inspire them as long as this Nation

A. D. 1643. Nation has a Name. Other Propositions were for a general Pardon, with some few Exceptions, Newcastle, Digby, &c. Members of Parliament to be restor'd to their Offices, and to have their Losses repair'd. The King answer'd with Propositions of his own. The first of which made void whatever the Parliament had, or should ask of him. To have his Magazines, Towns, Ships, Forts, and all his Revenues, immediately restor'd to him; to recall what was done against L A W, and the King's Right; always supposing, that whatever the Parliament did in defence of their and the People's Rights, Properties, and Liberties, was against L A W, and that whatever the King had done or should do was his Right. All Power claim'd by Order of Parliament to be disclaimed. His Majesty will consent to the Execution of all Laws concerning Popery, provided there be a Bill for preserving the Common Prayer. The Commissioners were by their Instructions ty'd down to treat with the King himself, who had commonly with him Prince Rupert, the Lord Keeper Littleton, Earl of Northampton, the Lord Chief Justice Banks, and several Lords of the Council. The Commissioners often debated Matters till Midnight, and upon one of the most material Points press'd his Majesty so home with good Reasons and Arguments, that he said he was satisfy'd, and promis'd to give them his Answer in writing according to their Desire the next Morning: Upon which the Commissioners went to their Lodgings, full of joyful Hopes to receive the promis'd Answer the next Morning, which being given, would have conduc'd to a happy Issue of the Treaty. They had his Majesty's Word for it, says Whitlocke. But instead of that Answer then, he gave them a Paper quite contrary to what had been concluded, and very much tending to the Breach of the Treaty. The Commissioners humbly expostulated it with his Majesty, pressing him, upon his Royal Word, and the ill Consequences which they fear'd would follow upon his new Paper. But he told them, he had alter'd his Mind, and that the Paper he now gave them was his Answer. And to their great Grief they could obtain no other. Some of his own Friends, of whom the Commissioners inquir'd touching this Passage, inform'd them, That after they were gone from the King, and that his Counsel were also gone away, some of his Bed-Chamber, and they went higher, hearing from him what Answer he had promis'd, and doubting that it would tend to such an Issue of the Treaty as they did not wish, they being rather for the Continuance of the War, never left pressing, and perswading his Majesty till they prevail'd with him to change his former Resolutions, and to give Order for his Answer to be drawn as it was now deliver'd.

The Treaty had continu'd near six Weeks, when his Majesty sent this Message to the House on the 12th of April. That as soon as he was satisfied in his first Proposition, which was every Thing, to disarm the Parliament, and remain himself in Arms, for what else is his having all the Revenues of the Kingdom, the Tower, Portsmouth, Hull, and, in a Word, all the strong Towns, Forts and Castles, put into his Hands, as he demanded. As soon as the Members of both Houses should be restor'd, and that his Majesty and both Houses might be secured against tumultuous Assemblies, which he conceiv'd could not otherwise be done than by adjourning the Parliament to some Place twenty Miles from London, his Majesty would consent to disband his Army, and return to the Parliament. This Message being intimated to the Commissioners, they dissuaded the sending of it as that which, they fear'd, would break off the Treaty, it being very improbable, that the Houses would adjourn, and leave the City of London, their best Friends, and Strength, and put a Discontent upon them. Yet was the King prevail'd with to send it, and the two Houses upon Receipt of it immediately recall'd their Commissioners, April the 15th. as the smallest Politician in the smallest College at Oxford could not but have foreseen. Whitlocke has not told us, what it was that gave his Majesty Satisfaction, nor whether the material Point was the Militia, or the Bishops Bill, probably it was the latter, and is sunk by the Earl of Anglesey, who publish'd his Memorials, that nothing might appear in Defence of that Bill, which carry'd with it so much Conviction as to satisfy the King, whose Inflexibility, and the Influence his Queen and evil Counsellors had over him are here most apparent.

Some Weeks before this Treaty broke up, the Scots Commissioners Earl of Loudun, Chancellor of Scotland, and Mr. Henderson, one of the chief Members of the Assembly of the Kirk, came to Oxford. The Earl of Loudun came to offer the Mediation of the Conservators of the Peace in Scotland, for composing the Differences between the King and the Parliament. Mr. Henderson brought a Petition, which the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard find Wit enough to make merry with for these Terms in it, The Lord Jesus Christ. The Work of the Lord. Unity of Religion. The Lord of Heaven and Earth. Abuse of the Gospel. Idolatry, Superstition. Day of Visitation, &c. There is not the least Appearance of Wit in either of their Histories, unless they catch at such Religious Phrases, which having been long profan'd by Ridicule, are perfect Jest with them. Let us now see what our Scots Brethren say for themselves, "Our great Grief and Apprehension of Danger is not a little increas'd, partly by the Insolence and Presumption of Papists, and others disaffected to the Reformation of Religion, who though for Number and Power they be not considerable amongst us, yet through the Success of the popish Army in Ireland, and the Hopes they conceive of the Prevailing of the popish Armies, and Prelatical Faction in England, they have of late taken Spirit, and begun to speak big Words against the Protestant Religion." They then complain of the Earl of Newcastle's Army in their Neighbourhood full of Papists, Officers and Soldiers, as infamous for their Treasons and Conspiracies against Princes and Rulers, as for their known Idolatry and spiritual Tyranny. This, and the like Passages, are represented as Farce by those two Historians, who did not enough consider their Talents and their Subject, when they affected to be witty on what would so little bear it, had they had more Wit to spare. The King's Answer to the Complaint about Papists gives one full Satisfaction, as to his good Intentions with respect to the other Parts of the Petition, for in Excuse of his arming that idolatrous Race, his Majesty says, the Parliament had arm'd more Papists than he, and that 20 or 30 Papists had been found in a Troop or Company of their Army when taken Prisoners; nay, some of them such Papists, that he had himself refus'd to employ them, which I think is sufficient to shew us, of what Spirit, and what Truth the Oxford Answers, Declarations, and Messages were. The Lord Loudun's Offer of a Mediation was refus'd, and so was his Request, that there might be a Parliament in Scotland. And Mr. Henderson could get no better Answer,

A. D. 1643. Answer than the Proposition of a Synod regularly chosen according to the LAWS, by which was meant a Convocation, and what that means in the Case of Reformation needs not to be further explain'd here. The King was so far from permitting the Scots Commissioners to go to London, that they were told they would be murder'd on the Way if they attempted to go thither without his Licence. One may easily imagine what will be the Issue of dismissing these Gentlemen in this Manner, and that when they came home their Principals would enter upon other Measures for their Preservation, since their Application to the King had been so ineffectual. The Oxford People were so afraid of their applying to the Parliament, that, as we have said, they were threaten'd to be assassinated if they went that Way.

Reading taken by the Earl of Essex.

There being so little Hope left of an Accommodation, the Two Houses order'd their General to besiege Reading, to streighten the Garrison of Oxford, and prepare the Way for the Reduction of that City, from whence frequent Inroads were made into the adjacent Counties, as particularly that of the Earl of Cleveland, Lord Chandos, Lord Crawford, Sir John Byron, and others, to the Number of 1200, who pillag'd, plunder'd and wasted the County of Buckingham, as by a Letter which Sir John Wittewrong and Sir Thomas Tyrrel wrote to Col. Hampden and Col. Goodwyn, to be communicated to the Parliament, dated the 16th of May. "They murder all who make any Resistance: One Woman big with Child, who could make no Resistance, they cut in Pieces: What Household-Goods they cannot carry off, they destroy: They sweep the Pastures of Cattle; and that no Cruelty might be left unexercis'd, they have this Day fir'd a Village call'd Swam-burne in seven Places, and guarded the Fire so carefully, with all their Forces divided into several Parts, that no Neighbour durst venture to come to quench it." The Earl of Essex came before Reading two Days after the Parliament had recall'd their Commissioners from Oxford. The Earl of Essex's Army consisted of 15000 Foot and 3000 Horse; and Sir Arthur Aston, the Popish Governor, who afterwards join'd the Rebels in Ireland, had a Garrison of 3000 Men well provided for a Siege. The Lord General sent a Summons to the Governor, who return'd an haughty Answer, and the Artillery began to play on the great Fort upon Caversham Hill, where the Besiegers continu'd to make their Approaches, and a Shot of theirs beating down a Stack of Chimneys, one of the Bricks fell upon the Governor's Head, which wounded him so much, that he was disabled, and kept his Chamber. His Successor, Col. Fielding, wanting Powder, as it was said, hung out a Flag of Truce. While the Treaty was depending, the King in Person, with Prince Rupert, Prince Maurice, &c. having drawn together a considerable Body, advanc'd from Wallingford towards Reading to raise the Siege. But the Lord Roberts and Col. Berkeley's Regiments, which were posted at Caversham Bridge, stop'd the Passage of the Royal Army, and compell'd them to retire with Loss: Yet in the Time of this Skirmish they at another Place got an Opportunity to convey over the River into the Town a Quantity of Powder. However the Treaty went on, being in a manner concluded before, and Fielding alledg'd he could not in Honour recede from it; so the Articles were sign'd April the 27th, to surrender the Town, to have free Passage to Oxford, to deliver up the Earl of Essex's Deserters; and accordingly the next Day the Garrison march'd out. But, says Rushworth, "one

Rushw. 266.

"of their Waggon was pillag'd by Essex's Men, and some of them had their Hats and Swords taken away or chang'd; General Essex was much offended, and in Person beat and slash'd the Soldiers for such their violating the Articles." Here was one Waggon plunder'd, and some Hats chang'd, but under Pretext of making Reprisals for this one solitary Waggon and a few old Hats, the Cavaliers sack'd the City of Bristol when it was afterwards taken by Prince Rupert. Echard in Defiance of Truth assures us, most of the Waggon were plunder'd, the Soldiers not only abus'd, but many of them disarm'd. He says not a Word of the Occasion of it, as in Rushworth: The Garrison were themselves in Fault, there being one Waggon discover'd which had 140 Muskets in it, directly contrary to the Articles of Surrender, and this exasperated the Parliament Soldiers, who were also put out of Humour by being restrain'd from plundering the Town, which they were in Expectation of had they carry'd it by Storm. The King was much incens'd at Fielding for yielding up the Place, and he was condemn'd to lose his Head by a Council of War, but obtain'd a Reprieve. His Majesty by Proclamation broke that Article of the Treaty of Surrender, which oblig'd the Governor to deliver up Deserters; and Mr. Archdeacon gives a most pleasant Reason for it: The Soldiers out of Conscience had left the Parliament's Godly Army to serve in the King's more Godly one, and the poor conscientious Men ought not to have been put out of the King's Protection. Thus he tells us in the same Page, that Major General Chudleigh out of Conscience deserted the Earl of Stamford's Army, and join'd himself with that pious Gentleman Sir Richard Greenville, and the other religious Gentry of Cornwall. I am sensible that this Gaiety is not within the Decorum of History, but really the grave Assertions in the Earl of Clarendon's and Mr. Echard's, which are the very Reverse of Fact and Reason, provoke Mirth, and would make even a Thucydides merry. Chudleigh had been taken Prisoner by Design, as Rushworth informs us, at the Battle of Stratton in Cornwall by Sir Ralph Hopton, who had there beaten the Earl of Stamford much better than the Earl had beaten him before at Oakhampton; and while he was a Prisoner proper Means were us'd to work upon his Conscience, the same doubtless as were practis'd upon Sir Alexander Carew, the two Hothams, and others; Promises of Honours and Offices, which in all Times have carry'd with them Conviction in Minds capable of Temptation and Perfidy.

We are now to return to the North, where we left the Queen and her little Army, of which she declar'd her self General, and march'd thence to join the King, having with her 3000 Foot and about 2000 Horse and Dragoons, with 6 Pieces of Cannon. The King met her at Edgehill in the Beginning of July, and she carry'd off so many Men with her, that the Marquis of Newcastle's Army when divided was not so formidable as it had been in the Northern Parts. Sir Thomas Fairfax attack'd those at Wakefield, beating 3000 Foot and 400 Horse, and gain'd a complete Victory, which Echard takes no Notice of. Sir Thomas Fairfax, as himself tells the Story, with 1200 Foot and about 800 Horse, advanc'd to Stanley, where they beat up the Enemy's Quarters, and took about 20 Troopers and Dragoons Prisoners. About Four a Clock in the Morning, May the 21st, Fairfax's Soldiers came before Wakefield, and beat the Enemy's Horse into the Town. His Foot with unspeakable Courage drove the Cavalier Foot after them, and assaulted

Sir Tho. Fairfax's Victory at Wakefield.

A. D. 1643. faulted the Town in two Places, Wrengate and Norgate. The Dispute lasted an Hour and an half, and Fairfax's Men having taken a Cannon and turn'd it upon the Enemy, Passage was open'd to them into the Town at Norgate, and almost at the same Time at Wrengate. Sir Thomas with the Horse clear'd the Street where General Goring was taken Prisoner by Lieutenant Alured, Brother to Capt. Alured a Member of Parliament; yet three Troops of Horse stood in the Market-Place, as also Col. Lambton's Regiment of Foot, which had but just enter'd the Town. Sir Thomas sent a Trumpet to them with Offer of Quarter upon laying down their Arms, which they refusing with Scorn, Major General Gifford a Parliament Officer fir'd a Piece of their own Ordnance upon them, and the Horse falling in at the same Time, the Cavaliers were beaten out of the Town, and Sir Thomas Fairfax became intirely Master of it. Here were taken about 40 Officers, the Chief of them General Goring, Sir Thomas Bland, Lieutenant-Colonel St. George, Lieutenant-General Macmoyler, Major Carnaby, Capt. Legard, Capt. Lambton, Capt. Benson, 27 Colours of Foot, 3 Cornets of Horse, and 1500 common Soldiers, a great Number of Arms and Store of Ammunition. There were not above 7 Men kill'd on the Parliament Side, and the Number of Prisoners being almost equal to their Forces, Sir Thomas put them into Places that were more tenable than Wakefield.

The two Hotthams Traytors. We have spoken of the Desertion of Sir Hugh Cholmley, and are now to mention that of Sir John Hottham and his Son Capt. Hottham. Sir John had been tamper'd with by the Lord Digby, who lay conceal'd in Hull with his Privy; but he withstood the first Temptation, tho' it sufficiently prepar'd him for another. The elder Hottham had had frequent Differences with the Lord Fairfax, the Parliament's General, in Yorkshire, to whom he was unwilling to submit, expecting that Command himself, by overvaluing his taking Possession of Hull. The Parliament, who were pleas'd with the Lord Fairfax's Conduct, hearing of Hottham's Behaviour towards him, had Thoughts of putting another Governor into Hull unless he made the Lord Fairfax more easy, which Sir John suspecting, resolv'd to keep his Government by betraying his Trust, and declaring for the King. The Parliament had Spies about him, and Warning enough of his and his Son's intended Treason; so they order'd Sir John Meldrum to apprehend Capt. Hottham, who was seiz'd and sent Prisoner to Nottingham Castle, but made his Escape. Sir Matthew Boynton, a very honest worthy Gentleman, Brother-in-law to Sir John Hottham, had Instruction to have an Eye upon him and his Son too, and to endeavour to preserve the Town if he perceiv'd it in Danger. In the Interim the Mayor of Hull receiv'd Information of a Plot to betray it, which he presently communicated to Sir Matthew Boynton and some of the Aldermen, and it was resolv'd to arm the most zealous of the Townsmen for the Preservation of the Peace: Accordingly 1500 Men were in a few Hours got in Readiness, and with so much Privacy, that they seiz'd on the Commanders of the Main Guard, particularly Capt. Hottham, before any Notice was taken of them. They then seiz'd on the Magazine, the Ordnance, on the Walls, the Guards at the Gate, the three Block-houses, and the Castle. Thus in an Hour's Time they secured the whole Town without one Drop of Blood. Sir John Hottham got out of his House, and meeting a Man riding into the Town, made him alight, mounted his Horse, and rode thro' Beverly Gate, the Guard having had no Order to stop him; but being pur-su'd, he quitted the Road and turn'd down to a Ferry, intending to have pass'd over into Hol-derness. He there mis'd the Boat, and was forc'd to ride on to Beverley, whither Sir Matthew Boynton's Man was now got before him with a Letter to his Son Col. Boynton, acquainting him with the Plot, and Order to apprehend him, which he did, taking hold of his Horse's Bridle as he enter'd the Town, and obliging him to alight. He sent him to Hull, from whence he was soon after convey'd to London by Sea together with his Son, and both imprison'd in the Tower. The Parliament were very well pleas'd with the good Service done on this Occasion, and publish'd a Declaration to indemnify Thomas Raikes, Esq; Mayor of Hull, Sir Matthew Boynton, Sir William St. Quintin, Sir Richard Darley, Sir John Bourcher, Sir William Allison, Lancelot Roper Alderman, Nicholas Denman Alderman, John Barnard Alderman, William Pople Alderman, John Penrose, Gent. and Robert Johnson Clerk, for what they had done in that acceptable Service to the King and Parliament.

I do not repeat all the King's Messages, they being most of them pretty long, and drawn as if they were intended not to have any Effect at this; upon News of the Victory at Stratton in Cornwall, wherein his Majesty gave the Parliament an Account of the Strength of his Army, and the Plenty of his Ammunition, as sure Tokens of his Inclinations to Peace, and requires them, as they will answer to God, himself, and the World, that they would remember by whose Authority, and to what End they met in that Council. Was it not very easy to answer, that they sate there then by their own Authority, it being not in his Power to dissolve them but by their own Consent, and that their End was to prevent for the future the Injustice and Oppression of the Administration for 16 Years past, to secure their own Privileges, and the Rights, Liberties and Properties of the People, Spiritual and Temporal, which had been so often invaded and violated. This, says Echard, put the Parliament in a Fury. Their Clergy blew their Trumpets louder than ever, if that could be possible. If there was not a Sort of Witchery in the Case, these People would not so often touch upon Things which are so easily turn'd against them, nothing being better known than that the Sermons of Sibthorp, Pocklington, Beal, Montague, Maynwaring, for arbitrary Power, Superstition, and Persecution, were the real Cause of the Calamities which ensued. Had he never read this Speech in Parliament: "My Lords, it is a Saying of Gregory the Great, that when Antichrist comes, Preparatus est exercitus Sacerdotum, there is an Army of Priests to receive him. This is fulfill'd in our Time, for certainly this Army of Priests doth many Ways advance the Design and Plot of Popery for the Subversion of our LAWS and Government. Our LAWS and Popery cannot stand together, but either Popery must overthrow our LAWS, or our LAWS must overthrow Popery. But to overthrow our LAWS, the PRIESTS must overthrow Parliaments, and to overthrow Parliaments, they must overthrow Property; they must bring the Subjects Goods to be arbitrarily dispos'd of, that so there may be no Need of Parliaments. This hath been done by Dr. Maynwaring, Dr. Beal, &c,

Among other unprecedented Things at which the Archdeacon holds up his Hands, is the Impeachment of the Queen. He had forgot what he had said before, that this King's Favourite the Duke of Buckingham had told her, there have

A. D. 1643. have been Queens of England who have lost their Heads. He informs us, This Action is without Precedent, and extremely surprized the World, which is not true. The World talkt of such a Thing a Year before, and the Commons made a solemn Declaration against it. But since that, in the Words of Rusſworth, "She had been "very industrious, whilst in Holland, to furnish "the King with Arms, Ammunition and Mo- "ney, and being now at the Head of a consider- "able Army at York, ready to march South- "ward, the House of Commons resolv'd to im- "peach her Majesty of High Treason, and Mr. "Pym was sent up to the Lords on that Message.

impeach'd.

"Accordingly he did impeach her, promising in "the Name of the Commons to bring in parti- "cular Articles." The Queen, in a Letter to the Marquis of Hamilton, writes him, The House of Commons hath declared me Traytor, and carry'd up their Charge against me to the Lords. This I assure you is true, but I know not yet what the Lords have done upon it, God forgive them for their Rebellion. They have no other Word amongst them, when the Privileges of Parliament, the Rights and Liberties of the People, and the Defence of them, are in question. To speak the Truth of them is to asperse, to oppose their Oppression and Violence to rebel. The Queen's harbouring of Priests, employing Papists, ill counselling the King, and her unpopular Conduct, had been long a general Complaint, which she depending perhaps on foreign Support too much, slighted, and upon her being impeach'd the People shew'd their Resentment, by insulting her Chapel, driving away the Jesuits and Friars, breaking the Organs, throwing down the Altars, and pulling down the Cross in the Burying Place. If these Marks of their Hatred were too outrageous, says Larrey, her secret Practices gave Occasion to the Outrage. What we read in another Author takes off something of the Surprise Mr. Echard put us into at her Impeachment.

H. I. L. 187.

*"The whole Source of the King's deplorable "End, sprung only from his Marriage with a "Daughter of France, who though residing in "another Kingdom, yet still retain'd warm Af- "fections for her own popish Country, prefer- "ring the Counsels which came with her from "thence to the Repose and Tranquility of her "Royal Husband and his Kingdom, so blindly "bigotted was she to her own Ways of Worship, "that all her Thoughts were bent upon esta- "blishing her idolatrous Religion here, and ad- "vancing only those who profess it, which was "absolutely contrary to the LAWS OF THE "LAND." Echard has often spoken of her as a Blessing to this Nation, and as such there was a Form of Thanksgiving Prayer made for her by the Oxford Doctors: *Oh most merciful God, we render thee all Praise and Thanks, for that thou hast been pleased to extend thy Hand of Deliverance unto the Person of our gracious Queen, That thou hast made her an Instrument of so much Good to this Kingdom, and brought her safely hither; Lord, make the King and his People daily more and more happy in her, that as by thine especial Favour she is already become the Mother of so many hopeful Princes, so she may be daily fruitful in the Addition of more Blessings to us, through Jesus Christ our Lord. If every Word of this is not Blasphemy, in the Mouth of a Protestant, sensible of the Idolatry of her Religion, and her secret Practices to establish it, we are then to be taught what the Meaning of the Word is, and what the Nature of the Sin.

Prayer for the Queen.

About the same Time that the Earl of Essex took Reading, Sir William Waller having routed and dispers'd the Welch Forces, march'd from Gloucester to Hereford with 3000 Horse and Foot, and some Artillery. Coming before that City he summon'd it, but receiving a slight Answer from the Governor, Colonel Herbert Price, he order'd the Cannon to fire upon the Gates, through one of which a Ball pierc'd and kill'd a Lieutenant within it with some Men. This so frighted the Cavaliers, that most of the Garrison abandon'd the City at another of the Gates, and the rest yielded upon Quarter. Here were taken the Lord Scudamore and his Son, Colonel Herbert Price, Sir Richard Cave, Lieutenant Colonel Coningsby, Mr. Coningsby, Sir Walter Pye, Sir William Crofts, Sir Samuel Adebry, Major Dalton, Dr. Rogers, Dr. Godwyn, Dr. Evans, and several others, who were sent to Gloucester.

Bristol had supply'd Sir William Waller with Plot at part of his Forces, and while he was ranging Bristol. thus in Gloucestershire and Herefordshire, a Plot was form'd to betray that City to Prince Rupert. The chief Plotter was one Mr. Robert Teomans, a Merchant, who Echard tells us, was a Man of great Reputation, and had been High Sheriff the Year before. As I have by me a Manuscript History of that City, which I may hereafter publish, I have acquainted my self much better with the Affairs of it than it can be suppos'd he has done. Teomans was indeed the youngest Sheriff in the Mayoralty of Mr. John Locke, Merchant, and far from being a Person of distinguish'd Reputation. George Bowcher his Fellow Plotter, was drawn in by him, as were Mr. William Teomans, Mr. Edward Dakers, Mr. Arundel, Mr. Teague, Thomas Barret, Cutler, John Nickens, Trunk-Maker, Ephraim Goody, Goldsmith, Mr. Millard, John Collins, Mr. Brent, Robert Blackborough, Captain Cole, Mr. John Throupe, one Corely a Quack, Green an Attorney, John Pestor, Thomas Stephens, Matthew Stephens, Nathaniel Street, Tiler, Henry Russel, and others. On Monday the 7th of March in the Night, Prince Rupert, Prince Maurice, and the Lord Digby, with 4000 Horse and 2000 Foot, were to advance to Durdam Down, half a Mile from the City on Gloucester side, and the Conspirators engag'd to sieze Froom Gate under St. Michael's Hill and Newgate for their Entrance. Blackborough, one of the Plotters, liv'd near Froom Gate, and was to give Passage to the King's Forces through his Garden. Notice was to be given the Conspirators, by tolling a Bell at St. Nicholas, St. John, and St. Michael Churches. The Bell at St. Nicholas was a Token to those that were to attack the main Guard near the Cross and Tolsey. The Bell at St. John's was Notice to those that were to sieze Froom Gate, and the Bell at St. Michael's was a Token to Prince Rupert's Men without the City on Gloucester side, to act all together. The Conspirators were to be distinguish'd by white Tape in their Hats. According to Agreement about 50 of them met arm'd at Mr. Teoman's House, expecting to be join'd by a Multitude of Butchers from the Shambles near St. Nicholas's Gate and other Rascality at the High Cross, at the upper End of High Street, fronting that Gate. They were there to sieze the main Guard, and post a strong Body at St. Nicholas Gate to hinder Assistance from that part of the City which is on the other Side of the Bridge, in Somersetshire. Robert Teomans, who was to be a Colonel in the King's Service, undertook to move with this Part as soon as St. Nicholas's Bell toll'd. Bowcher was to head the Party that was to sieze Froom Gate, at the Tolling of St. John's Bell, in which he was to be assisted by the Seamen

Sir William Waller takes Hereford.

A.D. 1643. from St. Austin's Back. Then was the Bell at St. Michael's on the Hill to toll, and the Royalists immediately to draw down to Froom Gate and Blackborough's Garden, while others of the Conspirators broke open the House of Humphrey Hooke, Esq; Mayor of the City, murder'd him and his Family, and seizing the Keys of the City Gates, open'd them to their Confederates. Those Citizens who had not the white Tape Mark, and certain other Marks, were to be massacred and plunder'd. It was not above an Hour or two before this Conspiracy was to be executed, when a poor Man came to the Guard at the Bridge foot, and said, he saw some Men go into Teomans's House at 12 a Clock at Night. Teomans being a suspected Person, a Party of Horse and Foot was sent to invest his House, where they forc'd Entrance, and found the Men in Arms, whom they presently apprehended and carry'd to the Castle. Bowcher being also a suspected Person his House was search'd at the same Time, and a like Company found there in Arms. Both Teomans and Bowcher had increas'd the Suspicion against them, by their not hanging out Lights, as Colonel Fiennes the Governor had commanded the Citizens to do. Prince Rupert advanc'd according to the Scheme projected, but hearing no Tokens, and apprehending the Plot was discover'd, he quitted Durdham Down, where he had waited 3 or 4 Hours for them, and drew as near as Brandon Hill with some Horse, but after a Shot or two of Cannon from the City Works he retir'd. In Yeoman's House was found this Writing, All Inhabitants of the Bridge, High-street and Corn-street, keep within your Doors upon Peril of your Lives. All other Inhabitants of this City who stand for the King, let them forthwith appear at the High Cross with such Arms as they have, and follow their Leaders. The Parliament having Information of the Discovery of the Plot, and Seizure of the Plotters, order'd Clement Walker, Esq; Advocate to the Council of War, Colonel Fiennes, William White, Esq; Richard Cole, Esq; &c. to exhibit Articles of High Treason against them, and proceed by Law Martial. The Court sat at the Lady Rogers's House. The Fact was very plainly prov'd upon them, and Robert Teomans and George Bowcher were condemn'd to be hang'd before the main Guard, which Sentence was executed the 30th of May, notwithstanding the impotent Menaces of the Earl of Forth, the King's General, to hang up Mr. George, Mr. Stephens, and Captain Huntly, Prisoners taken at Cirencester, if those two Conspirators suffer'd. But Colonel Fiennes and Mr. Walker sent them Answer, that they would in such case execute Sir Walter Pye, Sir William Crofts, and Colonel Coningsby, who were taken in open REBELLION, and actual War against the King and Kingdom. His Majesty himself wrote a Letter to the Mayor, the two Sheriffs of Bristol, William Colston, Esq; and Henry Greswick, Esq; wherein he told them, that the hanging of Teomans and Bowcher would call down the just Vengeance of God, and bring perpetual Infamy on the City, he therefore will'd and commanded them to raise all the Power and Strength of the City to rescue them. There is no End of Wonderment at these Letters, for could any one suppose that the Mayor of Bristol, a Puritan, would enter into a War with the Governor Fiennes, a Presbyterian, to attempt a Thing that could end in nothing but Slaughter or the Gallows. Warwick, for they are alike, says Dakers, was hang'd too, but it is a Falstrey. There was a Day of Thanksgiving kept for this Discovery at Bristol; the Parliament also or-

A.D. 1643. der'd Thanksgivings for it; and what is very extraordinary, the King too order'd Thanksgivings at Oxford for Prince Rupert's Deliverance from this Conspiracy, which it was said there was a mock one contriv'd by Fiennes to draw that Prince and his Cavaliers into a Snare, and then under Colour of receiving them cut them to pieces.

Another Plot broke out the very Day that Waller's Teomans and Bowcher were hang'd at Bristol, to betray the City of London to her avow'd Enemies, the Cavaliers. Mr. Waller, one of the finest Genius's of his Age for Poetry but an ordinary one for Politicks, was at the Head of this Conspiracy; his Brother-in-Law Mr. Tompkins, Clerk of the Queen's Council, Mr. Challoner a wealthy Tradesman in Cornhill, Mr. Blinkborn of Covent Garden, and others, enter'd into the Plot, after having taken an Oath of Secrecy, to seize the King's Children, to secure several Members of both Houses of Parliament, particularly the Lord Say, the Lord Wharton, Mr. Pym, Sir Philip Stapleton, Colonel Hampden, Colonel Strode, as also the Lord Mayor of London, Sir John Woolaston, and the Committee of Militia, under pretence of bringing them to a legal Trial. To seize upon the Outworks which had been rais'd from St. James's to Hide Park Corner, Piccadilly, St. Giles's, Pancrass, Grays Inn Lane, Holloway Road, Newington and Hoxton. To seize the Magazines, Gates, and other important Places of the City, the Tower, and let in the King's Army, whose Lust was so strong after the Plunder, to resist and obstruct all Payments of Parliament. Mr. Waller being brought acquainted with Mr. Challoner by Mr. Tompkins, propos'd to him, to make a Party in the City of the Moderate Men to stand in the Gap between King and Parliament, and bring them to a Reconciliation, without which Party there was no Hopes to unite them. Challoner said, Sir, If I could assure you of three Parts of London, none of them should stir unless we had the Countenance of the Lords and Commons. Mr. Waller reply'd, You shall have to countenance this Business the whole House of Peers, except three or four, and divers of the House of Commons. Mr. Waller was the Mouth of those Peers and Commoners. He told Challoner what Conversation he had, or pretended he had with those Lords and Commons, and Challoner told Blinkborn, Abbot, Luntloo, King, and other Citizens. Among all the Falsities in the History of the Rebellion, and the Archdeacon's History, there is none that has so good Proof against it as this, That the Plot was only to petition for a Peace, Tompkins and Challoner at the Gallows confessing it was a treasonable Design. Tompkins said his Suffering was just; and Challoner, I confess I now die justly. The Lord Clarendon and Eckard will not allow that these poor Gentlemen, who were just going to be hang'd for this foolish Business, as Tompkins call'd it, spoke the Truth. I can see no real Cause, says the Lord Clarendon very gravely, but those who dy'd for it, own'd themselves there was a real Cause, and that they dy'd justly. The like Assertion is not in any History, or other Writing in being, and it is a great Comfort to have his Lordship's fine Characters confirm'd by so fine a Remark. The first Discovery of the Plot was made by Mr. Roe, Servant to Mr. Tompkins, who having over-heard some of the Consultations, imparted the Substance of them to Mr. Pym, who acquainting the Parliament with it, a Committee, Mr. Pym, Sir Henry Vane, jun. Mr. St. John, and Mr. Glyn, were appointed to inquire into the Conspiracy, which they trac'd

A. D. several Days and Nights to find out the Conspirators, and when the Matter was ripe, the Two Houses had a Conference upon it, and a Declaration of it was drawn up by their Order, to be printed and read in all Churches and Chapels. In Tompkins's Cellar was found a Commission from the King under the Great Seal of England, to Sir Nicholas Crisp, Sir George Stroud, Sir Thomas Gardiner Recorder of London, Sir George Binion, Richard Edes, Esq; Marmaduke Roydon, Esq; Thomas Brozen, Esq; Peter Paggen, Charles Jennings, Sir Edward Charlton, Robert Abbot, Andrew King, William White, Stephen Bolton, Robert Alden, Edmund Foster, and Thomas Blinkhorn, of London, Gentlemen, to raise Forces, Horse and Foot, to arm, muster, conduct, order, lead and govern, to raise Money for the clothing, arming, furnishing and paying them, to stay and to destroy the Friends to the Parliament, I see no real Cause, says Lord Clarendon, and I do not know many Sayings of his better grounded. This Commission was brought from Oxford by the Lady Aubigny, and one may by that see what good Use the Ladies made of the Parliament's Civilities towards them. Hasel one of the King's Messengers, went to and fro between London and Oxford with Accounts of the Conspirators Proceedings, and the King's Approval of them. One of his Instructions was, that they should settle at Oxford, Qua forma Regiminis, what Sort of Government should be set up when the Parliament was destroy'd, which is something more than a Petition for Peace, mention'd by the Earl of Clarendon as the Sum of this Design. Mr. Alexander Hampden was another Agent, and probably he had suffer'd as well as Challoner and Tompkins, had not his Sickness prevented his Trial. The Conspirators Tompkins, Challoner, Blinkhorn, Abbot, &c. were try'd by a Council of War in Guildhall, where were present in Court 22 Colonels of the City and the Lord General's Army, the Earl of Manchester President. The Evidence and the Confession of the Prisoners gave full Satisfaction as to their Guilt, so these four receiv'd Sentence of Death, Abbot and Blinkhorn were repriev'd, but Tompkins was executed over against Fetter-lane End in Holborn near his own House, and Mr. Challoner over against the Royal Exchange, both dying very penitent, and sensible of their Wickedness in ingaging in this cursed Conspiracy; tho' their Wickedness in plotting is not so great, considering their Penitence, as that of the Historian, who with equal Impenitence and Falshood turns this Plot upon the Parliament, as if it had been a Contrivance of theirs to bring a Scandal on the King, who indeed was deeply concern'd in it, as appears by the above-mention'd Commission to stay and destroy the Parliament and all their Friends and Adherents. A French Popish Historian, who however is more modest than either the Author of the History of the Rebellion or the Archdeacon, says, The particular Inclinations his Majesty always had to save the Blood of his Subjects, his earnest Desire to stop the Effusion of it on so many Occasions, and his great Tenderness to his poor People, shews sufficiently that he had no manner of Knowledge of such a Design, to kill and destroy, tho' he had granted a Commission for it under his Broad Seal. The Lord Clarendon says there is nothing in the World clearer than that the Commission had no Relation to Tompkins, tho' it was found in his Cellar; and he said at the Gallows he was glad it was discover'd, for it might have occasion'd very ill Consequences, and Challoner own'd at his Death he knew of it, as in Rushworth 326, 327. What Consciences must these Men have, and what Heads, to affirm Things to be false, the Truth of which was so easily prov'd? Mr. Archdeacon aping the Lord Clarendon, I cannot say right or wrong, for it is always wrong, tells us, The Parliament subtly join'd Sir Nicholas Crisp's Commission and Waller's Projects together, and enviously moulded them into one Plot. What occasion was there for subtly joining and moulding a Thing that was moulded and join'd to their Hands? Echard goes on very sagely and gravely, Plots are the dark Parts of History, Plants of quick Growth with small Roots and Branches, almost invisible in their Causes, but visible in their Effects. These very formal and impertinent Reflections are not however his own, for the Strength of his Genius does not seem to exert it self in Reflecting. Was the Broad Seal an invisible Part? Was a Commission to raise Men and Money, Horse and Arms, to seize Magazines, and kill and massacre, a small Branch? It is not worth Animadversion, for one cannot tell which is most predominant here, the Falshood or the Nonsense. This Plot has no Darkness in it, 'tis confess'd, the Causes were as visible as the King's impatient Desire to be Master of the City could make it, and the Effects were to guard against the like Treason for the future, by a new solemn Engagement or Covenant to be enter'd into by all the good People of England. The Preamble to it was, Since there has been a Popish Design to subvert the Protestant Religion, and a Popish Army to support that Design, and a treacherous and horrid Plot lately discover'd, &c. I A. B. will not consent to lay down Arms so long as Papists, now in open War against the Parliament, be protected against Justice. The Reverend Historian declares here that the Preamble was void of Truth, and thus gives the Lie to the House of Lords and House of Commons; yet some squeamish People have thought I have offended against Decency, when I have charg'd him and the Lord Clarendon with saying Things void of Truth: Tho' it is monstrous to think I may not take the same Liberty with Historians who write falsely, as they both take with the most august Senate in the World in Arms for the Defence of their own and the People's Religion, Rights, Privileges and Liberties. If the Papists had no Design to subvert the Protestant Religion, if there was no Plot to seize the City and dissolve the Parliament, then the Preamble was void of Truth, and on that Issue I leave it. The chief Plotter, Mr. Waller, appeal'd from the Council of War to the House of Commons, offering which he was a Member, and being brought to the Bar, made one of the most eloquent and moving Speeches that is in our or any other Language, ancient or modern. He begins with a Confession of that Crime which the Lord Clarendon and Mr. Echard deny with incredible Resolution; for can one believe that two Men should know more of a Matter than the Man who is to die for it, and yet confesses it. His Speech began thus; I acknowledge it a great Mercy of God, and a great Favour from you, that I am once more suffer'd to behold this Honourable Assembly. I mean not to make use of it to say any thing in my own Defence by Justification or Denial of what I have done; I have already confess'd enough to make me appear worthy not only to be put out of this House, but out of the World too. The Lord Clarendon has it over and over again, I can see no real Cause which the Criminal who expects Sentence of Death to pass upon him, did see and own that he saw. I am not surpriz'd at Echard's repeating such prodigious Passages, for had the Extravagance of that

A. D. 1643. Partiality been greater, and the Falshood of it been still more notorious and self-evident, he would have run away with it as with an inestimable Treasure coming out of such a Storehouse as the History of the Rebellion, where we also read, and in the Archdeacon's History too, that Mr. Waller brib'd the Ministers of the Gospel who came to pray with him, to speak a good Word for him to the House of Commons, which will not bear Remark. He clos'd his Speech thus; Sir, not to trouble you any longer, if I die, I shall die praying for you; if I live I shall live serving of you, and render you back the Use and Employment of all those Days you shall add to my Life. By this pathetick Speech and other Artifices, says Echard as fallly as ever Man said any thing, he prevail'd not to be try'd by a Council of War, p. 571. Rushworth, p. 330. The House of Commons proceeded to expell him, so being LEFT TO THE COUNCIL OF WAR, he was condemn'd to die. Should a Man with such a Falshood in his Mouth accuse very religious and pious Divines of Vile Sayings, of taking great Sums for their Prayers, of Hypocrisy and Bribery. But so it is, and the Infensibility with which he repeated such Stuff after the most partial and profligate Writers, will doubtless render all Reproof ineffectual. Mr. Waller had a Reprieve from the Lord General Essex, and after about a Year's Imprisonment, paying a Fine of 10000 Pounds, which, says the Lord Clarendon, the Parliament wanted, he was discharg'd and travell'd into France. Is not the Historian's Reflection there on the Parliament's Poverty very discreet and courtly, considering what a flowing Treasury his Majesty had at Oxford? There are several Parts of the History of the Rebellion as merry as this, and one cannot help laughing, as much as it is below the Dignity of History, Larrey having read what the Earl said of kneading and joining, which Echard calls moulding and joining two Plots together, thought it very ridiculous. " 'Tis of little Importance whether Crisp's Commission was a Sequel of Waller's Conspiracy, as Rushworth writes, or a separate Enterprize from either, as the Lord Clarendon affirms, tho' it seems not at all to agree with the Commission's being found in Tompkins's Cellar." Mr. Waller was forc'd to sell an Estate of 1000 Pounds a Year

Dr. Birch. to clear off this Fine and Charges. Dr. Birch, who marry'd his Daughter, in a Manuscript Account of his Life, said, " He conferr'd with some Loyal Citizens and others about recovering the City into the King's Interest, in which he was betray'd by his Sister Price and her Presbyterian Chaplain Mr. Good, who stole some of his Papers; and if he had not strangely dream'd the Night before he was seiz'd that his Sister betray'd him, and thereupon burnt the rest of his Papers by the Fire left in his Chimney, he had certainly lost his Life for it." Now to get a Petition, as the Lord Clarendon positively asserts the Design was, is no hanging Matter. This small Scrip of History by Dr. Birch, shews us what Sort of Historians our most famous Doctors make: He tells us the Presbyterian Minister was a Thief, and builds his Story on a Dream. Mr. Echard cannot but be pleas'd to see his own Manner of Writing confirm'd by that of Dr. Birch.

Waller accus'd the Earl of Portland and the Lord Conway of being privy to the Design, and they were imprison'd for some Time; but it not being clearly prov'd they were discharg'd.

His Majesty publish'd a Proclamation at Oxford, June 20. forbidding all Persons to obey the Orders of the Two Houses. We must note that these Proclamations had no Currensey any where but in the King's own Quarters; but the Penman Sir Edward Hyde was extremely enamour'd with his florid Stile, and took infinite Pleasure in writing Proclamations and Declarations with a Clarendon's Fluency of Words, which pass'd off as they were, like so much Air. Sir Philip Warwick informs us that Mr. Hobbes thought his Verbofeness and Flourishes did more Hurt than Good. I had taken Notice of this Vice in his Language before I knew that it was the Opinion of Warwick and Hobbes. In this Proclamation was an Offer of a general Pardon, with some Exceptions in it; as, Robert Earl of Essex, Robert Earl of Warwick, Exceptions Edward Earl of Manchester, William Lord Say to the and Sele, Sir Francis Popham, Sir John Hotham, Sir Arthur Haselrigge, Sir Henry Ludlow, Sir Edward Hungerford, Alexander Popham, Esq; Nathaniel Fiennes, Esq; John Pym, Esq; William Strode, Esq; Henry Martin, Esq; Alderman Pennington, Capt. Ven; neither of whom, as I can find in History, shew'd any Disposition to be at the Charge of the Broad Seal for a Pardon, tho' his Majesty threaten'd to proceed against them as guilty of High Treason by the KNOWN LAWS OF THE LAND, which are twenty Times mention'd in this Proclamation, and have been a thousand Times broken in this Reign by upper and lower Officers.

About a Month before, a Proclamation was publish'd at Oxford in Favour of the Clergy, wherein it is said that several Ministers have been sequester'd for preaching the Word of God according to its Purity, of which Hundreds of Instances might be taken out of the Registers of Laud, Wren, and other such Prelates, for not teaching Sedition, for not fomenting this unnatural War, for not sowing Sedition again, for not acting contrary to the Word of God, &c. Wherefore the King forbids any one to take their Places, or touch their Tithes. Where the Cavaliers were Masters, no Body was suffer'd to take any thing from them but themselves; but where the Parliamentarians, this Proclamation did them no more good than Goring's Blessing would have done. Before we enter further upon the Military Actions of this Year, we must remember the Civil, and we find the Parliament proceeding with great Calmness and Wisdom in the Latter, and with as much Diligence and Vigour in the Former, as the Circumstances of the Times would permit.

They pass'd an Ordinance about the Beginning of April for sequestering the Estates of all notorious Delinquents, and another for the speedy raising and levying of Money throughout the whole Kingdom of England and Dominion of Wales, for the Relief of the Common-Wealth, and the Taxing such as have not at all contributed or lent Money, or not according to their Estates and Abilities. The Preamble to this Ordinance having set forth the Miseries the Nation endured by the Army the King had rais'd to make War against his Parliament, and the Ruin that would be inevitable, unless the Army rais'd by the Parliament was supported, it is further said, " which said Army cannot be maintain'd without great Sums of Money, yet for raising such Sums, by Reason of his Majesty's withdrawing himself from the Advice of the Parliament, there can be no Act pass'd with his Majesty's Assent, albeit there is great Justice that the said Money should be rais'd; Be it therefore ordain'd by the Lords and Commons, that all those who have not contributed, &c. as in the Title, shall be assess'd;" and Commissioners

A. D. 1643. fioners were appointed to assess and levy this Tax, which being, I think, the first of the Kind, I shall insert their Names.

Commissioners of the Land Assessment all over England. Commissioners for the General Contribution Tax all over England and Wales, in the Year 1643. rais'd by Parliament.

The County of Oxford is omitted, the King's Forces being in Possession of it. As this is the first Precedent of appointing Commissioners of Taxes in every County, as is done lately for the Land-Tax, at least it is the first that comes so near to the late Practice; and this being the most compleat List extant, for all others are imperfect, I doubt not it will be acceptable to the Reader; and the Posterity of those Gentlemen who have preserv'd true Protestant and English Principles in their Names and Families, will be pleas'd with so honourable a Succession. As for those who have degenerated, and there will be some found in several Counties, it is to be hop'd that the Goodness of the Cause, and the Example of their Ancestors, will wean them from Bigotry and Faction, and make them as good Englishmen and as good Protestants as their Fathers were before them.

All this while was the War carrying on in several Parts of the Kingdom by Skirmishes, Surprises, Rencounters, without much Damage to either

A. D. 1643. either Side, tho' it must be confess'd that what Advantage there was fell mostly to the King's Share in this Year's Dispute. The Garrison of Oxford made frequent Sallies even within a Mile of the Earl of Essex's head Quarters, which were about Tbame. Prince Rupert cut off a Regiment or two at Postcomb and Chinnor. He also fell upon a Body of Parliamentarians in Chalgrave Field, Buckinghamshire, where a warm Action commenc'd, and ended in the Rout of the latter, who were betray'd by Col. Hurry a Deserter. In this Engagement Major Gunter was shot dead, and Col. Hampden mortally wounded; Capt. Sheffield and many Officers and Soldiers were taken Prisoners. Some advised Mr. Hampden not to go upon that Party, he having no Order for it; but, says Whitlocke, his Courage did put him forward. He adds, He was a Gentleman of the most ancient Extraction in the County of Bucks, Hampden of Hampden; his Fortune large, his natural Abilities great, his Affection to publick Liberty and Applause in his Country, expos'd him to many Difficulties and Troubles, as in the Business of the Ship-Money and the Loan, and now in Parliament, where he was a most active and leading Member. He spoke rationally and sublimely, and often propos'd Doubts more than he resolv'd. He was well belov'd in his Country, where he had a great Interest, as also in the House of Commons. He dy'd of his Wounds a Week after the Engagement, about the 24th of June, and was lamented by every good Man in the Nation. His Character is universally acknowledged to be the brightest and purest of any Man's then living. Mr. Whitlock was his Neighbour and Friend, as good a Judge of Men as was then in England, and as well able to speak in their Praise or Dispraise; yet we see in how few Words, with what Simplicity and Sincerity he leaves this shining Character to Posterity. If it will not shine of it self, it shall have no Ornament of Words or Fancy from him; and if the

Clar. Characters false. Earl of Clarendon's Pictures had been drawn with the same Integrity and Discretion, we had lost above half of them in Number and Value. I shall speak of them more at large elsewhere, and could prove very easily, that there is not one of them just, either in Beauty or Blemish. That all Likeness is lost in a barren Superfluity of Words, and the Workings of a prejudiced Imagination, even where one may suppose the Drawing was his own. But that there has been more Dawbing in some Places, and more Dirt in others, put on by his Editors, is now incontestable. In the Character of this great and excellent Man, which we could wish had escap'd his Drawings, or the Drawings of those clumsy Painters into whose Hands his Work fell, there is something so very false and base, that such Coin could only come from a College Mint. In a Word, what was said of Cinna might well be apply'd to Hampden, he had a Head to contrive, and a Tongue to persuade, and a Hand to execute any Mischief: His Death therefore seem'd to be a great Deliverance to the Nation. There are not Words to express the Infamy of this Slander and Imposture, nor the unparallel'd Wickedness of those Doctors, who foisted so horrid a Reflection into that Character. The Person who did it was Mr. Edmund Smith of Oxford, Author of Phedra and Hippolitus, a Tragedy, who at his Death confess'd to the Gentleman in whose House he dy'd, that among a great Number of Alterations and Additions which he himself made in the History of the Rebellion, by Order of Dr. Aldrich, Dr. Atterbury, and Dr. Smalbridge, successive Deans of Christ-Church, this very Saying of Cinna, apply'd to Mr. Hampden, was one; and when he read it to one of those Doctors, he clap'd him on the Back, and cry'd with an Affelevation, It will do. The Confession Mr. Smith made, and the Remorse he express'd for being concern'd in this Imposture, were his last Words. Probably before this History is publish'd that Gentleman, or my self by his Permission, may have set this whole Matter in a clear Light, and the World will then see what a fair Way they were in to be impos'd on, perhaps for ever, if so worthy a Gentleman had not detected the Fraud. That the Ground-work of the Characters and History was the Lord Clarendon's, is not to be doubted, from the Abundance of Words and Wantonness of Fancy; but that those Additions and Alterations were made to flatter or abuse Persons and Things to keep Life in a languishing Cause, is now well known, and will be made appear. This Digression must serve for all that might be said here upon this Subject.

We have mention'd the Covenant fram'd on the Discovery of Waller's Plot, which was order'd to be tender'd by the Ministers of Parishes to their Parishioners. One Grimes, Parson of Igham in Kent not only refus'd to take it himself, according to Order, but also to tender it to his Congregation. The Parliament being inform'd of it, sent a Party of Horse to bring him to London: But the Parson was prepar'd to receive them, and having gotten a Rabble together with Halberts, Swords and Staves, pretended to stand out against the Troopers, who soon dispers'd them, seiz'd Grimes, and carry'd him off. But the Mob assembled again as soon as the Party was gone, and rais'd a downright Rebellion against the Parliament, being encreas'd to 2000, and having got Fire-Arms amongst them. Against these Col. Richard Brown was order'd to march with 600 Horse and Dragoons, and 1200 Foot. He came up with them at Tunbridge, and they fir'd upon his Men, kill'd an Officer and seven Soldiers; upon which Col. Brown commanded his Forces to attack them, and their sudden Flight prevented a great Slaughter; 200 were taken Prisoners, and the Town was plunder'd for harbouring and encouraging them. The Parliament had offer'd them Pardon if they would lay down their Arms, and to redress whatever Grievances they complain'd of, but they contemptuously refus'd it; and being routed, the Two Houses pass'd an Ordinance in August, empowering Commissioners to seize the Horses and Arms, the Lands, Tenements, Goods and Chattels of these Rebels, and their Abettors; which Commissioners were Sir Henry Vane sen. Sir Anthony Welden, Sir John Sidley, Sir Michael Livesey, Sir Henry Hayman, Sir Edward Boyse, Sir William Springall, Sir Edward Master, Sir Peter Wroth, Sir John Roberts, Sir Thomas Walsingham, Thomas Selyard, Esq; Augustine Skinner, Esq; Thomas Blunt, Esq; Thomas Franklyn, Esq; John Boyse, Esq; Richard Lee, Esq; Mr. Nutt, Mr. Browne, Mr. Boyse.

About the Time of the Discovery of the Plots to betray London, Bristol, and Hull to the Cavaliers, there was a Conspiracy to deliver up the City of Lincoln by Major Purefoy and his Brother, who were in the Parliament's Service there. Two thousand of the Forces which the Queen had left at Newark in her Passage to Oxford, were to advance to the Gates, which the two Purefoys had engaged to open to them, and for that Purpose had admitted a small Party of the Enemy, disguis'd like Market-men, whom they conceal'd in the Dean's House. The Mayor of Hull got Intimation of the Plot, and communicated it to the Governor of Lincoln, who seiz'd the

A. D. 1643. the two Puresfoys. However, the disguis'd Cavaliers sally'd out of the Dean's House into the Town, and endeavour'd to seize the Magazine and master the main Guard till one Cannon only was fir'd upon them, which kill'd several of them, and the rest threw down their Arms. The Forces from Newark hearing the Plot was discover'd made their Retreat. Not long after the Lord Willoughby of Parham with a Party of Horse and Dragoons took Gainsborough, and made the Earl of Kingston, Sir Jervase Scroop, and several other Gentlemen and Officers Prisoners, together with 250 common Soldiers. He found Treasure in the Earl's House, which held out a whole Day after the Town was taken. The Lord Willoughby understanding the King's Forces were gathering from Newark and other Places to recover Gainsborough, sent away the Earl of Kingston in a Pinnace to Hull, which a Party of Royalists on the Trent side spying they discharg'd their Muskets at her, and kill'd the Earl of Kingston and his Man Savit in the Cabbin. The Pinnace got clear and past on to Hull. Colonel Cromwel hearing that the Lord Willoughby had taken Gainsborough, drew that way to reinforce him, and in his March met with Colonel Cavendish with a Party of the Earl of Newcastle's Army, which he entirely defeated, and slew the Colonel. He gives this Account of the Action himself in a Letter dated July 31. "I march'd after the taking of Burleigh to Grantam, and was join'd by the Lincolneers at North Scarles, 10 Miles from Gainsborough. About a Mile and half from the Town we met the Forlorn of the Enemy, who drove a Troop of our Dragoons back to their main Body. We advanc'd and came to the Bottom of a steep Hill, which we could not well get up but by some Tracts, and the Body of the Enemy endeavour'd to hinder us, but we prevail'd and gain'd the Top of it. This was done by the Lincolneers, who had the Vanguard. A great Body of the Enemy's Horse fac'd us there, at about a Musket Shot distance, and a good Reserve of a full Regiment of Horse behind it. We did what we could to put our Men in good Order, and the Enemy advanced towards us to prevent it and take us at a Disadvantage, but in such Order as we were we charg'd their great Body, I having the right Wing: We came up Horse to Horse, where we disputed a pretty while with our Swords and Pistols, all keeping close Order so that one could not break the other. At last the Enemy shrinking a little our Men soon perceiv'd it, prest in upon them and routed their whole Body, some flying on one side and others on the other of the Enemy's Reserve. Our Men pursu'd them with good Execution about 6 Miles. I perceiving the Reserve still unbroken kept back my Major Whaley from the Pursuit, and with my own Troop and two Troops more of my Regiment we got into a Body. In this Reserve was General Cavendish, who one while fac'd me, another while fac'd four of the Lincoln Troops, which were all of ours that engag'd the Reserve, the rest being in Pursuit of those who fled. General Cavendish charg'd the Lincolneers and routed them. Immediately I fell on his Rear with my three Troops, which did so astonish him that he gave over the Chase, and would have deliver'd himself from me, but I pressing on forc'd him down a Hill, and below it drove the General and some of his Soldiers into a Quagmire, where my Captain Lieutenant slew him with a Thrust under his short Ribs. The rest "of the Body was wholly routed, not one Man staying on the Place." I have repeated Cromwel's own Words, to shew the unparallel'd Falsties in Echard's Account of this gallant Action. Colonel Bury had given Colonel Cavendish Quarter, and he was slain in cold Blood, throwing the Blood running from his Wounds in his Enemies Faces, like the Cannibal in Montaigne. Neither Echard nor his Original, knew that this had more of the Malulike and the Tartar in it than the Hero.

This Victory was more than over-ballanc'd on the King's Side, by the Defeat of the Lord Fairfax on Atherton Moor, where he was engaged by the Earl of Newcastle, who was much Superior to him in Number. He had 500 Men kill'd. Many Prisoners and Pieces of Ordnance were taken by the Royalists. The Lord Fairfax with his shatter'd Forces retreated to Bradford, and thence to Leeds, the Earl of Newcastle pursuing him. At Leeds his Lordship heard of Hotbom's Conspiracy to betray Hull, he repair'd thither, and in his Passage was stop't at Selby by a Party of the Earl of Newcastle's Army, whom Sir Thomas Fairfax's Son held in Play, while his Father and his Attendants past the River. In this Skirmish Sir Thomas was shot in his Arm, and though he lost much Blood he kept a Horseback 20 Hours after; his Lady, who would accompany him, was taken in the Rout at Atherton riding behind Mr. William Hill an Officer, and his Daughter, not above 5 Years old, she who was afterwards Dutches of Buckingham, was also in the Retreat with him, riding in his Maid's Lap. Sir Thomas past the Trent and went to Barton, but had not been there a Quarter of an Hour before the Enemy came up with him. However, he made a shift to get a Ship-board under the Security of the Fire from the Ships Ordnance, and crossing the Humber arriv'd at Hull, whether the Earl of Newcastle sent his Lady in his own Coach with a Guard of Horse, which Sir Thomas Fairfax Memorial says himself, Gain'd him more Reputation than p. 58. he could have got by detaining a Lady Prisoner.

The Earl of Newcastle being thus Master of the Field came before Gainsborough with 6000 Horse and Foot, and having batter'd the Town rough re- taken, with his Artillery, the Lord Willoughby surrender'd it on Terms to march with Bag and Baggage to Lincoln, whether the Earl of Newcastle follow'd him, had the Gates open'd to him, and plac'd a Garrison there for the King. Earl of Newcastle.

The Lord Fairfax was made Governor of Hull, and the Earl of Newcastle came before it with an Army of 16000 Horse and Foot, Sir Thomas Fairfax had got together about 1500 Foot and 700 Horse, with which he was posted at Beverley, while the Earl of Newcastle was in Lincolnshire, and with that little Body he was so troublesome to the Garrison and Neighbourhood of York, that the Enemy sent for the Earl of Newcastle to return into Yorkshire, though his Orders were to take in Boston, from thence to enter the associated Counties, to march through Essex to London, and block it up on that Side, while the King, who was Superior to Essex in Number, advanced, and did the same on Middlesex side. But Newcastle return'd to York and commenc'd the Siege of Hull, into which Sir Thomas Fairfax had thrown himself upon his Approach towards Beverley, though with some Difficulty. The Lord Newcastle laid down at a great Distance from Hull, the Sluices being let down, and the Country drown'd. Yet upon a Bank which was the Highway he approach'd so near as to shoot Cannon-shot at random into the Town, and for the most part hot Bullets, but by the Diligence and Care of the Governor, who caus'd every

A. D. every Inhabitant to watch his own House the 1643. Danger was prevented. Sir Thomas Fairfax's Horse being useless in the Town he was sent over with them into Lincolnshire, to join the Earl of Manchester's Forces, and was receiv'd at his Landing by Major General Cromwel. Sir John
Henderson had got together a little Army of near 6000 Men, drawn out of the Garrisons of New- ark, Gainsborough, Lincoln, most of them Cavalry. The Earl of Manchester's Troops were fuller though not so many in Number, and he led them on singing of Psalms. Quarter Master General Vermuyden had the Forlorn, with 5 Troops of Horse, and Colonel Cromwel the Van, seconded by Sir Thomas Fairfax. The Roy-alists Word was Newcastle, the Parliamentarians Truth and Peace, and they engaged near Horn
Castle in Lincolnshire the 19th of October. Ver- meiden and the Dragoons gave the first Charge, and then Major General Cromwel charg'd with the Horse, having received the first Fire from the Enemy's Dragoons. They gave him a second Salutation within half Pistol Shot. His Horse was kill'd and fell down upon him, and as he rose he was knock'd down again by the Gentleman who charg'd him; suppos'd to be Sir
Ingram Hopton, but he got up and recover'd a poor Horse in a Soldier's Hand and so mounted again. The Van of the Royalists Horse being beaten back upon their Foot put them into Disorder, and Manchester's Troops taking that Advantage fell in upon them and put them to flight, leaving their Dragoons who were now on foot behind them. Thus being totally routed Manchester's Men had the Pursuit, and did Execution upon them for several Miles. The Earl of Manche- ster's Foot did not come up till after the Horse had done the Business. The Number of the Royalists slain were about 1500, among whom were Sir Ingram Hopton, Sir George Bolles, Lieutenant Colonel Markham, and other Officers. On the Parliament Side very few were kill'd, and none of Note. The Royalists had no Time to rally, being pursu'd as far as Lin- coln. Neither were they suffer'd to rest there, the Earl of Manchester following them thither the next Day, and finding them at work in fortifying the Clofe he summon'd them to surrender, which they refusing, he attack'd them gallantly with Horse and Foot and carry'd the Place by Storm with very little Loss. He found there 2500 Arms, 30 Colours, and 3 Pieces of Cannon; and these Successes so soon one after another, gave a Check to the Marquis of Newcastle, as he is now to be call'd, whose Army was more terrible by the Noise they made than by their Actions. A few Days before this Victory the Earl of Manchester seiz'd the Town of Old Lynne, and planting Ordnance there much an-noy'd the new Town: He made two Approaches, one by the Causeway that leads to the South, the other to the East Gate. The Besieged fally'd upon him and fir'd two Houses in Gar- wood, intending to destroy the whole Town that he might not have Quarters there, but that Party was beaten back and the rest of the Houses preserv'd. The Besiegers summon'd in Pioneers from the Neighbourhood, and by Degrees brought their Approaches within half Musket shot, and had begun a Battery near that End of the Town next the Sea, resolving to storm it by Land and by Water, Boats and Ladders being provided for that purpose, which the Besieged perceiving, they sent to desire a Parley, and a Treaty was agreed on, to be manag'd by eight Persons of a Side: For the Earl of Manchester were Sir John Palgrave, Colonel Russell, Colonel Wal- ton, Mr. Philip Calthorp, Mr. John Pickering,

Mr. Gregory Goffer, Mr. John Spelman, and Mr. William Good. For the Town were Sir
Hammond L'Estrange, Sir Richard Hovil, Mr.
Clinch, Mr. Dereham, Mr. Pallet, Recorder, Mr. Hudson, the Mayor elect, Mr. Leek, and Mr. Kirby. The Terms were soon concluded.
 They were honourable, and honourably observ'd.
 His Lordship took Possession of the Place the same Night, and detach'd 500 Men to reinforce the Garrison of Hull. But Cate not having been taken in the Articles of Lynne to provide for Reparation of Damages so such well affected Persons in the Town as had been damnify'd by the Cavaliers, the Parliament empower'd Colonel Walton, who was made Governor of Lynne to examine into those Damages and appoint Reparation accordingly.

We left the Marquis of Newcastle in a vain Enterprize against Hull; he lay near a Month about the Place without making any considerable Approach, and the Lord Fairfax the Governor having receiv'd a Reinforcement, made a Sally out of the Town on the Marquis's Trenches, the very same Day that Sir John Henderson was routed at Newcastle. The Lord Newcastle drew out most Part of his Army to relieve them, but the Lord Fairfax's Men charg'd them so resolutely that they possess themselves of his Cannon;
 and pursuing their Advantages put the Enemy to a total Rout, upon which he rais'd the Siege and return'd again to Tork. These are the Actions of which the Lord Clarendon says, Few Days past without Blows between Newcastle and Fairfax, in which the Parliament Forces had usually the worst. And to shew his Impartiality further, he says not a Syllable of the Rout at Horn Castle, nor of the Marquis of Newcastle's being driven from before Hull, which Mr. Arch- deacon phrases very finically, The Lord New- castle thought it necessary to withdraw. Thus it is through both of their Histories, the Cavaliers are always charging first. If the Parlia- mentarians are worsted they run, if the Roy- alists they withdraw, which is extremely puerile, and by no means the Mark of Talents proper for History.

The Success of the Parliaments Forces in Torkshire and Lincolnshire, was abundantly made up to the King by the taking of the most important Place in England, the City of London only excepted, for Prince Rupert with an Army of 20000 Horse and Foot coming before Bristol, and the Summons being refus'd, laid Siege to it, and the next Day gave a fierce Assault, but was beaten off. He continu'd his Attacks with great Resolution, and was as resolutely resisted, till Colonel Washington gain'd the Outworks, and made a Breach in the Walls, which Captain Langrige was to have secur'd with his Troop of Horse, but there was some Failure in that Service, and Colonel Fiennes the Governor submitted to a Parley, which brought on a Treaty that was soon concluded, and the City surrender'd on Articles, The Officers to march out with full
Arms, Horses, Bag and Baggage, the Foot Soldiers without their Arms, the Troopers with their Horses and Swords, the Parliaments Friends in the City to have free Liberty, with their Wives, Families, Goods, Bag and Bag- gage, to depart the Town with the Governor and Forces, all the Citizens to be secur'd from Plundering and all other Violence. Not one of which Articles was kept, but all of them broken in the most outrageous and scandalous Manner, Colonel Fiennes was try'd and condemn'd by a Council of War, but afterwards repriev'd, and serv'd no more in the Army. Prince Rupert came before the City on the Eve of St. James, the great

A. D. Fair Day, and had it surrender'd the 27th of July.

1643. Some Days before this Sir William Waller had beaten up the Cavalier Quarters at Wells, and dispers'd Sir James Hamilton's Regiment, which so provok'd the Royalists, that they gather'd what Forces they had in those Parts together in a Body and resolv'd to drive Sir William out of Bath. He order'd Major Dowel with 300 Horse and Foot to secure the Pass at Ford Bridge, but he was beaten off, 16 of his Men kill'd, and two Hammer Pieces taken. On the 4th of July Waller drew out his Forces upon Landsdown expecting the Enemy, who advanc'd the next Day. Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Colonel Carr, Major Dowel and Captain Butler, charg'd them with 400 Horse, but were gallantly receiv'd, and forc'd to retreat, though in good Order, till they were relieved by Colonel Burghill, between whom and the Royalists the Fight was maintain'd for two Hours, and then the Parliaments Foot growing weary a Supply was sent, which consisting of new rais'd Men presently gave ground, and Colonel Burghill was shot through his right Arm. The King's Party charg'd up very furiously, which prov'd to the Advantage of the Parliament's, for now both Armies being on the Plain, and Waller exceeding the Cavaliers in Horse as much as they exceeded him in Foot, had the better Opportunity of fighting. The Battle grew hot on both Sides, and continu'd so many Hours till Night parted them, each side pretending to the Honour of a Victory, which Echard, after his usual Way, puts out of all Doubt; and if we will not allow him such Victories his History will be the most barren of Triumphs of any that ever was written. There's a Trophy erected on Landsdown, a Mile from Bath, in Honour of that brave Gentleman Sir Bevil Greeneville of Cornwall, who was slain in this Fight, and those of his Posterity who have been ennobled have taken their Title of Viscount or Baron from this Landsdown, in Remembrance of the Glory their Ancestor acquir'd here. On the King's Side were also kill'd Lieutenant Colonel Ward, and Major Lower. On the Parliament's Side Major Straughan a Scots Gentleman, a Lieutenant and two Cornets. The Number of the Slain is so variously reported that there is no fixing it. Waller thought himself so much a Victor, that having refresh'd his Men a Day or two at Bath, he follow'd the King's Forces to the Devizes, where Sir Ralph Hopton shut himself up with the Foot, no great Sign that he was Victorious at Landsdown, while Prince Maurice and the Marquis of Hertford carry'd away most of the Horse to Oxford. Waller made an Assault upon the Town, and Sir Ralph desir'd a Parley and Cessation for two Hours, but Sir William Waller's Terms not being accepted of, both Sides again took to their Arms, and Waller was preparing for a general Assault when he heard that the Lord Wilmot and the Earl of Carnarvon with 2000 Horse, were advanc'd within 2 or 3 Miles of the Devizes, upon which, instead of keeping his Ground, which was advantageous against Cavalry, he suddenly drew off July 13th, without Drum or Trumpet to Roundway Down, where his Horse, rashly led on by Sir Arthur Haslerigge, gallop'd up Hill, leaving the Foot to be attack'd by Sir Ralph Hopton. Haslerigge charg'd the Cavaliers in a disorderly Manner, and was consequently put to a disorderly Retreat, yet with the Help of their Reserve his Troops rally'd and stood a second Charge, but were then totally routed. Waller's Foot made a better Resistance, but the Lord Wilmot's Horse coming upon them they were intirely defeated, flung down their Arms and fled. The King's Forces took 4 Pieces of Cannon, abundance of Arms, and many Prisoners, Sir William Waller, Sir Arthur Haslerigge, Colonel Popham, Colonel Strode, and other Commanders, escap'd to Bristol, 25 Miles off, where they could not stay long, for that City was surrender'd a Fortnight after. Waller repair'd to London, and notwithstanding this Disaster, owing chiefly to ill Conduct, he was highly carress'd, and Means concerted to raise him another Army.

In this Confusion of Affairs Civil and Military, 'tis impossible to observe the due Order of Things and Times. While the one Party is making War with Success in the North of England, the other does the like in the West. Four or five Towns are besieging at once by both Sides; the Parliament are busy'd in Debates and Counsels at Westminster, the same are the King and Court at Oxford, we are therefore compell'd to antedate and postpone Events, as it serves best to clear Matters in the several Parts of the Kingdom where they happen'd. The Parliament's Affairs are represented by Clarendon, Warwick, Echard, and that Sort of Writers, as in a desperate Condition, though they themselves were far from any such Apprehensions, and knowing that the Scots were preparing to march an Army to their Assistance, the Confidence of the Cavaliers was more ridiculous than terrible to them, which Confidence they did not only mix with their Mirth over their Cups, but with their Devotion, and thank'd God for Victories they either never obtained, or had at the same time Losses which over ballanc'd them.

The Parliament Army under the Earl of Essex had suffer'd much by Sickness, which had lessen'd their Number, and Desertion had not a little thin'd the Companies and Regiments, the Soldiers being disgusted that they were restrain'd from plundering Reading, and had not received the 12 Shillings a Man they were promis'd in lieu of it. Their usual Pay also did not come so regularly as at first, which putting them into an ill Humour, one may be sure their General was not in a good one. He wrote a Letter to the Parliament from Great Brickhill, wherein he propos'd to send to his Majesty to have Peace, and mention'd some of the Terms which Echard conceals, To bring the chief Delinquents to trial for having brought all this Mischief to both Kingdoms, to have Religion, Laws and Liberties settl'd, &c. Terms which every Man in his Wits would have fallen in with. And in such Case the Author of the History of the Rebellion must have been brought to Trial, being always excepted in the Parliament's Indemnities as a chief Delinquent, and he has endeavour'd to take his Revenge of them in his History. In case the King wou'd not comply with this, the Lord General desir'd he might be mov'd to name a Day and Place for a Battle to decide the Matter at once, and put an End to the Cries of the poor People which are infinite. The Parliament return'd for Answer, "The King by his last Proclamation, publish'd in the Height of Exultation for the taking of Bristol, had cast them out of his Protection, and thereby made them incapable to treat till that Proclamation be recall'd. And that by their late Covenant they were bound never to lay down Arms so long as Papists, now in open War against them, shall by Force be protect-ed from Parliamentary Justice." They assur'd him of speedy Recruits both of Men and Money, which they perform'd, and in about a Month's Time he muster'd an Army of 15000 Men on Hounslow Heath.

The

Earl of Essex writes to the Parliament about Peace.

A. D. 1643. The Lords and Commons taking into Consideration the Inconveniences which attended the Want of a Great Seal, pass'd an Ordinance for making a new one, the Lord Littleton having, contrary to the Trust repos'd in him and the Duty of his Place, secretly and perfidiously convey'd it away. The Commissioners appointed for keeping of this new Seal, were Henry Earl of Kent, Oliver Earl of Bolingbroke, Oliver St. John, Esq; John Wyld, Esq; Serjeant at Law, whom the Earl of Clarendon calls infamous, Samuel Brozen, Esq; and Edmund Prideaux, Esq;

Book of Sports. The Parliament had some Time before pass'd an Ordinance for burning the Book of Sports by the Hangman, and all Persons who had those impious Books, which injoin'd the Profanation of the Lord's Day, were order'd to bring them in to the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, that they may be burned accordingly.

Printing. The Licentiousness of Pamphlets requir'd the Wisdom and Authority of the Parliament to restrain it. One Saltmarsh, a Minister, had said in a Book of his, That all Means should be used to keep the King and People from a sudden Union: If the King would not grant their Demands, he should be set aside, and the Crown put upon another Head. Exceptions being taken against this in the House of Commons, Mr. Henry Martin said, I see no Reason to condemn Mr. Saltmarsh; it is better one Family should be destroy'd than many. Sir Nevil Pool mov'd that Mr. Martin might explain himself, and he boldly answer'd, I mean the King and his Children. Upon which some Members upbraided him with his Amours, and several spoke sharply against him, so he was committed to the Tower, but soon after releas'd, and re-admitted to his Seat in Parliament. However an Ordinance pass'd to restrain the Licence of the Press, by which the following Licensers were appointed in the several Faculties.

Licensers of the Press. For Books of Divinity. Mr. Thomas Gataker, Mr. John Downham, Mr. Callibut Downing, Dr. Thomas Temple, Mr. Joseph Caryl, Mr. Edmund Calamy, Mr. ——— Carter of Yorkshire, Mr. Charles Herle, Mr. James Cranford, Mr. Obadiah Sedgwick, Mr. ——— Batchelor, Mr. John Ellis jun.

For Law Books. Sir John Bramston, Mr. Serjeant Rolls, Mr. Serjeant Pbesant, Mr. Serjeant Fermine.

For Physick and Surgery. The President and Censors of the College of Physicians.

For Civil and Canon Law. Sir Nathaniel Brent, or any three Doctors of the Civil Law.

For Heraldry. One of the three Heralds at Arms.

For Philosophy, History, Poetry, Morality and Arts.

Sir Nathaniel Brent, Mr. Langley School-master of Paul's, Mr. Farnaby.

Assembly of Divines. An Ordinance pass'd the 12th of June, for calling an Assembly of Learned and Godly Divines, and others, to be consulted with by the Parliament for the settling of the Government and Liturgy of the Church of England, and for the vindicating and clearing of the said Church from false Aspersions and Interpretations. This Synod consisted of Lay-Members as well as

Clergy, as will be seen by the following List of some of both: Algernoon Earl of Northumberland, William Earl of Bedford, Philip Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Salisbury, Edward Earl of Manchester, James Lord Viscount Say and Sele, Edward Lord Conway, Philip Lord Wharton, Edward Lord Howard of Escreeke, Sir Henry Vane sen. Sir Benjamin Rudyard, Sir Thomas Barrington, Sir Henry Vane jun. Sir John Clotworthby, John Selden, Esq; Bulstrode Whitlocke, Esq; John Maynard, Esq; William Wheeler, Esq; Walter Young, Esq; Humphrey Salwey, Esq; Oliver St. John, Esq; Edmund Prideaux, Esq; Francis Rous, Esq; John White, Esq; John Glyn, Esq; John Pym, Esq;

Here are the greatest Names in England, Lords and Commons; now let us see what Divines there were: Dr. William Twisse, Dr. Thomas Wincop, Dr. Richard Love, Dr. Brocket P. 338. Smith, Dr. Cornelius Burges, Dr. Anthony Tuckney, Dr. Callibut Downing, Dr. Edmund Stanton, Dr. Thomas Temple, Dr. William Spurstow, Dr. William Gouge, Dr. Lazarus Seaman, Dr. Henry Wilkinson, Dr. Francis Cheyney, Dr. Humphrey Chambers, Dr. Joshua Hoyle, Dr. Peter Smith, Dr. John Arrowsmith, Dr. John Lightfoot, Dr. Edward Reynolds, Dr. John Conant, Dr. Christopher Pashley, Edmund Calamy, B. D. Herbert Palmer, B. D. Thomas Whitaker, B. D. Oliver Bowles, B. D. Robert Harris, B. D. Henry Hall, B. D. Thomas Hill, B. D. George Walker, B. D. William Mew, B. D. Thomas Valentine, B. D. Robert Crofs, B. D. Thomas Gataker, B. D.

I mention no more of the 120 Divines, for these eminent Names will be sufficient to prove that human Nature is not capable of a greater Frailty than this Asperion of the Earl of Clarendon's: Some of them were INFAMOUS in their Lives and Conversations, and most of them of very MEAN PARTS, if not of scandalous Ignorance, and of no other Reputation than of Malice to the Church. An Author capable of saying that, one may modestly say, is incapable of writing a true History. Dr. Calamy reflects upon it very justly: "This is a very heavy Charge upon such a Body of Men as they were. "Tho' my Lord Clarendon was undoubtedly a very great Man, yet this Censure won't recommend his History to Posterity, who will be hard put to it to find Men of more exemplary Piety, and more eminent Ministerial Abilities among their Progenitors in any Age, than those were whom he endeavours at any rate to expose. Who can give Credit to him as an Historian, who shall represent such Men as Dr. Twisse, Bishop Reynolds, Dr. Arrowsmith, Dr. Tuckney, Dr. Lightfoot, Mr. Gataker, &c. as Men of scandalous Ignorance," I am glad this groundless Reflection, so defil'd with Scandal, drop'd from the Pen of the Historian, it being a strong Confirmation of the Liberty he took in the abusive Part of his Characters in other Places, and having given Mr. Echard himself an Opportunity to own he is asham'd of it, the Lord Clarendon perhaps is too severe. Every one of the Assembly-Men had four Shillings a Day allow'd for their Subsistence in London. When they met first July 1. Dr. Twisse preach'd the Sermon, and was chosen Prolocutor. He was look'd upon as a Divine the most able in Controversy of any of his Time. Mr. Roborough and Mr. Adoniram Byfield were appointed Scribes and Notaries, and the good Success of the Synod was pray'd for by the City Ministers. Their Place of Meeting was the Jerusalem Chamber

A. D. Chamber in the Deans Lodgings, Westminster, 1643. and one of their first publick Acts was a Petition to both Houses for a Fast, to which the Parliament consented, and Mr. Bowles and Mr. Newcomen preach'd before them: The King publish'd a Proclamation to countermand their Meeting, which had no other Effect, than to keep out Dr. Holdsworth, Dr. Hammond, Archbishop Usher, Bishop Brownrigg, Bishop Westfield, Bishop Prideaux, Dr. Sanderfon, Dr. Hacket, all excellent Men, and their Absence was a great Loss to the Assembly. Those who sat did not answer the general Expectation of the People. Dr. Calamy tells us, "They met with many Difficulties. They were not only embarrass'd by the Dissenting Brethren, but by the learned Mr. Selden, who often employed his uncommon Learning rather to perplex than clear Matters that came before them." At which Mr. Archdeacon rejoices extremely. After the Fast was solemniz'd the Synod wrote Letters to the Reform'd Churches abroad, wherein speaking of their Desire for a farther Reformation in England, and the War that was rais'd to prevent it; they say, We doubt not but the said Reports of the Miseries under which the Church and Kingdom of England do bleed, and wherewith we are all ready to be swallow'd up, the Cup which the Righteous Lord hath given us to drink, is long since come to your Ears, and it is probable that the same Instruments of Satan and Antichrist have endeavoured by their Emissaries to present us as Black as may be amongst your selves, who by Falshood and Lies endeavour every where to put fair Glosses upon their own bloody Design. The History of the Rebellion is an intire Collection of those Glosses. And to reproach our Struglings after a more thorough Reformation of Religion in the Church of England, according to the Word of God, and our just Defence of our Lives, Liberties and Religion, against their own cruel and unjust Violences. Again, How great a Hand this treacherous and bloody Generation amongst us have long had in the Miseries of other Reform'd Churches, in the Destruction of the Palatinate, and in the Betraying and Loss of Rochelle; and how by seeming Overtures of Embassies and Treaties for their Relief, they have fomented, combin'd and increas'd their Calamities, is so well known by you all, and miserably felt by some of your selves, that we need not speak any Thing of them; and we suppose their inveterate Hatred against you all is sufficiently manifested, in that Multitudes of them have refus'd to acknowledge any of you for Churches of Christ, because you are not Prelatical, and thereby, as they conceive, want a lawful Vocation of Ministers, &c. The Lord Clarendon particularly refus'd to acknowledge the French Protestants to be a Church, and was one of the Counsellors who dissuaded King Charles the Second from going to the Reform'd Church at Charenton when he was in France. These Letters were address'd to The Reverend and Learned Pastors and Elders of the Classes and Churches of the Province of Zealand, our much honoured Brethren. The same to those of Holland, East Holland, Guelderland, Overysse, Utrecht, Friesland and Groningen. To the Reverend and Learned Pastors and Elders of the Church in the City and Republick of Geneva, our much honoured Brethren. The same to the Churches of Bern, Zurich, Basil, Schaffhausen. To the Reverend and Learned Pastors and Elders of the Church at Paris, our much honoured Brethren. To the Reverend and Learned Pastors and Elders of the Classes and

Their Letter to the Reform'd Churches.

A. D. Churches of Hesse, our much honoured Brethren. The same to those of Anhalt. And 1643. lastly, To the Reverend and Learned Pastors and Elders of the Churches of Hanaw, our most honoured Brethren. In these populous and potent Republicks and Principalities, there may by a modest Computation be about seven Millions of Souls. The Presbyterians of Bohemia, Transylvania, Poland, Silesia, and Austria, and other Protestant Principalities and Cities of Germany were not written to. And the whole Body of the Presbyterians in England, Scotland, Ireland, which at that Time was the Generality of the British Nation, or at least was pretended so to be, even according to Echard, are not number'd. All these Nations in Mr. Archdeacon's Opinion, are Schismatical, and only those of the Church of England, who thought and said as Laud did, Orthodox, though they were not one in Twenty of those Bodies of People. He tells us further, the King publish'd a Collection of seven Petitions to the Parliament, sign'd by 482 Lords and Knights, 1740 Esquires and Gentry, all of Note, 631 Doctors and Divines, I wonder they were not 6000, and no less than 44599 Freeholders of Name and Note, for the Preservation of Bishops and the Common Prayer. This is extremely diverting, for the Falsity of it stands in the Front. He owns there were but seven Petitions, and we will suppose they came from seven of the largest Counties in England. There must then be to every one of these Counties 70 Lords and Knights, 250 Esquires and Gentlemen, and 6000 Freeholders, all Men of good Name and Note, and not one Presbyterian among them. I doubt not the Reader will remember this, I was drawn into the Digression by the Simplicity of the Calculation.

After some Time of Sitting the Assembly of Divines presented to the Parliament a Confession of Faith, a larger and shorter Catechism, a Directory for the publick Worship, &c. of which some further mention will be made. The Annotations on the Bible ascrib'd to this Synod are not their Work, but some of their Members assisted in it, as Dr. Gouge, Dr. Reynolds, and the very Learned Gataker, who, says Dr. Calamy, is exceeded by no Commentator antient or modern.

After the taking of Bristol, and his Majesty's King's other Successes in the West, there were two Declarations publish'd at Oxford, A Form of Prayer on and for a Thanksgiving, and a Declaration address'd to all his loving Subjects. There was also a Form of Prayer for the Victory in the North, I suppose at Atherton Moor, without taking any Notice of the Rout at Horncastle, and near Gainsborough, of the Loss of Lincoln and Lynne, and of the Marquis of Newcastle's being driven off from Hull. Having spoken in their Form of Prayer of the notable Victory over the Rebels in the North, for they call Names in their Prayers, they say, O Lord; though our Sins cry loud hear them not, but look to the RIGHTEOUSNESS of our CAUSE, see the Seamless Coat of thy Son torn, the Throne of thine Anointed trampled upon, thy Church invaded by Sacrilege, and thy People miserably deceiv'd with Lies. It is not to be repeated. Paganisme has nothing so profane. See it, O God, as see it thou dost, and vindicate what thou seest upon the Heads of those who lead these Wretches. They call Names again, and the same Temper, the same Humility and Sincerity, are in all their Thanksgivings. The Declaration, if you can believe the Archdeacon, was much magnify'd as a most gracious and undeniable Instance of his Majesty's Clemency and Justice, wherein he express'd

A. D. 1643. press'd himself an Indulgent Father to the most Disobedient Children. We shall see that presently. He is pleas'd to leave the World to judge, Whether those Men who are profess'd Enemies to the Establish'd Church, who persecute the Learned, Orthodox Ministers, who vilify the Common Prayer, can be good Protestants; and whether they ought to suffer their Country to be wasted and ruin'd by the Malice and Cunning of those State Impostors, who under Pretence of Reformation would introduce whatever is Monstrous and Unnatural both in Religion and Policy, and therefore he requires Money, Plate, Men, Arms and Horse, which may establish a firm Peace. I have already hinted, that it is very easy to distinguish the Sophistry from the Argument in these Papers. Is any Thing more natural to Mankind than the Desire of Liberty? Is any Thing more monstrous than Tyranny and Idolatry? As to Malice, Cunning, State Impostors, and the like, they are Words to which no Ideas are annex'd, for we can have no Conception of the Malice of a Parliament, the Cunning of a Parliament, the Imposture of a Parliament. One cannot suppose that these Papers were read any where, but in the King's Quarters, and where he could take the Money if it was not given him. The Archdeacon, who is the constant Teller in both Houses of Parliament, assures us, there were but five Peers in the Upper House who had any Inclination to continue the War. There was not one Lord nor Commoner at that Time, who was not for Peace on Terms of Security against future Oppression. The Lords drew up Propositions which were very secure and good Grounds to treat upon, To Disband both Armies, to settle Religion by a Synod, and the Militia by a Bill, to the Satisfaction of King and Parliament, to punish Delinquents, and pass a general Pardon. The Commons were not so forward to treat as the Lords. But after a VAST Debate, says Mr. Archdeacon, who is a fine Linguist, it was carry'd by 29 Votes. The Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, petition'd against the Treaty, and express'd themselves so zealously for a vigorous Prosecution of the War, that the House of Commons were inspir'd with the same Zeal, gave the City Thanks for their Petition, Advice and Courage, and rejected the Propositions. The sober Part of the City, according to Echard, discover'd great Aversion to this Petition, and to prove it, he brings out his sober People, the Wives of the most substantial Citizens gather'd together in a tumultuous Manner, and in the same Manner they ran to the Parliament House, crying out in the Sobriety of their Spirits, Peace, Peace. A very good Word in its right Construction; but when by Peace is only meant the Carrying on of wicked Designs without Opposition, it is the worst one can make use of. On the Change of the Ministry in the Days of Sacheverel and Harley, the Cry was Peace, Peace; and what was the wicked Design, but to break the Grand Alliance, to restore the exorbitant Power of France, to bring in the Pretender, and introduce Popery and Slavery? And what did these sober Women mean by bawling out Peace, Peace, at this Juncture, but to restore the King to the Exercise of that absolute Power to which he laid Claim before the Parliament met, and which is still meant by the LAW, the LAWS OF THE LAND, THE KNOWN LAWS, &c. in Proclamations, Declarations, Messages and Answers. These sober, substantial Gentlewomen cry'd out also, Give us the TRAYTORS that we may tear them to Pieces. Give us that Dog PYM. It is really true, the Reverend Historian does say,

A. D. 1643. They were of the sober Party, and the Wives of the most wealthy Citizens, but after the firing of some Powder, and a little Drubbing from the Soldiers, they grew still soberer, and all that had Houses to go to return'd home. These Ladies made the greatest Army that ever appear'd in the City on that Side, which Mr. Archdeacon has happily espous'd.

Though his Account of the Siege of Gloucester is as frail as his other Accounts, yet there being some pleasant Things in it they must not escape us, after we have told the Fact as it was. On the 10th of August his Majesty having march'd from Oxford to Bristol came back and fac'd Gloucester with 6000 Horse and Foot in Tredworth Field, about a Quarter of a Mile off the Town, and about 2000 more fac'd it in Walham within Cannon Shot, the Main of the Army not being yet come up. His Majesty sent two Heralds at Arms with a Summons, promising to pardon the Citizens and the Soldiers, if they would submit, and threatening all Calamities and Miseries if they would not. Colonel Maffey the Governor, with the Consent of the Mayor and Aldermen, return'd the following Answer:

WE the Inhabitants, Magistrates, Officers and Soldiers, within this Garrison of Gloucester, return our humble Answer, that we do keep this City according to our Oath and Allegiance to, and for the Use of his Majesty and his Royal Posterity, and do accordingly conceive our selves wholly bound to obey the Commands of his Majesty, signify'd by both Houses of Parliament, and are resolv'd so by God's Help to keep this City accordingly. Sign'd,

This Answer was sent by Major Pudsey and one Citizen, who presented it to the King, and he receiv'd it without expressing either Choler or Indignation, though he seem'd to wonder at their great Confidence, and from what Hope of Relief it should proceed, using these Words before the Messengers, Waller is extinct, and Essex cannot come. But Essex did come, and Waller was so far from being extinct, that he extinguish'd the King's Army at Alresford in Hampshire some Months after. The Pleasantry of Echard's Story is this: There return'd two Citizens from the Town with lean, pale and ugly Visages, and in a Garb so strange and unusual that at once gave Mirth to the most severe Countenances. A Flourish of the Lord Clarendon's. And Sadness to the most chearful Hearts. These without any Marks of Duty or good Manners, in a pert, sprill, fearless Tone, said, They brought an Answer from the godly City of Gloucester. Which is false, the Word Godly being not once named in their Answer. Major Pudsey who brought it, behav'd very gallantly in this Siege, and shew'd it was much easier to lampoon him than to beat him. He proceeds, this Indignity prompted Resolutions of Revenge, which no doubt the Cavaliers would have taken if they could. It was on the other Side resolv'd by the Governor and Council of War, that the whole Suburbs of the City, which were a third Part of it, should be demolish'd, and 241 Houses were accordingly burnt, pull'd down, and utterly destroy'd, besides Barns, Stables, Out-houses, in in all to the Value of 26000 Pounds, which was done the Night before the Cavaliers began their Attacks. The King's head Quarters were at Matson on the East Side of the Town. Col. Maffey order'd the Cannon on the Pen at Westgate to fire on the Body of Horse in Walbam, and oblig'd them to retire with Loss. Lieutenant-Colonel Matthews, Capt. White, Capt. Blunt, Capt. Pury the younger, and Capt. Lieutenant Harcus, made a Sally at the North-gate, fell upon a Party at Watton, and brought 10 Prisoners into the Town. Soon after Capt. Nelmes sally'd out at the same Gate towards Burnwood, and did some Execution; which Sallies gave the Besiegers to understand, that they were not like to get Possession of the Town easily. As soon as the Army began their Intrenchments, the Townswomen and Maids wrought all that Afternoon in the Little Mead, fetching in Turf for repairing the Works in Sight of the King's Horse. The Besieg'd, for Want of Men, but 1400 in all to guard the City it self, were forc'd to quit their Out-Works, at the Wine Tard and Two Sconces in the Isle of Alney. The Royalists cut off the Pipes that convey'd the Water from Robin Hood's Hill to the City Conduits, and diverted the Water which drove the Corn-Mill. The Citizens contented themselves with Pump and Severn Water, and us'd Horse-Mills for their Corn. Sir William Vavasor, a bigotted Papist, lay with his Welch Forces on the West Side, and intending to join with others coming from Worcester, he drew to the North Side. On the South lay Ruthen Earl of Brentford, the King's General, shelter'd from the Shot of the Town by a Rising Ground. On the East Side Sir Jacob Ashley was quarter'd with a strong Brigade, and was shot in the Arm in one of the first Skirmishes. Many of the King's Commanders were Officers of the greatest Skill and Experience, and his Army was encreas'd, by the Arrival of two Regiments out of Ireland, commanded by Col. Myn and Sir William St. Leger. These Regiments had been rais'd by the Parliament for the War against the bloody Irish Rebels; but now his Majesty recall'd the English Troops in that Service to employ them against his Protestant Subjects in England. The King's Officers and Engineers made their Approaches and plac'd their Batteries with as much Advantage as was possible; nor were the Besieg'd behind-hand in Courage and Dexterity, as appear'd in their Defences and frequent Sallies, which kept the Cavaliers waking by continual Alarms, and wasted and weary'd them. On the 12th of August Capt. Harcus sally'd out thro' a Door made for that Purpose in a Brick-House adjoining to the Town-Wall, on the South-East Part, and making a Bridge of Ladders over the Mote, fell suddenly into the Besiegers Trenches in Gawdy Green, beat them out, took some Prisoners and Arms, with several of their Tools, and retreated without Loss. The same Day Capt. Gray with 150 Musketeers sally'd over the Works upon the Worcester Forces at Kingsholm, march'd up to their Main Guard and burnt it, kill'd Capt. Runney and nine Soldiers, took five Prisoners and some Arms, and retreated without Loss. The Besiegers planted two great Culverins of between 15 and 16 Pound Ball at the East Side, batter'd the Town-Wall, and shot several Shells into the Town without doing any Execution. The Besieg'd lin'd their Walls from the South-gate to the East-gate, and the biggest Mortar-Piece which the Besiegers had, said to be the biggest in England, broke at the first Discharge. On Sunday August the 13th they plant'd three Pieces of Ordnance on their Battery at Gawdy Green; the Ball 15, 18, and 23 Pounders, from whence they fir'd briskly all that and the next Day; but as fast as any Breaches were made, they were repair'd with Wool-Sacks and Earth-Baskets. On Tuesday the 15th of August, upon Intelligence that the Enemy was drawing Ordnance to Kingsholm, the Governor sent out 150 Musketeers under the Command of Capt. Mallerie, who kill'd some Men, took some Prisoners, and fir'd the Cavaliers Quarters at the Margrets. The same Day Capt. Harcus, a very brave Officer, was slain as he was too venturously looking to see what Execution a Granado had done which he had flung into the Enemy's Trenches. On the 16th of August Capt. Crisp sally'd with 150 Musketeers at the New Port, fell on the Royalists in their Trenches, kill'd above 100 of them, wounded many, drove them out of their Works, took their Spades, Shovels and Arms, and retreated without Loss. This Rushw. Day the King left the Siege and went to Oxford. The next Day several Granades were shot into the Town, some of which fell upon Houses. One in the open Street near South-gate, but a Woman coming by with a Pail of Water, threw the Water upon it, and so extinguish'd the Fusee, that it did not break, but was taken up whole, and weigh'd 60 Pound. August the 18th the Besiegers having planted four Pieces of Ordnance against the Acungate and Sconces adjoining, a Party of 400 Men, under the Command of Major Pudsey, Capt. Gray, Capt. Falkner, and Capt. Maffey, sally'd at the North-gate, having one Weaver, a stout Fellow in Capt. Pury junior's Company, for their Guide. Major Pudsey sent Lieutenant Pincock with about 50 Musketeers over the Works, to give the Enemy a divertive Alarm by advancing up towards the Cannon. In the mean Time the Major got behind their Cannon and Breast-works, fell upon their Main Guard, kill'd two Cannoneers, several Officers and Soldiers, took a Lieutenant Prisoner, nail'd their Cannon, and retreated with the Loss of two Men. This is the Earl of Clarendon's lean, pale, ugly visag'd Man, with a shrill Voice and old-fashion'd Clothes. Capt. Basset took Lieutenant Tipper Prisoner, and this Day his Majesty return'd from Oxford, where he had been to make up some Differences which had happen'd there in his Absence. Saturday the 19th of August the Besiegers, besides their 3 Pieces of Ordnance at Gawdy Green, having now planted three more on the East Side of the Fryars Orchard near Rignal Stile, within less than Pistol-shot of the Town-Wall, and two more on another Battery near the East-gate, began to batter most furiously on both Sides of the Corner of the Wall next Rignal Stile, making above 150 Great Shot upon it, and threw several Shells into the Town, which only kill'd one Man and a Maid. A Shell fell upon Mr. Hartway's House, broke thro' his Chamber over the Kitchen, and a Piece of it fell into the Kitchen Chimney, where three Women were sitting, but neither of them receiv'd any Hurt. A few Houses were somewhat damag'd by the Granades. On the 20th of August one Hatton a Cannoneer deserted the Garrison, and went off to the Enemy, a thing which did not often happen. Two Sallies were made the same Day; one of 200 Men under Capt. Stevenson and Capt. Moore, in which by Accident 40 Musketeers of the Garrison fell in with three Times the Number of the King's Forces, slew several of them, took Lieutenant Anderson and Lieutenant Trapps Prisoners, and drove them back to a strong Body of their Forces, after which they made their Retreat with the Loss of two or three Men only. The other Party that

D. 1643. that fully'd was commanded by Capt. Blunt and Capt. White, who pass'd down Severne by Boat, and then march'd up to the Enemy's Quarters in Severne-street; beat them out of a Redoubt there, kill'd Major Wells who commanded the Guard, some Soldiers; and retreated with Loss. Other Parties made Sallies the three following Days only to annoy the Enemy, without coming to any Engagement. On Thursday the 24th of August, upon a Letter sent into the Town that Mr. Bell of Sanctiburgh and Mr. Hill of Tewksbury, both Lawyers, had something of Importance to communicate, they were admitted within the Drawbridge at North-gate; their Business was to represent to the Town the great Strength that was against them, the Impossibility of Relief, the Miseries the Country endur'd by Reason of their Obstinacy, and therefore to perswade them to yield while good Terms were to be had. The Governor and Magistrates shew'd they were Men of Temper and Discretion, in suffering these two officious Petitioners to harangue them thus, and not throwing them over the Walls to those that sent them. They gave them a short Answer in the Negative, and they return'd like Fools as they came. The same Day the Besiegers made several Shot with two Pieces of Ordnance newly planted at Lanthony. One Bullet, a 20 Pounder, came thro' a Chamber of the Crown Inn, carry'd away a Bolster before it into a Window, and there slept in it. The Cavaliers also shot red hot Ball into the Town, but did little Damage. It rain'd this Day into their Trenches, which much annoy'd them. At Night the Besieg'd discover'd a Fire upon Wainload's Hill, which gave them Encouragement, they having appointed a Person whom they had sent out in Time for that Purpose, to signify to them by making a Fire there, if he heard of any Relief coming. The Royalists observ'd it, and lest the Country should do so too, and their Soldiers be discourag'd, they gave out it was a Stratagem of their own to tempt the Besieg'd into some Ambuscades. On the 25th of August the Besiegers, besides many Granades and great Stones from their Mortar-Pieces, shot above 20 fiery red hot Iron Bullets from 18 to 22 Pound Weight, which in the Night appear'd in the Air like what we call Shooting Stars. The Besieg'd put out Lights on the College Tower to give Notice abroad of their holding out, which extremely vext the Enemy, and they levell'd their Shot at the Tower to destroy them. Capt. Pury, who had the Care of setting up those Lights, looking towards Lanthony, from whence the fiery Balls came, was in great Danger from their Shot, but he continu'd with his burning Links, and receiv'd no Hurt. On the 26th and 27th of August the Besiegers wrought hard in filling up the City Moat with Faggots, making a Gallery over the Head of their Trench to save themselves from the Fire of the Town. They shot at the Besieg'd from this Work, but did them little or no Harm. The Besiegers on the 28th of August sunk a Mine under East-gate, and the Besieg'd countermin'd till they came to Springs, when they left off, supposing the Enemy would be forc'd to do the like. The next Day they undermin'd at the East Side of Fryars Orchard, to plant a Piece of Ordnance at the Bottom of the City Wall, and batter the Flank of the Enemy's Gallery, which they did with good Effect. They had Intelligence that Night from Warwick that the Earl of Essex and Sir William Waller were advancing to relieve them. On the two last Days the Besieg'd turn'd out their Cattle to graze in the Little Mead, guarded by some Musketeers, and took them in at Night. The Besiegers attempted to take them away, but were

repuls'd. While the intrepid Massey, Governor of Gloucester, the valiant Mayor, Major Ferrer, the Magistrates, Officers, Soldiers and Townsmen, were thus resolutely defending the City, against the fierce and fiery Assaults of the Cavaliers, the Mace-Bearer and other fit Instruments for such a villainous Business conspir'd to kill the Governor, the Mayor, Chief Officers and Magistrates, and betray the Town to the King, but the Conspiracy was discover'd, and the Conspirators hang'd. The very learned and worthy Mr. Chillingworth was prevail'd upon to assist at this Siege, for which he invented certain Engines after the manner of the Roman Testudines cum Pluteis, with which the Besiegers intended to assault the City between the South and West Gate: They ran upon Cart Wheels with a Blind of Planks Musket Proof, and Holes for four Musketeers to fire out at, plac'd upon the Axle Tree to defend the Musketeers, and those who thrust the Engine forwards, with a Bridge before it. The Wheels were to fall into the Ditch, and the End of the Bridge to rest upon the Town's Breast Works. Thus were several compleat Bridges got ready to enter the City; but the Besieg'd, to prevent it, intended to have made another Ditch out of their Works, so that the Wheels falling thereon, the Bridge would have fallen short, off the Breast Work into the West Moat, whereby Mr. Chillingworth's learned Design would have been entirely frustrated. It is great Pity to find the Name of so excellent a Person as Mr. Chillingworth among the Besiegers of Gloucester, not only on Account of his Vocation, which was to preach Piety, Purity and Peace, but on the Score of his Merit, his vast Learning and good Sense, which were strangely corrupted with false Notions of unlimited Obedience to unlimited Power. Davenant the Poet was also at this Siege, and receiv'd here the Honour of Knighthood, which if he deserv'd no more for his Chivalry than he did for his Poetry, was a Dubbing thrown away. August the 30th the Garrison kept a Fast, and had two Sermons without any Disturbance, only a Musket-Ball enter'd the Church, but did no Hurt. The next Day three Soldiers of Major Ferrer's Company crept along the Severn Bank, gave the Enemy an Alarm, and held them in Play almost an Hour. The Truth is, never were there more insolent Fellows than the Besieged in Gloucester. They seem'd to War in Sport, and to treat the Besiegers with the utmost Contempt, tho' a Royal Army, commanded by the King in Person, surrounded them. On the 1st of September some of the Besieg'd crept out at a Hole made in the Dungeon at the East-gate, and came softly to the Mouth of the Enemy's Mine, where one John Burnwood took a Board aside which cover'd it, and fir'd, and flung a Shell into the Mine among the Cavaliers, who run out of it, crying, Arms, Arms. Burnwood and his Companions shooting at them as they were running, four of them were kill'd, and the Men of Gloucester return'd the same Way they came. The next Day, September 2, both Sides were very active, the Besiegers playing hard upon the Wall and the South Gate, and the Besieg'd firing as briskly into their Trenches. A Party of Welsh Men came up as far as the Town Ham, where they plac'd themselves in a Ditch, and very valiantly fir'd upon some Maids and Workmen, who were fetching Turf out of the Little Mead, but the Gun at the Pen soon frighted them away, though it must be said for them, that no other Cavalier Soldiers came nearer the Town than those Welsh Men. The Springs not hindering the Mine at the East Gate, the Besieg'd renew'd

A. D. 1643. renew'd their Countermine, and as they were at Church, Sunday, Sept. 3d, they were inform'd the Besiegers had planted store of Cannon Baskets at the East Gate, within less than half Musket Shot, and 'twas believ'd intended a Battery there upon the Springing of their Mine. The Minister dismiss'd the Congregation without a Sermon. They all fell to Work, Lining the Houses over the East Gate, and making a strong Breast-work cross East Gate Street, but it was only a Cavalier Flourish. A Party of Horse came almost within Musket Shot, but would not venture nearer. A Gun was fir'd among them from Captain Pury the Elder's Sconce, and a white Horse was seen to drop, the rest fled. This Afternoon a Paper was shot upon an Arrow into the City, on which was these Words written, You are to understand that your God Waller hath forsaken you, and hath retired himself to the Tower of London. Essex is beaten like a Dog. Yield to the King's Mercy in Time, otherwise, if we enter per Force, no Quarter for such obstinate Traytors and Rogues. This historical Billet has the same Spirit of Truth and Charity as their other Histories have. One of the Townsmen return'd an Answer in honest, though bald Rhime.

*Waller's no God of ours, base Rogues, ye Lie,
Our God survives from all Eternity.*

The Siege of Gloucester rais'd. On Monday, Sept. 4th, the Besieged observed two Fires on Wainload Hill, which they answer'd with Lights from the College Tower, blazing like so many Comets over the Royal Army, who began to discover their Intentions of raising the Siege. September the 5th was appointed for a publick Fast in the Town, to be kept by such as might be spar'd from Labour, and the Townsmen could now perceive the Besiegers were marching off as fast as they could. Their Carriages from Lanthony being drawn up Tredworth Field, and their Horse and Foot marching after, their Rear Guard fir'd their Huts, and their Trenches were abandon'd. The Townsmen and Soldiers venturing out, burnt their Gallery and Cannon Baskets, and brought in Mr. Chillingsworth's Roman Engines. Thus, after the King had lain 26 Days before the City of Gloucester he drew off, and made Room for the Earl of Essex to enter, which he did the 8th of September with a strong Body of the Parliament's Army, and was receiv'd with as much Joy as one can imagine fill'd the Minds of People deliver'd from a revengeful and cruel Enemy. I have been more particular in this Siege than I shall be in any other, for that it was carry'd on by his Majesty in Person, and gave a Turn to his Affairs, which was not so soon expected by the Parliament, then in their lowest Condition during the whole War. It is said the Queen hurry'd him on to this Expedition, which had the Success of her other Counsels. He lost 1000 Men before this City. The Loss on the Parliament's Side was inconsiderable, not above 50 kill'd and taken. The Lord General Essex began his March the 25th of August from Colnbrooke, to relieve Gloucester. Prince Rupert, with the greatest Part of the King's Horse drew off to oppose him. About Bicester 400 of his Men fac'd a Part of the Parliament's Army and skirmish'd, but were soon driven away. Scarce a Day past but there were some such Skirmishes, Prince Rupert very narrowly watching the Earl of Essex's Motions to take Advantage of them. On the 4th of September a very smart Encounter happen'd near Stow in the Wold, where Prince Rupert attack'd him with 4000 Horse, but could make nothing of it, and the News of his being repuls'd reach'd Gloucester. On the 5th Essex advanc'd to Presbury Hill, where the Royal Army could see him, and they immediately began to make Way for him. He lay two Nights only in Gloucester, and having furnish'd it with all Neccessaries he march'd to Levensbury, near which he made a Bridge over the Severne, as if he design'd for Worcester, and on a sudden turn'd back upon Cirencester, where the Enemy had left two Regiments with most of their Stores, Ammunition and Provisions, which were intended for an Army to be rais'd in Kent by Sir Nicholas Crisp, for which the Parson of Igham was preparing the Way by the Rebellion he began there, as is before mention'd. The Lord General enter'd Cirencester about one a Clock in the Morning, surpriz'd the two Regiments that were posted there, drove Sir Nicholas Crisp and Colonel Spencer out of the Town, took 40 Loads of Provision, 6 Standards, 300 Soldiers, and 400 Horses, but did not leave behind him those Marks of Blood, Rapine and Destruction, which Prince Rupert left after he had taken the Place from the Parliament.

There are abundance of fine Schemes in the History of the Rebellion, to scatter all the Parliament's Armies, break up the Parliament, and shut the Doors of the two Houses. Mr. Echard repeats them very gravely, as if there really had been something in them. Thus the Earl of Newcastle is to enter Whitechapell, while the King enters Piccadilly, and being join'd at the Royal Exchange to do what they would with the City of London, and if this had been done the King would not have met with that Disgrace before Gloucester. Of such Matter are their excellent Histories made up. From Cirencester the Earl of Essex march'd to Cricklade and Swinden, and the Van of his Army being almost over Awburn Chace, between Marlborough and Hungerford, a strong Body of the King's Horse fell upon their Rear Guard and routed them, forcing them to retire in Disorder to the main Body, where they were again drawn up in Order, but the King's Horse once more advancing, put their Enemies again into Confusion, till Sir Philip Stapleton came in with fresh Forces and stop't them in their Career. Both Sides behav'd in this Engagement with true English Valour, which could not have been worse employed than in the Slaughter of English Men. On the King's Side was kill'd the Marquis de Viewville, who contrary to the Law of Nations, drew his Sword against the Parliament, to whom he came in an Embassy with the Prince of Har-court, Ambassador of France, to mediate a Peace between the King and the two Houses. This Breach of the Law of Nations is highly commended by Mr. Archdeacon, at the Expence of two or three Falsities, for he did not attend the Queen out of Holland, he was not taken Prisoner, he was not kill'd in cold Blood. All which that Reverend Historian plainly asserts. Quite contrary to which, he came over with the Ambassador of France, he wounded Colonel Kilson in the Fight, and pursuing him with too much Obstinacy was himself kill'd by him. The Lord Clarendon does not say he was kill'd in cold Blood. And Echard takes it from Salmonet a French Papist, and Orleans a French Jesuit. My Author is a French Man too, but the Archdeacon may object against his Authority because he was a Protestant. I have met with another Account of the Death of Viewville, differing a little from Larrey. Here the Marquis of Vieu-Parl ville was taken Prisoner, and had Quarter given him, but as he was marching away with the Officer that took him he suddenly drew out Larrey. If this is killing in cold Blood the popish Historians and Mr. Echard are in the Right. There were Three other French Men, all of the Ambassador's Train, in this Engagement, Chavre, Persan and Beaveais, and their Treachery was the Occasion of the Ambassador's Negotiation proving Abortive, for the Parliament resenting this Partiality would not hearken to his Proposals, which was signify'd to him by the Earls of Stamford and Salisbury. He excus'd it as an imprudent Action, which could not be imputed to him, and for which the three Gentlemen living had been sufficiently punish'd by the Death of one of their Companions. This gave no Satisfaction to the Parliament, and he was told in plain Terms, that they look'd upon him as no better than a Spy, and as one who design'd rather to foment the Troubles than appease them.

The Earl of Essex proceeding to Hungerford, carry'd with him the Corpse of the Marquis de Vieuville, but order'd it to be deliver'd to those the King sent for it, paying 500 Pounds to his Soldiers. He there surpriz'd a Troop of the King's Horse, and took up his Quarters in great Want of Provisions. His Carriages not being come up, and the Country about him so ill affected, occasion'd by the Neighbourhood to Oxford, that he could get nothing but by Compulsion. The whole Body of the King's Army had posted themselves off Newbury. On their right Hand they had the Advantage of the River Kennet, and on their left a Hill half a Mile from the Town, where they had planted their Ordnance, so that the Parliament's Forces had no Passage to them but what was expos'd to the Fire of their Cannon; however, the Earl of Essex finding his Soldiers were full of Mettle, and resolv'd to force their Way, would not balk them, but led them on in Person, and first charg'd the Enemy with his own Regiment, as we are inform'd by Whitlocke, but the Reverend Historian directly contrary to this assures us, The precipitate Courage of the King's young Officers compell'd him to fight. The Earl of Essex's Regiment, and the Lord Roberts's Brigade of Horse began the Battle about six a Clock in the Morning, Sept. 20th. It lasted with very hot Service till ten a Clock at Night. The Parliament's Forces beat the Enemy from all their Advantages, got the Hill from them, pursu'd them to Newbury, and out of the Town again, and though the King's Forces, especially the Horse, consisting mostly of Gentlemen, made a gallant Resistance, yet this Place being not proper for their Fight, they could not support their Foot, who were every where beaten, and in the Night the King drew off his Ordnance and march'd away, leaving the Earl of Essex entirely Master of the Field of Battle, which he kept that Night and part of the next Day. When Night drew on the Enemy both Horse and Foot stood in good Order on the farther Side of the Green where they fought, and the Earl of Essex expected another Engagement the next Day, but the King's Forces retreated by Night. The Parliament's had the Pillage of the Field. Both Parties perform'd with great Manhood and Animosity, particularly the King's Horse, who were however worsted. The Earls of Carnarvon and Sunderland, Colonel Morgan a Papist, who had rais'd a Regiment of Horse, Lieutenant Colonel Houghton, Major Eyre, Major Leak, Captain Constable, Captain Wolsole, Captain Clifton, Captain Singleton, Captain Whittingham, Captain Symcots, Captain Molinoux, the last Nine all Papists, were slain in the Fight. The Lord Viscount Falkland, Secretary of State, in the Morning of the Day of Battle call'd for a clean Shirt, and daily shifting not being then the Mode, he was ask'd the Reason of it. He reply'd, If I am kill'd in the Fight they shall not find my Body in foul Lin- land kill d.

nen. Being dissuaded by his Friends not to go to the Battle, as having no Call to it, his Office a Civil and not Military one, he said to them, I am weary of the Times, and believe I shall be out of it before Night. As indeed he was, being slain in the Fight. Whitlocke closes this Story with a just and modest Character of this noble Lord, His Death was much lamented by all that knew him or heard of him, being a Gentleman of great Parts, Ingenuity and Honour, Courteous and Just to All, and a passionate Promoter of all Endeavours of Peace between the King and Parliament. Echard would have us take his Word for it, that the Earl of Clarendon's Character of this Great and Good Man is written with the Majesty of an Historian. You will see how both the Earl and he understood the Majesty of History, by these few Words of this very Character concerning the Lord Falkland's Death; Had there been no other Brand upon this odious and accursed Civil War than that single Loss, it must be most Infamous and Execrable. Can any Thing be more Majestick, Odious, Accursed, Infamous and Execrable, in a Breath. It is most certain they neither of them knew better. Sometime before this Battle the King and Court being at Oxford, his Majesty and his Attendants drew the Sortes Virgilianas. It was then a Custom among the Learned, as it was among the Godly to dip for Texts of Scripture to be adapted to certain Purposes. The King's Sors Virgiliana was these Verses of the IVth Book of Virgil's Æneis.

*At Bello audacis populi vexatus & Armis, Finibus extorris, complexu avulsus Juli,
Auxilium imploret, videatq; indigna suorum
Funera: Nec, cum se sub leges pacis iniqua
Tradiderit, regno, aut optata luce fruatur:
Sed cadit ante diem, mediaque inhumatus arena.*

The King commanded Mr. Cowley to translate them, but did not let him know the Reason of it, and he did it thus:

*By a bold People's stubborn Arms oppress'd, Forc'd to forsake the Land which he possess'd,
Torn from his dearest Son, let him in vain
Beg Help, and see his Friends unjustly slain.
Let him to bold, unequal Terms submit,
In hopes to save his Crown, and lose both it
And Life at once. Untimely let him die,
And on an open Stage unbury'd lie.*

MS. ante
Warwick.

By Dryden more paraphrastically, and more elegantly.

*Yet let a Race untam'd, and haughty Foes,
His peaceful Entrance with dire Arms oppose,
Oppress'd with Numbers in th' unequal Field,
His Men discourag'd, and himself expell'd,
Let him for Succour sue from Place to Place,
Torn from his Subjects and his Son's Embrace,
First let him see his Friends in Battle slain,
And their untimely Fate lament in vain;
And when at length the cruel War shall cease,
On hard Conditions may he buy his Peace.
Nor let him then enjoy supream Command,
But fall untimely by some hostile Hand,
And lie unbury'd on the barren Sand.*

A. D. 1643. It is said King Charles seem'd concern'd at this Accident, and that the Lord Falkland observing it would likewise try his own Fortune in the same Manner, hoping he might fall upon some Passage that could have no Relation to his Case, and thereby divert the King's Thoughts from any Impression the other might have made upon him. But the Place Lord Falkland stumbled upon, was yet more suited to his Destiny than the other had been to the King's, being the following Expressions of Evander upon the untimely Death of his Son Pallas, as Dryden translates them :

*O Pallas ! Thou hast fail'd thy plighted Word,
To fight with Caution, and not tempt the Sword.
I warn'd thee, but in vain ; for well I knew What Perils youthful Ardour would pursue.
That boiling Blood would carry thee too far,
Young as thou wert to Dangers, raw to War.
O curst Essay of Arms ! disastrous Doom !
Prelude of bloody Field, and Fights to come.*

Æneis XI.

The Loss of Men was much greater on the King's side than on the Parliament's : 2000 Royalist were slain from the Time of Effex's Removal from Hungerford to the End of Newberry Fight. The Earl of Sunderland was not far from the King's Person when he was kill'd ; as was also Col. Constable, and a great Number of Officers. On the Parliament's side were slain 500. Col. Tucker, Lieutenant Colonel White of Effex's Regiment, and a Captain of Horse were the Chief. The City Auxiliaries were the hardest put to it, and distinguished themselves in this Battle : After which, Effex advanced towards Reading to refresh his Men, and no Enemy appeared till he came to Theale, 4 Miles from the Town, where Col. Harvie, a Scotchman, fell upon his Rear with a Party of the King's Horse, and a hot Skirmish ensued, in which 60 of Harvie's Men were slain, about 8 of the Parliament's, and the rest of that Party retreating, the Parliament Army marched on to Reading, without Interruption. When the Reader has gone through this History, will he not be surpriz'd to hear Eckard tell him the King had considerable Marks of Victory ; and the Lord Clarendon, to flee at the Parliament ; they made no Scruple to declare it a Victory. Sir Philip Warwick, who is by no means so florid, but every whit as faithful an Historian as the Earl of Clarendon, owns the King was worsted ; but his owning it does not signify much. The Defeat was too shameful and visible to be disputed. The Lords and Commons sent a Committee to their General at Reading, to complement him, and congratulate his great Successes. It must be own'd, that from his marching to relieve Gloucester, to his Arrival at Reading, not much above 20 Days, he had done Wonders, considering the Difficulties he had struggled with. His Army consisted chiefly of Militia, and besides was not so numerous as the King's, who were spirited with several late Successes. However he had obliged the King to raise the Siege of Gloucester. He had surpriz'd two Regiments, and a great Magazine at Cirencester. He had engaged the Royalists in several Actions, and in the last obtained a Victory over them : All which gave new Heart to the Parliament and their Well Wishers ; and the Condition of their Affairs grew daily better. The Lord General, with the Lord Gray, Sir Philip Stapleton and other principal Officers coming to London, were received with great Marks of Honour and Esteem. The House of Commons, with their Speaker, went to Effex's House to complement the General on his happy Success and safe Return, and caused their Acknowledgment of it to be enter'd into their Journal. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen waited upon him in their Scarlet Gowns, and paid their Compliments to him as the Protector and Defender of their Lives and Fortunes, their Wives and Children. Before this Issue of the Campaign, People were much terrify'd at the News of the Cavaliers frequent Successes, in the West especially, which the Royalists magnify'd beyond all Bounds of Modesty and Truth. Some great Persons were so weak as to desert the Parliament, when their Presence and Assistance were most wanted. The Earl of Portland, the Lord Lovelace, the Lord Conway were never much depended upon, and their Absence was not much lamented ; but the Earls of Bedford, Clare and Holland had express great Zeal and Alacrity in the Cause which the two Houses were engaged in ; and when it was known that they were in Oxford, it struck a Damp on the Minds of many good Englishmen, which however did not last long ; for those three Lords had then an Opportunity to see so much of the Conduct of the Court, that they were satisfy'd it was not mended by residing at Oxford, so they left the King's Party again and returned to the Parliament. It is pretended that the cold Reception they met with there was the Reason of their Return : But the Earl of Holland said, That after he heard of the Cessation with the bloody Irish Rebels, his Conscience would not give him Leave to stay any longer with them at Oxford.

As the King apply'd himself to the Papists in Scots. Ireland, so did the Parliament to the Presbyterians in Scotland, who being our Brethren as Protestants, were very fit to be enter'd into Friendship with. The two Houses had sent the Earl of Rutland, Sir Henry Vane, junior, Sir William Armine, Mr. Darley and Mr. Hatcher, with two Ministers, Mr. Marshall and Mr. Nye, to Edinburgh, to treat with the Scots for Assistance. That Nation were themselves alarm'd at the Strength of the Earl of Newcastle's malignant Army in the North, and wanted only the Forms to enter England with a stronger Army, and assist the Lord Fairfax. The Scots insisted upon abolishing of Episcopacy in this Kingdom, and that the Solemn League and Covenant should be taken here : To which both Houses agreed, and to advance 100,000 l. Sterling, for raising and maintaining 20,000 Scots, Horse and Foot, to carry on the War, to secure the Religion, Laws, Rights and Liberties of both Nations, and bring Delinquents to Justice. The Scots were to have a Committee at Westminster to act with a Committee of both Houses with equal Authority as to the Management of the War. Eckard is positive that they did not believe the Parliament would have swallowed the Covenant, because they knew that most of the Lords were against the Presbyterian Government ; whereas in Truth they did not, and could not know any such Thing, for the Proposal of taking it was no sooner made to both Houses than they both fell in with it more readily than with any other Ordinance which had yet past : And accordingly the Lords and Commons, and the Assembly of Divines took it with great Solemnity in St. Margaret's Church Westminster, on the 25th of September, a double Holy-day ; by the Earl of Effex's Return to London, and this religious Exercise, says Mr. Archdeacon with a Fleer, as he treats most Things that are really religious, and have not their very Essence in Form and Ceremony.

Here are 222 Members, whom for Estate the Earl of Clarendon assures us the King's Troop of Guards could buy. The King himself in all his Declarations upbraids them with the Paucity of their Number; whereas, allowing for Sickness and Absence, here is a very great Majority of the House of Commons, excluding the Deserters and other great Offenders who had been regularly expell'd. These all took the Covenant, which, says the Lord Clarendon, was illegal, wicked, and full of Perjury. And Mr. Archdeacon, who refines upon his Lordship, even in his Faults, adds, It shed more Blood than Henry VIII's six bloody Articles; it ruin'd Families infinitely beyond them; it destroy'd the Patrimony of the Church; and murder'd the King. I know very well the Respect that a Writer owes his Reader, and that he ought never to appear before him in Passion; but is it possible to write or read such Trash without Indignation? The Presbyterian Clergy, when the King was about to be try'd, protested against it, and urg'd the Obligation of this very Covenant, by which they were all sworn to preserve his Royal Person. Their Words are, It is contrary to the Solemn League and Covenant, from which Engagement we know not any Power on Earth able to absolve us. We will now see what there was in this Covenant, which the King calls seditious, and the Oxford Men damnable, and which has been call'd more Names in Pulpits and Colleges than the Ribaldry of Billingsgate can furnish one with.

The Preamble is the obligatory Part of the Oath, and it is then divided into six Articles.

The First is, That the Covenanters will sincerely, really and constantly, through the Grace of God, endeavour to preserve the Reformation of Religion in England and Ireland in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline and Government, according to the Word of God, and the best Examples of the Reform'd Churches.

This is what the Earl of Clarendon terms Wickedness and Perjury.

The Second Article is, That they will in like manner, without Respect of Persons, endeavour the Extirpation of Popery, of Archbishops, Bishops, Chancellors, Commissaries, and all other Ecclesiastical Officers depending on the Hierarchy, and of all Superstition, Heresy, Schism, Profaneness,

A. D. 1643.

A. D. 1643. faneness, and whatever shall be found to be contrary to sound Doctrine and the Power of Godliness. More Perjury and Wickedness, according to Lord Clarendon.

The Third Article is, That they will with the same Zeal and Constancy endeavour with their Estates and Lives mutually to preserve the Rights and Privileges of Parliaments, and the Liberties of the Kingdom, and to preserve and defend the King's Majesty's Person and Authority. Here the Wickedness and Perjury are intolerable, for they are so impious as to explain what they mean by the King's Authority, in the Preservation and Defence of the True Religion and Liberties of the Kingdom. The Lord Clarendon and Mr. Archdeacon have not the least Conception of any such Authority; that the World may bear Witnesses with our Consciences of our Loyalty, and that we have no Thoughts or Intentions to diminish his Majesty's just Power and Greatness. For the Power those two Historians always intend is unjust and arbitrary.

The Fourth Article concerns one of those Historians personally, That they will endeavour to bring all Malignants, Incendiaries and evil Counsellors to condign Punishment. The Parliament had declar'd Mr. Edward Hyde to be one of those Malignants, and he could not therefore be much in Love with this Covenant, or think it any thing better than Perjury and Wickedness.

The Fifth Article is, To preserve the Peace between England and Scotland, and punish all that oppose it.

The Sixth is a general Confirmation of all the rest, And that they will never yield to a detestable Neutrality, but continue constant to their Covenant to their Lives End.

The King publish'd a Proclamation against taking the Covenant, but it was taken before that Proclamation came out by both Houses of Parliament, the City of London, the Clergy, &c. And if they had not done it, one cannot suppose they would have been hinder'd by a Proclamation, which, like the Thunder of the Vatican, had of late lost all Effect and Terror.

Scots. His Majesty was very well inform'd of the Proceedings of the Scots towards assisting the Parliament; and tho' he could not prevent the Meeting of the Estates at Edinburgh, yet when they were about raising an Army, he issu'd a Proclamation against it, and he might as soon have beaten the Army with a Proclamation as have hinder'd the raising it. He also permitted the Earl, whom he made Marquis of Montrose, to invite the Marquis of Antrim, with 2000 Irish Rebels; into Scotland, and those Papists under Calkito, Brother to Antrim, joining Montrose, reatled the Massacre of Ireland, as the learned

Ach. 552. Lawyer informs us, by murdering Men, Women and Children, and added to the Cruelty the burning their Houses and Habitations. These Butchers were intended to make a Diversion in that Kingdom as soon as the Scots Army enter'd England, and the King at the same Time drew off the best English Regiments from Ireland, as Sir William S. Leger's, Sir Michael Ernly's, Sir Richard Fleetwood's, Col. Myn's, Col. Monk's, Col. Warren's, by which Means the bloody-minded Rebels were left at Liberty to continue their horrid Butcherings, Burnings, Rapes and Robberies. We have mention'd the Care which the Parliament took of that Kingdom, by procuring Subscriptions for vast Sums of Money for raising Forces to oppose those Rebels, and relieve the Protestants; which Care of theirs had not the desir'd Success, by Reason of the Delays the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland met with in his

Ireland.

Dispatches from the Court, of which his Lordship complains in the Letter to the Earl of Northumberland; and it might well be so, when the Irish Rebels had Agents at Court, and a Cessation of Arms with them was in Treaty soon after the King set up his Standard. His Majesty refus'd to pass the Act to enforce the Payment of the Subscription-Money for the Service of Ireland. That Act was sent to him by Sir Robert King, William Jephson, Esq; and Arthur Hill, Esq;. The Pretext was, that the Money would be employ'd against him. But the true Reason was probably that it would be employ'd against the Irish Papists then in Rebellion, tho' he would not allow them to be call'd Rebels; inasmuch that when Sir Edward Walker gave him his Manuscript Memoirs, wherever the Term Rebels was us'd, he struck it out, and with his own Hand wrote Irish, as A. Wood informs us. Mr. Jephson seeing the Lord Dillon and the Lord Taaf, two Irish Papists, in high Favour with the Court at Oxford, told the Lord Falkland, then Secretary of State, "There were two Lords

A. D. 1643. "about the King, who to his Majesty's great Dishonour, and the great Discouragement of his good Subjects, did make use of his Majesty's Name to encourage the Rebels; that he had seen two Letters sent by the Lord Dillon and the Lord Taaf to the Lord Muskerry, the chief Man in the Rebellion of Munster, intimating, that tho' it did not stand with the Conveniency of his Majesty's Affairs to give him publick Countenance, yet the King was well pleas'd with what he had done, and would in Time give him Thanks for it; which Letters were also seen by the Lord Inchiquen, General of the English Forces in Munster, and by his Secretary, who took Copies of them;" which Mr. Jephson said should be forthcoming, and my Lord Falkland cry'd, They deserve to be bang'd. But the Matter was no further inquir'd into. On the contrary, their Negotiations in Favour of their Fellow-Rebels went on successfully, as will be seen in the Sequel. Before we proceed in the Affairs of England, we will take a transient View of the Rebellion in Ireland, from its Beginning to this Time.

The first Town the Rebels undertook to be-siege was Drogheda, which was bravely defended by the Governor Sir Henry Tichburn, the Lord Moore, young Sir John Borlace, and other gallant Officers; and after the Garrison had been reduc'd to eat Horses, Dogs, and Cats, the Lord Moore making a Sally with 400 Horse, fell upon Sir Phelim Oneal, General of the Rebels, and put him to Flight; which so discourag'd the Irish, that they rais'd the Siege; after which Sir Henry Tichburn and the Lord Moore recover'd Dundalk. Sir Simon Harcourt, Colonel of the first Regiment that was sent from England against the Irish Rebels, was kill'd before the Castle of Carrickmain, within four Miles of Dublin, as was also Major Bor; but their Men reveng'd their Death, storm'd and enter'd the Castle, and put all the Irish to the Sword. In April 1642. the Marquis of Ormond march'd out of Dublin with 3000 Foot and 500 Horse, most of them Troops sent by the Parliament to the Assistance of the Protestants under Col. Monk, Sir Michael Ernly, Sir Richard Greenwoile, and other good Officers. The Lord Ormond engag'd the Rebels at Kilrush, and defeated them, tho' much above twice his Number, killing 700, among whom the Lord Dunboyne's Brother and the Lord Ikerin's Son were the Chief. Many Colonels and Captains fell on the Spot. In May the Rebels held that great Council at Kilkenny, which Leti speaks of and asserts that this Meeting

Life Cromw.

A. D. 1643. was with the King's Consent. They took the Government of the Kingdom into their own Hands, as far as their Power extended, drawing up a Form of it, which was approv'd of by these Popish Bishops; Hugh Archbishop of Armagh, David Bishop of Ossory, Emery Bishop of Down and Connor, Thomas Archbishop of Cashels, Boetius Bishop of Elphin, John Bishop of Clonsfert, Malachy Archbishop of Tuam, Patrick Bishop of Waterford, Rock Bishop of Kildare, with some Deans, Abbots, Priors, and one Archdeacon John Bowwick, who were all involv'd in the Rebellion and Massacre, and had the same Hands with which they absolv'd and blest'd their Penitents, stain'd with the Blood of 200000 Innocents by Commission, or Permission; for the Pardon of which and all other Sins Pope Urban VIII. sent them a Bull. The Delay of Relief to Ireland could not be avoided, by Reason of the Danger the Parliament was fallen into in England, which oblig'd them to provide for their own Defence in the first Place. If they could not defend themselves, the Defence of the Protestants in Ireland must fall of course. They did however send them Supplies of Men, Money, Arms, and Ammunition, some of which Supplies were intercepted by the King's Forces, as particularly Arms and Clothes, which were seiz'd by them near Coventry. The Parliament in one of the Papers deliver'd by their Commissioners to the King's at Uxbridge, say, "Tho' the Complaints from Ireland, and the great Extremities of the Protestants, have been procur'd and increas'd by the Popish Party, yet earnest Endeavours have been us'd to lay the Blame and Neglect therein upon the Two Houses of Parliament, who have been so zealous for their Relief, and whose only Care, under God, hath been their Preservation; and that in the Heat of our miserable Distractions, they have continu'd their Supplies; and from their own great Want, have not spar'd to afford our Brethren there the Means of their Subsistence." Mr. Robert Goodwin and Mr. Robert Reynolds, two Members of the House of Commons, were appointed to reside at Dublin. With them went Colonel Tucker of London, afterwards kill'd at Newbury Fight. They carry'd over 20000 Pounds in Money, 300 Barrels of Powder, 10 Ton of Match, &c. The Lords Justices and Council receiv'd these Gentlemen with Respect, and they us'd their Endeavours to satisfy the Officers of the Army of the Care the Parliament took to make Provision of all Kinds for them. It is very obvious that the Residence of these two Deputies would be of good Use, not only to give the Two Houses right Information of the State of Affairs in that Kingdom, but also to encourage the Officers and Soldiers by their Presence. The King, who had other Service for the Army there, did not like this Deputation from the Parliament, and sent Orders that the two Deputies should not be admitted into the Council; so they return'd to England, and the Cessation with the Massacres went on briskly.

The Marquis of Ormond, with 2500 Foot and 500 Horse defeated an Army of the Rebels, 6000 Foot and 650 Horse, in Ross, kill'd 300, took Lieutenant-General Cullens and many Prisoners, with their Baggage and Ammunition; and soon after he receiv'd a Commission from his Majesty to treat with our Subjects who have taken Arms against us, and to agree with them upon a CESSATION. The rebellious Murderers are term'd Subjects, and spoken of with much Tenderness. The Lords and Commons, and the Protestant People of England, are Rebels, Traytors, and Devils, as far as the Malice and Insolence of the Oxford Men could make A. D. them so. This pious Commission was confirm'd a Week after by a second Command, and follow'd with an Order to Sir John Borlace and Sir Henry Tichburn, Lords Justices, to agree to that Cessation, tho' contrary to the LAW OF THE LAND, THE KNOWN LAW OF THE LAND, to all LAWS of Nature and Nations, Divine and Humane. His Majesty, says Mr. Acherley, laid aside his Promises, to observe without Violation the LAWS passed in this Parliament, for by the Cessation with the REBELS the Security of the Adventurers was to be enervated and defeated. We have been often, and shall again and again be told he was fighting for the Laws, &c. There has not been, nor will be a Proclamation or Declaration but what is full of the LAWS, THE LAWS OF THE LAND, and the like Terms. The Council of Kilkenny appointed Nicholas Viscount Gormanston, Donogh Viscount Muskerry, Sir Lucas Dillon, Sir Robert Talbot, Tirlogh Oneale, Esq; Geoffrey Brown, Esq; Ever Mac Gennis, Esq; and John Walsh, Esq; to treat with the Marquis of Ormond, who made no Scruple of entering into an Agreement with those execrable Wretches, and concluded a Cessation the 15th of December, in the Articles of which those detestable REBELS are styl'd his Majesty's Good Subjects. To make way for this wicked and infamous Treaty, Sir William Parsons, one of the Lords Justices, was turn'd out of his Place, as were also Sir John Temple Master of the Rolls, Sir Adam Loftus Under-Treasurer of Ireland, and Sir Robert Meredith a Privy-Counsellor, for dissuading the Cessation, as dangerous, scandalous and illegal. The Parliament of England publish'd a Declaration against it; the Protestants of Ireland opposed it with all the Vigour they were capable of; yet with the most confounding Confidence it is said, the Cessation with the Massacres was made for no other End than to save those Protestants from Destruction; whereas in Truth it was made for no other End than to bring over the Forces the Parliament had rais'd and sent to Ireland against the REBELS, and employ them against the Lords and Commons of England. This Design was so barefac'd, that it impos'd upon no Body, and only made the People shake their Heads in Pity of such Counsels, which tending to the greatest Evil, pretended to the greatest Good. The Parliament say in their Declaration, "The Wants of the Army were often represented and complain'd of, whereby with much Craft a Ground was preparing for the Pretext, wherewith they would cover the Counsels of this Cessation, as if nothing had drawn it on but the extreme Wants of their Armies; whereas it is evident that the Reports of a Treaty have been in a great Part the Cause of their Wants, for thereby the Adventurers were dishearten'd. Contributions were stopp'd, and by the Admittance to Court of the Negotiators of this Cessation, their wicked Counsels have had that Influence as to procure the Interceptions of much Provisions which were sent for Ireland; and others coming from thence with Commodities to exchange for Victuals, have been taken not only by Dunkirkers, having his Majesty's Warrant, but also by English Ships commanded by Sir John Pennington under his Majesty: The Parliament's Messengers, with Ordinances for Loans and Contributions, have been taken and imprison'd, their Money seiz'd, and not a Penny either Contribution or Loan hath been suffer'd to be sent in for Ireland from those Counties which were under the Power of the King's Army,

A. D. 1643. " Army, while in the mean time the Houses of Parliament were still procuring no contemptible Aid and Relief for the distress'd Protestants in that Kingdom." The Earl of Clarendon says, and Eckard vouches for him that he is in the right, the Cessation was pious and just, and it is self-evident that there is no Act of Injustice and Impiety to compare with it in all Story, the Blood of 200000 innocent Men, Women, and Children being sacrific'd to it, and the Murderers were dismiss'd with Impunity.

Before this accurs'd Treaty was concluded, St. Leger's and Myn's Regiments, already mention'd, were shipp'd for England, and landed at Bristol, where the Lord Hopton receiv'd them under his Command, which, according to Acherley, proves that Ormond knew the REBELS would be obedient to the King's Inclinations. The other Regiments were sent to Chester, and receiv'd and commanded by the Lord Byron. Before and after these came over, several Irish Rebels, Officers and Soldiers, as Lord Muskerry, Callagan o Callegan, and others, who were welcome to the Court at Oxford, in which City Ludlow saw some of them when he was there a Prisoner; and he informs us, they were sent by the Papists in Rebellion to treat with the King about assisting him against the Parliament.

Scots.

The Committee of Estates in Scotland having summon'd all the Lords of the Council to take the Covenant, Duke Hamilton and some more refus'd it, for which their Goods were order'd to be seiz'd, their Rents to be gather'd, and their Persons to be apprehended. The Duke and his Brother the Earl of Lanerick went to Oxford, where Montrose had been before-hand, and represented their temporising with the Covenanters as Treachery. The Design of the Hamiltonians, since they could not hinder the raising an Army for the Parliament, was to have as many Lords as would take Service in it be chosen from among the King's Friends, that when they were in England they might assume the Umpirage between both Parties, and join against that which would not consent to an Accommodation. These Counsels were condemn'd by Montrose and the rigid Royalists as fraudulent; and the Queen hating Hamilton, so prepossess'd the King against him, that his Majesty was deaf to his Reasons. I know it will be thought to be taken from the scandalous Chronicle, but I have it from good and great Authority, that the Queen's Hatred to Hamilton was occasion'd by his being a little too curious, and having made some such Discovery

M. S.

'tis said cost Ovid a perpetual Banishment; that Hamilton had profess'd Gallantry at Court, where Fermin was prefer'd, and his Jealousy making him very watchful, he saw what may be better imagin'd than express'd. I know the Ground we walk on is slippery, and therefore leave it, tho' I do not want Supporters if I had a mind to go further. Neither of the Hamiltons were admitted to the King's Presence. They were both imprison'd as soon as they arriv'd, and severely us'd. The Resentment of the Court was push'd so far, that it was talk'd of trying them for their Lives. Lanerick's great Crime was the putting the King's Signet, of which he had the keeping as Secretary of State, to a Proclamation for a General Rendezvous of the Army that was to march into England. Those Writers, as Eckard and others of that Stamp, who speak of Duke Hamilton's Correspondence with the Kirk Men, had never Opportunities of informing themselves of the Truth in doubtful Matters, or they might have known that the Duke was authoriz'd by King Charles I. to favour the Covenanters that he might find out their Designs, and he was now so treated, according to Eckard, not for looking upon a Lady and her Lover, but for looking upon the Covenanters, and sometimes sitting with them. What he or his Originals spin so finely, as to the Duke's mysterious Conduct, is only one of those Visions with which their Heads are sometimes giddy. Hamilton had been bred under a Mother, Lady Ann Cuninghame, Daughter to the Earl of Glencairn, who was a zealous Presbyterian and Covenanter, and his Heart doubtless hung that Way, but his Ambition, and the Glory of being a Favourite, kept him from engaging further than consisted with the Character of a Courtier, and that was enough to render him suspected, and Suspicion enough to cause his Confinement, when the Court were so afraid of the Scots. The Marquis of Montrose, and those who came from Scotland, knew so much of his countenancing the Covenanters in Raising the Army intended for England, that it was resolv'd to try him for High Treason. The Queen push'd on this Trial, and made so sure of the Duke and the Earl of Lanerick's being found guilty, that when she heard the latter had made his Escape, she said, Abercorn has mist a Duke-dom. The Lord Abercorn was a Papist, and next the two Brothers in Succession to that Title. The Duke must have been try'd as Earl of Cambridge, and the Court found the Majority of their own Lords would not convict him, so they sent him Prisoner to Pendennis, and afterwards to St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, where he remain'd till that Place was surrender'd to the Parliament's Forces three Years after, and two Years after that he commanded an Army against the Parliament. The Matter of the Trial was push'd so far, that a Warrant was actually sign'd by the King, and undersign'd by the King himself as a Secretary of State, for executing both Duke Hamilton and his Brother the Earl of Lanerick, which the Lords procur'd; and to have them try'd at a distance from Oxford, that if they were condemn'd Sentence might be executed before they could get a Pardon; for the Lords doubted not if they were pardoned they would have the King's Ear again, and then their Judges would have been infallibly ruin'd. The Lord Berkeley of Stratton shew'd Bishop Burnet the original Warrant.

Burnet;

In the beginning of the Winter Prince Maurice came before Exeter with an Army, and laid Siege to it. The Earl of Stamford was in the City, but not with a sufficient Strength to defend it a long Time. The Citizens, like the Inhabitants of other Cathedral Towns, being Enemies to those who declar'd for the Protestant Religion, the Rights and Liberties of the People, and for bringing Delinquents to Justice. The Lord Stamford in the Articles of Surrender, committed a great Weakness and Error, by stipulating for a Pardon for himself, Sir George Chudleigh, Sir John Bampfild, Sir John Northcot, Sir Samuel Roberts, Sir Nicholas Martin, &c. These Gentlemen could not be overstock'd with Wisdom, if they had been so long venturing their Lives and Fortunes in a Cause which they thought needed a Pardon. The Parliament was much disgusted at it, and there was a Discourse of Calling the Earl to an Account for that Article, and his whole Conduct in their Service, but nothing came of it.

The King having succeeded so ill in the Siege Digby's of Gloucester, an Attempt was made to get the City by Treason since it could not be got by Arms. The Lord Digby employ'd one Stamford, a Friend to Captain Backhouse, who commanded a Company in Gloucester, to enter into a Negotiation for betraying the Town. Backhouse was offer'd 5000 Pounds, and actually received 200 Pounds. Several Letters pass between

A Cavalier Party of Horse and Foot advanc'd as far as Lassington Hill, in Expectation of hearing from Backhouse that he was ready to admit them into the Place, but no News coming they mistrusted Backhouse had discover'd the Plot and retreated to Newent.

Col. Skippon takes Grafton. Major General Skippon with about 1000 Foot; a Party of Horse, and four Pieces of Ordnance march'd from Newport Pagnel to Grafton Regis, where the King's Forces had a strong Garrison in a House of the Lady Crane's. After three Days Siege the Governor Sir John Digby desir'd a Parley, and agreed to surrender. The Garrison were all made Prisoners, and among them Sir John Digby, Major Brookband, Captain Clarke, Captain Longfield, Captain Butler, 80 Troopers, 100 Foot, three Ministers, and several Gentlemen that came thither Volunteers. Major Brookband having formerly deserted the Parliament's Service was try'd by a Council of War, condemn'd, and shot to Death about Christmas.

The Garrison had for some Time been blockt up by the Royalists, who took a Fort called Mount Stamford upon Articles. The Town was much streighten'd and terrify'd by it. However, the Garrison and Towns-men were so faithful to the Parliament that they all took an Oath to defend the Place to the utmost Extremity. The Gentlemen of the King's Party who lay before the Town sent a Summons; which was sign'd by John Digby, Thomas Bassett, Peter Killegrew, John Wagstaff, Jonathan Trekarony, R. Prideaux, John Arundel, Thomas Monk, William Arundel, John Downing, Thomas Stukely; with Offers of Pardon, and Security for Persons and Estates, if the Mayor and Governor would surrender, but they return'd no Answer, and the Royalists continu'd the Siege, which was commanded by Prince Maurice, whose Forces took the Town Guard at Lazy Point, and in it 6 Pieces of Ordnance. There happen'd other Skirmishes, as that at Lypson Work and Lare Point, in which 100 Cavaliers were driven into the Mud, and most of them either taken, stifled or drown'd, though not without considerable Loss to the Besieg'd. The Batteries of the Besiegers were so counterbatter'd from the Works that their Men could not stand to their Guns, and did little Execution, so that after a tedious, fruitless Siege, Prince Maurice was forc'd to abandon it. The Prince had taken Lyme and Darimouth by the same Means as he hop'd to take Plymouth, the Treachery of those that had the Keeping of them.
